The Appellant, in 1822, filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, stating the facts before mentioned, and charging laches and collusion between Richard Creagh and the parties managing the estate of the lunatic, and particularly that no rent was demanded of the Lysaghts or C. Lopdell, or his representatives, nor enforced by the receivers against Richard Creagh, although there was always a sufficient distress upon the lands to recover the rents. The bill prayed that an account might be taken of what Stephen Darcy received or might have received out of the lands, and an account of what William Croker received or without wilful default might have received out of the lands, or what was received or without his wilful default might have been received by George O'Callaghan out of the lands, and that credit might be given for the same to Plaintiff, or if by lapse of time, or the contrivances of Stephen Darcy, William Croker or George O'Callaghan, such accounts could not be taken, then that Robert Creagh might be perpetually restrained, by injunction, from proceeding on the judgment obtained by [265] him for recovery of the rent found to be due by the jury before whom the action of covenant was tried.

The Respondent, by his committee, having answered the bill, the Appellant moved the Lord Chancellor, by way of appeal from an order of the Master of the Rolls, to continue the injunction until the hearing, and thereupon it was ordered that the injunction should be continued until further order, the Appellant undertaking to give security by his own recognizance before one of the masters, in the sum of £180 (the amount of assets found at law to have come to his hands,) conditioned to abide the decree to be made in the cause.

Issue having been joined, and witnesses examined, the cause came on to be heard on pleadings and proofs, on the 30th of June, 1823, before the Lord Chancellor, when the bill was dismissed with costs, and the injunction dissolved.

From this decree the appeal was presented.

For the Appellant: Mr. Brougham,* Mr. Merivale.

* In opening the appeal, Mr. Brougham submitted that it ought to stand over till the question which was the subject of the preceding appeal had been decided.

There is no evidence that Christopher Lopdell ever was in possession of the lands since the year 1791, or that James Lopdell as administrator, or the Appellant as administrator de bonis non, were ever called upon, from that time, until the time of bringing the action of covenant in Hilary Term, 1821, either under the covenants in the lease, or otherwise, in respect of the rent of the lands, although [266] such rent was, during the whole, or most of that period, in arrear, and unreceived; and James and Andrew Lysaght, and afterwards Richard Creagh, being successively, in the rentals filed, and accounts passed by the several receivers, named as tenants of the lands to the Respondent, and from the several other circumstances of this case, as proved on the part of the Appellant, a surrender of the lease of the 15th of April, 1762, ought to be presumed in favour of the Appellant. Notwithstanding the verdicts which have been obtained on the several trials of the action at law against the Appellant, it is competent for a Court of equity, which is not bound by the decision of a Court of law, in a case of this nature, to admit such presumption. It is no objection, against the admissibility of such presumption, that the Respondent is a lunatic, and has been found, upon Inquisition, to have been so since the month of March, 1786, at which time Christopher Lopdell is alleged to have been still in possession under the lease; because such finding is not inconsistent with the supposition that the lunatic might have had lucid intervals, and that during one of such lucid intervals, such surrender might have been accepted; and there is evidence in the cause, of the lunatic having had at least one such lucid interval; and even if such evidence were wanting, or if the fact were negatived, yet, the acceptance of such surrender not being an act in the discretion of the Respondent, it is not necessary for the presumption of such surrender to suppose that it was made during such lucid interval.

There was gross neglect on the part of the several committees and receivers, who were from time to time appointed to manage the Respondent's estate, [267] and to collect the rents, in suffering the rent to be in arrear, and in not resorting to the land for payment, although it appears by the evidence that there was at all times, or at least generally, a sufficiency of stock on the premises, in case they had thought fit to distrain; and, in consequence of no steps having been taken in pursuance of the order of the 23d of July, 1811; and also in consequence of the order for vacating the recognizance, entered into by William Croker, and his sureties, having been collusively obtained upon the petition of the representatives of the sureties, the Appellant is precluded from any remedy which he might otherwise have had against the estates of the sureties. These facts when coupled with the circumstances of relationship between the several parties, and with other facts of the case, afford strong ground for presuming fraud and collusion on the part of those to whom such neglect is attributable; the Appellant has been rendered liable to a demand in respect of the rent so suffered to be in arrear, to which, but for such gross neglect, he never would have been liable; the demand made is, under such circumstances, wholly unconscientious, and one against which, upon every principle of justice, a Court of equity is bound to afford relief.

The presumption of an assignment from Christopher Lopdell to Richard Creagh, (which presumption appears to be necessary, in order to repel the contrary presumption of surrender,) has been directly negatived by the affidavit made by Richard Creagh, in the lunacy of the Respondent, which was given in evidence on the part of the Appellant: it appears by that affidavit, and by the evidence, that Richard Creagh entered into possession of the lands, not as the assignee of Christopher Lopdell, [268] or claiming or deriving under him, but as the agent and manager of the estate of the Respondent, who was his brother by the half blood; and in the event of whose dying intestate, Richard Creagh, would be entitled, as one of the next of kin, to a distributive share of any monies to be recovered from the Appellant, on account of the rents of the lands; the entire rents of which lands, Richard Creagh had himself received already, and fraudulently converted to his own use, instead of paying or accounting for the same annually, to the different

But it was suggested by the Respondent's counsel, that in argument it might be assumed that the evidence was read as entered in the Register's note, and thereupon the appeal proceeded.

receivers in the matter of the lunacy, as the same became due; to which fraud or neglect of Richard Creagh in not paying or accounting for the same, it is owing, that the Appellant became liable at law to the payment.

For the Respondent: Mr. Sugden; Mr. Pepys.

The Appellant does not allege that Stephen Darcy, William Croker, or George O'Callaghan, ever received any money out of the lands; but on the contrary, the case made and relied on by the Appellant in his bill, is inconsistent with the fact of any such sum having been received. An account of what those several persons, or any of them, might, without wilful default, have received out of the lands, would be perfectly immaterial; for even if in fact it should appear that any such sum might have been received, the Appellant would not be entitled to credit for such sum, nor would his liability be in any way lessened in consequence. The accounts prayed by the bill could not be directed in the absence of George O'Callaghan, or of the representatives of Stephen Darcy and William Croker: who are not parties in the suit.

[269] Christopher Lopdell having by the indenture of the 15th of April, 1762, covenanted to pay the rent during the continuance of the term, he and his representatives were bound by the covenant during the term; and at all events, whether he and his representatives were so liable or not, and whether in fact the term did continue until the period to which the Respondent claimed the rent or not, were questions cognizable in a court of law, and have already been decided in favour of Respondent, by the proper tribunal. The Appellant has not established any facts sufficient to warrant a court of equity to interfere to protect the Appellant from his legal liability, and to deprive the Respondent of his legal right; for mere lapse of time, independent of any other circumstances, cannot create an equitable bar to a legal right, when the legislature has not thought fit to constitute it a legal bar; and in this case the Appellant has not proved any other circumstances, and has not shown that any collusion existed between the several persons charged therein with in his bill; and even if in fact any collusion did exist between them, it must have been for the purpose of defrauding the Respondent; and if a court of equity should now restrain the Respondent from enforcing his legal claim, it would in effect promote the object of that collusion, and lend its aid to the accomplishment of fraud.

If the Appellant has sustained any loss as Administrator, it has been occasioned by the neglect and want of good faith of Christopher Lopdell, who, when he transferred his interest in the lands to Richard Creagh, might have protected himself, by obtaining from Richard Creagh proper security for the performance of those covenants by which he was him-[270]self bound, and whose peculiar duty it was, considering the unfortunate situation in which the Respondent then was, to take good care that any person whom he might substitute as tenant in his own stead, should faithfully discharge his duty as such. Christopher Lopdell and his representatives were at all times primarily liable to the Respondent, and those concerned for the Respondent were not bound, in the first instance, to resort to any other person.

The Appellant cannot derive any equity from the recognizance entered into by the securities of William Croker having been vacated, inasmuch as the Appellant would not be entitled to have any part of the sum secured thereby, applied in discharge of the debt for which he is liable as such administrator, even if the whole amount of the recognizance should now be levied from the sureties, the same being only a security for what William Croker actually received out of the Respondent's estate; and William Croker never having received any sum out of the lands, or on account of the rent thereof, the Appellant could not in any event be entitled to have the recognizance enforced against the sureties for his benefit: for even if the recognizance should be deemed a security for such sums as William Croker might have received, yet inasmuch as Christopher Lopdell and his representatives were at all times liable to the Respondent for the rent of the premises, it was the duty of William Croker to have compelled the payment thereof by Christopher and his representatives; and although the sureties might be liable to the Respondent in consequence of William Croker's neglect, yet the Respondent might resort to those who were always liable to the payment of rent and from whom William Croker ought to have received the [271] same; and so far from Christopher Lopdell and his representatives having any right in such case to be reimbursed by those for whom William Croker ought to have received the rent, the sureties would in case of default have a claim in equity against the Appellant, but the Appellant could not in any event have any claim against the sureties.

The Lord Chancellor (Lord Lyndhurst), in the course of the argument observed, that the questions of limitation of time, and presumption of surrender of the lease, were peculiarly questions for the decision of a court of law: that the affidavit of Richard Creagh was evidence only that such an affidavit had been made, not of the facts contained in it: that the receipts of Richard Creagh proposed to be introduced as evidence being mere abstracts of the original receipts copied from dictation, and not even compared with the originals, could not be admitted in evidence; and that notice to produce the originals having been served upon a person not a party in the suit, was wholly inoperative, and could not be admitted as a ground to receive the secondary evidence of copies. The Lord Chancellor also observed, that some equity had been opened by the Appellant's counsel, but no case proved; and thereupon the judgment was affirmed with £150 costs.

IRELAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

WILLIAM HENRY ARCHER.—Appellant; WILLIAM LITTLE.—Respondent.

By an Act of Parliament for the improvement of the city of Dublin, reciting that the cleansing of the streets before an Act passed in 1784, had been managed by the Corporation of Dublin, and the expense defrayed by them out of the tolls and customs of the city; and that since 1784, the Corporation had paid to certain intended Commissioners the sum of £2000 yearly, towards the expenses of cleansing the streets, it is enacted that, from the passing of the Act, the Corporation shall pay to the Commissioners of Paving, etc. appointed by the Act £2000 yearly, out of the revenue arising from the tolls and customs of the city.

The Corporation, according to the Act, paid the £2000 annually until 1818, after which, the payment being in arrear, the Commissioners, by their Secretary, under the authority of the Act, in Easter Term, 1819, brought an action against the Treasurer of the Corporation to recover £2000, being one year's instalment. After appearance, the Corporation represented, that the tolls and customs were insufficient to pay any part of the £2000, and proposed that the action should be stayed without prejudice to other proceedings. To this proposal the Commissioners acceded, and the action was discontinued.

In 1821, the Commissioners brought another action to recover arrears, among which, by the fourth count in the declaration, £6000 were claimed, as due on account of the arrear for three years' payment for cleansing the streets, to which the Defendants pleaded that during the three years in the count mentioned, no revenue had arisen to the Corporation out of the tolls and customs whereout the Corporation could have paid to the Commissioners, etc. In consequence of this plea, the Commissioners, in the name of their Secretary, filed a bill in Chancery against the Defendant in the action, stating the facts above-mentioned, and charging that the tolls were not deficient, and setting forth the particulars of various tolls and customs, claimed and received by the Corporation: that before and since 1784, the Corporation had let the tolls or some part of them upon leases at large rents; and [273] that since the year 1784, the Corporation had received in tolls every year, beyond the sum paid to the Commissioners, a surplus annually of £2000 at the least. Upon these statements, with interrogatories founded upon them, the bill prayed, in aid of the action a discovery and account of the revenue arising from tolls and customs, and of the leases granted, and the rents received and paid upon the same.

To this bill the Defendant demurred:—1st, as to so much as sought a discovery and account of the surplus of revenue received by the Corporation in every year since 1784, beyond the sum paid to the Commissioners; the cause assigned was, that such surplus was not liable to the payment of the arrears of future years; the second demurrer was to so much of the bill as sought a discovery of the leases of tolls and customs granted by the Corporation since 1784, and not subsisting since 1818; the ground of this demurrer was, that, the arrears had been paid up to 1818, and that the surplus of tolls before 1818, could not be applicable to the payment of arrears accruing after 1818.

The Defendant also put in a long answer in which he admitted that the Corporation and their lessees both before and since the year 1784, had demanded and received tolls on various articles, and that payments had been and were made upon ships entering the harbour and ferries; but contended that such payments were not liable under the Act to the payment of the £2000; and he set forth accounts in schedules, of tolls and customs and payments made for ships and ferries since 1818; insisting that since that time there had been no surplus monies received upon tolls and customs after defraying the expence of collection.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court below) that the demurrers should be overruled.

The reasons for the judgment on the appeal were: first, because the demurrers were overruled by the answer; and secondly, because even admitting that the surplus of former years was not applicable to the payment of arrears of future years, the discovery of the revenues actually received in such years might be material to furnish presumptive evidence upon the trial of the action.

The Appellant was the Treasurer of the Corporation of the city of Dublin; the Respondent was Secretary to the Corporation called the Commissioners for paving, cleansing, and lighting the streets of the city of Dublin.

[274] By an Act of Parliament (47th George III.), entitled "An Act for the more effectual Improvement of the City of Dublin, and the Environs thereof," the Commissioners for paving, cleansing, and lighting the streets of the city of Dublin, were constituted a Corporation. The Act recited, that the Corporation of Dublin were, before the passing of an Act therein recited, (26th Geo. III.) liable to keep in repair certain parts of the pavements of the city, the annual expence of which was estimated to amount to £300, which sum was directed to be paid by them, as a compensation for the paving thereof. Upon this recital it is enacted, that the Corporation of Dublin should pay to the Treasurer of the Commissioners, the annual sum of £300, together with a further sum of £50 in every year, for the pavement round St. Stephen's Green, amounting in the whole to the sum of £350 per annum; and that in consideration of the payments so to be made, the Corporation of Dublin should be exonerated from all expenses of paving and repairing the pavements. The Act further reciting, that the Corporation were theretofore used to maintain several lamps at the Mansion-House, Tholsel, and Market-House, enacts that the Treasurer of the city should pay for such purposes to the Treasurer of the Commissioners, the annual sum of £20 in every year; and that, in consideration of such payment, the Corporation should be exonerated from all expenses of lighting those lamps.

The Act further reciting, that the cleansing of the streets, and other places in the city of Dublin, before the passing of a certain Act, (23d and 24th Geo. III.,) was conducted under the direction of the Corporation, and the expenses thereof defrayed by them out of the revenue arising from the [275] tolls and customs of the city; and that since the passing of the 23d and 24th Geo. III., the Corporation had paid to the Commissioners or Directors intended to manage the paving, lighting, and cleansing the city, the sum of £2000 yearly, towards defraying the expenses of cleansing the streets; enacts, that the Corporation of Dublin shall, from the passing of the Act, pay, and continue to pay to the Commissioners, the annual sum of £2000 out of the revenue of the city, arising from the tolls and customs of the city, by equal half-yearly payments to be made on the 25th day of March, and the 29th day of September in every year: and it is further enacted, that in case any body corporate should neglect or refuse to pay any rates to be assessed by virtue of the Act, the Commissioners, or their proper officers or officer, might recover the same by action, or other legal proceeding instituted against the Treasurer of such body corporate, in the name of the Secretary to the Commissioners.

The Corporation of Dublin, from time to time, and up to the year 1818, paid the annual sums of £350, £20, and £2000.

On the 25th of March, 1819, an arrear being due to the Commissioners, they, in Easter Term, 1819, commenced an action in the King's Bench, in Ireland, in the name of the Respondent, as their Secretary, against the Appellant, as Treasurer to the Corporation, for the recovery of the arrear. The Appellant having entered his appearance to the action, it was alleged by the Corporation, that the annual sum of £2000 was payable only out of the revenue of the city of Dublin, arising from the tolls and customs of the city, and that such revenue was unproductive, and insufficient to pay the whole or any [276] part of the sum of £2000, for which the action had been brought: and thereupon a proposition was made by the Appellant on the part of the Corporation, that the Commissioners should accept of the arrear of £20 and £350, without prejudice to any proceedings they should think fit to adopt for the recovery of the £2000. The Commissioners, believing the representation as to the tolls and customs of the city being unproductive, to be true, acceded to the proposition: and received the two sums of £20 and £350, leaving the sum of £2000 still in arrear.

On the 25th day of March, 1821, further arrears became due, amounting to the sum of £4610, in addition to the £2000, and making altogether an arrear of £6610; and the Commissioners, in Easter Term, 1821, commenced another action. As to the arrear of £6000, which was claimed by the fourth count of the declaration filed in the action, as the compensation payable under the Act for cleansing the streets, the Defendant pleaded, that he did not owe the same, or any part thereof: and, that during the three years in the fourth count mentioned, ending the 25th March, 1821, no revenue arose to the Corporation out of the tolls and customs of the city, whereout the Corporation could have paid to the Respondent, or to the Commissioners, the sum of £6000, and that the Corporation had not received out of the tolls and customs of the city the sum of £6000, or any part thereof.

In December, 1821, the Commissioners filed a bill in Chancery, stating the facts above set forth, and charged, that the Respondent could not go to trial in the suit at law without a discovery; that the tolls were not deficient, as alleged by the Corporation; and that, if they were so, such deficiency was [277] occasioned by the misconduct of the Corporation; that the Corporation had made illegal demands for tolls and customs: that they were in the receipt of various tolls and customs arising from the public markets, which were properly chargeable with the payment of the annual sum of £2000, that such markets in some cases had been let at considerable annual rents, particularly the markets in Halston-Street, or the Little Green, and Mary's-Lane: that large tolls and customs were collected from the market at Smithfield and Kevin-Street, and at the Burgh-Quay, at Stoney-Batter, the Grand Canal Harbour, and Frances-Street, and particularly for weighage and cranage; that the Corporation used divers public cranes, which yielded considerable rents; that the Corporation received a customary payment for ships entering the port of Dublin: that there were divers ferries and a bridge over the Anna Liffey, for which they received certain payments; together with large sums for pontage, murrage, passage, stallage, peckage, and weighage.

The bill further stated, that a market-house in Thomas-Street yielded large customary payments; that the Market-House being required for the use of the public, the Commissioners for making convenient streets in the city of Dublin, purchased of the Corporation the Market-House, and all their interest arising therefrom, and the tolls and customs there collected, at the price of £1000, which sum had been received by the Appellant, as Treasurer of the Corporation, since the 25th March, 1819, and applied to the use of the Corporation, and that no part thereof was paid to the Commissioners, in discharge of their demand, upon the foot of the annual sum of £2000, or any part thereof; that [278] the sum of £1000 was awarded by a jury, and that some part thereof was so awarded on account of the loss which the Corporation would sustain in the tolls and customs of the Market-House; in evidence of which loss, proof was given before the jury, of what the Corporation had theretofore made by the Market-House, and the tolls and customs arising therefrom, and what they were thereafter likely to make in respect thereof; that the materials of the Market-House, and the scite thereof, were comparatively of little value, but that in consequence of the loss which would arise to the Corporation by their being thus deprived of the market, and of certain valuable tolls and customs, and also of the rent or sums paid for stallage and stands within or about the same, the sum of £4000 was awarded by the jury.

The bill farther stated, that in, or shortly previous to, the year 1784, the Corporation demised the tolls and customs of the city at the yearly rent of £4050, since which time the Corporation had made various other demises of the tolls and customs for considerable rents, and that the whole of the revenue arising from tolls and customs, was vested in the Corporation, for the purpose of paying and cleansing the streets of Dublin, as appeared from the charters of the Corporation, and also from the Report of a Committee of the House of Commons, made in or about the year 1784; that since the year 1784, the Corporation had never in any one year, paid to the Commissioners more than the sum payable by the Act of the 47th Geo. III., (that is to say), the sum of £2370 in the whole; and that the Corporation had received in every year since the year 1784, over and above the sum paid to the Commis-[279]-sioners, an annual sum of £2000, at the least,* out of which, if there was at the time of filing the bill a deficiency in the tolls and customs received within the last three years, the Commissioners were entitled to satisfaction of the arrear due, or to so much thereof as the annual receipts of the tolls and customs for the said three years should appear to be inadequate to discharge.

The bill charged that the toll receivable by the Corporation was toll thorough; and that the consideration given by them for the same prior to the passing of the Act of the 23d and 24th Geo. III., was by their paving and repairing certain parts of the city, which had since been performed by the Commissioners.

The Bill prayed, that the Appellant, as Treasurer of the Corporation might, in one or more schedule or schedules to be annexed to his answer, set forth a full, true and perfect account, of all and every the revenue of the city of Dublin, arising from tolls and customs, or customary payments, including petty customs of every description, and pontage, murage, passage, stallage, package, weighage, and cramage, and including the tolls, customs, and petty customs relating to, and payable out of, the several public markets and cranes, ferries and bridges, in the city of Dublin, distinguishing which of the several tolls, customs, petty customs, and customary payments, had been available since the 25th day of March, 1818; and might also, in such schedule or [280] schedules, set forth a full and accurate account of the several sums of money, which the several tolls and customs, petty customs, and customary payments respectively, had yielded quarterly since the 25th of March, 1818, and down to the time of filing his answer; and of the several and respective sum and sums of money which the Corporation, or their Treasurer, or other officers, had received thereout respectively since the 25th day of March, 1818; and that the Appellant should, in such schedule, distinguish how much of the tolls and customs, petty customs, and customary payments, had been received by the different officers, servants, farmers, or lessees of the Corporation, and how much had been paid to the Treasurer of the Corporation, and the difference between the sums received and the sums paid to such Treasurer; and that the Appellant should also set forth a full and accurate account (stating the date, term, tenants' name, and the considerations paid), of the several leases (if any) made by the Corporation of the tolls and customs, customary payments, or petty customs aforesaid, or of the markets, cranes, or other places, wherein the same are collected by virtue of such lease or leases, and of the rents reserved upon each lease, and the payments made

* Upon this allegation of the bill an interrogatory must have been framed, which is the subject of the first demurrer. The interrogatories are not set forth in the printed cases: nor is the fourth Count of the declaration on which the case turns. The Lord Chancellor complained of the omission as too common in Irish cases. See post p. 298.

on account of such since the 25th day of March, 1818; and that the Appellant, before he answered the bill, should inspect the books of account of the Corporation, which could give him any information upon the subject, so that he might be enabled to make full answer to the Respondent's bill; and also that the Appellant should state whether he had so done; and should also consult any officer or servant of the Corporation, with regard to such matters and things, [281] for the purpose aforesaid; and that he should state whether he had so done.

The Appellant put in demurrers to part of the bill, and a very long answer to the remainder.

The demurrers filed by the Appellant, are as follows:

"As to so much of the said bill as seeks a discovery whether the Lord Mayor, sheriffs, commons, and citizens of the city of Dublin, have or have not in each and every year since the year 1784, and prior to the year commencing on the 26th day of March, 1818, received an annual sum of £2000 at the least, or any other, and what annual sum, over and above the sum paid to the Directors or Commissioners appointed by Act of Parliament for paying, cleansing and lighting the streets of Dublin; and what sum the said Corporation of the Lord Mayor, sheriffs, commons, and citizens of the city of Dublin received in each and every year, particularly from the said year 1784, down to the end of the year expiring on the 25th day of March, 1818, out of any tolls and customs of the said city, over and above the annual sum paid to the said Directors or Commissioners; and how much such surplus sums in the whole amount to: and as to so much of the said bill as calls upon this Defendant to set forth in a schedule or schedules, or otherwise, any account of any revenue of any description, payable to or received by, or arising to the said Corporation of the Lord Mayor, sheriffs, commons, and citizens of the city of Dublin, in any year previously to the year commencing on the 26th day of March, 1818.—this Defendant doth demur thereto, and for cause of demurrer, this Defendant shows, that it [282] appears and is stated in and by the complainant's bill, that all sums of money due or payable by or from the said Corporation of the Lord Mayor, sheriffs, commons, and citizens of the city of Dublin, to the said Commissioners for paying, cleansing and lighting the streets of Dublin, up to and for the said 25th day of March, 1818, in respect of the annual sum of £2000 in the bill mentioned, have been fully paid, satisfied and discharged by the said Corporation to the said Commissioners; and the Defendant humbly submits and insists, that no sum or sums of money received by the said Corporation as part of the revenue of the said city, arising out of the tolls or customs of the said city or otherwise howsoever, upon, or at any time prior to the said 25th day of March, 1818, is, or ever was, or could be, by law subject or liable to the payment of any alleged arrear of the said annual sum of £2000, accrued, or alleged to have accrued or become payable or due to the said Commissioners by the said Corporation, subsequently to the said 25th day of March, 1818, and therefore that the complainant is not, nor are the said Commissioners, entitled to any discovery with respect to any revenue or receipt whatsoever, of the said Corporation, during any year prior to the year commencing on the 26th day of March, 1818, either from this Defendant or the Corporation of the Lord Mayor, sheriffs, commons, and citizens of the city of Dublin. Wherefore, etc.

"And as to so much of the bill as seeks a discovery of any lease or leases, demise or demises, of the several tolls and customs in the bill mentioned, or any of them, or any part thereof, or any other [283] lease or leases executed by the said Lord Mayor, sheriffs, commons, and citizens of the city of Dublin, and not subsisting and in force subsequent to the 25th day of March, 1818, this Defendant doth also demur thereto, and for causes of demurrer this Defendant shows, that it appears, and is stated in and by the complainant's bill, that all sums of money due or payable by, or from the said Corporation of the Lord Mayor, sheriffs, commons, and citizens of the city of Dublin, to the said Commissioners for paying, cleansing, and lighting the streets of Dublin, up to and for the said 25th day of March, 1818, in respect of the annual sum of £2000 in the bill mentioned, have been fully paid, satisfied and discharged by the said Corporation to the said Commissioners; and the Defendant humbly submits and insists, that no sum or sums of money received by the said Corporation as part of the revenue of the said city, arising out of the tolls and customs of the said city or otherwise howsoever, during any year prior to the year commencing on the 26th day of March, 1818, is, or ever was, or could be, by law subject or liable to the payment of any alleged arrear of the said annual sum of £2000 accrued, or alleged to have accrued or become payable to the said Commissioners by the said Corporation subsequently to the said 25th day of March, 1818, and therefore that the complainant is not, nor are the said Commissioners, entitled to any discovery with respect to any such lease or leases, demise or demises, as herein before last-mentioned, either from this Defendant or the said Corporation of the Lord Mayor, sheriffs, commons, and citizens of the city of Dublin. Wherefore, etc."

[284] The Appellant by his answer, admitting the Act of Parliament, (47th Geo. III.) and that the Respondent was secretary to the Commissioners; and the payment made by the Corporation to the Commissioners up to the 25th March, 1818, in consequence of a judgment obtained by the Commissioners, and also the arrear due on the 25th March, 1819; submitted that no sum was then due to the Corporation on account of the annual sum of £2000 inasmuch as the funds liable thereto had been unproductive.

The answer farther admitting the sums of £350 and £20 to be due, and the action commenced in Easter Term, 1819, and proceedings therein, stated the proposal made on the part of the Corporation, and that the proposal was agreed to on the part of the Commissioners, in consequence of their being satisfied of the truth of the Appellant's representations, and, that in order to satisfy the Commissioners upon the point, an account of the revenue was furnished to the Commissioners.

Admitting also the action commenced by the Respondent in Easter Term then last, and that it was then depending and the pleas pleaded by him to the action, the Appellant by his answer denied that the Corporation had at any time subsequent to the 25th of March, 1818, any funds, whereout to discharge the arrears of the annual payment of £2000, inasmuch as the expenses of collecting the tolls and customs had exceeded the receipts; he denied that the Corporation alleged that the tolls and customs had not been at all paid since the 25th March, 1818, but admitted that it had been alleged that they had not been sufficient to defray the costs of collecting them; he denied that [285] the deficiency was occasioned by the misconduct of the Corporation, and said, that if any illegal practices existed, they were wholly unauthorized by the Corporation; that the tolls and customs collected since the 25th March, 1818, were the same as existed at the time of the passing of the Act of the 47th George III.; that in 1818 there was a general disposition in Ireland to resist the payment of tolls and customs; and that since the 25th March, 1818, persons who previously paid tolls and customs without opposition, refused to pay them; he submitted, that if the demand of tolls and customs were illegal since the 25th March, 1818, they must have been so at the passing of the Act of the 47th Geo. III., but insisted that the tolls and customs were legal. He admitted that, in consequence of the refusal to pay tolls and customs, the Corporation had been compelled to commence legal proceedings to enforce payment of them; but did not believe that, if the Corporation had acted as in the bill stated, the payment of the tolls would not have been evaded. He insisted that the tolls and customs received at the time of passing the Act of the 26th Geo. III., were reasonable, and would not have been objected to, except under the circumstances. He denied that such tolls had been, prior to the passing of the last mentioned Act, paid only after the sale of the commodity.

The Appellant by his answer farther admitted, that since the passing of the Act (26 Geo. III.), as well as from time immemorial theretofore, the Corporation or their lessees demanded and received tolls and customs on various articles, matters and things passing into the city, and before the same were sold; and which articles, with the rates of toll respectively charged thereon, he set forth in the first schedule to the answer annexed; [286] but whether or not such demands were contrary to law, or whether any immemorial usage would be necessary in order to warrant such demands, the Appellant could not state; but he believed that the Corporation rested their claim to the tolls and customs not merely upon their charters, but upon immemorial custom and prescriptive right. The Appellant also admitted, that the annual sum of £2000 was directed to be paid to the Commissioners by the Act (47th Geo. III.) out of the revenue of the city, arising out of the tolls and customs of the city, payable in respect of corn and other tollable articles passing into or out of the city, as specified in the first schedule to the answer annexed; but out of no other revenue. The Appellant submitted that such revenue means the surplus, if any, arising to the city out of the receipts of the tolls and customs in the Act mentioned, after defraying the expenses incurred in the collection thereof; and that such last-mentioned revenue was the only fund intended by the Act (17th Geo. III.) to be charged with the payment of the annual sum of £2000: he therefore denied that the Corporation then was, or at any period since the 25th of March, 1818, had been, in the enjoyment of any tolls or customs contemplated by the Act (17th Geo. III.) so as to form the revenue of the city justly chargeable with the payment of the annual sum of £2000 to the Commissioners.

The Appellant by his answer farther admitted, that the Corporation had not during the last-mentioned period, accounted for or paid over to the Commissioners, any sum out of the tolls and customs charged with the annual sum of £2000, such receipts not having been in any one year during [287] that time equal to the expenses of collecting such tolls: he admitted, that there were in the city divers public markets, wherein, or in some of which, tolls and customs were collected, but of what description in particular, he did not know: for he stated that none of such markets were, to his knowledge or belief, held by the Corporation, though the Lord Mayor of the city had the superintendence thereof, by virtue of his office of clerk of all markets in the city; but whether or not tolls or customs, or any payments therein made, did in point of law belong to the Corporation, or whether or not the Corporation at any time demised the markets, he could not set forth as to his belief or otherwise: but he believed that the Corporation had never received any tolls or customs thereout.

The Appellant farther stated by his answer, that he did not believe that there were in Halston-street, or the Little Green in the neighbourhood thereof, or in Mary's-lane, in the city of Dublin, different public markets, though he admitted that there had been for many years, and that there was then, a public market held at the Little Green, in the city of Dublin, and extending to Halston-street, and Little Mary-street, in which commodities were sold; but that he could not set forth whether the same did or not belong to the Corporation: but he stated that the market had never been held by the Corporation, but by one William Clarke, and that payments were therein made in the nature, as the Appellant supposed, of tolls and customs: but what such tolls and customs were, or what they included, he could not set forth as to his belief or otherwise, excepting that he did not believe that such tolls and customs were of the annual value of £2000, or any such [288] value, or that they produced, or for the three years in the bill mentioned had produced, that or any such sum, nor what sum in particular: but he did not believe that any sum had been received therefrom, to the use of the Corporation, or that the market, or any profits thereof, or in respect of the soil thereof, had ever been demised or let by the Corporation.

It was denied that any markets whatever in the city of Dublin had been demised by the Corporation, or any fines or annual rents paid in respect thereof.

It was admitted that there were, at the places mentioned in the bill, public markets: but contended that those markets did not belong, or produce any emolument, customs or tolls to the Corporation, nor did the same ever compose any part of its revenues.

The Appellant by his answer farther said he believed that there were in the city divers public cranes: but that none of such cranes, then or at any time since the 25th day of March, 1818, yielded any fees or emoluments to the Corporation, nor did any such fees or emoluments ever form any part of the revenue of the city, arising from tolls and customs: nor did such public cranes belong to, nor were they ever demised by the Corporation, nor ever yielded to the Corporation any rents: for that the only crane with which the Corporation had any connexion by way of profit, was a crane situate in Bridge-Fort-Street, the soil or ground and warehouses whereof had been demised by the Corporation at the rent of 100 guineas per annum, which rent was payable only in respect of the ground whereon the crane stood, and not as an equivalent for the profits arising from weighing thereat, for that such profits had never belonged to the Corporation.

[289] It was admitted, that for all ships entering the port of Dublin a customary payment was made to the Corporation: but contended, that such customary payment was not any part of the revenue arising from tolls and customs contemplated by the Act (17th Geo. III.), and thereby rendered liable to the payment of the annual sum of £2000. It was admitted, that such last-mentioned customary payments had been received by the Corporation since the 25th of March, 1818, and had yielded to them some, but not a considerable income, which the Corporation had applied to their own use, and the same had not been paid over by them to the Respondent or the Commissioners.

The Appellant, in the second schedule to his answer, set forth the amount of the revenue arising from the customary payment on ships since the 25th of March, 1818: he admitted, that there were divers ferries in the city, over the river Anna Liffey, the rent of which belonged to the Corporation: but he submitted, that those rents formed no part of the revenue arising from the tolls and customs of the city, subjected by the Act (47th Geo. III.) to the payment of the annual sum of £2000, though he admitted that the Corporation had been in the receipt of the rent of the ferries since the 25th day of March, 1819, and that the rent was paid to the Corporation by the lessee of the ferries, as an equivalent for such profits as in the answer stated; but that no separate rent was paid to the Corporation in respect of the bridge.

In the same schedule he also set forth the sums received by the Corporation in respect of the rent of the ferries, including the bridge, since the 25th March, 1818: and he admitted that the [290] same had not been applied in payment of the annual sum, but to the use of the Corporation: but the Appellant denied that any fine had been received by the Corporation for any demise of the ferries or bridge, since the 25th March, 1818, or that the Corporation received any sum or sums of money whatever for tolls, or customary payments for pontage, murage, or passage, though he could not set forth whether the Corporation were or not entitled to any such last-mentioned tolls or customs: but he believed that the Corporation had not received any such payments since the 25th day of March, 1818, nor were the Corporation, as the Appellant believed, entitled to any weighage, stallage, or package, independently of the several tolls and customs in the bill and answer before enumerated. He admitted, that no sum derived from any of the several last-mentioned sources was ever paid by the Corporation to the Commissioners for paving, cleansing, and lighting the streets of Dublin.

It was further admitted, that there was in Thomas-street, in the city, a public market-house belonging to, and built by, the Corporation: that the ground upon which the same stood was the property of the Corporation: that the market-house was used for certain purposes in the answer stated: and that persons paid, for standing under the same, certain weekly sums to the Corporation, but not as tolls or customs, nor were the Corporation entitled to, nor did they receive, any tolls or customs for grain sold at the market-house, since the 25th of March, 1818. The Appellant also admitted, that the market-house, together with the scite thereof, was sold for such reasons, and to such persons, and for such sum, as [291] in the bill mentioned: but he denied that any part of the interest of the Corporation in any tolls or customs there collected was included in the sale.

It was admitted, that no part of the purchase-money had been paid by him or the Corporation to the Commissioners, in discharge of the annual sum of £2000 or otherwise, the purchase-money forming no part of the revenue of the city, which was liable to the payment of the annual sum of £2000, or any part thereof. The Appellant also admitted, that the purchase-money was ascertained in the manner in the bill mentioned: but he denied that any part thereof was awarded in respect of any loss which the Corporation would sustain in respect of any tolls or customs arising from the market-house, or that evidence of such loss adduced before the jury, determined the amount of the purchase-money: but he said that the evidence was confined to those subjects only in the answer particularly mentioned.

The Appellant denied, that the materials of the market-house, or the scite thereof, was only of such value as in the bill mentioned, or that any such facts were given in evidence before the jury, the purchase-money being, as the Appellant believed, the fair value for the scite and the materials of the market-house, and of the profits which the Corporation derived from the storage of corn in the lofts thereof, and for weekly payments made to the Corporation, and also of the future profit which might accrue to the Corporation, by applying the market-house in future to other uses.

The Appellant by his answer further stated, that the only demise made by the Corporation, of the tolls and customs mentioned in the Act (47th Geo. [292] III.), since the 25th of March, 1818, was a demise of the tolls and customs to Alderman John Claudius Beresford, at such rent, for such term, and made with such view as in the answer mentioned; but that nothing had been received in respect of the demise since the 25th of March, 1818. The Appellant denied that it appeared from any of the charters of the Corporation or otherwise, that the whole of the revenue of the Corporation arising from tolls and customs was vested in the Corporation, for the purpose of paving or cleansing the streets of the city, though the Appellant had been informed and believed that it was so stated in a Report of a Committee of the House of Commons.

The Appellant further stated his belief, that since the year 1784, the Corporation had never in any year paid more to the Commissioners for paving, cleansing, and lighting the streets of Dublin, than the gross amount of the several annual sums payable by the Act (47th Geo. III.), that is to say, the sum of £2370 in the whole. The Appellant said that he could not state whether the toll to which the Corporation was entitled, and which was by the last-mentioned Act subjected to the payment of the annual sum of £2000, was or not toll thorough; but admitted, that since the passing of the Act 23d and 24th Geo. III. the duty of paving and repairing had been performed by the Commissioners.

The Appellant submitted to the opinion of the Court, whether the Commissioners were or not entitled in the first instance, before any application of any part of the revenue of the city arising from the tolls and customs in the Act of the 47th Geo. III. mentioned, should be made, to full or any payment or satisfaction of their demands; insisting that the only [293] revenue arising from the tolls and customs, applicable to the payment of their demand, was the surplus arising from the receipts of the tolls and customs, after defraying the expenses of collecting; and that no such surplus had been received by the Corporation since the 25th of March, 1818.

The Appellant, in the third schedule to his answer, set forth all sums of money received by him or by the Corporation, from the 25th of March, 1818, to the filing of the answer, for or on account of the tolls and customs, in and by the Act (47th Geo. III.) mentioned, and made liable to the payment of the annual sum of £2000, together with the expenses of collecting the same, and the names of the persons by, and through whom such payments were made; but said that he could not state whether there was any difference between such sums as were actually received by the several persons appointed to collect the tolls and customs, and the sums which they accounted for. In the second schedule to his answer annexed, he set forth an account of the sums received by him or the Corporation since the 25th of March, 1818, out of the profits of ferries, and also of all payments made by ships in the bill mentioned, and the several sums, and the manner in which such payments had been made.

The two demurrers were argued before the Master of the Rolls, on the 26th and 29th days of June, 1822, and the 1th, 6th, and 18th days of July following; and on the 18th day of July it was ordered, that the first demurrer should be overruled, with liberty to the Appellant to make such application as he should be advised, for the purpose of taking the demurrer off the file, and to demur [294] and answer again. The second demurrer was allowed, with liberty to the Respondent to amend his bill, as he should be advised; and it was ordered, that each party should pay his own costs.

The Respondent, on the 16th of December, 1822, presented his petition to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, praying that the two demurrers might be set down for re-argument before him; which being ordered, the two demurrers were re-argued on the 6th, 15th, 17th, and 18th days of February, 1823; and by order, on the 18th of February, both the demurrers were over-ruled.

From this order the appeal was made.

For the Appellants, Mr. Sugden and Mr. Pepys.

The two sums of £350 and £20 are made payable generally out of the revenues of the Corporation, and not yearly out of the tolls and customs, as in the provision respecting the £2000. That one of the demurrers should be good and the other bad, as decided by the Master of the Rolls, is impossible, from the nature of the case. The bill admits that all arrears to 1818 had been paid, yet demands an account from 1784. The reasons of the Respondents resolve themselves into two classes. The main proposition is, that if the income of the Corporation is insufficient at any period to pay the allowance, it is payable out of the surplus income of former periods. This is a proposition of general application, relating to all such charges upon a particular fund. This case does not depend upon general principles, but upon the construction of an Act of Parliament. The Act recites the duties to be performed, and gives, as an equivalent, a certain sum yearly out of the tolls and customs of the city. [295] The discovery and account as to the tolls and customs received since 1818, is not within the scope of the demurrer. If the bill does not show a right to discovery, the demurrer is good: as, if it appears on the face of the bill that the action at law is untenable, the Commissioners having no right to payment out of the tolls received before 1818, how can they be entitled to discovery (Redes. Tr. p. 152; 3 Ves. 494; 13 Ves. 240)? The discovery sought in this case will be useless at law. Yet this is one great argument for the right of discovery. To induce a jury to presume the amount of income in 1818, from proof of the amount in 1784, would be tempting them to rush to an erroneous conclusion: and if this is a proper ground to ask for a discovery, it should have been stated in the bill.

As to the objection, that it is a speaking demurrer, it alleges no fact which is not to be found in the bill, and uses no argument arising out of extraneous facts. The reasons arising out of the facts stated in the bill are always set forth, as appears by the form of demurrers.

The argument, that the demurrer is over-ruled by the answer, is untenable. The demurrer extends only to one interrogatory: that which relates to the discovery of tolls before 1818. The answer gives the discovery as to tolls since 1818.

For the Respondents, The Attorney General, and The Solicitor General.

The discovery sought is material and relevant in support of the Respondent's case at law: and, even if that were matter of doubt, the discovery would be enforced in equity, leaving the legal question to be determined by the court of law.

[296] Upon the true construction of the Act of the 47th Geo. III. c. 109. sec. 51., and the Irish Act of the 23d and 24th Geo. III. therein recited, it is manifest that the revenue arising from tolls prior to 1818, over and above the annual sum of £2000 made payable to the Commissioners for paving, if discovered, would be properly applicable to make good the deficiency in that annual sum subsequently to the year 1818, particularly as that deficiency has been occasioned by the misconduct and improper management of the Corporation of the city of Dublin.

Taking into consideration the original liability of the Corporation of the city of Dublin, as trustees for the public, to apply the whole of the revenue arising from tolls and customs in cleansing the streets of Dublin, as recited in the Act of the 47th Geo. III., and the Irish Act of the 23d and 24th Geo. III., it is at least a doubtful and arguable question, whether such surplus revenue received prior to 1818, is not applicable to subsequent deficiencies, caused by the mismanagement of the Corporation of the city of Dublin: and under such circumstances a Court of Equity should not stop the inquiry in limine, but should leave such question, involving the consideration of questions of law arising upon these acts of Parliament, to the consideration of the Court of Law where it originated, and where other questions of construction upon the same acts are depending between the parties in the same action.

Even though the surplus revenue, prior to 1818, were not applicable to make good subsequent deficiencies, still the discovery of the annual receipt of the sum of £1000 by the Corporation of the city of Dublin, down to and for the year 1818, would be [297] evidence to go to a jury, to show primò facie the receipt of a like revenue subsequently to the year 1818, which would be clearly applicable to the payment of the Respondent's demand.

The discovery of any lease or demise of tolls and customs made by the Corporation of the city of Dublin prior to 1818, though the same might expire in that year, would be evidence primò facie before a jury, to charge the Corporation of the city of Dublin with the receipt of tolls and customs, to the extent, in value, of the rent reserved in such lease or demise: and this, though the revenue prior to 1818 were not applicable to subsequent arrears.

The demurrers are argumentative, and do not sufficiently distinguish the particular parts of the bill demurred to; so that the Court must look over the whole bill to ascertain the parts in question.

The Appellant, by answering to certain facts or parts of the bill purporting to be covered by his demurrers, overrules the demurrers.

In the course of the argument, the Lord Chancellor made the following observations:

It is contended that the answer overrules the demurrer,—in what part has not yet been pointed out. Independently of that objection, is it contended that the action is maintainable even without proof of the alleged misconduct of the Corporation as to the management of the tolls and customs? Can they go to this extent? The Act creating the right passed in 1807, the bill seeks a discovery from 1784. If this can be maintained, might they not ask for a discovery in 1907? It is on this view of the case [298] that I desire to know on what ground the Master of the Rolls gave leave to both parties to amend!

The Defendants do not demur to the discovery as to matters between 1818, and the filing of the bill.

As to the argument urged from the analogy of mortgages, annuitants, or grantees of a rent-charge, it is a misapprehension. Such incumbrancers could have no discovery as to by-gone rents and profits. The ordinary security is, first to distrain, then to enter, then a term; but as to by-gone rents, not a shilling could be recovered.

If the bill had asked what is the amount of the revenue actually in the hands of the Corporation, it might have been difficult to avoid answering; but to ask for discovery from such a remote time is a different thing. To seek a disclosure of all the affairs of the Corporation from 1784, is one thing; the question, what have you in your hands to pay the arrears of the £2000 per annum, is another.

Perhaps the Master of the Rolls, in giving leave to amend, had a view to this distinction. If the Plaintiff is entitled to payment out of any revenues arising before 1818, it might be desirable to give leave to amend.

It is hard upon the judges of the Courts below, and in the Court of Appeal, that cases should be decided without knowing the reasons upon which the judgments are founded.*

As the judges in the Court below have not agreed in their opinions as to this case, it is a respect due to their judgments, that the House should take time [299] to consider the question, and to obtain, if possible, the reasons of their judgment.

The Earl of Eldon,† after having stated the subject-matter of the appeal, the clauses of the Act of Parliament out of which the question arose, the facts, the pleadings, and proceedings in the case, continued thus:

The demurrers came on to be heard, first, before the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, who pronounced an order which was afterwards made the subject of appeal to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who, by his decretal order, overruled both demurrers, differing in opinion from the Master of the Rolls. When the appeal was heard in this House, measures were taken for the purpose of obtaining information, and reconciling the different opinions which had so been expressed: but more than one inquiry have not enabled me to state to your Lordships upon what grounds either the one or the other proceeded. The question now before you is, whether the judgment of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, overruling these demurrers, is right or wrong? If you look at the reasons which are stated on the part of the Appellants, contending that the judgment is wrong, you will perceive, that all of them apply to this sort of representation, namely, that £2000 a year have been fully paid and satisfied, down to the 26th day of March, 1818; that it does not signify what was the state of the revenues previous to the 26th March, 1818, and that according to the true construction of the Act of Parliament, the Corporation [300] is obliged de anno in annum, to expend the whole of their revenues, paying £2000 to the Commissioners. Whether or not that is the true construction of the

* The Lord Chancellor also observed, that, in Irish cases particularly, it was desirable, that accurate copies of the pleadings should be printed. See ante p. 279.

† The case having been heard by Lord Eldon while he was Lord Chancellor, the judgment was delivered by him after he had retired from the office.

Act of Parliament, I desire it may be understood that I do not presume to state my opinion: because, I do not think that is a question which it is necessary to decide; and not being necessary, it appears to me that it would be improper to decide it. The true question is, whether regard being had to all that is stated in the answer, and to the fact, that this is a bill called a discovery bill, these demurrers ought to be overruled.

Upon an attentive perusal of the matter of the answer which is part of the record, in the first place, I have formed an opinion (in which I am confirmed by a very attentive consideration given to this case by a noble and learned Lord (Lord Redesdale) that, as a demurrer cannot be good in part and bad in part, which a plea may be, there is enough in this answer to overrule the demurrer: and I am farther of opinion, that, supposing (for the present, and desiring not to prejudice the question by the supposition,) that the Corporation are as right as probably they may turn out to be, in contending, that having satisfied the annual payment to these Commissioners up to a given time, all the rest of the revenue belongs to them, and that they are not bound to apply a surplus of revenue in one year to a deficiency of revenue in another year: still I am of opinion that the persons filing this bill as a bill of discovery have a right to know, what they desire to be discovered, how the account actually stands: because the state of the revenue antecedent to that period, may afford very considerable evidence with respect to many of [301] the questions which arise out of this record: considerable evidence upon the trial of the issue which is joined at law.

Upon these grounds it is, that I offer my humble, but very confident opinion, that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has rightly decided the case: and therefore, upon the motion, which is according to your forms the usual motion to be made, that this order should be reversed, my advice is to say, "Not Content" to that motion, for the purpose of affirming the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHN GLEGG, EGERTON LEIGH, JAMES BAYLEY, THOMAS PARKER, JOSEPH NIXON, and THOMAS WHYMAN.—Appellants; RICHARD LEGH.—Respondent.

JANE GLEGG and others, (personal representatives of JOHN GLEGG,) etc.—Appellants; T. R. W. FRANCE and THOMAS MAWDSLEY, (Executors of RICHARD LEGH.)—Respondents.

[See Norbury v. Meade, 3 Bli. 211. 261.]

In a suit for tithes by an impropriate rector against occupiers, where the Plaintiff by the answer is put to the proof of his title, it is sufficient, 1. As to personal ownership, to prove that he is the beneficial owner of the tithes subject to terms vesting the legal estate in trustees, and creating charges on the rectory, but which charges being annual are satisfied up to the date of the suit. 2. As to general title, it is sufficient to prove, a recent perception of tithes, with occasional payment of composition and leases of the tithes taken by the occupiers.

The Respondent Richard Legh claimed to be entitled as tenant for life under the will of Charles Legh, to the impropriate rectory of Prestbury in the county of Chester, consisting of various townships or hamlets: and as such impropriator to receive from the occupiers of the several farms and lands lying within certain townships in the rectory, all manner of great tithes, and particularly the tithes of hay in kind.

[303] The Appellants in the original appeal, respectively held farms and lands lying within the townships specified, and within the rectory.

The Respondent Richard Legh, in Hilary Term, 1817, filed a bill in the Exchequer against the Appellants in the original appeal, stating his title as rector; and that the Appellants had taken tithes of hay, clover, and other grasses, and had refused to pay or account for the same, and praying an account of the tithes during the year 1816, and payment, waiving penalties.

The Appellants put in separate answers to the bill, and thereby severally admitted themselves to be occupiers, and to have mown and carried away hay; but stated that the Respondent had never received title of hay, or any satisfaction for such tithe; and claimed to be exempted by a modus, and without specifically answering the allegation in the bill, that the Respondent was seised of or entitled to the rectory. The defendants severally stated, that they did not know of their own knowledge, but believed, that the Respondent was not, at the time stated in the bill, seised or entitled for his life or to the legal estate or interest in the rectory, and therefore, as to that fact, left the Respondent to such proof as he should be able to make.

The Appellant Thomas Whyman, in 1818, filed a cross bill against the Respondent Richard Legh, for the purpose of proving that he had no title to the rectory.

To this bill the Respondent put in two answers.

The cause was heard in June, 1820, when the Respondent read passages from the answers of the several Defendants, admitting their having severally occupied farms within the rectory, and having severally taken hay from their respective farms, and having, [304] in 1816, severally paid a composition for tithes to the Respondent. The Respondent also proved payment of tithes to him as impropriator, or some person for his use.

There was also proof that leases of the tithes had been taken by the Appellants, as occupiers of land within the parish.

The Appellants, to make out that the Respondent had not such an interest in the rectory as entitled him to sue for the tithes, read from the answers of the Respondent to the cross bill, filed by the Appellant Thomas Whyman, passages admitting the existence of certain terms of years in the rectory, and that the same were outstanding in certain trustees; but in the passages admitting the existence of such terms, and from other passages in the answers, it appeared, that the terms were created and subsisting merely as collateral securities for the payment of certain annual sums, the whole of which, so far as the same were payable, had been paid to the time of the filing the answer, and that the Respondent was in the uninterrupted possession of the rectory and receipt of the tithes, and that none of the trustees of such terms had ever interfered with the Respondents receiving the tithes of the rectory.

The Defendants endeavoured to prove the modus laid in their respective answers, but failed in such proof.

A decree, bearing date the 8th day of July, 1820, was thereupon made in favour of the Respondent, and the Appellants were decreed to account in the usual manner for the title of hay taken by them within the rectory.

From this decree the appeal was presented.

After the petition of appeal had been lodged, and the cases on both sides printed, the Appellant John [305] Glegg, and the Respondent in the original appeal cause died; whereupon the appeal cause was revived by their respective representatives.

For the Appellants: Mr. Agar, and Mr. Duckworth.

For the Respondents: Mr. Shadwell, and Mr. Spence.

Upon the argument in chief, the case was put by the Appellant's counsel upon the defect of title, because the legal estate was outstanding in trustees upon a term unsatisfied. But in the reply it was urged, on the authority of Norbury v. Meach, that the title of a lay impropriator was not proved by the mere perception of tithe, and that the grant from the Crown and recent possession were indispensable proofs of title.

The case was argued in Nov. 1826, and stood over from that time for consideration. (It was decided at the same time with the next following case.)

On the 18th of May, 1827, the Judgment was affirmed.

[See Norbury v. Meade, 3 Bl. 211, 261.]

A lay-impropriator, who is in possession of a Rectory and in perception of the tithes, subject to charges by way of mortgage, and for raising portions, (inasmuch as such mortgagees, etc., having permitted the possession, cannot claim the bygone rents,) has a title sufficient to sustain a suit against occupiers for an account of tithes.

Upon a bill filed by such a lay-impropriator against an occupier, who had taken a lease from the rector, of the tithes of corn and grain, but expressly without prejudice to any question as to the title of lay, and who, by his answer, set up, but did not prove, a modus as to the small tithes.—Held, that proof of the perception of some tithes by a lay-impropriator, without evidence of a grant from the Crown, gives a title to other tithes, of the perception of which there is no actual proof.

If the occupier shows a colour of title to the tithes not rendered, a court of equity will not interfere, but leave the plaintiff to his remedy at law.

The Respondent Richard Legh claimed to be entitled for life (subject to certain trust-terms and to a mortgage) to the impropriate Rectory of Prestbury, and, as such, to receive all the tithes, both great and small. The Respondents, Egerton and Tatton, were trustees, in whom respectively two several terms of the Rec-[307]-tory were vested for securing two several annuities. The Appellant, Cherry, was an occupier of land within the Rectory.

In 1820, a bill was filed in the Exchequer by the Respondents, in the original Appeal against Cherry, stating their title as impropriators, and praying against Cherry, as an occupier who had subtracted tithes of lay and small tithes, an account and payment, waiving penalties. The Appellant, Cherry, by his answer admitting occupation and the taking of tithes, put the Respondents to the proof of their title, and set up a certain custom as to the title of lay, and divers moduses as to the small tithes.

The cause was heard in 1821, when proof was given of payment of tithes by Cherry to Legh, as beneficial owner, in actual possession, of the Rectory; and, as an exhibit, an agreement was proved between Legh and the parishioners by whom it was signed, and among others by Cherry, to let and take respectively, at a rent for one year, the title of grain: but it was expressed to be made without prejudice to any question or claim as to the title of lay.

On the part of Cherry, evidence was read to sustain the defence, but it failed as to the modus; and with respect to the title, proved only that the legal estate in the rectory was conveyed to and outstanding in persons having charges upon it: but a decree for account was pronounced, according to the prayer of the bill.

The Appellant, Cherry, and the Respondent, Legh, died pending the Appeal, which was revived by their representatives respectively.

For the Appellants: Mr. Agar and Mr. Duckworth.

[308] For the Respondents: Mr. Shadwell and Mr. Spence.

On the part of the Appellants in this case, (as in the case of Gigg v. Legh.) the objection to the decree, as argued in the court below, and in the printed papers, rested upon the question of modus, and the defect of title in the Respondent, because the legal estate was vested in trustees for incumbrancers; but finally, in the Court of Appeal, the case was argued chiefly on the authority of Norbury v. Meade (ante, vol. 3, p. 261). And it was said in argument, that this case was stronger against the title, because in Norbury v. Meade there was an admission of title as to all the lands of the rectory, except one farm, and that case, in the Court below, was argued on the ground of the presumption of a grant to the occupier; but, in the House of Lords, the case of Norbury v. Meade was decided on the defect in proof of title by the Plaintiff. It was further argued, on the part of the Appellants, that if mere perception of tithes was sufficient proof of title, there had been no payment made to the rector by the appellant, except in respect of the tithes of corn and grain.

On the part of the Respondent, it was argued, that the perception of tithes is a proof of title, as well in the case of lay-rectors as of ecclesiastical persons; and that in this case the payment of tithes was admitted and proved. The case was said to be clearly distinguishable from that of Norbury v. Meade, as in that case the Defendants, being occupiers of a distinct farm, claimed a title to the tithes of that farm, and they denied that the Plaintiff was entitled to the small tithes, on which point there was great doubt whether there had been a valid impropriation at all inasmuch as no vicar had been endowed: that in this case, no such matter was raised by the pleadings: that in Norbury v. Meade a case was made by the pleadings, to which the evidence for non-perception might apply: in this case, the denial of title was general; not confined, as in Norbury v. Meade, to the particular tithes claimed. That the moduses set up by the answer, were an admission of the title by inference, the party being described as rector, and the allegation not being that he is not entitled to the title of hay, but that he is not entitled to it in kind.

In reply, it was observed on this latter argument, that the moduses were an admission of payments due to some ecclesiastical person, but not of an impropriation.

The Lord Chancellor, at the conclusion of the argument, made the following observations: This is a case of too much importance, to give judgment immediately; and I doubt whether judgment can be given upon the record as it now stands, without affecting a great many other cases which have been decided by this House. This proposition has been decided in the Exchequer, that if there is a lay-rector who proves that he has received all the tithes that have been paid, the Court would hold him entitled, as they would a spiritual rector, to tithes that have not been paid; but, on the other hand, if, in respect of those tithes that have not been paid to a lay-rector, there is a color of title by deeds in the hands of a layman, upon which he may claim those tithes which have not been paid the Court of Exchequer, applied to as a Court of Equity, will not interfere. The former of these propositions, I do not recollect ever to have been decided one way or the other in this House; and if the pleadings will call upon this [310] House to look at what has been decided in the Court of Exchequer, one of the most important considerations in this case is how far the judgment of this House shall or not bear upon those decisions. What I am now alluding to was discussed in the case of Scotch v. Airey (3 Gwill. 1174), in which I was counsel. In that case, the rector of Simonbourne claimed all the tithes in that great parish, which is now divided into six. He proved himself to have received all the tithes of the parish, except the tithes of a particular farm which belonged to a family of the name of Airey. The Court of Exchequer, in that case, held that, having received the tithes of all the rest of the parish, he was entitled to receive the tithes of that farm, unless the Airey family could shew that they had a colourable title to the tithes under their title-deeds. That they did shew, and thereupon the Court of Exchequer refused to determine the effect of those title-deeds, holding it to be a case in which the parties must go to law for the decision of their rights. I believe no case has been decided in Equity contrary to that, as yet at least; nor do I believe there has been any decision at law upon the subject. Undoubtedly it is very difficult to reconcile with that doctrine all that Lord Redesdale has said in the case of Norbury v. Meade; but I believe you will find no judgment in which this House has dealt with that case so as not to support the doctrine of the Court of Exchequer.

The Earl of Eldon: In the two cases of Glegg v. Legh, and Cherry v. Legh, which stand for the judgment of the House, the question is, whether the Court of Exchequer was right in the decrees which they made in these causes respectively, for [311] an account of tithes. Two grounds of objection and appeal were taken in these cases: one was, that the owner of the impropriate rectory held it subject to terms of years for raising money portions, and likewise subject to some mortgages. He is proved to have been in possession as far as the mortgagee is concerned, and there can be no doubt that the mortgagee has no right to call for the past rents and profits; and again, with respect to any other incumbrances, I apprehend that where persons are entitled, under terms for raising sums of money, whether portions or charges, it is impossible to say that the person who is the tenant in fee, or the tenant for life subject to such charges, is not in the enjoyment of the tithes, or that such enjoyment would not be a sufficient protection against the claims of persons who should afterwards resort to the estate in respect of those incumbrances.

Another ground of defence in this case rests upon the existence of a modus,—a modus very singular in its nature, upon which I observe the Court of Exchequer hesitated in giving an opinion, whether it is worth any thing in point of law. It does not appear to me necessary to call your attention to the question, whether it is good in point of law, because, though there is some semblance of proof, there is nothing like that sort of proof which is sufficient to establish the fact of its existence. It appears to me, therefore, that, in both cases, the judgment of the Court of Exchequer is right; and unless upon looking at the petitions of appeal, any thing further should occur upon them for observation, I should propose to your Lordships that both those judgments should be affirmed. (The case was not afterwards mentioned.)

The Corporation of Dublin having, before the year 1777, supplied water to the inhabitants of the city from works which they had constructed, but the rents which they received being inadequate to the maintenance of the water-works; by the Irish Act 15th and 16th Geo. III. the owners or occupiers of houses were compelled to provide branch-pipes from the mains of the company to the houses, and the Corporation were empowered to charge the owners or occupiers with certain fixed annual rates or rents, in order to construct new mains and extend their works, to borrow money for those purposes, and to mortgage the rates for the repayment of the money so borrowed.

Under the authority of this Act, the Corporation from time to time borrowed, on the credit of the water-rents, various sums of money, which in 1809 amounted to £67,800.

In that year the Corporation obtained a new Act of Parliament (49th Geo. III.) by which they were empowered to borrow, at stated annual periods, a further sum amounting to £32,200, and to charge the debt upon the rates granted by that and the former Acts. The Act further required, that the interest of the money borrowed under that Act, should be retained out of the rates thereby granted, as well as a further sum of £2000 to be appropriated as a sinking-fund to pay off the whole debt for money borrowed under that and the former Acts. The Act further directed, that distinct accounts should be kept of the rates received under the Act, and that the surplus, after providing for the interest of the whole debt, should be applied in laying down iron or metal main and service pipes, in the general improvement and extension of the water-works, and to increase the sinking-fund; and it was declared, that the rates, being granted only for such purposes, should not be subject to deductions, except for collection, nor be deemed rates for the supply of water as for sale.

The Act then provided that the Corporation should furnish annually, to be laid before Parliament, an account of the sums received by them under that and the former Acts, and of the manner in which the same had been expended and applied. Finally, a further provision was made by the Act for the appropriation to the sinking-fund of any further surplus out of the rates.

In 1823, an information and bill was filed on behalf of the inhabitants of Dublin paying water-rates, against the Corporation, which, stating various acts of mismanagement and misappropriation of the funds arising from the rates; submitting that the Corporation were trustees under the Act, of rates thereby given, for uses which were charitable in their nature; and charging that the conduct of the Corporation amounted to a breach of trust, prayed (among other things) a declaration and execution of the trust, and that accounts might be taken of the rates received by the Corporation, and the application thereof; of the sums annually applied to the sinking-fund, of the money borrowed and due on the credit of the rates, and which had been applied in payment of the principal and interest of the debt.

To this information and bill the Defendants put in an answer, by which, after admitting many of the principal facts, and setting forth various accounts, they submitted that they were not trustees, that the purposes specified in the Acts were not charitable uses, that the Act required the accounts to be furnished annually to the Lord Lieutenant to be laid before Parliament; which having been done, it was a bar to the jurisdiction of the Court, of which matter they prayed the same benefit as if they had pleaded to the bill.

Held (reversing the judgment in the Court below) that the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the information and bill.

In what particular form a Corporation shall account, and to what extent they shall be made responsible upon a breach of trust, Quære.

The question as to interest, whether simple or compound, at what rate, and from what times, to be charged upon monies which ought, according to the trust, to have been applied or reserved, at given periods, is a matter to be reserved for further directions.

The Corporation of Dublin for a great length of time possessed, as private property, a watercourse from the river Dodder to the city of Dublin, upon [314] which they constructed a basin or reservoir, and other works for supplying the inhabitants of Dublin with water.

The Corporation having thus provided a considerable supply of water for the city, and their property in the watercourse, reservoir, and water-works being indisputable, they, previous to the year 1777, furnished water to those inhabitants who applied to them; but no inhabitant was obliged to purchase a supply of water from the Corporation, and few persons incurred the expence of laying leaden branches from their houses to the mains.

The rents which were received by the Corporation before the year 1777, for supplying water, were uncertain and inadequate to defray the expenses of supplying it.

By the Irish Act (15th and 16th Geo. III. c. 24), commonly called the Pipe Water Act, which was made for the purpose of providing an adequate supply of water for the increased population of Dublin, the legislature compelled all owners or occupiers of houses in the city of Dublin to provide one branch or leaden pipe, to convey the water from the main pipes belonging to the Corporation into the houses; and empowered the Corporation, in order to construct new mains and extend their works, to exact from all owners or occupiers of houses certain fixed annual rates or rents; to make regulations for the advantage of the water-works; and to mortgage the rates for the repayment of the money which it might be necessary to borrow for their improvement and extension.

Soon after the passing of the Pipe Water Act, the Respondents began to set apart for their own use a certain sum annually, as a compensation for the past benefit the [315] city of Dublin had derived from the use of the waterworks, which, previous to the passing of that Act, had been the exclusive property of the Corporation; and they continued this annual appropriation from March 1777 to March 1809. They also continued from time to time, to borrow large sums of money on the credit of the water-rents, which, in the year 1809, had become subject to a debt of £67,800.

In the year 1809, the Corporation obtained an Act (19th Geo. III. c. 80.) commonly called the Metal Main Act, the chief objects of which were to substitute cast-iron metal main and service pipes, instead of the timber pipes then in use, and to enable the Respondents to exact the water-rates therein specified, in order to defray the extraordinary charges which would be thereby occasioned.

Soon after this Act had passed, great dissatisfaction began to prevail among those proprietors and occupiers of houses in Dublin who were subject to the water-rates imposed by it, respecting the manner in which the Respondents managed the funds entrusted by the Act to their care, and the means adopted by them for carrying into execution the purposes for which (it was contended) the trusts were created. In the year 1822, a select committee of the House of Commons was appointed for the consideration of this subject, among others connected with the local taxation of Dublin, and a report was made and printed. In 1823, the select committee of the house being re-appointed for the same purposes, after a laborious inquiry, came to the following resolution:—

“That it is inexpedient to examine witnesses respecting the pipe water and metal main taxes, as it appears, by the reports of the Commissioners for auditing Public Accounts, that continued misapplica-[316]-tions of public money are considered by the Commissioners to have occurred; and that it is necessary, on the part of the public, that immediate proceedings should be taken at law for the purpose of bringing this matter to a close, and ascertaining what sums remained due on the foot of those accounts; and what right or title the Corporation possess in the pipe-water estates.”

By the Metal Main Act, (sec. 11.) the Corporation was empowered to borrow at interest, upon the credit of the rates granted by the Act and the Acts therein recited, such sums of money as they should from time to time find necessary for the purposes therein mentioned, and to demise or mortgage the rates, or any part thereof, as a security for the sums so borrowed; but the Corporation were not allowed (sec. 12.) to borrow, for the purposes of the Act, more than certain limited sums annually, from 1810 to 1814, and amounting in the whole to £32,200.

By sec. 13, after reciting that there then was a debt of £67,800 secured by the rates granted in the therein recited Acts, and that it was expedient to provide a fund for redeeming and discharging the same, together with the sums which might thereafter be borrowed by virtue of the provisions of the reciting Act, it was enacted, that it should be lawful for the Treasurer of the Corporation and his successors, who were thereby required annually to retain out of the rates thereby granted, which should come into their hands, the sum of £2000 together with such sums of money as should be equal to the interest of the sum and sums which should be borrowed under the provisions of the Act; which sums of money so to be retained by them should be appropriated as a sinking-fund to pay off the £67,800 and sums of money so [317] to be thereafter borrowed, and to be applied from time to time in purchasing in the securities granted for such debts; and the treasurer to the Corporation for the time being was thereby required from time to time to retain all such interest as should become due upon all such securities and sums of money so purchased in or paid off, and to apply the same from time to time to the further aid of the sinking-fund in the same manner as the sum of £2000.

By sec. 14, it is enacted, that the treasurers for the time being shall keep, or cause to be kept, a distinct and separate account of the receipt and amount of the rates granted by virtue of the Act, and should apply the balance thereof, after retaining a sum sufficient to answer the interest of the money then due or thereafter to be borrowed, in laying down cast-iron or metal main and service pipes, or in making additional alterations and improvements to the works, and in increasing the sinking-fund thereby created. And it was thereby declared that the additional rates being thereby granted for such objects only, the same should not be subject to any deductions or per-centage whatsoever (save for collecting the same), nor be deemed rates for supplying the inhabitants of Dublin with water, as for the sale thereof.

By sec. 15, it is enacted, that the Corporation should, once in every year furnish or cause to be furnished, unto the Lord Lieutenant or other Chief Governor of Ireland, to be by him laid before Parliament, a full, true, and distinct account of the several sums of money received by them, or on their account, by virtue of that Act and of the Acts therein recited, and of the manner in which the same hath been paid, expended, and applied.

[318] By sec. 16, it is enacted, that if there should be any surplus of the several sums of money so received by the Corporation or on their account under the Act and the recited Acts more than should be duly expended by them as aforesaid, then, and as often as the same should exceed the sum of £500, such excess should from time to time be applied in the same manner as the annual sum of £2000, until the whole of the sums of money so due and thereafter to be borrowed should be discharged; and that the rates should stand as a security for all sums of money theretofore borrowed by the Corporation on the credit or account of the pipe water-works, and the interest due and to grow due thereon, as fully and effectually as if borrowed under the provisions of the reciting Act.

In 1823, an information and bill was filed by the Attorney General, at the relation of John McMullen, etc., on behalf of themselves, and all other the inhabitants of Dublin subject to the payment of the water-rates, stating the facts above-mentioned, and the clauses of the Metal Main Act, and submitting that it was the intention of the Legislature that the Respondents should be trustees of the rates thereby given, for the uses and purposes therein mentioned, and that such uses were charitable in their nature.

The information and bill further stated that, by virtue of the power by the Act (sec. 12.) given to them, the Respondents immediately proceeded to levy the rates thereby granted, and that it appears by the Corporation books of the Respondents, that the rates so levied by the Respondents and paid to their treasurer amounted, in the year ending in September, 1810, to £2291 5s.—in the year ending [319] in September, 1811, to £10,013 0s. 8d.—in the year ending in September, 1812, to £11,082 15s. 7d.—in the year ending in September, 1813, to £10,317 7s. 7d.—in the year ending in September, 1814, to £12,135 1s. 10½d.—in the year ending in September, 1815, to £10,993 2s. 4½d.—in the year ending in September, 1816, to £11,409 6s. 9d.—in the year ending in September, 1817, to £9176 16s. 9d.—in the year ending in September, 1818, to £7863 9s. 9d.—in the year ending in September, 1819, to £8188 2s. 6d.—in the year ending in September, 1820, to £11,111 12s. 6d.—and in the year ending in September, 1821, to £9593 1s. 11d.—making altogether the sum of £111,865 9s. 3d.

It was further stated, that the rates so collected, together with the rates for pipe water which the Respondents were theretofore empowered to levy, and which they did in fact levy during the said years, were abundantly sufficient to answer all the purposes of the Metal Main Act and other Acts therein recited, and to have provided for the inhabitants of Dublin more durable mains for the conveyance of water through the streets thereof, than those theretofore used, whereby the inhabitants would have had an almost uninterrupted supply of water, had the said funds been properly applied; whereas, it appeared from the books of the Corporation, and the fact was, that the original estimated length of the metal main required for the purposes aforesaid, was about 56 English miles; but that the Respondents, notwithstanding the large funds thus at their disposal, had, in the month of September, 1817, laid down only eighteen miles, four furlongs, Irish measure; and that for the two following years, which ended in September, 1819, they laid down only two miles, [320] four furlongs, Irish measure; and that for the year ending September, 1820, they laid down only one mile, four furlongs, thirty-four perches, and three yards; and for the year ending September, 1821, they laid down but two miles, twenty-eight perches, four yards, Irish measure; leaving on the 29th September, 1821, to be completed of the said work, twenty-four miles, four furlongs, three perches, and three yards, English measure, of which residue scarcely any had been executed:

That at the time of passing the Metal Main Act, John Carlton, an alderman of the City, and one of the Corporation, was treasurer, and so continued till the year 1814, when the Respondent, William Henry Archer, also an alderman and a member of the Corporation, was appointed treasurer, and has continued treasurer ever since:

That the Corporation being, by the Act, empowered to borrow certain sums of money, did in the year 1810, borrow £20,000, although they should have only borrowed £12,000, and in the year 1811, borrowed a further sum of £6000, and in the year 1812, £4000, and in the year 1813, £2200, for which said several sums the Corporation issued 325 debentures, and paid as a premium on the debentures issued in the year 1813, £36 9s. 7d., making together the sum of £32,236 9s. 7d., being £36 9s. 7d. more than the Respondents were entitled to borrow.

That, by the Act, the sinking-fund required to be created for the purposes therein mentioned, should have been formed from the four separate sources therein specified, that is to say, 1st. By an annual sum of £2000, which the treasurer should have retained out of the rates and rents. 2ndly. By a sum equal to the interest payable on all sums of [321] money which should be thereafter borrowed under the provisions of the said Act, which the said Treasurer was in like manner directed to retain. 3rdly. By a sum equal to the interest of all the securities or sums of money which the Treasurer should purchase in or pay off, which sum the Treasurer was in like manner directed to retain; and 4thly. If there should be any surplus of the sums of money to be received under the Act, or any of the Acts therein recited, more than should be duly expended for the purposes of the Acts, the same so soon and often as it should exceed £500 should be added to the sinking-fund.

That the Respondents, in the years between 1810 and 1821, omitted to reserve the sums directed by the Metal Main Act to be set apart for a sinking-fund, leaving a deficiency of the sinking-fund of £10,670 2s. up to September, 1821, and diverted a large proportion of the rates, applicable by the Act for the special purposes therein mentioned, to their own use, and to objects entirely unconnected with their trust:

That immediately after the passing of the Metal Main Act the Respondents increased the rent or compensation, which they had before the year 1809 appropriated to their own use, from £1500 per annum to £2500 per annum; and also raised the salaries of the several officers who had been employed in the management of the pipe-water-works; and that this misapplication of the funds was also accompanied by a total deviation from the order in which the metal main rents were directed by the Metal Main Act to be applied, and the result was, that the most important object of the Metal Main Act, which was the creation of a sinking-fund for [322] the liquidation of the debt of £100,000, was disregarded, and the duration of the tax was thereby indefinitely prolonged:

That the Respondents, further availing themselves of their power over the funds committed to them by the Metal Main Act, and in order to relieve their private property from its proper charges, by an Act of Corporation Assembly, voted to the Lord Mayor of the City the sum of £1000 yearly, and to the City Treasurer a like sum of £1000 yearly, to be charged proportionably on the city and pipe-water funds, as salaries in lieu of poundage; although it is by the Metal Main Act expressly enacted, that the rates being granted for the objects therein mentioned, should not be subject to any deduction or per-centage whatsoever (except for collecting the same):

That as the rates collected for pipe-water have not averaged £12,000 a year, the poundage on which would not exceed £600 a year, the substitution of a salary of £1000 a year in lieu of poundage, on a principle of economy, was totally unwarrantable.

That the Respondents alleged that such salary was to be in lieu of poundage, and charged proportionably on the city private funds and pipe-water rents; but that in fact the salary was charged by Respondents equally on both funds, though the city private funds must have been considerably greater than the pipe-water rates, inasmuch as a charge of £2000 per annum on the two revenues could not have effected any saving, unless the joint revenues had amounted to more than £40,000 a year; but as the pipe-water rates did not exceed an average of £12,000 a year, it was unjust to charge against such funds a yearly sum of £1000:

[323] That the Respondents for the first three years after the passing of the Metal Main Act considered such poundage, or commuted salary, in lieu of poundage, as sufficient remuneration for the services of their Treasurer; but in 1812, the Respondents thought proper to allow him, as an accomptant, an additional salary of £300 sterling per annum; and he having desired that he should have such additional salary from the commencement of the Metal Main Act, the same was paid to him accordingly out of the rates, until the year 1815, when the same was discontinued:

That in the accounts of the Respondents, in addition to the yearly rent of £2500, the sum of £1000 a year in lieu of poundage, and the yearly salary of £300 a year to their Treasurer as an accomptant, there are also contained various other items, such as a yearly sum of £312, being for interest on a sum of £5200, exceeding the debt of £67,800, recognised and provided for by said Metal Main Act; a sum of about £75 yearly expended on a tavern entertainment; excessive charges for interest; and other charges not connected with any of the objects of the Metal Main Act, and which, if allowed, would have the effect of creating a perpetual burden on the inhabitants, by postponing to an indefinite period the accomplishment of its object:

That although the Treasurer of the Corporation is required, by the Metal Main Act, to keep separate and distinct accounts of the rates thereby granted, and to apply the balance thereof, (after retaining the several sums of money therein mentioned for the creation of the sinking-fund,) in payment of interest, in laying down metal main and service pipes, and making additional improvements in the works; yet, [324] down to the year ending September, 1821, so far was the Treasurer for the time being from complying with the provisions of the Act, for keeping distinct and separate accounts of the rates thereby granted, that, to that year inclusive, the account of those rates had been blended with the rates granted by the several other Acts:

That the said several unjust charges introduced into the respective yearly accounts of the Respondents, amounted in the year 1821, to £39,464 17s. 10d., exclusive of the sum of £960, which the Respondents deducted from the nett receipts of the metal main rates for each year, for salaries of officers; whereas the charge of £960 was not warranted under any of the provisions of the Metal Main Act, and, in fact, the salaries charged were not paid to the officers:

That the Respondents have not in any manner settled nor passed their accounts of the rates levied under the Metal Main Act, but that such accounts still remain open and unsettled:

That the Respondents wilfully, and for the purpose of making the balance appear to be in favour of themselves, and not in favour of the relators and other persons liable to such rates, in the account of each of the years enumerated, introduced various false and erroneous items of the several amounts mentioned; and that the Respondents, having become at length sensible either of the impropriety of so doing, or their mistake, had at length consented to give up in future some of those erroneous charges, and had then ceased to introduce such into their accounts:

That the right of the Respondents to levy the rates could not be resisted at common law, inasmuch as a general form of avowry is given by the Act, [325] to the persons who levy the same, and no mode whatever is provided by which the persons rated and bound to pay the rents can require an account of the application thereof:

That the accounts of the Corporation to the year 1821, had been submitted for examination to the Commissioners of imprest accounts, who had disallowed, as erroneous and improper, charges claimed by the Corporation, to the amount of £39,461 17s 10d.; and that the accounts contained charges improper and erroneous, besides these declared to be so by the Commissioners.

Upon these allegations and charges the information and bill prayed: That the Respondents might be declared trustees of the rates and rents mentioned in the Act of the 49th Geo. III., for the uses and purposes therein declared, and that the trusts thereof might be carried into execution; and also that an account might be taken of all the monies received either by John Carlton, or by the Respondents, William Henry Archer, or by the Corporation, or any other person or persons appointed by them in each year, from the passing of the Act, in respect of the rates or rents granted by the Act, and of the application thereof, in each of those years, and of the expenses incurred in each year, in laying down cast iron or metal main and service pipes, or otherwise making additional alterations and improvements in the works; and also an account of the sums yearly applied in and towards the sinking-fund, from the time of passing the Act, and of the debts yearly paid off; and that an account might be taken of the money borrowed by the Corporation under the provisions of the Act, and due on the credit of the rates thereby granted, and of the money applied in the payment of the [326] interest of the debt of £67,800, and of the money so borrowed; and that the balance of rates or rents after deducting the expense of laying down cast iron or metal main and service pipes, or otherwise making any additional alterations and improvements in the works, might be ascertained, and applied as directed by the provisions of the Act exclusively; and if it should appear that the money produced by the rates of rents so borrowed on the credit thereof, had been applied to purposes not warranted by the Act, then, that the Corporation and William Henry Archer, or such of them as it should seem right, might be decreed to replace such money to the account of the rates or rents; and that some proper person might be appointed to receive the rates or rents granted by the Act as aforesaid; or that the person or persons who then received the same, might pay the same into Court to the credit of the cause.

The Respondents, the Corporation of Dublin, under their corporate seal, and the Respondent William Henry Archer, their Treasurer, on the 10th of February, 1824, filed their joint answer to this information and bill.

They denied that they were trustees of the rates; contending that there was nothing in the Act, which in any manner interfered with, or controlled the absolute property which the Respondents theretofore possessed in the water-course and works; and that not only the ancient works, but the new and improved works to be completed through the medium of the metal main rates, were to be, and are the property of the Respondents, unfettered by any trust whatsoever; and they submitted that the uses and purposes specified in the Act are not charitable uses.

They insisted that, having furnished to the Lord [327] Lieutenant all accounts of the rents, up to and for the 28th September, 1821, pursuant to a clause in the Metal Main Act, and in the manner therein prescribed, the same are a bar to the jurisdiction of the Court, to call for the account prayed by the Appellant's information, or for any such accounts; and they claimed to have the benefit of the objection at the hearing of the cause, as if they had pleaded the matter in bar to the discovery and relief, or either the discovery or relief, prayed by information, or to the information itself.

They denied that the sums received by them, or by the Respondent William Henry Archer, had been misapplied, or that the purposes for which the Act was passed had remained unaccomplished, there being upwards of 38 English miles of metal main work laid down.

They admitted that the metal main rates were still levied from the Relators, and the persons liable to pay the same; and said that they did not know whether the right of the Respondents to levy the rates could be resisted at law; but were advised that the circumstance of a general form of avowry being given by the Act, is no bar to the right of any party to contest his liability.

They said it was not true that no mode was provided by the Act, by which persons rated thereunder could require an account of the application of the rates, it being provided by the Act, that the Respondents should account to the Lord Lieutenant; and therefore they were advised that it was unnecessary and improper in the Appellant to have come to the Court for such account, and they insisted that no jurisdiction existed in the Court to call for such accounts.

[328] They admitted the receipt of rents since the passing of the Act; but, denying the truth of the allegations in the bill, as to the sums borrowed, and the receipts, expenditure, and appropriation of the funds, set forth various accounts referring to schedules.

They admitted that their accounts, up to 1821, were submitted to the control and inspection of the Commissioners for auditing Public Accounts, and believed that the Lord Lieutenant directed the same to be submitted to the Commissioners.

They said that the Commissioners, in each of the accounts, disallowed certain charges and items particularly specified in the 6th schedule to their answer; but not the charges or items in the information specified; and that the Commissioners did not declare the balance of each year of accounts to be such as in the information stated; but that at the end of the first year only they struck a balance, which was brought forward to the next year, and so added to the alleged balance for all the years, and for the particular balances they referred to a schedule.

They denied that the accounts contained any charges improper or erroneous, except those disallowed by the Commissioners.

They insisted that, notwithstanding the opinion of the Commissioners, the charges were not improper or unreasonable charges; and that the opinion so expressed by the Commissioners was unfounded; which they would be able to show by referring to the provisions of the Metal Main Act, which the Respondents considered to have been misconceived, or at least inaccurately stated, by the Commissioners.

They denied that such disallowed items had been [329] introduced into the accounts, from the impure and improper motives unwarrantably imputed to the Respondents by the Appellant's information; and denied that any sum or sums of money received by them, as far as they were aware, as or for either metal main or pipe-water rates, had been in any respect misapplied or converted to the use of the Respondents, or to any use or purpose unconnected with the objects of the Act.

They admitted that they had persevered in collecting the rates, which they, the Respondents, submitted they could not, and ought not to abandon, so long as any of the purposes contemplated by the Metal Main Act remained to be accomplished; and they admitted that they had not passed or settled the accounts of the rates otherwise than by furnishing the same, pursuant to the Act, to the Lord Lieutenant, and said that they were not aware of any other mode of passing or settling the accounts, which they ought to have adopted.

They denied the jurisdiction of the Court, to investigate the accounts, or to call the Respondents to account for their administration of the funds, there being another tribunal pointed out by the Act, to which alone the Respondents were in this respect responsible; and they submitted that, under all the circumstances, they were not to be considered trustees of the rates, so as to be subject to the control or jurisdiction of the Court; and insisted that the Appellant was not entitled to call for, nor the Court competent to administer, such relief as in the information prayed; and they objected to such jurisdiction, as if they had pleaded thereto, or demurred to the Appellant's information.

The Appellant having replied to the answer, the [330] Respondents having rejoined, and issue being joined, witnesses were examined for the Appellant. No witnesses were examined for the Respondents; but one of the Appellant's witnesses was cross-examined by the Respondents, with respect to some documentary evidence.

The cause was heard on the 21st and 22d of July, 1824. The Respondents' counsel proposed, at the hearing, to read the depositions of the Appellant's witnesses, in order to prove that the Respondents' accounts had been audited by the Commissioners for auditing Public Accounts in Ireland. The Appellant objected to this course, on the ground that the effect of it would be to set up a defence for the Respondents, incompatible with that made by the Respondents themselves in their answer. The objection was over-ruled, and the counsel for the Respondents having insisted that the Respondents were not trustees of the rates, and that the uses for which the same were granted were not charitable in their nature, the Court decreed that the information should stand dismissed with costs, for want of jurisdiction.

Against this decree the appeal was brought.

For the Appellants: Mr. Shadwell and Mr. Sugden.

The objects of the Irish Act 15th and 16th Geo. III. c. 21, and the 19th of Geo. III. c. 80, especially the latter, are charitable; and the interests thereby created, of which the Respondents are the trustees, are charitable in their nature, and consequently subject to the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity.

That the objects of these two Acts, and especially of the Metal Main Act, are charitable, is manifest, both [331] because the general purpose is, by means of a heavy tax of temporary duration, to discharge a large subsisting debt, and afford a permanent supply of a necessary article of life to all future inhabitants of Dublin, at a comparatively trifling expense; and also because no houses are chargeable to the metal main rates, which do not pay to the amount of five shillings annually of Minister's money : and all the occupiers of such houses as pay to a less amount, which are extremely numerous, derive benefit from the Metal Main Act, without cost, and strictly in the way of charity.

If the uses of the Metal Main Act are of a charitable nature, the jurisdiction over them which is inherent in a Court of Equity could not be taken away by implication. It must continue to exist, unless it has been excluded by a positive declaration of the legislature. No such exclusion can be pointed out by the Respondents. There neither has been any direct exclusion of the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity, nor has any exclusive jurisdiction been given, directly or indirectly, either to Parliament or the Imprest Commissioners. No judicial jurisdiction was given to Parliament by the Metal Main Act, which requires the Respondents annually to furnish their accounts to the Lord Lieutenant, to be by him laid before Parliament, for the information of the members thereof ; but it is incompetent for the Houses of Parliament, or either of them, to adjudicate upon, or correct, prospectively or retrospectively, any mistakes or misconduct of the Respondents, which the inspection of these accounts may disclose ; nor was it the intention of the legislature, in ordering such accounts to be laid before Parliament, that the two Houses, or either of them, should have, nor have they thereby received, any power of dealing judicially with the same, or of preventing Courts of Equity from dealing with them in the same manner as with other trusts of a charitable nature. With respect to the Imprest Commissioners, no exclusive cognizance of these accounts can be pretended to be given to them ; and unless it were, a Court of Equity must, under any supposition, be entitled to exercise with them at least concurrent jurisdiction.

As the Respondents have, by their answer, disclaimed the authority of the Imprest Commissioners to examine, and finally settle, the Respondents' metal main accounts, it was not competent to the Respondents at the hearing of the cause, in contradiction to their answer, to endeavour to withdraw the examination of their accounts from the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity, by showing, from the depositions of the Appellant's witnesses, or in any other manner, that the Imprest Commissioners are exclusively entitled to examine the Respondents' accounts, and that, by them, these accounts have been already examined and settled.

Even if it were admitted that the Imprest Commissioners possessed exclusive jurisdiction in examining and settling the Respondents' accounts, on its being proved that these Commissioners, upon examination and settlement thereof, found a misapplication of trust-funds to have taken place, which they have ascertained to have taken place to the amount of £37,000, as is admitted by the 6th schedule to the Respondents' answer, a Court of Equity ought so far to have entertained the present information, as to have exercised the same jurisdiction it would have done on a Master's report,—to have secured the sums misapplied, and to have given all proper directions respecting the application thereof, as well as to prevent the future mismanagement of the fund.

[333] For the Respondents : The Attorney General and Mr. Pepys.

The Act of the 49th Geo. III. has established a jurisdiction to which the Respondents are expressly directed to submit their accounts of the revenue received by virtue of that Act of Parliament, and the several other Acts therein recited ; and the accounts which, by the information, are prayed to be taken under the decree of the Court of Chancery of Ireland, have accordingly been duly submitted to, and have been finally settled by, such jurisdiction.

The purposes to which the revenue is directed to be applied, are not charitable uses, nor are the Corporation trustees of the revenue, and the Respondents are not liable to render any account of their revenue in the Court of Chancery, at the suit of the Attorney-General, or any other relator or person whomsoever.

If the Court of Chancery had any jurisdiction over the accounts in the information mentioned, yet it would be contrary to the principles and practice of the Court of Equity, to open accounts finally settled by a competent authority : particularly when, as in the present case, no errors are proved to exist in the accounts so settled.

The Lord Chancellor in the course of the argument made the following observations :

If the reference of the account to Parliament takes away the jurisdiction of Chancery, I have acted without jurisdiction in many cases. As to the supposition that the jurisdiction is transferred to another tribunal, there is an express clause in the Metal Main Act, which incorporates the former Acts. What [334] might have been done under those Acts, may be done under this.

The case of the Attorney General v. Brown, whether ill or well decided, was not decided solely upon the ground that it was a charitable use. Upon reflection, I thought it so; but the judgment rested upon other grounds.

The Lord Chancellor (at the conclusion of the argument): I cannot advise the House to proceed to judgment immediately. It is a case of very great importance to the parties, and more so as to the general doctrine to be established or overturned.

Only two cases have been mentioned which bear directly upon the main question in the cause.*

In the Attorney General v. Brown, the question was much argued, whether the fund was to be applied to a charitable use? After the argument, it appeared to me that it was a charitable use. But that was not [335] the ground of the judgment in that case, whether it was well or ill founded; because I was of opinion that the Court of Chancery had jurisdiction in that case, whether it was or was not a charitable use.

The case of the Attorney General v. Heelis, weakens the authority of the Attorney General v. Brown; because much of the doctrine of the Vice Chancellor in the former case is not reconcileable with the principle of the decision of the Attorney General v. Brown.

But in neither of those cases did the Court look sufficiently into the old law upon the subject.

The research which has been made by a noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) into the old books as to the writ of account, rather confirms my decision in the Attorney General v. Brown, than the judgment in the Attorney General v. Heelis. But, without looking to the power in the common law to enforce the account, the jurisdiction being established in the Courts of Equity, it will be necessary, in reviewing the judgment of the Court below, to consider, 1. The law of the case according to the doctrines of a Court of Equity, if no special facts except the case out of the ordinary rule. 2. Supposing the Courts of Equity to have jurisdiction in such cases, whether any of the Acts of Parliament passed for the purposes in question destroy the jurisdiction of the Courts of Equity upon the subject: that is, whether such powers are given by the Act as expressly, or by necessary implication, displace the jurisdiction? The question of jurisdiction is the more material, because the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has not shown distinctly what his opinion would have been, if he had been accurately acquainted with the cases of the Attorney General v. Brown, and the Attorney General v. Heelis. He takes notice that two judges in England have differed upon the question, and says that if the Attorney General v. Brown is right, it proceeds upon the ground that there is no other jurisdiction. But I do not admit that the Attorney General v. Brown proceeds upon that ground.

In the course of the argument, Lord Redesdale asked how the law stood in the case of Road Bills, where it was directed that the accounts should be returned to Parliament: whether such a provision took away the ordinary jurisdiction to enforce an account with the directions usual in a Court of Equity?

* The Attorney General v. Brown, 1 Swanston, p. 265; and the Attorney General v. Heelis, 2 Sim. and Stuart, p. 67. In the latter case the Vice Chancellor said, "Funds derived from the gift of the crown, or the gift of the legislature, for any legal, public, or general purpose, are charitable funds, etc. It is the source from which the funds are derived, and not the mere purpose to which they are dedicated, which constitutes the use charitable, etc. Where an Act of Parliament passes, for paving, lighting, cleansing, and improving a town, to be paid for wholly by rates or assessments to be levied upon the inhabitants of the town, the funds so raised being in no sense derived from bounty or charity, in the most extensive sense of the word, are not charitable funds to be administered by the Court."

Quære as to that class of cases, where funds exist, which have been immemorially applied to purposes apparently charitable, but the source from which the funds have been derived is lost in antiquity? Quære also, whether rates, levied by authority of Parliament, for improving a town, are not funds derived from the gift of the legislature, and applicable to legal public purposes, within the terms of the definition?

At the end of the argument, the following observations were made by Lord Redesdale: There has not been in this case a sufficient investigation of the ancient law and practice on the subject of account. It seems to have been conceived that the common law had provided sufficient means for calling to account all persons liable to account. But it was found by experience, that the writ of account was a very imperfect and inefficient mode of proceeding.

In the case of an individual, there can be no doubt, that if a person had received the rents of an estate belonging to a minor for which he would be accountable, the law provided a writ to call such person to account, and to compel payment of what should be found due upon the account. Yet it is every day's practice, although the common law has provided this remedy, for Courts of Equity to take upon themselves the investigation of accounts on behalf of infants suing by their next friends. The [337] writ of account at common law, did not exclude, but rather was superseded by, the jurisdiction of the Courts of Equity on this subject; because the proceeding in Equity was found to be the more convenient mode of calling parties to account,—partly on account of the difficulty attending the process under the old writ of account, but chiefly from the advantage of compelling the party to account upon oath, according to the practice of Courts of Equity.

There is, on this subject, a writ in the Register (Reg. Brev., p. 138), which recites, that the King had been given to understand that his predecessors had granted certain rates on all merchandise brought into a town, to be applied to the walling of the town; and the inhabitants having complained that the rates collected had not been duly applied, the writ proceeds in the nature of a commission for taking the account. Under such circumstances, an information at this moment would lie at the suit of the Attorney General for taking such account. The practice of proceeding by information rather than by the writ of account has prevailed, in consequence of the difficulty of proceeding under the writ. That persons under such circumstances should be rendered accountable by virtue of the writ, is said to be according to the law and custom of England.

The practice of proceeding by information or by bill filed in a Court of Equity has arisen from the difficulties attending the process by writ. The King, as paterfamilias, may institute a suit by his Attorney General. It is not essential that Relators should join in the suit; but it is the common course to join them in the suit, in order that the Defendants may not be oppressed, without remedy, by vexatious suits, [338] the Relators being liable to costs, which are never paid by the Crown.

The main question in this case is, whether any other mode of proceeding is exclusively provided by the statute.

As to the Acts for taking accounts of public money, it will be found, upon examination, that they cannot apply to the subject. Those Acts only substitute Commissioners for the Auditors of Imprest, and direct that in certain cases in which public money is advanced in the nature of imprest, the commissioners should take such accounts. This must be confined to the cases enumerated in the Acts, otherwise there is no purpose to be answered by enumeration. A larger construction would extend the Acts to many cases which never could have been within the view of the legislature in passing the Acts; and in such a sense, any inposition by Act of Parliament might be called public money.

As to the provision for laying the account before the Houses of Parliament, can it be considered as an effective account? They can neither take such account, nor order payment of the balance, nor compel the proper application of the money.

To effect such purposes, the two Houses could only proceed by Act of Parliament; and if they had independent and distinct powers, one House might draw the result of one balance—the other House might come to a different result. In such a case, which of these conflicting balances should be paid? Could either House appoint a committee to examine the account item by item, or require vouchers? Suppose them competent so to do, and that process being adopted, they should discover an improper application of the public monies or trust funds: [339] what could they do but order the Attorney General to file an information against the parties? The subject requires mature consideration: for if this House should determine that Courts of Equity have no jurisdiction upon the subject, it will remain to be considered what effective remedy parties will have in cases of this description.

If the necessity for raising the rates had ceased under the provisions of the Act, there is a power to resist, by common law, the payment of the money; but that fact is the result of an account, and can only be shewn by taking the account and ascertaining that the incumbrances are discharged.

The Act directs the application of the revenues to reduce the principal debt: but in the case of a misapplication of the funds to purposes not authorized by the Act, the debt might have remained undischarged, and then the remedy at common law would not have arisen. It was said that the proceeding was premature: but it was necessary to enforce the proper application of the funds, and was in the nature of an injunction to stay waste. If, from the probability of the misapplication of the funds, the incumbrances were likely to be prolonged, a case arose in which it was proper to apply to a Court of Equity in order to ascertain the facts and prevent the misapplication. In the case of a deed of trust, if the trustees, being directed to keep down the interest of incumbrances, and also out of the trust funds to pay off the principal of incumbrances, the parties interested under the deed might apply to a Court of Equity, and complain that the funds being available for that purpose, were not applied to the discharge of incumbrances, and that the interest upon the incumbrances was therefore [340] continued without necessity. Whether the incumbrances were, or were not discharged, the parties interested have a right to be informed of the fact by proceedings in a Court of Equity.

As for the Auditors of Imprest, it is clear that they are unable to grant relief: they could not order the specific application of any money; they could only order payment into the Exchequer. They might declare that the Corporation had been guilty of misapplication, and might declare them to be liable: but could they charge them with the default, and provide a remedy for the misapplication?

But even if the account could be effectively taken by the Auditors or the Commissioners of Public Accounts, or by Parliament, I doubt whether the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery would be excluded. It is important to ascertain, how far such Corporations are liable to account in Courts of Equity. As to the cases where Courts of Quarter Sessions are authorized to take accounts, it is purely a matter of account debtor and creditor; and if a balance bearing interest is ascertained to be in the hands of one of the accounting parties who is chargeable, there is no jurisdiction to compel the payment. It is an important question, worthy of serious consideration, whether the jurisdiction in these cases is to be limited to the mere matter of account, excluding the power of correcting malversation and misapplication; as where, under a trust for the purpose, the funds have not been applied to the payment of debts bearing interest. In the case of hospitals and other public institutions, where money for specific purposes has been granted by Parliament, or money borrowed to erect buildings, or for other purposes under the authority of an Act, if it should appear [341] upon the taking of an account, that the debt has not been extinguished in consequence of a misapplication of the funds, a mere account to be rendered to Parliament would not remedy the evil. In such cases, is the jurisdiction of the Court of Equity excluded? is the justice extended to individuals, refused in the case of public bodies?

It is expedient, in such cases, that there should be a remedy, and highly important that persons in the receipt of public money should know, that they are liable to account, in a Court of Equity, as well for the misapplication of, as for withholding, the funds. Suppose even the case of a public accountant clearly within the Act, who, having embezzled or misemployed the public monies, had rendered accounts which were imperfect or fabricated—could not the Attorney General, upon discovery of the fact or the fraud, proceed by information to recover the monies so fraudulently withheld or misappropriated? It has been said, by high authority, that such a right vests in the Attorney General by virtue of his office, and that the Court of Exchequer, upon such information, has jurisdiction to order such person to account and pay the money. A similar remedy is applicable, as I conceive, to any other person having the trust and management of public money; any public accountant of any description.

As to the remedy before the Commissioners of Public Accounts, they can only take the account as it is presented before them by the accountant. They have only the ordinary means of calling the party to account. If a defective or fraudulent account is passed before them, does no remedy exist for such an abuse? The case now before the House is so important in all its bearings, involving so much of the great principles of the general administration [342] of justice, that it is highly necessary the House should enter fully into the question of jurisdiction.

Lord Redesdale: This is an information which was filed by His Majesty's Attorney General in Ireland, in consequence of an investigation which had taken place respecting certain duties which were to be levied upon persons who are house-holders and owners of houses in the city of Dublin, and the liberties of that city, for the purpose of paying the Corporation of Dublin a remuneration for the supply of water, which was to be afforded to the citizens of Dublin. It is unnecessary to enter into the whole subject: the question which is now before your Lordships being properly merely a question whether a proper mode of proceeding has been adopted in this case for the purpose of compelling the Mayor and Corporation of Dublin to account for certain rates which they are entitled to receive under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and to apply them according to the terms of that Act of Parliament, or whether the persons who have instituted this suit have not mistaken their remedy, because another jurisdiction is supplied by the Act which authorized the establishment of those rates and duties, or by a more general Act which directed certain public accounts to be taken in a particular way. Looking into a note with which I have been furnished of what was the judgment of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, I find that he thought fit to dismiss this information as being improperly instituted, and that judgment seems to be founded upon an idea that there was another jurisdiction, and that that jurisdiction was before the Commissioners of Public Accounts. It has been contended at your Lordships' bar, that there is no jurisdiction, in consequence of the Act [343] which creates these duties having directed that the Mayor and Corporation of Dublin should lay their accounts before the two Houses of Parliament. It seems to me most singular, that directing the accounts to be laid before the two Houses of Parliament, who are perfectly incompetent to take the accounts, who never act in the character of a Court of Justice for any such purpose, that the mere laying those accounts before the two Houses of Parliament, should defeat every jurisdiction which would have a right to take those accounts if that provision had not been made. I do not find that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland so considered it; he conceived that the accounts might be properly taken under the Commissioners for examining and taking the public accounts, as they are called. The Act passed for the purpose of taking and directing the manner of taking the public accounts; that is, accounts relating to the public monies applied for the public purposes of Government, which may be for special purposes directed by the Government of the country; proceeds, it is true, to give to the Commissioners of Public Accounts a jurisdiction with respect to certain establishments to which either the Parliament of Ireland, whilst it was a separate Kingdom, or the Parliament of the United Kingdom after the Union, had granted certain sums of public money in assistance of their funds; but all those are specially enumerated in the Act, and distinguished from what are called public accounts, it being the clear construction of the Act, that what are called public accounts are the accounts of the application of public money—that money which belongs to the State, and not the application of money not belonging to the State. If a general jurisdiction of this description had been intended, the Act of [344] Parliament would unnecessarily have mentioned these particular establishments. There was no occasion to mention them, according to the argument in this case: but by mentioning them specially and particularly, it is clear that the Act of Parliament did not intend by the words "public accounts," to include any accounts of this description. I take it therefore to be perfectly clear, that the Act of Parliament for taking the public accounts does not extend to this case. But there is a power given in the Act of Parliament, in certain cases, to the Lord Lieutenant to order certain accounts to be taken by the Commissioners of Public Accounts: those are special cases, and this is not one of those special cases. But suppose it had been one of those special cases, here the Lord Lieutenant did take upon himself to order the Corporation of Dublin to account before the Commissioners of Public Accounts, and the Commissioners of Public Accounts proceeded, though imperfectly, to take the accounts, and in the course of taking those accounts, they reported a misapplication by the Corporation of Dublin to a very considerable amount. What was to be done upon the Report, supposing that they were authorized to make the Report? Suppose the Lord Lieutenant had authority, and had authorized them to make the Report, what could be done upon it but that which has been done; namely, to institute a suit in the name of the Attorney General for the Crown to compel the application—the proper application of that money which the Commissioners of Public Accounts had stated to be misapplied. Look at the Act of Parliament for taking public accounts of any kind, either the public accounts relating to the public money, or those particular cases which are specially mentioned in the Act, in which a juris-[345]-diction is given to them. If those Commissioners report any balance or misapplication, what is the mode of proceeding? The Act of Parliament says, it shall be by information, by proceedings on the part of the Attorney General, according to the ordinary course of proceeding, for the purpose of compelling those who have money in their hands which ought to have been applied to a particular purpose, to apply it either to that purpose, or to pay it into the Exchequer, in the manner in which, according to the result of this transaction, the money ought to be applied. Does it not show, with respect to accounting for any part of the public revenue, that proceedings must be had to enforce the payment of that money, or the execution of that which the Commissioners of Public Accounts should report ought to be done. I therefore confess that I cannot conceive what objection there can possibly be to the mode of proceeding which has been adopted in this case, because there never should be a wrong without a remedy. Our law will not allow such a defect of justice: our law has provided certain modes of proceeding in different cases, and the ancient law generally proceeded by certain regular forms, which were writs contained in a collection called the Register of Writs, which writs were renewed according to certain cases which had occurred, by the persons authorized to frame the minutes.

It was specially enacted by a very ancient statute, that if the forms which had been provided were insufficient for particular purposes, the persons authorized by the Act should devise new writs for the purpose. But circumstances (which we see by referring particularly to them) induced the persons who had that authority to be very sparing in the exercise of it, and in consequence of that practice, [346] the particular writs which were actually framed either by the ancient law or under the authority of this particular law, were not always adapted to the purposes for which they were designed; but if no new writ was framed for the purpose, the Courts of law were content to use the writs, such as they found them, and apply them, though in some cases not exactly conformable to the exigency of the writs, and the reason given was, that no other writ was provided, and the wrong must not be without a remedy.

The law of Ireland is founded upon the law of England, by the adoption of the law of England in Ireland; and in the establishment of the Courts in Ireland, the same law which remains in England with respect to the Court of Chancery, the Court of King's Bench, and the Court of Exchequer, became the law of Ireland; and, therefore, if in this country a remedy was provided by writ, a remedy by writ might also be had in Ireland. Looking into the Register of Writs in this country, it seems to me that the remedy which was provided by the ancient law was an imperfect remedy, but a remedy was provided by the ancient law for a case of this kind. In early times, our Kings took upon themselves by prerogative to grant certain duties very much resembling these duties, for the benefit of towns and cities: to wall towns, to pave towns, and for various other purposes. There are, in the Register, writs expressly adapted to that purpose, reciting the grant, by some remote ancestor of the King, of certain duties which were to be applied to the walling of towns, or paving towns, or other public purposes; and that those duties so taken had not been so applied; and not having been so applied, the writ authorized certain persons to call before them the persons whose duty it was to [347] account, and to direct whatever should be in their hands to be applied according to the original intention of the grant, until the whole should be applied according to the intention of the grant.

We are referred to the statute of Elizabeth [7 App. Cas. 642, 38 Ch. D. 531], with respect to charitable uses, as creating a new law upon the subject of charitable uses. That statute only created a new jurisdiction, it created no new law; it created a new and ancillary jurisdiction; a jurisdiction borrowed from the elements which I have mentioned; a jurisdiction created by a commission to be issued out of the Court of Chancery to inquire whether the funds given for charitable purposes had or had not been misapplied, and to see to their proper application: but the proceedings of that commission were made subject to appeal to the Lord Chancellor, and he might reverse or affirm what they had done, or make such order as he might think fit for reserving the controlling jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, as it existed before the passing of that statute, and there can be no doubt that, by information by the Attorney General, the same thing might be done. While proceedings under that statute were in common practice, (as appears in that collection which is called Duke's Charitable Uses,) you will find it stated, that in certain cases, although a commission might issue under the statute, an information by the Attorney General was the better remedy. In process of time, indeed, it was found that the commission of charitable uses was not the best remedy, and that it was better to resort again to the proceedings by way of information in the name of the Attorney General. The right which the Attorney General has to file an information is a right of prerogative; the King, as parens patriæ, has a right, by his proper officer, to call upon [348] the several Courts of Justice, according to the nature of their several jurisdictions, to see that right is done to his subjects who are incompetent to act for themselves, as in the case of charities and other cases: the case of lunatics, where he has also a special prerogative to take care of the property of a lunatic; and where he may grant the custody to a person who, as a committee, may proceed on behalf of the lunatic; or where there is no such grant the Attorney General may proceed by his information.

I take this case to be one which falls precisely within the description that I have mentioned. I apprehend it is one in which, according to the practice of the ancient law, such a commission as this which is to be found in the Register, might have issued; because the persons who collect these rates are to account for the application of them, and to apply them accordingly. In this case, one part of the question arises from a provision in the Act of Parliament, that when a certain sum should have been discharged, a part of the duties should cease: that then they should be no longer levied. For the purpose of effectuating this, there were different provisions in the Act of Parliament, and amongst others a direction for the application of a certain sum in the reduction of this debt, a fund constituted for the purpose of more effectually relieving and putting an end to this debt as soon as the collection of rates would admit, and when that debt was perfectly satisfied, then the rates themselves were to cease. It has been objected, that if these rates had actually ceased by the payment of the debt which they were appropriated to pay, then the persons upon whom the rates had been levied, or against whom they were sought to be levied, might proceed at common law for the pur-[349]-pose of defending themselves against the rates, and if the rates had been improperly levied, to recover back what was so levied; and they urge that it is not pretended that the debt is actually extinct, but that the funds had not been applied in such manner as they ought to have been for the purpose of the extinction of the debt. Supposing the debt not to be extinct by the collection, have not the persons upon whom the rates are levied, and has not the Crown on behalf of those persons from whom they may be in future levied, a right to see that the funds are properly applied according to the directions of the Act? Now how were they to be applied in the gradual extinction of the debt? In paying certain portions of it; in creating a fund which should operate by degrees to the extinction of the principal of a portion of the debt, lessening consequently the interest that was to be paid out of the same fund, and then gradually to extinguish the whole.

If persons are entitled to the benefit of a trust of any description; for instance, persons who are interested in a fund which for a certain period is to be applied to the extinction of a debt: are they not to have a right to call from time to time for an account, for the purpose of seeing that every sum as it has been received, should be applied according to the exigency of the particular trust, as in the extinction of so much of the principal of the debt to which it could be applied, and consequently in extinction of so much of the interest, reducing the amount of the interest by degrees, and thus effecting the earlier reduction of the principal of the debt? Even suppose the Court of Commissioners of the Public Accounts have a right to take the accounts, and they find that monies to the amount of near £10,000 have [350] not been applied according to the terms of the Act of Parliament, is it the same thing merely to call for the account to ascertain the default of that sum of £40,000, and to compel the proper application, even with interest? because, if it had been applied according to the directions of the Act of Parliament, it would have operated so much quicker to the extinction of the debt.

Under these impressions, I confess I am at a loss to conceive upon what ground the account now sought by this information can be resisted. That it is a case in which the Mayor and Corporation of Dublin, are accountable persons;—in which an Act of Parliament has provided particular directions for the manner in which they should apply what they should receive under the authority of that Act, is not a question. The accounts which they are ordered to render to the two houses of Parliament, are mere accounts upon which nothing can be done but as the two Houses of Parliament might think fit to direct, when one House of Parliament might proceed one way, and the other House another way. And, after all, if one House were to appoint a Committee to examine into these accounts, and to inquire of the persons who are about to come before them, as it were, rendering those accounts, and they rendered those accounts, what could the House do when it had taken the accounts? could it order payment? and is that a part of the jurisdiction of the House of Commons, or of this House, proceeding as a House of Parliament, and not as a Court of Justice? We should be acting against the constitution of the country, if we assumed any such authority. It would be rather extraordinary [351] doctrine to hold that either House of Parliament, independent of the other House of Parliament and the Crown, can act for any legislative purpose, or for any purpose except so far as this House is constituted a Court of Judicature, in which capacity it must act as a Court of Judicature. The House of Commons, for certain purposes, is capable of acting as the public accuser, but the House of Commons might just as well attempt to try and condemn a person whom, according to the usage and practice of Parliament they thought fit to impeach, as proceed in the manner in which it is suggested in argument they might proceed. Those who constitute the House better understand the constitution of the Government of this country, than to attempt any such proceeding. There was a time when such proceedings were attempted, but the result was the overthrow of that constitution of which the House of Commons formed a part.

I conceive, therefore, that with reference to this case, there can be no doubt but that, in default of any other jurisdiction, the Court of Chancery in Ireland had the jurisdiction by the information of the Attorney General, with or without a Relator; for the Attorney General might have filed this information without a Relator. The Relator is introduced properly by the Attorney General, that there may be some person responsible for the costs of the proceedings, if finally there should be an opinion in the Court that the information has been improperly instituted, or if in the course of the proceedings it should be in any manner improperly conducted. It is for the benefit of the subject that the Attorney General in all those proceedings provides persons to [352] be responsible as Relators in the information, that the Court may award against them what the Court cannot do against him.

Under these impressions, it seems to me that it is your Lordships' duty to reverse the decree which has been pronounced; that the accounts which have been taken before the Commissioners of Public Accounts, have been taken by persons who had no authority to take the accounts; that the result of the investigation upon the subject, amounts to nothing, except as it affords information upon the subject. If, in fact, the Commissioners had jurisdiction upon the subject, still I conceive that, upon this information, the Court of Chancery originally might have proceeded to order, that that which the Commissioners of Public Accounts report, should be carried into execution; for I know not how any report of the Commissioners of Public Accounts, can be carried into execution, but by means of the ordinary courts of justice. In the Act framed for passing the public accounts before the Commissioners of Public Accounts, even with respect to the public revenue, the proceedings to enforce the payment of any thing that may be due in relation to the accounts, must be by the ordinary proceedings in a court of justice. I therefore think your Lordships ought now to proceed to reverse the judgment (dismissing the information, and ordering the Relators to pay the costs) which has been given by the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and to direct, on the contrary, an account to be taken of the receipt and application of the duties in question, according to the exigencies of the particular case; following nearly the terms of the prayer of the information. I reserve the [353] consideration of costs, until it shall appear what is the true result of that account; and in so doing, your Lordships, I apprehend, must direct, as to the several sums of money which have been received by the Corporation for the duties in question, that an inquiry shall be made, whether they have been applied according to the terms of the Act of Parliament; particularly in creating what is called a sinking fund, and in the application of the money, first to the payment of the interest, and then in the reduction of the principal, in the very words provided for by the Act of Parliament. If the result of that inquiry should be, that the Corporation of Dublin have not applied the funds according to the Act of Parliament, it will remain to be considered in what manner the Court of Chancery in Ireland should then have jurisdiction upon the subject, and would be able to proceed to do justice. In what I propose to your Lordships to do, I propose to prevent further injustice, supposing injustice to have been done. How far, upon the report of the accounts to be taken in the Court of Chancery, the Corporation of Dublin can be compelled to do now retrospectively, what they ought to have done, from time to time, as the funds came to their hands, may be a question of considerable difficulty, considering the nature of a Corporation, and the funds which may belong to a Corporation; but if it were the case of an individual—if an individual, being a trustee for the payment of a debt, and receiving funds for the payment of that debt, with a provision, clear and distinct, in the deed creating the trust, that out of the funds so reserved, a certain sum should be applied until the extinction of the debt, or carried to a [354] sinking fund, or applied in any particular way, and that person so intrusted, did not think fit to observe the directions of the trust under which he acts, but retained that money in his own hands, or applied it for purposes to which it was not applicable; it would be a consideration, according to the circumstances of the case, in what manner justice should be done to the persons who were injured by such a misapplication of the funds? It might be in the shape of an action for damages, or in the Court itself charging the trustee with compound interest, according to the nature of the particular case, in such a manner as to do justice to the persons who were injured by his misconduct. That is a subject which can only be properly entered into after the account shall have been taken, and it shall be shown what is the misapplication which is complained of. The proceeding appears imperfect upon the report of the Commissioners of Public Accounts, and, indeed, the Commissioners of Public Accounts seem to have felt they were not competent to the undertaking, although the Lord Lieutenant had thought fit to refer the account to them, and the Corporation of Dublin choose to come before them. They seem to have felt themselves not competent; and besides that, the Corporation of Dublin did not conceive they were bound by the account, for in their answer to this bill, they object to the account. How then can it be said, that that account is to bar these proceedings? And yet that is the ground upon which, as I understand it, that information was dismissed.

It will require some little time to frame an order for your Lordships to make upon the subject; but I think that this decree ought to be reversed, and [355] that directions ought to be given upon the information filed by the Attorney General. I also think that it may be a subject of inquiry and of a good deal of consideration, in what manner the order to be pronounced, should be framed. A precedent cannot be obtained, and therefore the House must endeavour to act upon that which the justice of the particular case requires, without the assistance that might be derived from other similar cases. In that case * of a proceeding under a special Act of Parliament, which your Lordships thought did not give the authority assumed in the case, the Court of Chancery certainly proceeded upon the idea of making a Corporation responsible for the acts which had been done; and although the Corporation itself had derived no benefit from those acts at all correspondent with the sum of money which had been reported to be due from them, in consequence of what had been done, they were charged with that amount as the consequence of those acts.

I cannot but consider this as a proper proceeding, and that it is within the regular jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, and that it is a case in which the Corporation of Dublin might be charged out of their general funds, to make good the loss to that particular fund by the misapplication complained of. It appears to me, that the subject ought to be reserved for future consideration. The account ought to be simply directed according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, reserving all further directions, until the result of the account shall be ascertained.

[356] The Lord Chancellor.—I propose to postpone the further consideration of this case till Monday next. It appears to me to be extremely desirable that my noble and learned friend would be pleased to sketch out, in some degree, the order which ought to be pronounced; because one great difficulty I have had in the consideration of this case has been, what we are to do in enforcing the payment of what shall appear to be the balance of the account taken with respect to the Corporation. My noble and learned friend seems to think that we ought to reserve the question whether we can, or cannot, effectuate our decree. That is a point which is deserving of some consideration before we make the decree.

The Earl of Eldon: The mere question here is, whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland did right in having dismissed this information, and having dismissed it with costs. There was no place for much argument on the question, whether, regard being had to the nature of the case stated in this information, the Court of Chancery had, or had not, a jurisdiction. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland being of opinion, that if the Court of Chancery had jurisdiction independently of the circumstances which formed the ground of the decision, yet there are peculiar circumstances in the case that would deprive the court of its jurisdiction.

When this case was argued at the bar, two cases were cited, which had been heard in the Court of Chancery in England, one before myself, the case of The Attorney General v. Browne, and another, I believe, by the present Master of the Rolls, The Attorney General v. Heelis; and it is but fit to state that although I was of opinion, in that case of The [357] Attorney General v. Browne, that the purpose for which certain tolls were appropriated, was a purpose that made the establishment of those tolls, an establishment for a charitable use, I was of opinion it was not necessary that it should be a charitable use, to give the Court of Chancery jurisdiction upon the subject. But my judgment in that case proceeded upon this ground: that the court had a jurisdiction to call upon persons intrusted with the application of those tolls, which were granted for the purpose of supporting banks to protect the land from the inroads of the sea. I thought that the Court of Chancery had a right to direct an account of those tolls to be taken. The authority of that case is considerably weakened by the opinion given by the present Master of the Rolls, then Vice Chancellor, in the case of The Attorney General v. Heelis, inasmuch as the reasons on which he proceeded, were considerably different from those on which the judgment was founded which I thought myself bound to give, in the prior case of The Attorney General v. Browne.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in the present case, was of opinion that, inasmuch as the Act of Parliament had directed the accounts to be laid before the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and before Parliament or before the Commissioners of Public Accounts, that such a direction constituted another jurisdiction, and that, therefore, the Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction upon the subject. To the industry of a noble and learned Lord (Lord Redesdale), we are indebted for having established, in what he stated for your Lordships' consideration, that old authorities justified him in saying that a writ of account [358] might be brought, according to the old forms of the law, for the purpose of calling such parties to account, and he reasoned satisfactorily, at least to my humble judgment, that if a writ of account could have been maintained, a suit in Chancery would be also capable of being maintained, unless the jurisdiction of the Court was expressly, or by necessary implication, taken away.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland, advertng to that case of The Attorney General v. Browne, stated, that according to the facts embodied in the report of the case, it appeared that there was no other jurisdiction, and that the Court of Chancery in England probably was induced, by that circumstance, to think there must be a remedy somewhere, and that therefore the Court of Chancery was competent to decree the account which, in that case, the Court directed to be taken. I am most clearly of opinion, that, admitting the Act of Parliament ordered this account to be laid before the Lord Lieutenant, who is to lay the account before Parliament, and that the Commissioners of Public Accounts, have some authority likewise in taking such accounts, that this provision does not oust the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, because that jurisdiction cannot, in my judgment, be taken away but by express words, or by words creating a necessary implication to that effect; and, in every view which I can take of this case, I cannot imagine why the direction that the Lord Lieutenant should be informed of the state of the accounts, and that the Commissioners of Public Accounts should look into these matters, and that Parliament should have the accounts laid before them, should have such an effect. It appears to me that those are measures [359] rather ancillary to the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery than measures to oust the Court of Chancery from its jurisdiction. Upon the whole, I cannot entertain a doubt that, in this case, the Court of Chancery has a jurisdiction which has not been taken away by any enactment contained in this Act of Parliament regulating those institutions to which it refers. My opinion is, that in this case the Court of Chancery having jurisdiction, the bill ought not to have been dismissed.

I have prepared, with the assistance of my noble and learned Friend, some minutes of the judgment which I propose to your Lordships to pronounce. I have likewise been furnished by the parties with other minutes, in which notice being taken that the costs which were given by the Lord Chancellor have been paid into the Bank, those minutes provide for the repayment of those costs, which certainly ought not to have been paid if the bill ought not to have been dismissed, and they further provide for the costs of this appeal. With respect to the former costs, I do not apprehend it is necessary for your Lordships to say any thing upon the subject, because if you reverse the Lord Chancellor's decree, it will be of course on application that an order will be made to have those costs paid back again. With respect to the costs of this appeal, it being an appeal from the decision of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, it is not according to the usage of your Lordships' House to give such costs. I should, therefore, upon the whole submit to your Lordships, that the minutes which I have now in my hand should form the judgment of your Lordships. For the purpose of taking care that there should be no alteration hereafter, [360] perhaps it will be proper that the parties should have an opportunity of seeing these minutes which are now put upon your Lordships' table; and, in case nothing is said in the course of the morning to induce your Lordships to alter them, I propose, with the leave of the House, to-morrow, to move that the decree should be reversed, and that the judgment of this House should be conformable to those minutes.

Lord Redesdale: Having already given my opinion with respect to this case at length, I will not trouble your Lordships further upon the subject. My opinion perfectly concurs with that of the noble Lord who has just addressed you. With respect to the costs in the cause, your Lordships often, in reversing a decree, are in the habit of giving further directions to the Court of Chancery, and, in order to carry your order into execution, to direct the repayment of costs. The minutes which have been proposed are framed with a considerable degree of particularity from the Act of Parliament under the authority of which the particular revenues were raised. They are very minute, and therefore, I think it is proper that the parties should have an opportunity of looking at them before they are finally made the order of the House, because it is possible, in going through an Act of Parliament containing a vast variety of provisions, something may have escaped notwithstanding the attention I have given to the minutes, and they may not be expressed with perfect accuracy. My object was to make an order for the purpose of carrying into execution the particular provisions of the Act of Parliament as I found them in the Act.

[361] Ordered and adjudged (11th May, 1827), that the decree complained of be reversed, and it is declared that, by the terms of the Act of 49th Geo. III. intituled, "An Act for the better supplying of the city of Dublin with Water," the Respondents are bound to account for and apply the several rates and rents in the said Act mentioned in the manner expressed in the said Act, so far as the said Act relates to such rates and rents respectively. And, it is further ordered, that it be referred to one of the Masters of the Court of Chancery in Ireland to take an account of all sums of money received by the said Respondents, or by any person or persons by the order, or for the use, of the said Respondents in each year, from the time of the passing of the said Act, for or in respect of the rates and rents granted by the said Act, and of the application thereof respectively in each year, and particularly of the expenses incurred by the said Respondents in each year, in making reservoirs and laying cast iron or metal main and service pipes, or other alterations and improvements authorized by the said Act, and to state the balances of such account appearing at the end of each year respectively; and also an account of all sums of money which the said Respondents borrowed at interest upon the credit of the rates and rents granted by the said Act, and by the Acts therein recited, and which were necessary for the purpose of making such reservoirs and laying such cast-iron or metal main and service pipes; and also an account of the several demises or mortgages of the said rents, or any parts thereof for such purposes, and of the costs of such demises or mortgages, and to whom such demises or mortgages have been made, and for what sum or sums respectively; and whether such sum or sums of money so borrowed exceeded or fell short of the several sums authorized by the said Act to be borrowed in the several years therein mentioned respectively. And it is further ordered, that the said master do inquire and report the nature and particulars of the debt of £67,800 in the said Act mentioned, and to whom such debt was due and how incurred, and at what rate or rates of interest, and whether a fund has been duly provided according to the directions in the said Act for redeeming and discharging the same, and all such further sum and sums and [362] money as have been borrowed for the purposes and within the several periods authorized by the said Act; and whether the treasurer and treasurers for the time being of the said Respondents have annually retained out of the rates or rents granted by the said Act, the sum of £2000, together with such sum or sums of money as would be equal to the interest on all such sum and sums of money as have been borrowed under the provisions of the said Act; and whether all such sum and sums of money by the said Act directed to be so retained have been appropriated and applied as a sinking fund to pay off and discharge the said sum of £67,800 and all such other sum and sums of money as have been borrowed under the provisions of the said Act; and whether all such sum and sums of money so directed to be retained and appropriated have been for such purpose laid out in purchasing securities granted or passed for the debt and debts in the said Act mentioned, or any of such debt or debts; and whether all such interest money as have become due and owing on all the securities, sum and sums of money so purchased in, paid off, or discharged, has and have been applied in aid of the said sinking fund, according to the directions of the said Act, or whether the whole or any and what part or parts of such sum and sums of money has or have not been applied as directed by the said Act, and how the same respectively has or have been applied. And it is further ordered, that the said Master do inquire and report whether the treasurer and treasurers of the said Respondents has or have kept such separate and distinct accounts as directed by the said Acts of the receipts and produce and amount of the rates and rents granted by the said Act, and received under and by virtue thereof, and has or have paid and applied such part or balance thereof as from time to time remained after the retention of the several sum and sums of money directed to be otherwise applied, as in the said Act mentioned, in payment of the interest from time to time due on the money mentioned in the said Act to be then due and owing or borrowed under the authority of the said Act, and in laying down cast-iron or metal main and service pipes, or otherwise making such additional alterations and improvements in the works in the said Act mentioned, and in increasing the sinking fund created [363] by the said Act; and whether any deduction has been made from the said rates and rents, save for collecting the same, and, if any, what deduction and on what ground; and whether any surplus has been at any time or times, and when, received by the said Respondents, or on their account, more than had been from time to time duly expended as directed by the said Act; and whether such excess has at any time or times, and when, exceeded the sum of £500; and whether such excess has been from time to time added to the sinking fund created by the said Act, and paid and applied in like manner as the said annual sum of £2000 is by the said Act directed to be applied; and whether the whole of the sum and sums of money due, as in the said Act mentioned, and borrowed under the authority of the said Act, has been fully paid and discharged; or whether any and what parts or part thereof remain or remains due and owing, and to what amount, and why the same have or has not been paid or discharged. And it is further ordered, that the said Master do take an account of the costs, charges and expenses, in preparing, drawing, obtaining, and passing the said Act, and certify whether the same have been paid and discharged, and when and in what manner; or whether any and what parts or part thereof remain or remains due and unpaid, and for what reason. And it is further ordered, that the said Master do inquire and certify whether the several additional works and improvements intended to be provided for by the said Act have been completed, or whether any and which of such works and improvements have not been completed, and why the same have not been completed, and what remains to be done in respect thereof. And in case any of such works and improvements have not been completed, it is further ordered, that the said Respondents be at liberty to lay before the Master such statement as they may be advised to make respecting the same; and that the said Court do all such things as shall be necessary to carry this Order and Judgment into execution; reserving to the said Court the consideration of further directions, and the costs of the suit, until after the Master shall have made his Report.

IRELAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

WILLIAM MONTGOMERY,—Appellant; JAMES MILES REILLY, and EMILY GEORGINA SUSANNA, his Wife, JOHN REILLY, EMILY MARIA CATHERINE REILLY, JAMES MILES REILLY, the Younger, JANE HESTER REILLY, and THEODOSIA HARRIET REILLY, (Infants, by the said JAMES MILES REILLY, their Father and next Friend,) the Honourable GEORGINA CHARLOTTE EMILIA HANNAH MONTGOMERY, Widow, the Reverend EDWARD MONTGOMERY, Clerk, ARTHUR HILL MONTGOMERY, JOHN CHARLES MONTGOMERY, FRANCIS OCTAVIUS MONTGOMERY, GEORGE AUGUSTUS FREDERICK SANDYS MONTGOMERY, WILLIAM EDMOND REILLY, and the Right Honourable ROBERT WARD, —Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. xii. 837. S.C. 1 Dow and Cl. 62; Hay and J. (App.) liv. See Hammersley v. De Biel, 1845, 12 Cl. and F. 45 at p. 65; Jorden v. Money, 1851, 5 H.L.C. 185.]

A, being a younger child, becomes entitled, upon the death of her father, by his appointment under a marriage settlement, to £[4000], as a portion charged on lands, and to £1500 under his will, charging only his personalty. The other younger children became entitled to similar portions and bequests. The widow was entitled to a jointure under the settlement, and plate and household furniture under the will. B., (as eldest son,) enters upon the estate under the limitations of the settlement, and being in possession, carries on a correspondence on the subject of an increase of the jointure of the widow, and the portions of the younger children, with W., a common friend of the family, acting as the agent of B. as well as the widow and younger children. In the course of this correspondence, he proposes, by letter, on certain conditions to increase the portions of his brothers and sister, and the jointure of his mother, and gives directions to one [365] of his brothers to pay the increased jointure, and the interest upon the increased portions, which is done accordingly. After the interest had been paid for one year, a treaty of marriage was commenced between A. and C., who applied to the common friend to ascertain the amount of A's fortune, and was informed by him of the correspondence with B., and that he had authority to state, that £4000 was the amount of A's portion, to be secured on B's estate. Upon the faith of this communication, A. and C. intermarried. The interest upon the increased portion was paid by the agent of B., to A. and C., for three years after the marriage. B., in the mean time, had possessed, in consequence of the correspondence, part of the personality which belonged to the widow and younger children under the will; and had received, without objection, accounts from his agent, including the allowances paid to the widow and to younger children by way of interest upon the increased portions.

Upon a bill by A. and C. to enforce the payment of the increased portion, to which the widow and the other younger children were defendants, and, by their answers, submitted to perform the conditions on which the increase of portion and jointure was proposed.—Held, that the effect of the correspondence, with all the circumstances of the case, amounted to an agreement which a Court of Equity ought to enforce.

In the letter on which the husband and wife relied as the agreement in consideration of marriage, B. says:—"I can never be reconciled to the marriage, etc." Then he proceeds to speak of the arrangement between him and his family, and repeats his part of the agreement as to the younger children:—"£1000 each to be secured on certain lands; my sister's to be secured to herself for life, then among her children, etc." After stating the conditions for this increase of portion, he concludes:—"This, I think, is an abstract of the agreement, and when put into the form of a deed, if assented to by them, I am ready to execute at any time." And he adds:—"I will not entangle myself with Mr. J. R. (the husband.) If this match goes on, I will neither meddle nor make with it or their settlements."

Whether such a letter, written before the marriage to W., the common friend, and in the circumstances before mentioned, could be enforced as an agreement in consideration of marriage.—Quære.

Hugh Montgomery, being seised in fee of lands in the county of Down, by indentures dated [366] the 1st of June, 1782, and executed previously to his intermarriage with the Respondent, Georgina Charlotte Emilia Hannah Montgomery, limited the lands to the use of himself for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail; and by the settlement reserved to himself a power of charging the lands, by will or deed, with a sum of £5000, as a provision for the younger children of the marriage, and a further power of charging £800 for the same purpose.

The marriage took effect in the year 1782, and there were issue of the marriage, living at the death of Hugh Montgomery, eight children; namely, the Appellant, his eldest son and heir at law; the Respondents, Emily G. S., the Reverend Edward Montgomery, Arthur Hill, John Charles, Francis Octavius, and George Augustus Frederick Sandys, and Hugh Bernard (since deceased); of whom Francis Octavius and George Augustus Frederick Sandys were infants at the time when the cause was heard, but Francis Octavius is since of age.

Hugh Montgomery, on the 29th day of September 1801, made his will, and thereby gave to each of his younger children, £1500 to be paid by his executors, without interest, on the day of their respectively attaining the age of twenty-one years; and, after reciting that his estate of Rosemount stood charged with the sum of £5000 for younger children, he directed that the said sum should be equally divided among them, share and share alike; and, after reciting that he had a power to charge his estate with £800, he directed that the same should be divided among them, share and share alike; and also that the overplus of the rents and profits of the estates which he held in fee, after paying the interest [367] of his bond and judgment debts, should be paid to his wife, for the education and maintenance of his younger children, until they should respectively attain their majority, when the interest of the £1500 should be paid, out of the surplus, to each of them; and he bequeathed all the plate and household furniture he might die possessed of, to his wife, and declared, that it was his intention his personal property should go in discharge of his debts in the first instance, except the bequest to his wife. This will was attested by two witnesses.

In the year 1807, after making his will, Hugh Montgomery purchased lands, the purchase-money for which was £15,750. This having made an alteration in the nature and circumstances of his property, he determined on making a further provision for his younger children by a charge on this lately-purchased estate, and es-pressed his intention of doing so to his friend, William George Wakely. He died, however, without having fulfilled his intention, on the 31st day of March, 1815, leaving his children before mentioned, and his widow, surviving.

At the time of the death of Hugh Montgomery, the Appellant, and Hugh Bernard, the Respondents Emily G. S., Edward and Arthur Hill, were adults; all the other children were minors.

The Appellant, immediately on the death of his father, entered into possession of the settled and unsettled estates; the former (exclusive of the mansion-house, demesne, and some in the Lough of Strangford) were of the yearly value of about £2825; the latter of the yearly value of £2275.

Shortly after the death of Hugh Montgomery, William George Wakely (who was an intimate friend of the family) communicated to the Appellant [368] the intentions of Hugh Montgomery relative to his younger children; and the Appellant on that occasion expressed his determination to carry his father's intention on that subject into effect, and to make up the fortunes of his younger brothers and sister £5000 each.

This led to a correspondence on the subject between the Appellant and W. G. Wakely, in the course of which letters were written containing passages to the effect following:

On the 25th July, 1816, Mr. Wakely addressed a letter to the Appellant, who was then in London, in which he says, "Your letter did not reach me as soon as it might: you need make no apology to me for writing freely on your family affairs. Before I have any communication with Grey Abbey, let us first completely understand what is to be done and expected: then I shall be able to answer the questions put to me. You expect your mother, brothers and sister, to convey to you their claim on Lord Bangor's money: * do you mean the whole of it present and to come? Suppose this agreed on, how are you to manage with the minors? Your first determination was [369] £800 a year for your mother, and £5000 each for younger children." He requests him to be explicit on the subject, and states that the Appellant's mother had expressed her surprise that he had not executed a deed according to his first proposal. He then presses for a final adjustment of the business, and says, "It is natural that your family should wish the business finally settled as far as it can be; delay to your sister would be very prejudicial;" and adds, "you are now the father of your family, and it is well; for God has blessed you with a clearer understanding than falls to the lot of most people, which will help you to settle these matters as nearly as possible in the way you wish." And he concludes by saying, "I do not mean to write to the North till I hear from you, as I never understood, from any of the family, that you had fully explained your wishes and intentions to any of them. I think I understood you myself; but your answer to those questions will remove all possibility of doubt."

To this the Appellant replied by a letter, dated "London, 29th July, 1816," in which he says "Your kindness emboldens me to make one proposal to you, which I trust will convince you of my readiness to come to a conclusion, and to do every thing that is fair and honourable towards my family. As you are now fully acquainted with all my feelings and guides of conduct, if you will be so kind as to desire Arthur to send you a correct copy of my rent-roll, specifying the bad or rather insolvent tenants, as also a full statement of my debts, and any other paper you may require; if you then will be so kind as to compare and balance these, making allowance [370] between actual net income and paper rent-roll, which from experience I feel you are very capable of doing, and am sure are aware is no small sum, even in the best paid estates; if you will trouble yourself with all this, and decide between my family and me, I hereby engage to sign whatever deed may be tendered to me, certified to have been drawn up under your directions." He then mentions several arrangements he had previously in contemplation on the subject, and further adds, "my estate is heavily burdened, in addition to the claims of the family; but if an arrangement could be made to give me a certain prospect of future relief, I would not hesitate a moment reducing myself to the most limited income, and at once settling the whole business. The minors certainly offer difficulties; but if the family, who are now of age, sincerely put their shoulder to it, and, in short, are determined, both now and hereafter, to act an honest and equitable part, I think it might be arranged by your kind interference. Might not a trust be raised? I am willing to allow my whole estate to be so vested; but I will suggest nothing, but leave every thing to your kind arrangement and discretion; again repeating, do you, my dear Sir, with my estate what you please, so as it is kept together; for I well know my father never would submit (have submitted) to its dismemberment;" and he inclosed in this letter a statement and calculation to assist Mr. Wakely in forming an opinion on the subject.

* The Appellant's mother, the Respondent the Honourable Georgina Charlotte Emilia Hannah Montgomery, was the youngest of the three sisters of Lord Bangor: in the event of his dying intestate, and without issue, (an event which from his advanced age, and having been forty-five years a lunatic, was almost certain) she would, if she survived him, be entitled to a distributive share of his personal property. The amount of that personal property appeared at the time of the examination of witnesses in this cause, to be about £300,000: and that the share of that sum, to which the Respondent, Georgina Charlotte Emilia Hannah Montgomery would be entitled, was one-sixth, with the chance of being increased by the death of either or both of her two surviving unmarried sisters, to one-fifth or one-fourth.

On receiving this letter, Mr. Wakely immediately went to Grey Abbey, the family mansion, in order to obtain the necessary information; and, having done so, he addressed a letter to the Appellant, dated Grey [371] Abbey, 17th October, 1816, which contains the following passage:—"My dear William, I fear you think by this time, that I have neglected you and your last letter; but I found it impossible to get a sufficiently explicit account, by letter, either of the property, or of what the parties concerned would be at. I have seen the rent-roll, etc. etc. Your mother thinks your father's will valid, with respect to the legacy to her of the furniture, stock, etc.; that they were well worth £2000, and more indeed; that therefore you should add £200 a year to her jointure of £600, making a clear sum for her of £800 a year, without the interference of any one. She intends to take with her, when going, the spoons and forks; nothing more. She most readily and freely offers you as follows; to secure to you your share of Lord B.'s fund, and to add to it £1500; both to be paid to you immediately on the death of Lord B. We both think that the young people should secure to you the £1500 in case your mother dies before Lord B.; this is a material point in your favour. As you mention that your means will not allow you to do what you first intended, it is now proposed that you pay £4000 (four thousand pounds) to each of the young people, at the death of Lord B.; till that event takes place, to pay them £250 a year each, as they come of age; this to be so settled now, as that each of them, as they come of age, will be legally entitled to it, and be able to make settlements at marriage, or dispose of their shares by will or otherwise; that, on the marriage of your sister, she should be at liberty to call for the £4000, if it should be thought expedient to get the money. [372] instead of the £250 a year. You allowed £200 a year for the boys at school, and said you would allow £150 a year to Charles, to manage for himself: in this there can hardly be any change; as, though £200 a year may be more than Francis and Sandys cost at present, yet hereafter it will not; it is not intended that they shall be any further expence to you, even for pocket money. As far as I can judge, your rent roll amounts to £5176 11s. 5½d. exclusive of the demesne and islands; some of this is uncertain, and you will see on the other side an allowance for it. In the roll the slate quarries are put down as producing £200 a year; this may not be too high an income for them, as I hear they have produced £150, or nearly, a year, formerly.

"This is a statement of what I have said, and what you are to pay.

To your mother	£800	0	0	a year.
1 of age	1000	0	0
3 others	350	0	0
2 annuities	132	0	0
interest of debt	1516	8	9½
	£3798	8	9½
Balance in your favour	1378	5	8
	£5176	14	5½

From this balance take off £178 5s. 8d. which, as far as I can see, will fully cover the uncertain part; then you have for yourself £1200 a year, a good demesne, and a house well furnished. I do not say more than, with good management, you might contrive to live in it. I see that part [373] of your income is an annuity from Mr. Echlin: his life ought to be insured for what the annuity cost."

This letter appears to have reached the Appellant on the Continent; and he immediately replied thereto by a letter without date, but which appeared, from the post mark and the testimony of Wakely, to have been received by him on or about the 16th of November, 1816: this letter contains the following passages:—"I do not know how to thank you for the trouble you have taken, and the unexampled kindness of settling the affairs between me and my family. I trust you have the satisfaction to have left them contented. Had your decision been unfavourable to me, you may rest assured I should have been satisfied. All I looked for was strict justice, and from your hands I have received it. As to my mother's claims, I must make one or two observations. The will as to the chattels has not certainly the defect which renders it invalid as to the freehold estate—admitted: but I deny its being, by any possibility, beneficial to any of the legatees, because the debts, both simple contract and others, that did not affect the freehold, except on a deficit of assets, amounted in total to a much larger sum than the produce of any chattel property of which my father died possessed. On my taking upon myself the responsibility of those debts, surely in common justice, all chattels became mine: in short, without going into particulars, there was an arrear of interest, on one sum alone, of above £3000, and different smaller ones, amounting to at least another thousand: to which add book debts and servant's wages: £5000 would not be beyond the total, but in my opinion considerably within it. As that would exceed all proceeds of assets, I need [374] not say that, had I put them to the will, and confined them to take under it, I could have added all bond debts upon which no judgment was entered, and not a penny of which was I liable to, as long as there was a pin of chattels. Upon those grounds I deny my mother's claims, as a right; for which reason, and that they may all fairly understand that what they take I might have withheld, I shall certainly make no objection to my mother having the use of the spoons and forks you mention, or indeed any remainder of the plate she may choose for her life, reversion to me or my heirs. The value is but small; of the reversionary of course nothing: but there are limits at which I must stop in justice to myself. There are stories come to my ears in London about Emily: indeed so openly talked about, that I was asked if it was not actually the case; but as you say nothing of it, though her never having written to me since May last, makes me very suspicious, I would fain hope it is not true; namely, that she is going to be married to James Reilly. She long knows my opinion; an opinion drawn from me by herself; and, if she is going to act contrary to that opinion which she professed to me she would be guided by, in short if she marries J. R., I can never consider her otherwise than having acted most deceitfully towards me: it will be a marriage I can never acknowledge: she must bid farewell to Grey Abbey for ever. I do not pretend to any right of interference: but as she has an opinion in writing of mine, not expressed in the gentlest terms, I cannot forgive the deceit of drawing out an opinion by pretending to hold the same, when she must have been, if this report is true, which I fear much it is, mentally [375] determined, the first opportunity, to act contrary to it. As to my not being able to live on £1200 a year, I trust I shall always be able to reduce my expenses to my income, when all other control over my purse is removed. £200 a year is certainly a high average for the quarries: I am not aware of their ever netting £450. I never will myself count them in my rent roll, considering them as only making up for and equalising the bad or waste parts of the demesne; they never were averaged at more than £200 at their best times, and last year were a losing concern. I should like to know what the bogs were put at; they never realised their calculated average, but it is a matter of no essential consequence."

In the autumn of 1816, a treaty of marriage was entered into between the Respondents James and Emily. In a letter of the Appellant's to the Respondent James, dated the 24th December, 1816, he declares he will never recognise the Respondent James as a brother, but does not intimate an intention of withholding the portion he designed for his sister.

On the 6th of January, 1817, the Appellant addressed a letter to Wakely, in which, alluding to the expected intermarriage of the Respondents James and Emily, he says, "A few posts ago I received your kind letter of the 10th of December, and would have answered it immediately, but for the unsettled state I was, and am still in, about this to me horrible match of my sister's; it is in vain to try. I can never be reconciled to it, or induced in any manner to receive the gentleman as my brother." And after stating that he was himself about to be married, he proceeds as follows: "I am thus explicit, because you have at all [376] times taken such a kind interest in all the affairs of our family; and to show to you that my marriage will not in any manner affect the arrangement you have so kindly undertaken between me and my family, the manner of putting which into execution, to prevent mistakes, I shall now repeat: £4000 each to be secured upon certain lands, principal not payable till after the death of Lord Bangor; interest to commence to each on their coming of age; my brothers' to be settled on marriage, in the manner most agreeable to the parties concerned; my sister's to be secured, first to herself for life, then share and share alike among her children; but in all cases, in failure of issue, reversion to my estate. My mother to have £800 a year, secured to her for life, and the use of the plate which she has chosen for her life; also I am to be secured my share of Lord Bangor's dividend by my mother, as also £1500 over and above that sum, for the payment of which latter sum my brothers and sister are to become bound, as my mother might die before Lord Bangor; and, to sum up all, they are to assign to me all title or claim which they may have, or fancy they have, upon my father's chattels, or the estate, either in virtue of his will, marriage settlement, or any other claim whatsoever. This, I think, is an abstract of the agreement; and when put into the form of a deed, if assented to by them, I am willing and ready to execute it at any time. I will not entangle myself with Mr. James Reilly; if this marriage goes on, I will neither meddle nor make with it or their settlements. What Emily gets from me, she shall take under the same deed as the rest of my family; it shall be therein strictly settled, and Mr. J. R. or any other [377] person she may choose to marry, shall have nothing to say to it."

To this Mr. Wakely replied by letter bearing date the 25th of January, 1817, in which he endeavours to prevail on the Appellant not to insist upon having his brothers' portions settled as intimated in his letter of the 6th January. On the subject of the marriage between the Respondents, (J. and E. Reilly) he writes thus: "The writings are preparing by Keown, relative to your sister, and James R.; I communicated your decision as mentioned in your's of the 6th, to your mother, as to what you would give Emily, and the terms, etc. Reilly settles £1000 (one thousand pounds) in money on your sister, in case she survives him, and a jointure of £260 a year; her own of course is to be as you determined." And on the subject of his brothers, he proceeds thus: "But as to your brothers, this alteration of yours is a very serious one, and probably was not in contemplation when you wrote your last of the 6th instant. If their fortunes are only to be paid on their marriage, and to revert to your estate in case of failure of issue, what are they but poor annuitants! how are they to advance themselves, on any occurrence? they could not be possibly put into a more awkward predicament. The plan I sent you from Grey A., did not contain such an arrangement, your consent to which I communicated to the parties concerned. Put yourself, by supposition, into the situation of a younger brother, similarly circumstanced as yours will be, if they are to be annuitants, and you may easily guess what must be the sensations of Hugh, and Edward, and Arthur, on [378] hearing that so very great a change is to take place. I took particular pains that the plan I sent from Grey A., should be clear, but I really do not think you meant this when you wrote last; at all events it is but right that you should immediately explain yourself. Whatever your brothers are to have they should have the power over, when they come of age. Consider the matter, and I am certain you will decide as you ought. I am neither afraid of your head or heart."

To this the Appellant replied by a letter dated the 19th of March following, by which he relinquishes the purpose of having his brothers' portions brought into strict settlement, but insists on it as to his sister's. His words are, "As you say you cannot see the business in the same light with me. I most willingly consent to your construction of the agreement, as far as relates to my brothers; but as to my sister, I cannot bring myself to alter one tittle; she must abide the consequences of her unkind conduct towards me."

At the commencement of the marriage treaty between the Respondents James and Emily Reilly, the Respondent James applied to Mr. Wakely, as the person acquainted with the particulars and in the confidence of the family, who informed him that the fortune of the Respondent Emily was not £5000, but only £4000, to be settled on her brother's estate; that her brother had promised by letter to execute a deed to secure that sum, and that he had authority to say so, and he read to the Respondent James extracts from his correspondence with the Appellant. In the course of the treaty it was suggested by Mr. Wakely that [379] as the Appellant wished to have the £1000 charged on particular lands, not then ascertained, it would be better not to mention the same in the Respondent's marriage settlement.

In the instructions drawn under the direction of Mr. Wakely, to be laid before counsel, is contained the following paragraph: "Miss Montgomery's fortune, it is presumed, need not be mentioned in this settlement: it is £4000, charged by her brother, or rather to be charged on his estate for her life, with remainder to her issue, failing which, to merge into Mr. Montgomery's estate."

These instructions were sent to counsel, and according to the desire expressed by the Appellant, to reserve the right of ascertaining on what part of his estate the portion should be charged, and the wish expressed in his letter of the 6th of January, 1817, that the limitations to which that sum was to be subject, should be made in the deed by which such charge was to be made, it was left out of the settlement, which contained only the limitations of the property of the Respondent James. This settlement was executed on the 4th of February 1817 and thereby an annuity, by way of jointure, of £260 a year, during life, in case the wife survived her intended husband, and a further sum of £1000, to be paid immediately on his death, was provided for her, with a covenant to secure to her and her executors, without the interference of her husband, any sum she might become entitled to by the death of Lord Bangor.

The Respondents, James and Emily Reilly, were married on the 4th day of February, 1817.

Before the Appellant went abroad in the year [380] 1816, he gave written instructions to his brother and agent, Arthur Hill Montgomery, directing him to pay to his mother £1000 a year, to the Respondents Emily, Hugh, and Edward, £250 a year, and to retain to himself £300 a year. These annual sums were paid, by Arthur Hill Montgomery, to the several persons mentioned in the instructions (including the sum of £250, paid to the Respondents James and Emily Reilly, until the year 1820) and still continue to be paid to all the parties now living, mentioned in the instructions, excepting the £250 per annum to the Respondents James and Emily.

The Appellant on the other hand, according to the agreement, took the stock, plate, household furniture, books, pictures, wine and money at Grey Abbey; was permitted to retain property which his mother, brothers, and sister, were entitled to under the marriage settlement and will of their father; and to take for his own benefit, the personal property of Hugh Bernard Montgomery, who died unmarried, intestate, and without issue, on the 1st of May, 1817. The Appellant was also permitted to retain for himself his brother Hugh's share of the younger children's fortune, charged on his estate.

During the absence of the Appellant on the Continent, his agent, Arthur Hill Montgomery, furnished him with accounts; and, in the year 1820, when the Appellant returned to Ireland, he investigated the state of his affairs, and settled all his accounts with his agent, Arthur Hill Montgomery; in all which accounts, as furnished from time to time, the annual sums paid to his mother, brothers and [381] sister, under the arrangement, were credited to the agent without objection. But, on the 10th August, in the same year, the Appellant wrote to the Respondent a letter, of which the following is an extract: "From a statement of the payments which have been made on my account at different times to your wife, since my father's death, they appear to me to exceed the total amount of her claim upon my estate:

the sum, which appears to be paid up to 1820, is £1071 10s. while her share of £5000, settled as younger children's portions, together with interest, as directed by my father's marriage settlement, at five per cent., amounts to £883, less a few shillings. As, therefore, it is my anxious endeavour to exonerate my estate as soon as possible from all charges, I have now to request that, as soon as convenient, there may be transmitted to me your joint receipt, in full of all claims upon my estate, together with an engagement that, should counsel, at any future period, advise any further security or form of discharge as necessary, you will satisfy it without further expense to me. Until the above-mentioned receipt, with its accompanying undertaking, be singularly signed and transmitted to me, I must withdraw any allowance which I may be inclined to give my sister, and shall give directions accordingly : " and accordingly he gave directions to his agent not to make any further payment to the Respondent.

The Respondent having written to the Appellant to remonstrate, and state that he was advised not to give such a discharge as the Appellant required ; and having called upon the Appellant to perform his promise, received another letter from the [382] Appellant, dated Florence, October 2, 1821, in which he says : " It is merely necessary to premise, that a greater insult cannot be attempted than the accusation of a desire to evade a promise. I have invariably purposed to charge my estate with £4000 for each individual of my father's younger family ; but this sum not to be in addition to any other claim by settlement or otherwise, which they might have against that estate, but it is to be released from all such charges. That £4000 is a sum more than fourfold their legal right, I believe not one of them will pretend to deny ; and that it is twice what my father intended for them, I believe they are all equally aware ; and it is highly probable that you, long ere this, are conscious of the fact. Thus I cannot but consider that the interference of a court of Equity, so far from being to my injury, would be my ultimate resource in case of subtle hostility : though, indeed, I consider the remedy almost as bad as the disease, not being silly enough to suppose the expense of law to be all upon one side : finally, I do not see how, either in law or equity, I can be prevented from arranging the detail of my own free gift."

In July, 1822, the Respondents James and Emily Reilly filed, in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, the original bill in this cause, against the Appellant William Montgomery, and the Respondents Georgina Charlotte Emilia Hannah Montgomery, the Rev. Edward Montgomery, Arthur Hill Montgomery, John Charles Montgomery, Francis Octavius Montgomery, George Augustus Frederick Sandys Montgomery, William Edmond Reilly, and the Right Honourable Robert Ward, (the last named Respondent having [383] been made a defendant pursuant to an order dated 18th November, 1822) : stating in substance the facts before mentioned, and particularly the arrangement by which the Appellant was to have given each of the younger children £5000, but admitting that sum to have been afterwards reduced to £1000, and stating that, as the sum upon the faith of which the marriage was contracted,

The original bill prayed, that the Appellant might be compelled, by the decree of the Court, specifically to perform his agreement with the Respondents James and Emily ; and that it might be referred to one of the Masters of the Court to approve of a proper deed to be executed by the Appellant, to charge his estate with the sum of £5000, or that the Appellant might be compelled to pay the same, with all interest due thereon, the Respondents James and Emily being willing, and thereby offering, specifically to perform the said agreement on his or their part ; and that on the Appellant's paying the sum of £5000, with all interest due on the same, or on his executing a deed charging his estates with the same, they were ready to execute a proper release and discharge to exonerate his estates of and from all and all manner of claims and demands, under or by virtue of the marriage settlement, or under the will, or in anywise whatsoever, except by the charge ; or that, in case the Court should be of opinion that the Respondents James and Emily were not entitled to such relief, then that it might be referred to one of the Masters of the Court to approve of a proper deed, to be executed by the Appellant, to charge his estates with the sum of £1000, and that the Appellant might be compelled to pay the same, with all interest [384] due thereon : the Respondents James and Emily being willing, and thereby offering, specifically to perform the last-mentioned agreement on his and their part : and that, on the Appellant's paying the sum of £4000, with all interest due on the same, they were ready and willing to execute a proper release and discharge to exonerate his estate from all and all manner of claims and demands, under or by virtue of the will, or in any way whatsoever, except such charge: or in case the Court should be of opinion that the Respondents James and Emily were not entitled to such relief as last aforesaid, then that the trusts of the marriage settlement, so far as related to raising the portions of the younger children, might be carried into execution, and performed, (the Respondent James being ready and willing, and thereby offering, as one of the executors of the surviving trustee, to do any act that might be deemed necessary on his part for that purpose), and that the estates in the marriage settlement, or a competent part thereof, might be sold: and that all proper parties might join in such sale: and in order thereto, that the marriage settlement, and the title-deeds and writings relating to the estates might be produced, and might be brought in and lodged in the Bank of Ireland, together with all letters, as well from the Respondent James, as from William George Wakely, addressed to and received by the Appellant on the subject: and that the will of Hugh Montgomery might be established, and the trusts thereof performed: and that an account might be taken, by and under the decree of the Court, of the legacy due to the Respondents James and Emily, and of their distributive share of the intestate Hugh Bernard Mont-[385]-gomery's personal estate, and of all debts which were owing by the testator, and the intestate Hugh Bernard Montgomery, at the time of their respective death or deaths, and which still remained unpaid: and that an account might be taken also of the testator's and of the intestate's personal estate and effects, received by or for the use of the Appellant, and that the personal estate and effects of the testator and of the intestate Hugh Bernard Montgomery might be applied in payment of their debts, in a due course of administration: and that as much of the testator's personal estate as should remain after payment of the testator's debts, might be applied in or towards the payment of the said legacy so due to the Respondents James and Emily as aforesaid: and in case it should appear that the whole or any part of the said testator's personal estate had been or should be exhausted or applied in or towards the payment of his specialty debts, and that the residue thereof was not sufficient to answer the simple contract debts and legacies of the testator, then that it might be declared, that the Respondents James and Emily, ought to stand in the place of the testator's creditors, by specialty, who had had, or should have a satisfaction for their debts, out of the personal estate, and might have satisfaction out of the real estate, for so much of their legacy as his personal estate, after payment of his simple contract creditors, should be deficient to answer, by reason of the same having been exhausted or applied in or towards the payment of his specialty debts: and that the same might be decreed accordingly: and that the real estates, so descended unto the Appellant, as heir at law of the testator, might be sold or mortgaged for that purpose: and that all proper parties might be decreed to join in such sale or mortgage: [386] and that the money to arise from such sale or mortgage, might be paid to the Respondents James and Emily accordingly: and that the bequest of the sum of £800, amongst the younger children of the testator, might be declared a good and sufficient execution of the power vested in the testator by the marriage settlement, to charge his estates with a sum not exceeding £800: and that the same might be raised and applied accordingly: and that a proper person might be appointed by and under the decree of the Court, to receive the rents, issues and profits of the estates of the Appellant, and to apply the same in keeping down the interest of the several incumbrances, affecting the estates or otherwise, as the Court should direct: and that the Appellant might, before he answered the bill, view in the hands of the Plaintiff's six Clerk or Commissioner, according to their mode of answering, the letters, bearing date the 10th of August, 1820, addressed to James Reilly, esquire, and signed "Wm. Montgomery:" and the letter, bearing date the 2d October, 1821, addressed to James Reilly, esquire, 62 Blessington-street, and signed "Wm. Montgomery:" and also two other letters, bearing date respectively, the 10th May, 1821, and the 27th March, 1822, and addressed to James Reilly, esquire, Blessington-street aforesaid, to be by him produced, and that he indorse his name thereon, and set forth in his answer to the bill, of whose handwriting they, each of them and every part of them are, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

The Appellant, by his answer to this bill, which was put in on the 14th day of April, 1823, and by his further answer, which was put in on or about the 10th of June, 1823, in consequence of exceptions [387] taken by the Respondents James and Emily to the former answer of the Appellant admitted frequent conversations with Mr. Wakely, on the subject of his family affairs, but he denied the agreement stated, and relied on in the bill; but although he denied that any agreement ever existed, he admitted, that, shortly after his father's death, he expressed, in a casual conversation with Mr. Wakely, an intention of increasing his sister's and younger brother's fortunes, but that he was then ignorant of the state of his affairs, and of the extent of the incumbrances affecting his estates. He admitted the directions given to his brother Arthur, but represented them as payments by way of voluntary annuity, to his mother, brothers, and sister; and denied that it was to be paid as interest, or in consequence of any agreement.

He said, that he wrote several letters to Mr. Wakely, in order to learn, through him, the exact state of his affairs, and the particulars of Lord Bangor's property; that he received that information from Mr. Wakely by letter, dated the 17th of October, 1816, stating his rent roll at £5000, the interest of the debts on his estates at £1500, and other particulars in answer to his inquiries; that Mr. Wakely, in this letter, proposed to Appellant, to increase his mother's fortune to £800 a year, and to give his sister and each of his brothers £4000, payable at Lord Bangor's death; and in the mean time to pay them each £250 a year.

The Appellant admitted that, with reference to Mr. Wakely's proposal, he wrote to Mr. Wakely a letter dated the 6th January, 1817, in which he declared that the sum he intended for his sister should be secured to herself, first for life, then share and share alike for the children; and the principal not [388] to be payable till Lord Bangor's death; but he required to be secured his share of Lord Bangor's property by his mother, with other conditions appearing by the letter: he denied that Wakely had any authority to make any arrangement on his part, as to the marriage settlement, but admitted a correspondence with the Respondent James, on the subject of his marriage. He insisted that Wakely had no authority from him to interfere in the marriage settlement.

The Appellant, by his answer, further insisted that his mother and the several other members of his family were bound on their parts to have performed and fulfilled the terms contained in Wakely's letter of October, 1816, and the Appellant's letter of the 6th of January, 1817, if they required or expected from the Appellant such settlement as was proposed by those letters; yet they had never done so, nor offered to do so; and, on the contrary, both his mother and the Respondents James and Emily, had refused to do so. In his further answer to exceptions taken by the Respondents, the Appellant insisted that, as Wakely could not by any letter of his, bind the Appellant's family to any engagement on their parts, nor did he by any of his letters pretend to do so; and as none of Appellant's family, by letter or otherwise, ever entered into any written or even verbal engagement or agreement with the Appellant respecting the subject of his correspondence with Wakely, or respecting any family arrangement whatsoever, the Appellant was not bound by any letters written by him to Wakely, which were voluntary, private, and confidential, and not intended for exposure, and did not authorise Wakely, by any declaration of his, to bind the Appellant.

[389] The Appellant, by his answer, further said that, although he considered himself discharged from any offer he had made, yet that in June, 1822, he had sent to and informed the Respondent, James, that he was ready, then, to fulfil the terms of his letter of the 6th of January, 1817; and, notwithstanding the bill filed by Respondent, did, to purchase his peace, about the 29th of October, 1822, cause a deed to be prepared, which he signed and tendered to Respondent for execution, agreeing to pay to trustees £1000 to the uses of Respondent's marriage settlement; but that Respondent refused to accept of or execute the same; whereupon the deed was cancelled.

The Appellant subjoined to his answer schedules, setting forth the specialty and simple contract debts of his father, and his personal estate.

The several other defendants put in answers agreeing to fulfil on their parts the terms of the arrangement as to Lord Bangor's property, and in all other respects.

The Respondents James and Emily afterwards filed an Amended Bill on the 8th of November, 1823, noticing the several objections raised by the Appellant, especially that in respect to the arrangement being conditional, and founded on the stipulation that the Appellant should be secured as to the share of Lord Bangor's property; and, by their amended Bill, the Respondents stated, that all the members of the family were ready to make good their part of the arrangement; and referred to their answers offering to do so.*

[390] By this Bill also some further letters of the Appellant were put in issue, so as to complete the chain of correspondence, from which the agreement was to be collected. With respect to the allegation that the communication to Mr. Wakely was merely intended as a private and confidential one, the amended Bill referred to some of the Appellant's letters, in which the Appellant states his reason for wishing to be explicit, "to prevent mistakes," and stipulates for the £4000 being settled.

The Appellant filed his answer to this amended bill on the 12th of February, 1824, in which he stated that any letters written by him, either to his brother or Wakely, were written in contemplation of a family arrangement which never took place, nor was definitively settled; and he insisted that such a correspondence could not form any ground of relief for the Plaintiffs in their present suit; and that he was not bound to comply with the terms of any letter written by him to Wakely, in answer to his letter of the 17th October, 1816, or otherwise. He insisted further, that the Plaintiffs did not, by any original or amended bill, found any part of their equity upon that letter; and that the letter amounted only to a proposal for a family arrangement which could not be carried into effect, except by all the members of the family ratifying it, which they never did; but on the contrary some of them, and particularly his mother, refused to do so.

The Respondents replied to the answers of the Appellant to the original and amended Bill; and the cause being at issue, and evidence having been produced on both sides:—the cause came on to be heard, on Wednesday the 30th of June, 1824; and to be further heard on the 2d, 5th, and 6th of July, 1824: [391] on which last day, it having been urged in argument, by the counsel of the Appellant, that the infant children of the Respondents James and Emily ought to be parties to the suit, the Lord Chancellor ordered, that, on the Respondents, James and Emily, undertaking to procure the agreement in the pleadings mentioned, to be duly stamped, and to pay the necessary duties and expenses consequent thereon, the cause should stand over, with liberty to the Respondents James and Emily to amend, by making the minor children of the Respondents James and Emily, parties in the cause, as the Respondents James and Emily should be advised; and on the 8th of the same month, the Respondents James and Emily, having procured the agreement to be duly stamped, and having paid the duties thereon, amended their Bill by making the infant Respondents John Reilly, Emily Maria Catherine Reilly, Jane Hester Reilly, James Miles Reilly the younger, and Theodosia Harriet Reilly, the minor children of the Respondents James and Emily, by the Respondent James Miles Reilly, their father and next friend, parties, Plaintiffs.

By a further order, made in the cause, bearing date on the 8th day of July 1824, it was referred to Thomas Ball, one of the Masters of the Court, to inquire and report whether it would be for the benefit of the minors that the cause should be heard as to the minors, upon the pleadings and proofs already made, as if they had been parties in the cause from the beginning; and that, if the Master should report that it would be for their benefit, then the cause should come on to be heard during the then present sittings. By a report, bearing date the 9th of July 1824, the Master reported that it [392] would be for the benefit of the minors that the cause should be heard, as to the minors, upon the pleadings and proofs already made, as if they had been parties in the cause from the beginning; and the cause came on accordingly to be heard on the 12th of July, and stood over until the 19th of the same month, on which last mentioned day the following Decree was pronounced, viz:—

* The pleadings are not set forth in the Appendix to either case, and it does not appear from the statements in the body of the printed cases, that the Appellant's letter of the 6th of January, 1817, was distinctly stated, as the ground of the plaintiff's equity.

"Whereupon, the Plaintiffs, James Miles Reilly and Emily Georgina Susanna Reilly, otherwise Montgomery, his wife, undertaking to release the estates real and personal of the Reverend Hugh Montgomery, clerk, deceased, in the pleadings in this cause named, from all title or claim under the will of the Reverend Hugh Montgomery, deceased, or by virtue of the marriage settlement of the Reverend Hugh Montgomery, or otherwise; and as to the sum of £1500 in the pleadings mentioned; and the Plaintiffs also agreeing to secure the same to the Defendant William Montgomery, in the event of Georgina Charlotte Emilia Hannah Montgomery, the mother of the Defendant William Montgomery, dying in the life time of the Right Honourable, Nicholas, Lord Viscount Bangor, a lunatic, according to the terms of the agreement in the pleadings mentioned; and the Defendants, the Honourable Georgina Charlotte Emilia Hannah Montgomery, widow, Edward Montgomery, clerk, Arthur Hill Montgomery and John Charles Montgomery, esquires, being willing and offering to perform the agreement mentioned on their respective parts; it is decreed, that the Plaintiffs are entitled to a specific performance of the agreement as to the principal sum of £4000 in the pleadings mentioned to be raised after the decease of [393] Nicholas Lord Viscount Bangor, and the interest thereof payable during the life of Nicholas, Lord Viscount Bangor; and it is further ordered, etc. that it be, etc. referred to Thomas Ball, one of the Masters of this honourable court, to settle and approve of a proper deed or deeds to be executed by and between the Plaintiffs and Defendants for carrying the agreement into execution, according to the true intent and meaning thereof: and it is further ordered, that the Master do audit and state an account of the sum due to the Plaintiff Emily Reilly on foot of the interest on the sum of £4000: and it is further, etc. referred to the Master to inquire and report whether it would be for the benefit of the minor defendants Francis Octavius Montgomery, and George Augustus Frederick Sandys Montgomery, the younger brothers of William Montgomery, that the agreement as to them should be carried into execution; and if the Master shall be of opinion that it would be for the benefit of the minor defendants, then, etc. the minors are hereby also decreed entitled to the benefit of the agreement, and bound by the terms thereof: and thereupon it is referred to the Master to settle a proper deed or deeds to carry the agreement into execution, so far as relates to the minors: such deed to be executed by them on their attaining their respective ages of twenty-one years: and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the Master do make a separate report upon the last-mentioned reference respecting the minor Defendants before the passing of this decree."

Against this decree the appeal was presented.

[394] For the Appellant: The Attorney General and Mr. Shadwell.

The order to amend and the decree can only be founded on the letter of the 6th of January, 1817, for it is only under that letter that the minor plaintiffs could have any interest in the subject matter of the suit. But that letter forms no part of the case made by the bill—on the contrary, the case made by the Bill is in contradiction to it; and on the Bill as now amended, the minor Plaintiffs appear to have no interest in the subject matter of the suit.

The decree gives the plaintiffs a relief not prayed by the Bill, on an agreement not stated in the Bill, but on a letter stated by the answer of the Defendant, and materially differing from the agreement stated in the Bill, and by which letter the defendant insisted he was not bound; and it is against the principles and practice of a Court of Equity to decree against a defendant upon an agreement stated by him, differing from an agreement stated by a plaintiff, unless the defendant submits to perform the same.

Even if the Plaintiffs had by their Bill founded their case on the letter of the 6th of January, 1817, and that it could amount to an agreement under any circumstances, they should have shewn by their Bill that it was assented to by the Defendant's family, and have offered to perform the terms of it on their parts.

The decree assumes, contrary to the fact, that the Defendants Georgina, Edward, Arthur, and John Charles Montgomery, had, by their answers, offered to perform the agreement decreed. Whereas, they did not, by their answers, mention or allude to it, or offer to perform any agreement but the agreement [395] stated in the Bill, and which agreement is negatived, as well by the evidence as by the decree.

Wakely, who wrote the letter of the 17th of October, 1816, and to whom the letter of the 6th of January, 1817, was addressed, had no authority to bind or contract for the Appellant's family, nor did he profess to do so.

The letter of the 6th of January, 1817, was on the face of it only a proposal, and conditional in its nature, amounting only to a treaty which never was completed.

That letter was voluntary, and without consideration, and as such ought not to be enforced in a Court of Equity.

The Appellant never promised, nor authorised any person to promise or represent, that he would give his sister, the Respondent Emily, £4000, or any other sum, on her marriage with the Respondent James Reilly.

The Respondents, James Reilly, and Emily, his wife, have not shown that their marriage was contracted on the faith of any promise or representation made by the Appellant in writing, or by any person lawfully authorised by him to do so.

For the Respondents: Mr. Horne and Mr. Sugden.

The agreement stated in the correspondence between the Appellant and Mr. Wakely, is sufficiently precise and definite in its terms to be carried into execution by a Court of Equity.

This is not merely a voluntary agreement, but for valuable consideration. The Appellant was to receive in exchange, first, the sum of £5800, charged by the will and settlement of his father; secondly, furniture, plate, stock, crop, books, pictures, all the moveables at the mansion-house of [396] Grey Abbey, together with arrears of rent, money in the house and bank, and debts due, amounting altogether, by the Appellant's admission, to a sum of £8,167 7s. 10d. actually received: and although the Appellant's father owed debts, chiefly by judgment and specialty, to the amount of £25,000 or thereabouts, the creditors ought to resort to the fee simple estate, which descended to the Appellant, and the assets would be marshalled in favour of Mrs. Montgomery, who was a specific legatee of the plate and furniture; and, thirdly, £1500 more than an equal share of the fund, expectant on the death of Lord Bangor, is secured to the Appellant: the present amount of this (if Lord Bangor were now dead) would be to the Appellant upward of £8642, with a reasonable prospect of its being further increased to £10,071 by the death of either of Lord Bangor's unmarried sisters, in the lifetime of the said Lord Bangor; and to the sum of £12,214 in the event of the death of both of the said sisters, during the joint lives of Lord Bangor and Mrs. Montgomery, together with the chance of its being further increased by the death of any of Mrs. Montgomery's children, in her life time; and, as a further advantage, in case of the Appellant's sister dying without issue, the sum charged was to merge in his estate. This appears to be not only a valuable, but an adequate consideration for the sum to be charged by the Appellant on his estates. At the time of the agreement, there were four of the younger children adults; the sum to be charged certainly on the Appellant's estate, therefore, must be at least £16,000, £4000 of which might revert to him; and whether it should ever exceed that sum, must depend upon whether the minor brothers of the Appellant should live to attain the age of twenty-one years.

[397] There is, therefore, in this case, such consideration as would entitle the Respondent, Emily, to have the agreement carried into specific execution, as against the Appellant, even if she were still unmarried, more particularly when the relative situation of the parties is considered, the Appellant having been at the time in loco parentis to his younger brothers and sister; and, as it is said, the Court does not weigh in very nice scales the consideration for family agreements, if they be fair and reasonable.

Even supposing this agreement to have been originally purely voluntary, the marriage, which has been contracted on the faith of it, forms a consideration of the highest kind in the contemplation of a Court of Equity (Brown v. Carter, 5 Ves. 862, see Dundas v. Dutens, 1 Ves. J. 199). The parties would not have placed themselves in this situation, if they had not calculated on the wife's portion of £4000 as part of the provision for the family; and it is in evidence that Mrs. Montgomery would not have given her consent to this marriage, if she had not considered that the Respondent Emily was to have a fortune of £4000 charged by her brother on his estate, and which, by his letter, he insisted upon being made the subject of strict settlement, so as to secure it as a provision for her and her children.

The agreement has been in part performed: the Appellant has been permitted to retain the household furniture, plate, linen, books, etc. in the mansion-house of Grey Abbey. Since his father's death, he has never been called upon for any account of his mother's, brother's, or sister's claims under the will or settlement of his father: he has never been called [398] on for any account of the personal fortune of his brother, Captain Hugh Bernard Montgomery, who died intestate in the year 1817: and, on the other hand, he has paid his mother and brothers, the annual sums stipulated by the agreement, and continues to pay them to the present day: and he, in like manner paid the Respondent Emily, under this agreement, until the year 1820. The Appellant does indeed allege (for the first time in his letter to the Respondent James, of the 10th August 1820), that the payment of £250 per annum to the Respondent, was in discharge of the claim which he alleges they had under his father's will and settlement: but it would be a fraud in the Appellant to permit the Respondents to act under the delusive impression that they were receiving an annual income, without diminishing the principal sum, or to anticipate the capital of the Respondent Emily's fortune, without apprising them that they were doing so. The Appellant cannot be allowed to put that construction upon his own acts, which would impute fraud to himself: and the payment of £250 per annum to the Respondents James and Emily, must be considered as in part performance and execution of the agreement.

Here is no defect of mutuality, for the receipt of the £250 a year by the Respondents bound them to the performance of the agreement.

At the conclusion of the argument, the Lord Chancellor said:

There might be two questions, 1. Is it maintainable as an agreement in consideration of marriage? 2. Is it maintainable as a family arrangement? But a preliminary question is, whether there is any final decree to appeal from? The decree requires that [399] there should be a separate report from the Master as to the interest of the minors before the decree should pass. If there has not been any such report, (and none is stated or suggested) how can the decree be final? Suppose the Master should report that the settlement is not for the benefit of the infants, is the decree to be operative? It must be considered whether the cause should not stand over till the report has been made. The Chancellor of Ireland may then determine whether the decree should pass. There cannot be an appeal from a decree which is conditional, and has not finally passed. The first thing to be done is to make out that there is a decree.

The Earl of Eldon: This is a case in which it is impossible for me to state to your Lordships that there is not very considerable difficulty; a difficulty which it would not be very easy to overcome, if your Lordships were to look at it as a case in which the question arose, and on which it must be determined alone, on what is called the marriage agreement, considering what the law of the land requires as evidence to give effect to such an agreement, and looking to the different cases in which different opinions have been given: some in which it has been said that there must be writing to make out such an agreement antecedently to the marriage, and other cases in which it has been thought that a parol promise followed by marriage and written evidence after the marriage, was sufficient (see Randall v. Morgan, 12 Ves. 67, and the cases there cited. 1 Fonbl. Tr. Eq. 312). But I think your Lordships may consider the case, with a view to all the circumstances, not merely what took place previous to the marriage, but whether, with reference to all which took [400] place as to the effect of the bargain, and all which has taken place between these parties, this agreement is an agreement which ought to be carried into execution; and upon the best judgment I can form upon this, which I at the same time acknowledge to be a very difficult case, it appears to me that you may be safely advised to affirm the judgment.

That judgment ought, in my opinion, to be affirmed with some costs; but, under all the circumstances, it does not appear to me that it should be with the infliction of all the costs which have been incurred at your Lordships' bar, and my motion will therefore be, that the judgment should be affirmed with £100 costs.

Judgment affirmed, with £100 costs.

(COURT OF EXCHEQUER.)

JOHN MORGAN and BRIDGET his Wife, and ELIZABETH MORRIS, Widow,— Appellants: THOMAS EDWARDS and THOMAS BEYNON, Clerk,—Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. v. 1545: S. C. 1 Dow and Cl. 104: 13 Price, 782: McCle, 541. Discussed in Worthington v. Wiginton, 1855, 20 Beav. 67, at p. 76: and see Dillon v. Parker, 1833, 7 Bli. N.S. 325, at p. 349.]

A being possessed of a term in lands for ninety-nine years, if she, and B, and C, and D, her daughters by a deceased husband, should so long live, intermarries with E, whereupon a settlement is made of the property of A, including the term which is assigned in trust for A and E during their joint lives, remainder to the survivor, his or her executors, etc. E dies in the lifetime of A, by his will treating as his own the term of years in settlement, and bequeathing it to A for life, remainder to B for life, remainder to C for life, remainder to D for the residue of the term. He also by his will bequeaths the residue of his personal estate to A, and leaves her sole executrix. A proves the will and administers to the estate, and dies, having made a will bequeathing all her personal estate to B, whom she appointed sole executrix. B, having married X, proved the will. X, in the right of B, entered and held possession of the lands until her death, when he gave up the possession to Y, who took possession as in the right of C, whom he had married. But afterwards B filed a bill against Y and C, and also against D, stating that he was ignorant of the settlement when he gave up possession of the premises, and had lately discovered its existence, and the right of B, his deceased wife and testatrix under it; and praying restoration of the possession, and an account of rents received, and payment of them, or an occupation rent during the wrongful possession.

By the answer to this bill, the defendants relied upon the will of E, and the acceptance by A of benefits under it amounting to an election. They also filed a cross bill against X, [402] stating the will of E, and that A, being appointed executrix under it, had proved the will, and acted under it, paying the debts, and retaining a large residue, and praying that it might be declared that A was bound to elect, and had elected, to waive her right to the term, and to take the benefit given to her by the will of X, and that they were entitled to the residue of the term, according to the will of X: but the cross bill did not make the personal representative of A in that character a party, nor pray any account of the personal estate of E possessed by her. Under these circumstances it was held in the Court below, and affirmed on appeal, that no election by A had been proved in the cause, and that X, in right of his wife, was entitled to the possession of the term under the will of A, supposing the term to have passed by the terms of her will.

By indenture bearing date the 16th of February, 1756, and made between Bridget Bevan of the one part, and Gwenllian Jones of the other part, Bridget Bevan demised to Gwenllian Jones the messuage, barn, stable, garden, and fields, therein described, to hold to Gwenllian Jones, her executors and administrators, for ninety-nine years, if Gwenllian Jones, and Margaret, Bridget, and Elizabeth, her daughters, or either of them, should so long live, at the yearly rent of £22.

By indenture or deed of marriage settlement, bearing date the 31st of January, 1758, and made between Thomas Thomas of the first part; David Edwards and John Harries of the second part; Gwenllian Jones of the third part; and Margaret Jones, Bridget Jones, and Elizabeth Jones, infant children of Gwenllian Jones by William Jones, her former husband, deceased, of the fourth part; reciting a marriage then intended to be had between Thomas Thomas and Gwenllian Jones: it was witnessed that in consideration of the marriage, and for making provision for Margaret Jones, Bridget Jones, and Elizabeth Jones, the infant children of [403] Gwenllian Jones, all and every the leasehold messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments whatsoever, of Gwenllian Jones, and which she was entitled to or held by lease or leases, from any person or persons whatsoever and wheresoever, were assigned to hold to David Edwards and John Harries, their executors, administrators, and assigns, to hold from thenceforth for the residue and remainder of the term or terms of years in and by the lease or leases granted and then to come and unexpired, in trust, for Gwenllian Jones, her executors, administrators, and assigns, until the marriage, and after the solemnization thereof, upon trust, to permit Thomas Thomas and Gwenllian Jones, during their joint lives, to receive the rents and profits of the leasehold estates, and likewise to have the use and enjoyment of all the rest of the personal estate and effects of Gwenllian Jones, and the produce and increase thereof; and from and after the decease of either of them, to assign and transfer the leasehold estate and effects to the survivor, and the executors, administrators, and assigns of such survivor.

Shortly after the execution of the indenture or deed of marriage settlement, a marriage took effect between Thomas Thomas and Gwenllian Jones.

John Harries, one of the trustees, died in the year 1782, leaving David Edwards surviving; whereby David Edwards became the sole surviving trustee.

David Edwards, the surviving trustee, died in the year 1794, and the Respondent, Thomas Beynon, and Peter Dubuisson, deceased, were the executors of, and proved his will; Peter Dubuisson died in December, 1812, leaving the Respondent, Thomas Beynon, surviving executor of the will of John Harries.

Thomas Thomas died in the year 1776, leaving Gwenllian, his widow, surviving. By his will, dated [404] in 1769, he made the following provisions; "I give all the estate which I hold by lease from Mrs. Bevan to Gwen, my dear and beloved wife, for and during the term of her natural life; and from and after her decease to Margaret Jones, (the wife of the Respondent Thomas Edwards,) for the term of her natural life; and immediately from and after her decease to Bridget Jones, (the Appellant, Bridget Morgan,) for and during the term of her natural life; and immediately from and after her decease to Elizabeth Jones, (the Appellant, Elizabeth Morris,) for and during the remainder of the term granted in the said leasehold estates." And he gave and bequeathed to Gwenllian his wife all the residue of his personal estate, goods, chattels, furniture, cattle, implements of household and husbandry, and all his stock and effects, for ever, if she continued his widow, and appointed her sole executrix of his will.

Margaret Jones, in 1785, intermarried with the Respondent, Thomas Edwards; Bridget Jones intermarried with John Morgan in 1778. Gwenllian Thomas died in 1790, having made a will, dated in 1785, by which she bequeathed to Margaret Jones "all her money in the funds, and all the rest of her personal estate, of what nature or kind soever, for her own use," and appointed her sole executrix. Upon the decease of Gwenllian Thomas, Margaret Edwards, with the concurrence of the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, proved the will in the proper Ecclesiastical Court; and thereupon the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, and his wife, entered into the possession of the leasehold estate demised to Gwenllian Thomas by Bridget Bevan.

In 1818 the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, filed a bill in the Exchequer, against the Appellants, and [405] Thomas Beynon, which bill was afterwards amended. The bill stated the facts before mentioned, except the will of Thomas Thomas, and then proceeded to state that Thomas Edwards, at the decease of his wife, was ignorant of the existence of the indenture of settlement, and that the Appellants, John Morgan and Bridget his wife, represented to Thomas Edwards, that they were entitled to the leasehold estate, by virtue of a will made by Thomas Thomas; that he, being deceived by such representations, and ignorant of his right, yielded up the possession of the leasehold premises to John Morgan and Bridget his wife; that they had ever since continued in possession, and in receipt of the rents and profits of the leasehold premises; and that he, Thomas Edwards, had then lately discovered the existence of the indenture of marriage settlement.

The prayer of the bill was, that John Morgan and Bridget his wife might deliver up to Thomas Edwards the possession of the leasehold premises, and the deeds relating thereto, particularly the indenture of marriage settlement, bearing date the 31st of January, 1758, and the indenture of lease bearing date the 16th of February, 1756; and that John Morgan and Bridget his wife might also account for, and pay to Thomas Edwards, the arrears of rent for the premises, or the value of the premises to be let for the time during which they had been in the possession of the same: and that such account might be taken by and under the decree, order, and direction of the Court: and that in the mean time a receiver of the rents and profits of the premises might be appointed, by and under the decree, order, and direction of the Court: and that the Respondent, Thomas Beynon, might, under the decree, order, and direction of the Court, assign the leasehold premises to the Respondent, Thomas Edwards.

[406] John Morgan and Bridget his wife, in their answer to the bill, admitting most of the facts, set forth the will of Thomas Thomas as before stated: and farther stated, that Thomas Thomas died in 1776, without altering or revoking his will: and that Gwenllian Thomas, upon the death of Thomas Thomas, proved his will in the proper Ecclesiastical Court, and took upon herself the execution thereof, and by virtue of the probate copy of the will, possessed herself of the testator's personal estate and effects to a considerable amount, and thereout paid and satisfied his funeral expences and debts: after which there remained a very large surplus, which was of much greater value than the leasehold estate: and that Gwenllian Thomas, after the death of her husband, entered into possession of the leasehold estate, and continued in such possession to the time of her death.

The answer further stated that Gwenllian Thomas died in the year 1790, and that thereupon Thomas Edwards and his wife entered into possession of the leasehold estate demised to Gwenllian Thomas: that Thomas Edwards, long before the death of his wife, well knew of the existence of the indenture of settlement: and that upon the death of the Respondent, Thomas Edwards' wife, in the year 1807, the Appellant, John Morgan, in right of the Appellant, Bridget his wife, entered into the possession of the leasehold premises, with the permission of the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, and had ever since been and then was in the possession and receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and that the Respondent, upon the death of his wife, voluntarily delivered up the indenture of lease to the Appellant, John Morgan, and soon afterwards delivered notices to some of the tenants of the leasehold premises, signed by him, requiring [407] such tenants to quit their holdings at Michaelmas then next ensuing, and admitted the Appellants were entitled to the leasehold estates by virtue of the will of Thomas Thomas: that although by the terms of the marriage settlement the leasehold premises were assigned to the trustees therein named, upon trust, after the decease of Thomas Thomas and Gwenllian his wife, to assign and deliver up the same to the survivor of them, and the executors and administrators of such survivor: and although Gwenllian Thomas survived her husband, and thereby, under the settlement, became entitled to the leasehold premises: yet that Thomas Thomas, by his will, took upon himself to dispose of the leasehold premises as his own, and that he also gave to Gwenllian Thomas the residue of his personal estate and effects, to the amount of £2000 and upwards, and that the same was of much greater value than the lease: and that Gwenllian Thomas accepted such bequest, and took under the will benefits of greater value than the leasehold premises, and frequently declared that the leasehold premises, after her death, would go to her daughters in succession, one after the other, and therefore it was submitted that Gwenllian Thomas must be considered as having made her election to take under the will, and to have thereby confirmed the bequest of the leasehold premises: and that the Appellants ought not to be compelled to deliver up the possession of the leasehold premises, nor the deeds relating thereto, nor the lease of the 16th day of February, 1756, nor to account for and pay to the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, the arrears of rent of the premises, nor the value of the premises.

The Appellant, Elizabeth Morris, also put in her answer to the bill, which was to the same effect as the answer of the other Appellants: and the Re-[408]-spondent, Thomas Beynon, also put in his answer to the bill.

In 1822, the Appellants filed against the Respondents a cross bill, stating the substance of the answer to the original bill, and praying that it might be declared that Gwenllian Thomas was bound, on the death of Thomas Thomas, to make election, and that she did elect to take the benefit of Thomas Thomas's will, as to his residuary personal estate, and that she thereby relinquished the benefit of the indenture of settlement, as to the leasehold estate and premises; and that it might be declared that John Morgan and Bridget his wife, in her right, were entitled to the leasehold premises, during her life; and that Elizabeth Morris would become entitled to the leasehold premises, immediately from and after the death of Bridget Morgan, during the existence of the lease; and that the Respondent, Thomas Beynon, might be decreed to execute a proper assignment of the leasehold premises to the Appellants, according to the will of Thomas Thomas.

Thomas Edwards by his answer to the cross bill stated that he had heard and believed it to be true, though he did not know the same of his own knowledge, that Gwenllian Thomas possessed herself of all or some of the estate and effects belonging to Thomas Thomas, at the time of his death, and to a considerable amount in the whole, and more than sufficient to pay, and that she did thereout pay and satisfy his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies, and that the clear residue of the personal estate, excluding therefrom the leasehold estate and premises, remained in the hands of Gwenllian Thomas, and that she was beneficially entitled thereto, under the will of Thomas Thomas, as his residuary legatee; and that Gwenllian Thomas ap-[409]plied the whole of the clear residue to her own use and benefit, and that she accepted of the bequest thereof made to her by the will of Thomas Thomas.

The answers in both suits having been replied to, witnesses were examined in the first-mentioned cause of Edwards v. Morgan, both on the part of the Appellants, John Morgan and Bridget his wife, and Respondent, Thomas Edwards.

The evidence on the part of the Appellants proved declarations by Gwenllian Thomas, that after her death the leasehold premises would go or belong to the Appellant, Bridget Morgan, and that upon the death of Bridget the same would go or belong to the Appellant, Elizabeth Morris.

The evidence on the part of the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, only proved notices to produce deeds.

Both the causes were heard on the 8th of November, 1824, when it was decreed that the Appellants, John Morgan and Bridget his wife, should forthwith deliver up to the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, the possession of the leasehold premises, in the pleadings mentioned, and that the indenture of lease should be forthwith delivered up by the Appellant, John Morgan, to the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, or such person as he should appoint to receive the same, together with any other title-deeds, papers, or writings, in the possession, custody, or power of the Appellant, John Morgan, relating to the title of the leasehold estate; and that the Respondent, Thomas Beynon, should forthwith deliver up to the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, or to such person as he should appoint to receive the same, the indenture of settlement, and should execute to the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, or to such person as [410] he should appoint, a proper deed of assignment of the lease, etc. And it was thereby referred to the Master to take an account of the rents and profits of the leasehold premises possessed and received by the Appellant John Morgan, since Hilary Term, 1818, the time of filing the original bill, down to the time when the Appellant should deliver the possession up to the Respondent, Thomas Edwards; and in case it should appear that the Appellant, John Morgan, had been in the actual possession and enjoyment of the leasehold premises, or any part thereof, then the Master was to settle a fair occupation rent for the same during the time of such occupation. And it was further ordered, that what the Master should find to be the amount of such rents and profits of the leasehold premises, should be paid by the Appellant, John Morgan, to Thomas Edwards. And it was thereby referred to the Master to tax Thomas Beynon his costs of the original suit, which costs, when taxed, were to be paid by Thomas Edwards to Thomas Beynon, or his clerk, in court; but the Court did not think fit to give costs to any other party to the original bill. And it was further decreed, that the cross bill filed by the Appellants against the Respondents should be and the same was thereby dismissed out of court with costs.

Against this decree the appeal was presented.

For the Appellants: The Attorney General and Mr. H. Martyn.

It is clear that the will of Thomas Thomas raised a case of election on the part of Gwenllian Thomas, as to the leasehold premises, and to the residuary personal [411] estate of Thomas Thomas; and it having been admitted by the answer of the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, that Thomas Thomas died possessed of personal property more than sufficient to pay his debts, and that his residuary personal estate and effects was possessed by Gwenllian Thomas, and applied by her to her use, it must at this distance of time be inferred and presumed, that Gwenllian Thomas elected to take under the will of Thomas Thomas, and to give effect to his will in regard to the bequest of the leasehold premises.

If Gwenllian Thomas did not intend to give effect to Thomas Thomas's will, so far as regards the bequest of the leasehold premises, it was incumbent upon her to have kept accounts of the personal estate of Thomas Thomas possessed by her, and of her payments out of such personal estate, and to have ascertained the residue of such personal estate, so that the Appellants, Bridget Morgan and Elizabeth Morris, might be compensated out of such residue for the loss they sustained by Gwenllian Thomas not giving effect to the bequest of the leasehold premises contained in their favour in Thomas Thomas's will. The length of time since the death of Thomas Thomas, rendered it now impossible to ascertain the amount of the residuary personal estate of Thomas Thomas.

Even assuming that it is not to be inferred or considered that Gwenllian Thomas did elect to take under Thomas Thomas's will, and to give effect to such will, so far as regards the bequest of the leasehold premises, yet the Respondent, Thomas Edwards, claiming the leasehold premises under Gwenllian Thomas, is bound to make compensation to the Appellants, Bridget Morgan and Elizabeth Morris, for the value of the interest they took in such leasehold estates under the [412] will of Thomas Thomas; and the decree does not give or provide for such compensation. Butrick v. Broadhurst (1 Ves. J. 171). Andrew v. Trin. Hall, Cambridge (9 Ves. J. 525). Brown v. Monk (10 Ves. J. 609). Tibbitts v. Tibbitts (19 Ves. J. 656).

For the Respondents: Mr. Shadwell and Mr. Selater.

The will of Thomas Thomas did not raise a case of election; and even if it did raise a case of election, in all cases of election, a party having two claims has the option of either, and cannot be held concluded by equivocal acts performed in ignorance of the value of the funds, or in ignorance of the necessity of electing. It cannot be held, that Gwen. Thomas did in her lifetime elect to renounce her absolute right to the tenements in question, there being no evidence that she was apprised of any necessity to make election.

As to the dismissal of the cross bill with costs, all the facts and circumstances of the case were sufficiently disclosed by the pleadings in the original suit, and it was competent for the Appellants to have proved their case (if it had been capable of proof) by evidence in the original suit, and the trustee, by his answer to the original bill, submitted to assign to such party as the Court should declare entitled; at all events the costs of the cross suit are properly directed to be paid by the plaintiffs therein, as the cross bill could, in any case, only be necessary as a bill of discovery. The cross bill did not pray any account of the personal estate of Thomas Thomas, alleged to be possessed by Gwen-[413]-llian Thomas, and there was not any personal representative of Thomas Thomas or of Gwenllian Thomas made a party to the original bill or the cross bill. Dillon v. Parker (1 Swan. 381). Stratford v. Powell (1 Ba. and Be. 1). Boytton v. Boynton (1 B. C. C. 445). Newman v. Newman (1 B. C. C. 186). Wake v. Wake (1 Ves. J. 335). Whistler v. Webster (2 Ves. J. 367). Gritton v. Howard (1 Swan. 409).

In the course of the argument, the Lord Chancellor made the following observations:

It must be taken for granted, that the words of the will passed leaseholds (see Woollam v. Kenworthy, 9 Ves. J. 137); if not, there is no representative as to that property before the Court, and it would be necessary to have an administration de bonis non.

It is said, that if the widow has not elected, her representatives must account for the personal estate. But how is the account to be taken? the personal representative is not before the Court. The bill should have prayed in the alternative either a declaration that the widow elected, or an account against her representatives. The former only is prayed. The prayer for general relief would have comprised the account, if there had been a representative of the widow before the Court.

The Lord Chancellor (at the conclusion of the argument): The property at stake in this appeal is of little value, but the doctrine brought into question is of great importance, as it may affect other cases. I have a strong impression what ought to be the decision in this case; but, considering the [414] importance of the doctrine to be established, I propose to adjourn the question for consideration.

On the 25th of May, the judgment was affirmed without farther observation, but without costs.

Judgment affirmed.

ENGLAND.

(KING'S BENCH AND EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.)

JOSIAH TAYLOR, —Plaintiff in Error; JOSEPH WILLANS, who, etc. —Defendant in Error.

[Mews' Dig. v. 956. S.C. 1 Dow and Cl. 19.]

Under the penal Statute, 9 Anne, c. 14, enacting penalties against gambling, and giving half the penalty to the poor of the parish in which the offence is committed, a declaration, stating that W. at the parish of St. J. in the county of M. at one sitting, by playing at, etc. lost to T. £25. and then and there paid the same to T. is sufficiently certain. 1. (semb.) as to the allegation of the parish, although it appeared, alimunde, that there was another parish of St. J. in the county of M. and at all events such objection, if sustained, should be taken before, and is bad after, verdict: and the parish, entitled under the Act, may recover half the penalty from the plaintiff. 2. From the allegation that "W. by playing lost to T." it is a necessary implication that W. was playing with T. in a case where the statement of facts excludes the supposition of a loss by betting.

If in the assignment of errors it is alleged, that it appears by public Acts of Parliament, that there are two parishes of St. J. in the county of M. the plea of in nullo est erratum is not an admission of the truth of the allegation.

Joseph Willans, the Defendant in error, in Mich. Term, 1823, brought an action of debt in the Court of King's Bench, against Josiah Taylor, the Plaintiff in error. This action was founded upon the statute of the 9th of Anne, c. 14, s. 2, by which it is enacted, "That from the 1st of May, 1711, any person or persons whatsoever, who shall, at any time or sitting, by playing at cards, dice, tables, or other game [416] or games whatsoever, or by betting on the sides or hands of such as do play at any of the games aforesaid, lose, to any one or more person or persons so playing or betting, in the whole, the sum or value of ten pounds, and shall pay or deliver the same, or any part thereof, the person or persons so losing and paying, or delivering the same, shall be at liberty, within three months then next, to sue for and recover the money or goods so lost and paid, or delivered, or any part thereof, from the respective winner and winners thereof, with costs of suit, by action of debt, founded on this Act, to be prosecuted in any of her Majesty's Courts of Record, in which actions or suits no essoin, protection, wager of law, privilege of Parliament, or more than one imparlance shall be allowed: in which action it shall be sufficient for the Plaintiff to allege, that the Defendant or Defendants are indebted to the Plaintiff, or received to the Plaintiff's use, the monies so lost and paid, or converted the goods won of the said Plaintiff to the Defendant's use, whereby the Plaintiff's action accrued to him, according to the form of this statute, without setting forth the special matter: and in case the person or persons who shall lose such money or other things as aforesaid, shall not, within the time aforesaid, really and bonâ fide, and without covin or collusion, sue, and with effect prosecute, for the money or thing, so by him or them lost and paid, or delivered as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful, to and for any person or persons, by any such action or suit as aforesaid, to sue for and recover the same, and treble the value thereof, with costs of suit against such winner or winners as aforesaid, the one moiety thereof to the use of the person or persons that will sue for the same, and the other moiety to the use of the poor of the parish where the offence shall be committed."

[417] The declaration consisted of thirty-eight counts, and the several penalties demanded amounted to the sum of five thousand four hundred and sixteen pounds. The material counts were the third, fifth, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-seventh. In the third count it was stated, that one William Willans, on the 20th of March, 1822, at the parish of St. James, in the county of Middlesex, did, at one and the same sitting, by playing at a certain game called Rouge et Noir, lose, to the said Josiah Taylor, the sum of twenty-five pounds, and did then and there pay the same to the said Josiah Taylor; and that the said William Willans, did not, within three months next after the time he so lost and paid the said money, sue, or with effect or otherwise prosecute for the same; and that the space of three months had then elapsed, whereby and according to the form of the said Act of Parliament, made and passed in the ninth year of the reign of Queen Anne, an action had accrued to the said Joseph Willans, (who sued as aforesaid,) to sue for and recover, of and from the said Josiah Taylor, the said sum of twenty-five pounds, and treble the value thereof, making, together, the sum of one hundred pounds, parcel of the said sum of five thousand four hundred and sixteen pounds, above demanded.

The other counts were the same in substance and effect.

In the declaration it was averred, that Josiah Taylor had not paid or rendered the sum of five thousand four hundred and sixteen pounds, or any part thereof, to the poor of the parish of St. James, in the county of Middlesex, (being the parish where the several offences were committed,) and to Joseph Willans, or to either of them, but refused to do so; and, therefore, as well for [418] the poor of the said parish as for himself, the said Joseph Willans brought his suit.

To this declaration, Josiah Taylor pleaded that he did not owe to, or unjustly detain from, the poor of the said parish and the said Joseph Willans, the said sum of five thousand four hundred and sixteen pounds, or any part thereof, in manner and form as the said Joseph Willans had above complained against him, and of this he put himself upon the country, etc. and the said Joseph Willans did the like.

The action was tried on 21st of January, 1804, before the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, when a verdict was found for Joseph Willans, as to the several sums of money demanded in the third, fifth, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-seventh counts, making, together, the sum of six hundred and eighty pounds, and for Josiah Taylor, as to the residue of the sum of five thousand four hundred and sixteen pounds demanded by the declaration: Whereupon it was, amongst other things, considered by the Court of King's Bench, that the said Joseph Willans, who sued as aforesaid, should recover against the said Josiah Taylor, for the poor of the said parish of Saint James, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, and for himself, the said Joseph Willans, the said several sums of money, in the third, fifth, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-seventh counts of the said declaration respectively mentioned, making the said sum of six hundred and eighty pounds, parcel of the said sum of five thousand four hundred and sixteen pounds above demanded; and that the said poor of the said parish of St. James, in the county of Middlesex, should have one moiety thereof to their own use, and that the [419] said Joseph Willans, who sued as aforesaid, should have the other moiety thereof to his own use, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

A writ of error was brought, returnable, in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, at Westminster, by Josiah Taylor, from the judgment of the Court of King's Bench: upon which Josiah Taylor assigned the same errors as those hereinafter set forth, and the judgment of the Court of King's Bench was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber.

From these judgments a writ of error was brought, returnable, in Parliament, whereon Josiah Taylor assigned the following errors:

That the declaration aforesaid, and the matters therein contained, are not sufficient, in law, for the said Joseph Willans, who sued as aforesaid, to have or maintain his aforesaid action thereof against the said Josiah Taylor.

That although it appears by public Acts of Parliament, that there are only two parishes of Saint James in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, that is to say, one parish called the parish of Saint James, Clerkenwell, otherwise called the parish of Saint James at Clerkenwell, and another parish called the parish of Saint James, Westminster, otherwise called the parish of Saint James within the city and liberties of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex; yet it does not appear by the record aforesaid, whether the said Joseph Willans sued as well for the poor of the said parish of Saint James, Clerkenwell, otherwise called the parish of Saint James at Clerkenwell, or for the poor of the parish of Saint James, Westminster, otherwise called the parish of Saint James, within the city and liberty of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, as for himself in that behalf.

[420] That it does not appear by the record aforesaid, whether the supposed offences in the third, fifth, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-seventh, and thirty-seventh counts of the said declaration mentioned, or any or either of them, were or was committed in the parish of Saint James, Clerkenwell, otherwise called the parish of Saint James, at Clerkenwell, or in the said parish of Saint James, Westminster, otherwise called the parish of Saint James, within the city and liberty of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid.

That it does not appear by the record aforesaid, that the said William Willans, at the respective times in the third, fifth, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-seventh counts of the said declaration mentioned, did lose, to the said Josiah Taylor, the said several sums of money in those counts respectively mentioned, or any or either of them, by playing with the said Josiah Taylor, at the said game called Rouge et Noir, in those counts respectively mentioned.

That it does not appear by the record aforesaid, that the said Josiah Taylor, at the said respective times in the said third, fifth, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-seventh counts of the said declaration mentioned, did play with the said William Willans, at the said game called Rouge et Noir, in those counts respectively mentioned.

That it does not appear by the record aforesaid, that the said William Willans, at the respective times in the said third, fifth, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-seventh counts of the said declaration mentioned, did, at one and the same sitting, by playing at [421] the said game called Rouge et Noir, lose, to the said Josiah Taylor so playing, the said several sums of money in those counts respectively mentioned, or any or either of them.

That it does not appear by the record aforesaid, that at the respective times in the said third, fifth, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-seventh counts of the said declaration mentioned, the said William Willans did lose, to the said Josiah Taylor, the said several sums of money in those counts respectively mentioned, by their playing together, or with each other, at the said game called Rouge et Noir, or by betting on the sides or hands of such as did play at the said game.

That by the record aforesaid it appears, that the judgment aforesaid, in the form aforesaid given, as to the several sums of money in the third, fifth, ninth, thirteenth, seventeenth, twenty-first, twenty-third, twenty-fifth, twenty-seventh, and thirty-seventh counts of the said declaration mentioned, making, together, the said sum of six hundred and eighty pounds, parcel of the said sum of five thousand four hundred and sixteen pounds, above demanded, was given for the said Joseph Willans against the said Josiah Taylor; whereas, by the law of the land, the said judgment, as to those several sums of money, ought to have been given for the said Josiah Taylor against the said Joseph Willans.

That the judgment aforesaid was affirmed in the Court of our Lord the King of Exchequer Chamber, at Westminster, before the Justices of the Common Bench and the Barons of the Exchequer, whereas no such affirmation of the said judgment ought to have been given thereupon, but by the law of the land the said judgment ought to have been reversed.

[422] Joseph Willans joined in error thereto, and said, that there was no error, either in the record and proceedings aforesaid, or in giving and affirming the judgment aforesaid.

For these and other errors in the record and proceedings Josiah Taylor sued out a writ of error, praying that the judgment might be reversed.

For the Plaintiff in error, Mr. Broderick.

It is essential to describe, with accuracy, the parish in which offences against the 9th of Anne, c. 14. are alleged to have been committed, otherwise the poor of that parish cannot recover the moiety of the penalties for which the verdict may be given; but it is uncertain, upon the present record, whether the offences were committed in the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell, or in the parish of St. James, Westminster, which are the only two parishes of St. James in the county of Middlesex. The Statute of the 9th of Anne, c. 14. which is a penal statute, and must be construed strictly, extends only to the cases of parties who lose and win above ten pounds, by playing together at any unlawful game, or by betting together on the sides or hands of persons who are playing at such unlawful game; but it is not alleged upon the present record, that William Willans and Josiah Taylor, the parties who are stated to have lost and won the money, were either playing together at any unlawful game, or were betting together on the sides or hands of persons playing at such game. No intendment can be made of that which is not expressly averred in a penal action, unless it be a necessary inference. Lynall v. Longbottom (2 Wils. 36. b.). It is not averred, that William Willans was play-[423]-ing at any unlawful game with Josiah Taylor, nor that he was playing at such unlawful game with any other person, and betting with Josiah Taylor, nor that he was betting with Josiah Taylor upon the sides or hands of any persons who were playing at such game: and it is doubtful whether the words of the Act would extend to a case where A. is playing and bets with B. who is not playing.

It being assigned upon the record for error that it appears by Acts of Parliament that there are two parishes of St. James in Middlesex, the Defendant in error by pleading in nullo est erratum admits the fact so assigned upon record, Edmunds v. Probert (Carth. 338. and see Bac. Abr. Error K. 2.). To avoid this consequence the Plaintiff should have demurred for duplicity.

For the Defendant in error, Mr. Patteson.

The Court cannot take judicial notice of the names of all the parishes in the county of Middlesex, and cannot therefore know, as matter of law, whether there be or be not a parish called the parish of St. James in the county of Middlesex. After verdict, it must be intended that there is a parish called the parish of St. James in the county of Middlesex, in as much as the Plaintiff could not have obtained a verdict without proving the offences mentioned in the declaration to have been committed in that parish. The misnaming of the parish, if it be misnamed, is an error in fact, and not in law, and cannot be assigned together with other errors. The misnaming of the parish, if it be misnamed, is matter of form only, and cannot by law be assigned for error. It sufficiently appears by the allegation in the declaration, that William Willans did play with [424] the Plaintiff in error, in as much as it is averred that William Willans did, at one and the same sitting, by playing at Rouge et Noir, lose to the Defendant a certain sum of money, which could not have been the case if he had not played with the Defendant. Such averment is at all events sufficient after verdict.

The plea in nullo est erratum is in substance a demurrer. At the utmost it only prevents advantage being taken of misjoinder in the assignment of errors. It is still open to say that the error alleged is not well assigned. The case of Edmunds v. Probert (2 Wils. 36. b.; the cases are collected in 2 Bac. Abr. qua. sup.) is no authority. It is argued that in nullo est erratum admits the fact. So does a demurrer. Such a plea is a demurrer. King v. Gosper Yelverton, 58. Morris v. Fletcher, Cro. Car. 53. So in the case in Carthew, it was held, that joining error in fact with error in law would be bad on general demurrer. So in Jeffrey v. Wood, 1 Stra. 439. Burdett v. Wheatley, 2 Raym. 883. Error in fact and error in law cannot be assigned together, because they require different modes of trial. In Hudson v. Banks (Co. Jac. 28) it was argued, that in nullo est erratum admitted an allegation of facts made upon the assignment of errors, but it was held otherwise because it was contrary to the record. It appears by the record that the parish of St. James is in the county of Middlesex. The error assigned cannot stand because it contradicts the record. The assignment speaks of Acts of Parliament; those Acts should have been shewn. If the description of the parish is wrong, the objection should have been taken at the trial for a variance. It may be argued that it could not be the subject of a nonsuit. If it is rightly described and there are two such [425] parishes, the subject matter is incapable of distinction. Doe v. Harris, 5 M. and S. 326. (See Doe v. Salter, 13 East. 9. Taylor v. Hooman 1 Moore 461.)

If it be admissible as error in fact, the allegation is not substantively that there are two parishes, but that it appears by Acts of Parliament upon which no issue can be taken; for Acts of Parliament are in the breast of the Legislature.

In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor made the following observations:

Upon that part of the argument in which it was said to be doubtful whether the Act would extend to a case where one of the parties playing betted with a party not playing,—

The Lord Chancellor said: If the bet was on the game, he must be betting on one side.

Upon the argument that there was no averment, that Taylor was playing with Willans, that the allegation was that he lost by playing, the Lord Chancellor observed, that the allegation was of loss "to another person" by playing, and he added, "How can one man lose to another but by playing or betting with him." Is there any authority which decides, that where A. is playing with B. and bets with C. the case is not within the Act. "If the fact is necessarily implied from what is stated, it is sufficient. The question upon this argument is, whether it is not a necessary implication from the facts alleged that there was a playing with Taylor."

The Lord Chancellor (at the conclusion of the argument): I am not sure that I know the precise objection. Is it that St. James should be distinguished by the addition of Clerkenwell? If St. James is the proper name, it is indifferent, whether it [426] is in Clerkenwell or Westminster. As to the argument that the distinction in pleading is necessary, in order that the poor may have their share of the penalty; if the Plaintiff recovers the whole, the parish entitled to the moiety may recover over from the Plaintiff. Is it necessary that the whole matter should appear on the record? Suppose there are two parishes of the same name in a county, is it not sufficient in pleading as to one of them, to describe it generally? What authority is there for the contrary position? If the parish of St. James is not the proper name, that was matter of nonsuit, and you cannot take advantage of such a variance by writ of error. It appears that St. James is the proper name, and that the rest is only matter of superfluous description. If the name is not properly stated in the declaration, advantage should have been taken of it upon the trial. It cannot now be alleged as an error in fact.

As to the second point, it is not possible for a person playing to lose to another (except by betting, which is not this case) unless he is playing with him.

Judgment affirmed without costs.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

The Right Honourable THOMAS LORD BARON TRIMLESTOWN, Appellant, EVAN LLOYD, Esquire, a Lieutenant-General in His Majesty's Army, and ALICIA LADY BARONESS TRIMLESTOWN, his wife; also, ROSALIE
 COUNTESS D'ALTON, PETER COUNT D'ALTON, her Husband, RICHARD D'ALTON and EDWARD D'ALTON, Minors, by the said PETER COUNT
 D'ALTON, their Father and next friend, — Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. xv. 234 (Trimlestown v. D'Alton): S. C. 1 Dow and Cl. 85. Cited (i.) on point as to undue influence (1 Bli. N. S. at pp. 475, 476) in *Haddock v. R. at p. 278.]

T. from time to time during his life prepares instructions for his will, and causes drafts to be prepared upon those instructions. At his death he leaves various testamentary papers, executed so as to pass his property; under which papers his son by a first wife, and the issue of that son: his widow, (a second wife,) his daughter with her children, and ulterior remainder-men, might severally claim interests. By the last of these testamentary papers the provision for the widow and the daughter and her children was considerably increased. The Testator died in 1813. In 1814 the daughter, with her husband and children, filed a bill in Equity to establish the last will, and effectuate the charge in their favour. In the same year the widow filed a bill in the same Court, to establish the same will and her interests under it. In 1816 the son and heir filed a bill in the same Court, impeaching the will as obtained by fraud and the improper influence of the widow, and praying a declaration of its invalidity, and an issue at law to try the question.

In the first of these causes, (the suit on behalf of the daughter and her children,) by a decretal order, an issue was directed to enquire by a trial at bar whether the last testamentary paper was the will of T. [428] The widow with her husband were to be the plaintiffs in the action, the son and heir to be the defendant, and the daughter with her husband were to be at liberty to appear in the action and defend their rights and that of their children. Upon the trial of the issue the Jury found a verdict for the defendant. In the course of the trial several of the testamentary instruments executed by the Testator were produced in evidence; but the only point submitted to the consideration of the Jury was the general question of the validity or the invalidity of the last testamentary paper. Application being made to the Court of Equity for a new trial upon the grounds, 1. that the evidence given by two of the witnesses upon the former trial had been improperly admitted; 2. of misdirection by the Judge; 3. that the verdict was contrary to evidence; the Lord Chancellor having required of the Judges who tried the issue a report of only part of the evidence; the Judges returned a report confined to the evidence of two witnesses; upon consideration of which the Court refused the application to set aside the verdict.

Against this decision there was an appeal to the House of Lords, who remitted the cause to the Court below, with directions to call for a full report of the notes of the Judges upon the trial of the issue. In consequence of this remit, a full report having been required and returned, the application for a new trial was reconsidered, and thereupon a new trial was granted and the issue was varied by adding to the original inquiry "whether the testamentary paper" (the subject of first issue) "was the last will of the testator," a farther inquiry "whether any and what paper writing is the last will of etc." Against this new order the son and heir appealed to the House of Lords.

Held that the variation of the issue not resting upon any allegation in the pleadings of any other testamentary instruments but that which was the subject of the first issue, was unauthorized; that the issue was defective in not directing a specific inquiry whether any part of the last testamentary paper, e.g. that under which the daughter and her children took interests, was valid, although the provision for the wife was void; which point ought to have been submitted to the Jury by the Judge at the trial, but was not so; that the order was erroneous in directing that the widow should be the plaintiff in the issue, leaving to the daughter the Plaintiff in the cause in which it was directed only liberty to appear and defend, etc. that the order and the issue were defective for want of parties taking interests under the several testamentary [429] papers; that the issue ought to have been directed upon a decree in the three causes; and that whether the new trial was granted or refused, no effective decree could be made in the cause in its actual state. Upon these and other grounds the cause was remitted to the Court below, with directions to enable the Court and parties to rectify the proceedings.

The Appellant was the only son of Nicholas Lord Trimlestown by his first marriage. The Respondent, Lady Trimlestown, was the widow of Lord Nicholas, afterwards married to Respondent General Lloyd. The Countess D'Alton is the only daughter of Lord Nicholas, and the other Respondents were her two sons.

Lord Nicholas, in August, 1797, intermarried with the Respondent Lady Trimlestown. Upon that marriage, he received, as a portion with his wife, £2000, and settled a jointure of £800 a year upon her for life, charged upon his Dublin and Meath estates.

In December 1797, by a will duly executed, Lord Nicholas confirmed the jointure of £800 a year, settled upon the Respondent Lady Trimlestown, and charged the same upon additional estates; and subject thereto he devised the whole of his real estates (except a small part which he directed to be sold for payment of debts) to the Appellant for life, with remainder to the Appellant's son, Thomas Barnewall, and his issue male, in strict settlement; remainder to any future sons of the Appellant, in tail male, with remainder to any future sons of the Testator, in tail male, remainder to Appellant's daughters for life, remainder to Testator's daughter, the Respondent Rosalie Countess D'Alton, for life, with several remainders over in favour of her children and their issue, remainder to his own right heirs. The will contained powers of leasing, jointur-[430]-ing, and charging, with portions, and gave a legacy of £400 to the Respondent Lady Trimlestown, and £50 to the Countess D'Alton. All the residue of the property was given to the Appellant.

In the year 1802, Lord Nicholas became intitled to the Turvey or Kingsland estate, as heir of his cousin the late Viscount Kingsland; and shortly afterwards gave instructions to have a codicil prepared, whereby he proposed to revoke the devises in remainder made by his will in favour of the Countess D'Alton, and her children and their issue, and to entail his estates so that they might attend the title of Trimlestown; and by the same codicil he proposed to devise the Turvey or Kingsland estate to the Appellant and his male descendants. A codicil was prepared according to these instructions, and revised by Mr. Butler; but it was not executed, Mr. Butler having stated his apprehensions that it was defective, and recommended a new will to be made, incorporating the codicil.

On the 3d of November, 1802, Lord Nicholas executed a codicil, whereby he revoked the limitation of his real estates to his daughter the Countess D'Alton, and limited the same to go with the title. In other respects he confirmed the bequests of the will as to his daughter, and gave her an annuity of £800 for life, if the estates should descend to etc. In addition to the bequests of the will, he also gave to his wife £200 per annum for life, with diamonds and furniture. The Turvey or Kingsland estate he devised to the Appellant his son, of whom he spoke in terms of great affection, and directed that when a certain annuity then charged upon the Turvey estate should be extinct, a further annuity of £200 should be paid to his wife. This codicil was found with the signature and seal torn.

[431] In 1804 the draft of a codicil was prepared by Lord Herbert Stewart, the friend of Lady Trimlestown, which she was led to believe, by a stratagem of Lord Nicholas, that he had executed, when in fact it never was executed.

By a will dated on the 1st of July, 1805, and which was duly executed, Lord Nicholas gave a rent charge of £100 to the Respondent Lady Trimlestown, in addition to her jointure of £800 a year, so long as she should remain single, declaring that if she should not remain single she would marry some person of rank and fortune, so as to make this £100 a year no object to her; he also bequeathed to her a legacy of £500; and he devised all his freeholds except the Turvey estate to the Appellant for life, remainder to Thomas Barnewall his (the Appellant's) son for life, with remainder to the first and every other son of Thomas Barnewall in tail male; with remainder to such person as should possess the title and dignity of Baron Trimlestown; and in case only of the extinction of his title, to the children of the Respondent Rosalie Countess D'Alton; and Lord Nicholas thereby limited the Turvey estate to trustees for the same uses as the other freeholds, and empowered the Appellant to charge his Turvey and Kingsland estate with £20,000, to discharge incumbrances upon his other estates; and he bequeathed all the residue of his property, of what nature or kind soever, to the Appellant. By this will he also gave an annuity of £300 to the Respondent Countess D'Alton, charged on his estates.

Of this will of the 1st of July, 1805, Lord Nicholas executed duplicates, one of which he left with Mr. Addis, the other he lodged in the hands of his relation Robert Barnewall, but both the parts in September 1810, were given up to Lord Nicholas by his desire.

[432] On the 25th of July, 1805, Lord Nicholas executed a codicil to his will, whereby he revoked the appointment by his will of 1805, of Mr. James Nangle, and Mr. Thomas Kemmis, as his executors and trustees, and appointed the Earl of Fingall, and Robert Barnewall, his trustees and executors.

On the 28th of September, 1810, Lord Nicholas executed a codicil to his will, by which he gave to the Countess D'Alton an annuity of £620 during her life, charged upon his estates in Dublin, etc.: a legacy of £5000 to her daughter, Henrietta D'Alton: £400 to her son the Respondent Richard D'Alton: and £100 to her son the Respondent Edward D'Alton: and by the same codicil, he gave to Lady Trimlestown his house in Portland-place, and all the rest, residue, and remainder, of his personal estate; he also devised to her during her life, his house at Turvey, with the use of the gardens thereto belonging, and thirty acres of land immediately adjoining to the house.

On the 2d of August, 1812, Lord Nicholas executed another codicil to his will, in which reciting that he had made his last will and testament, and different codicils, (which he thereby confirmed, of whatever date they might be,) and had thereby devised his estates in the King's County, and County of Meath, but had made no disposition of his estates at Turvey, in the county of Dublin, counties of Longford, Roscommon, and Kildare, he devised to Lady Trimlestown, for her life, the house and demesne lands of Turvey, then in his own occupation, and containing about fifty-eight acres; and, after her death, the same were to go to the Appellant for his life: to whom he also devised the remainder of the Turvey estate, with remainder to the Appellant's son, Thomas Barnewall, [433] for life, with divers remainders over in strict settlement. This codicil then recites that he had by his will given to his daughter an annuity of £600 a year, which he confirms, and, if she should die before her husband, £300, part of the annuity, was to go to her son, the Respondent Edward D'Alton (in this codicil called Edward Thomas Nicholas D'Alton), during the life of the Count; and he gives a legacy of £3000 to the Respondent Richard D'Alton (in this codicil called Richard Charles D'Alton), charged upon his King's County estate: and ratifies and confirms his will and codicils, and all the gifts, devises, matters, and things therein contained, and he revokes the appointment of the executors in his former will and codicil, and appoints Colonel O'Shee an executor.

Lord Nicholas was asked by Mr. Kemmis, who prepared this codicil, to produce his will and codicils, but he declined doing so, telling him that they were in England, and Mr. Kemmis made a memorandum on the back of the draft of the codicil prepared by him, that he had not seen the will and codicils thereby referred to.

The draft of this codicil, as prepared by Mr. Kemmis, began as follows:

"Whereas I, Nicholas Lord Baron of Trimlestown, have made my last Will and Testament, in writing, bearing date the _____ day of _____ in the year of our Lord _____ and have thereby devised my estates in the King's County and County of Meath, but have made no disposition of my estate at Turvey, etc."

Lord Nicholas altered the draft, by drawing his pen through the words, "in writing, bearing date the _____ day of _____ in the year of our Lord _____," And instead thereof, [434] he inserted, after the words "my last will and testament," the following sentence, "and different codicils which I hereby confirm upon whatever date they may be." But he did not correct the recital of his having made no disposition of the Turvey Estate.

On the 15th of November, 1812, a letter signed by Lord Nicholas was transmitted to Mr. Kemmis, containing the following inclosure in the handwriting of Lord Nicholas.

"Instructions to Mr. Kemmis for preparing my will.

"1. To revoke all former wills and codicils made by me.

"2. To direct that I may be buried, in a private manner, in the family vault at Trimlestown.

" 3. To entail all my real estates in the county of Meath and King's County on my son John Thomas Barnewall, and my grandson, his son, Thomas Barnewall, and their issue male, (subject, however, to my debts, and to the following legacies;) and all my family pictures, together with the Turvey Estates, after my beloved wife Lady Trimlestown's demise: all which I intend to entail strictly on my son and grandson, and their issue male, with a power to make a provision of £2000 a year on any future wife that they may have, and a power to charge the estates with a sum not exceeding £40,000 as a provision for younger children that may be born from such future marriages: with all the usual limitations with respect to the grant of leases customary to entailed properties: and in failure of issue male in my son and grandson, I wish to entail the estate of Trimlestown upon the heir male of my family, who is next in succession to my title, as M. Barnewall of Fyansstown, and his issue male: and the King's County [435] estate, and the reversion of my Turvey estate, after Lady Trimlestown's demise, I wish to entail on my daughter Countess D'Alton, and her heirs male, in succession: by which I mean her son Richard: and in the event of their succeeding, they are positively to take the name and bear the arms of Barnewall, and in failure of my daughter, and her heirs male, above mentioned, I wish to entail these estates on my own heirs male above mentioned.

" 4. I wish to bequeath to my beloved wife, Lady Trimlestown, all my personal property of every description, save and except my family pictures, which are to be entailed, as before mentioned. I also leave to Lady Trimlestown my wife, the house, demesne, and estates of Turvey, with all the property thereunto belonging in the Counties of Kildare, Roscommon, and Longford, and Dublin, to enjoy during her natural life, in as full and complete possession as possible, with power to eject tenants and grant leases, as is usual in such cases. And I also bequeath to Lady Trimlestown, my wife, £5000, to be secured to her on the King's County estate.

" 5. I wish to bequeath to my daughter Countess D'Alton £600 a-year during her natural life, for her sole and separate use, independent entirely on her husband Peter D'Alton: and to my grand-daughter Henrietta D'Alton £5000; to my grandson Richard D'Alton £3000; and in the event of Count D'Alton's outliving my daughter, I wish to leave my grandson Edward D'Alton, £400 yearly, during his father's life.

" I wish to name my cousin Colonel John O'Shee, and my brother-in-law Colonel Henry Eustace, to be the trustees and executors of this my will.

" TRIMLESTOWN."

[436] Upon these instructions a long correspondence followed between Lord Trimlestown and Mr. Kemmis, respecting the details of the will.

In pursuance of the instructions a will was drawn up and executed on the 8th of December, 1812, by which Lord Nicholas revoked all former wills and codicils, and then devised all his real estate to Colonel O'Shee and Henry Eustace: as to the King's County estate, subject to the jointure of £800 a-year to Lady Trimlestown, and charged with the payment of all his debts and the legacies thereafter bequeathed, to the use of Thomas Kemmis for 200 years, in trust for better securing the several annuities of £600, £100, and £100 thereafter respectively given to the Countess D'Alton and her sons Richard and Edward D'Alton: and upon trust also to raise money for the payment of all the testator's debts and legacies; and subject to the said term and the trusts thereof, to the use of William Kemmis and his heirs, during the life of the Countess D'Alton, in trust to pay her £600 a year during her life, and after her decease, in case her son, Richard D'Alton, should survive, and should not be her eldest son, then to the intent he should receive £400 a year during his life: and if Peter Count D'Alton should outlive the Countess D'Alton, then Edward D'Alton should receive £400 a year during his father's life: and he devised the Turvey or Kingsland estate to Lady Trimlestown for her life, without impeachment of waste. The estate in the County of Meath, called the Trimlestown Estate, he devised, "subject to the payment of the annuities to the Countess D'Alton, Richard D'Alton, and Edward D'Alton, and interest upon his debts and legacies, in aid and to supply any deficiency arising from the failure of the rents of his [437] King's County estates, until the subsisting leases thereof should expire;" together with the said King's County estate, subject to the several charges and annuities aforesaid, and the said Turvey and Kingsland estate, after the death of Lady Trimlestown (who was younger than the Appellant), to the use of the Appellant for life, with remainder to the Appellant's son, the Hon. Thomas Barnewall for life, with remainders over to his sons severally and successively in tail male, with remainders to any future sons of the Appellant, severally and successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, the King's County and Turvey estates were given over to the Countess D'Alton, and her children; and the Meath or Trimlestown estate to the Barnewalls of Fyansdown, with divers remainders over. And Lord Nicholas, by the said will, gave to the Appellant, and his son Thomas Barnewall, respectively, as and when they should respectively be in actual possession of the King's County, Meath, and Turvey estates, powers of jointuring with £2000 a year, and charging with £40,000 for the portions of daughters and younger sons. And he charged the King's County estate with a legacy of £5000 for Lady Trimlestown; £5000 for Henrietta D'Alton, to be paid on her marriage; and a legacy of £3000 for Richard D'Alton; and he bequeathed to Lady Trimlestown the whole of his personal estate (except his family pictures) exempt from the payment of his debts; and he appointed Colonel O'Shee and Henry Eustace his Executors.

Lord Nicholas died on the 17th of April, 1813, in the 87th year of his age, and was succeeded in his title by the Appellant.

The will was proved in the Ecclesiastical Court by [438] Colonel O'Shee, without opposition; but the Appellant afterwards instituted a suit (which is still depending) in the Ecclesiastical Court in Ireland, to recal the probate of the will.

On the 23d of April, 1814, the Respondents, Peter Count D'Alton and Rosalie, with Thomas Kemmis and William Kemmis, filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in England, against the Appellant, and Lady Trimlestown, the Hon. Thomas Barnewall, and others, seeking to have the will of the 8th of December, 1812, established, and an account taken of the debts and other incumbrances affecting the King's County estate; and also an account of what was due to the Countess D'Alton, in respect of the annuity of £600 given to her by the will, and praying that, in case it should appear the King's County estate was not equal to the payment of the annuity of £600, then that it might be decreed a charge on the Testator's estates generally; and that, in the mean time, a receiver might be appointed over the King's County estate, and directed to pay the annuity.

To this bill the Appellant put in an answer, whereby he disputed the validity of the will.

On the 29th June, 1814, Lady Trimlestown filed a bill in the Court of Chancery against the Appellant, the D'Altons, and others, praying (amongst other things) that the articles executed prior to her marriage, dated 8th August, 1797, whereby the said jointure of £800 a year was settled upon her, and also that the trusts of the will might be carried into execution; and that an account might be taken of what was due to her on the foot of the jointure, and also on the foot of the legacy of £500 given to her by such will, and the interest thereof; and that the Appellant might be de-[439]-creed to pay what should be due, by a certain day, or else that a competent part of the King's County estate might be sold for payment thereof; and that a receiver might be appointed in the mean time.

To the last mentioned bill also, the Appellant put in an answer, also disputing the validity of such will.

In the month of July, 1814, Lady Trimlestown intermarried with the Respondent Evan Lloyd, and shortly afterwards the bill filed by the Respondents Peter Count D'Alton and Rosalie his wife, and their trustees, was amended, and Evan Lloyd made a party defendant thereto; the Respondents Richard and Edward D'Alton were also made defendants thereto; and the Respondents, Evan Lloyd and Alicia (Lady Trimlestown) his wife, filed a bill of revivor for reviving the suit so instituted by the Respondent Lady Trimlestown, and which had abated by her marriage, and the same was revived accordingly. This bill was afterwards further amended by striking out the names of Thomas and William Kemmis, and making Richard and Edward D'Alton Co-Plaintiffs.

On the 19th July, 1816, the Appellant filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against the Respondents and others, praying, amongst other things, that the will of 8th December, 1812, might be declared fraudulent and void, and be set aside accordingly, and that proper issues might be directed for the purpose of trying the validity of such will; and that the Appellant might have the necessary commissions for examination of witnesses out of the kingdom, and also of witnesses, de bene esse.

The suit instituted by the Respondents Peter Count D'Alton and Rosalie his wife, came on for hearing on the 18th June, 1817, when, with the con-[440]-sent of the Respondents, Evan Lloyd and Lady Trimlestown, it was ordered, that they the last named Respondents should commence a feigned action in the Court of King's Bench in Ireland, against the Appellant, with the usual further directions, in order that a trial might be had between the parties by a special jury of the county of Dublin, at the bar of the Court, during the sittings at the then next Michaelmas term, to try the following issue, viz. "Whether the paper-writing, bearing date the 8th December, 1812, in the pleadings mentioned, be the last will and testament of Nicholas Lord Trimlestown, deceased, or not." And it was further ordered, that the Respondents Peter Count D'Alton and Rosalie his wife should be at liberty to appear in the action to defend their rights and those of their children, the Respondents Edward D'Alton and Richard D'Alton.

On the 6th June, 1818, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland made an order, entitled in the three causes, that the parties to the issue should be at liberty, on the trial of such issue, to make use of the depositions made by the witnesses examined abroad by them respectively, on commissions issued for that purpose.

The issue came on for trial on the 11th of June, 1818, in the Court of King's Bench, before Lord Chief Justice Downes, and Judge Mayne, and a special jury of the County of Dublin, and counsel appeared as well on the part of the Respondents Evan Lloyd and Lady Trimlestown, as of the Respondents Peter Count D'Alton and Rosalie his wife. The trial continued for fourteen days, when the jury not agreeing upon their verdict, a juror was withdrawn by consent of the Plaintiffs and Defendant in the issue.

* On the 21st November, 1818, the Respondents made an application to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland for a [441] new trial of the issue, and thereupon it was ordered that the new trial should be had at the bar of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, by a jury of the County of Dublin; but before the order was drawn up the venue was changed on the application of the Appellant, and it was ordered that the new trial should be had before a jury of the county of Kildare.

On the 22d February, 1819, the issue came on to be tried in the Court of Common Pleas, before Lord Norbury, Mr. Justice Fletcher, and Mr. Justice Moore, and continued on trial from that day until the 6th day of March, 1819, when the jury after having retired for twenty-eight hours, brought in their verdict, "That the paper-writing of the 8th December, 1812, in the pleadings mentioned, was not the last will and testament of Nicholas Lord Baron Trimlestown, deceased."

After the trial, Henry Eustace married Henrietta D'Alton, and claimed the legacy of £5000 given to her by the will.

The Respondents, being dissatisfied with the verdict, gave notice, on the 7th May, 1819, of moving for a new trial, on the ground, first, of inadmissible evidence having been received on the part of the Appellant; secondly, of the Judges who presided having misdirected the jury at the trial; and, thirdly, on the ground of such verdict having been given contrary to law and the weight of evidence.

The motion came on to be heard upon the 7th of July, 1819, when the Counsel for the Respondents required the Lord Chancellor to call for the full report of the Judges who presided at the trial; but his Lordship was pleased to declare his intention to call for the notes of the learned Judges as far only as respected the objection made by the Respondents' counsel as [442] to the admissibility of the evidence given by Edward Jerningham, and John Joseph Dillon, on the trial. The Lord Chancellor declined calling for any further report from the learned Judges than that before mentioned, and stated as a further reason for such his refusal, that he had conferred with the three learned Judges before whom the issue had been tried, two of whom (Mr. Justice Fletcher and Mr. Justice Moore) expressed their entire approbation of the verdict, and the other (Lord Chief Justice Norbury) stated that he saw no good reason for granting another trial.

On the 11th day of July, 1819, the motion upon argument was refused.

The Respondents appealed to the House of Lords from the last mentioned order, and contended, that such order ought to be reversed, principally on the grounds, first, that the Judges who presided at the trial had admitted the evidence of Edward Jerningham and John Joseph Dillon, and had dwelt upon it in their charge to the jury: and, secondly, that the Lord Chancellor ought not to have refused their motion for a new trial, without having previously called for and read the Judges' report of all the evidence given on the said trial.

The appeal was heard on the 23d of June, 1823, when the House declared, that not having before them, in a case in which a feme covert and infants were parties materially interested, any report which they could deem authentic of all the evidence given at the trial, the Lords were unable to determine whether the verdict complained of by the motion for a new trial ought or ought not to be deemed conclusive: and therefore the order of the 14th July, 1819, complained of in the appeal, was reversed: and the cause was [443] remitted to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, to rehear the motion for a new trial, upon a full report from the Judges, of the whole evidence given at the trial before them: the Lords deeming such report necessary in a cause in which such parties were interested.

The Respondents accordingly, on or about the _____ day of _____ 1824, gave notice of a motion, and also petitioned the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, to set aside the verdict, on the grounds of inadmissible evidence having been permitted to be given on the part of the Defendant, the misdirection of the learned Judges who presided at the trial, and that such verdict was given contrary to law, and the weight of evidence: and also grounded on the learned Judges' reports of the whole evidence produced on the trial, and the order of the Lords. Whereupon the Lord Chancellor called upon the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Mr. Justice Moore, the two surviving Judges who presided at the trial of the issue, to furnish him with a copy of their notes of the evidence given on such trial; and the two surviving Judges accordingly delivered copies of their notes to the Lord Chancellor.

The motion was heard on the 26th April, 1824, and was debated on that and the five following days, and it came on again on the 24th May following, when the Lord Chancellor ordered, that the verdict found on the trial in the Court of Common Pleas, on the issue formerly directed, should be set aside: and that the issue directed by the order of the 18th June, 1817, should be varied: and his Lordship further ordered, that the issue to be tried should be, "Whether the paper writing, bearing date the 8th December, 1812, be the last will and testament of Nicholas Lord Trimlestown, deceased, or not: and if not, whether [444] any and what other paper writing or writings is or are his last will and testament." And his Lordship further ordered, that such issue should be tried at the law side of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, at the sittings after the then next Trinity Term, by a special Jury of the county of the city of Dublin, and that the Plaintiffs in the issue should pay to the Appellants the costs of the former trial in the Common Pleas.

Against this order the Appeal was presented.

For the Appellants, Mr. Horne, Dr. Lushington.

For the Respondents, the Attorney General and Mr. Scarlet. (and Mr. Parry.)

The Lord Chancellor*: There are in truth two issues.

In this state of the record on the trial, what other paper or writing was there to form the subject of a distinct issue?

This House may arrange its proceedings in such manner as is convenient and just. What occasion is there for us to trouble ourselves with the question, whether that will which was the only will on which the order was made is a will or not, or what ought to be the verdict with respect to that will: if you mean to say there is some other will or paper, which might supersede the necessity of trying whether that will which is to be mentioned in the present order ought to be considered as a testament at all. What is the other will or paper which this second order of the Chancellor [445] refers to? If there is any other will or paper to set up, could that be the right issue? If the appeal from this order goes to the whole contents of it, and this order is wrong in directing the other issue, then it must be sent back again.

What other will or paper is meant to be referred to in this second order we do not know. The House may confine the objection to the issue, for the present to the point that there is no other paper or will referred to in the pleadings, and that therefore this second issue cannot be right. The Appellant would then have a right to ask that the cause should be remitted, unless this House was to confine the trial of the issue to what was the matter to be tried on the issue first directed: and then if there be any other will or paper which can be set up, we ought to know what that is. To authorize the direction of a new issue, there should be a petition of rehearing to vary the decree.

* The judicial observations above reported occurred in the course and arose out of the argument, the substance of which is, in some instances, shortly incorporated with the observations. In some instances where they appear connected in the report, they were in fact separated by intervals of argument. The arguments themselves could not conveniently be reported on account of their length.

Lord Redesdale: I have a suspicion that there is a mistake in framing this order. Upon the former appeal one doubt suggested was this, whether supposing that the evidence would have the effect of destroying the instrument which was then produced, so far as Lady Trimlestown took interest, it could have the effect of destroying the instrument, so far as the Countess D'Alton and her family took any interest under it; that was one important part of the case on the former hearing. The Jury found generally against the will. The evidence, as far as it appeared before us, was, that the will had been obtained by the influence of Lady Trimlestown. But it does not follow, although the influence of Lady Trimlestown has given her a certain interest under the will, which the heir at law has a right to contest, that therefore the disposition contained in the will, so far as it related [446] to the Countess D'Alton and her family, could be impeached: and if there is no other instrument mentioned in the pleadings, I should rather suspect that this was intended to embrace that case; but it does not do it; and upon the motion for the new trial of an issue which had been directed by the decree, I should have had a doubt whether a new issue could be directed without a petition for a rehearing.

The Lord Chancellor: In strict practice, it could not; sometimes parties are not turned round on such an objection: but if the object of the Lord Chancellor in Ireland was such as the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord Redesdale) supposes, the issue is wrong, because then it ought to be whether the whole of the paper or what part of it contains the will of Nicholas Lord Trimlestown.

The House has a right to know (if it is open to a question whether only a part of the order is wrong) on what ground that part, with reference to which we have never had in any record that has been before us, any ground whatever for directing it, on what ground the Court directed that latter part of the issue. We are not to go into a long examination whether the Jury were right or wrong upon the issue as it stood before, but why the new matter is now introduced. I take it to be clearly within the competence of the House to say, that unless it be for the convenience of parties, they will not suffer the issue to be altered.

Lord Redesdale: The Jury might have found on the former issue, that so much of the will as related to Lady Trimlestown was not the will of Lord Trimlestown, but that so much of the will as related to the Countess D'Alton and her family was the will of Lord Trimlestown.

[447] I remember a case where the Jury found that the whole of the will was not the will of the testator. It was a case in which Lord Erskine particularly exerted himself. The person who framed the will had introduced himself as the ultimate devisee; the Jury found the rest of the will to be the will of the testator, but that ultimate devise which the person who framed the will had inserted they found not to be his will. So here if what is meant to be argued is this, that this disposition in favour of the Countess D'Alton may be good, and the rest may be bad, the Jury might have found a special verdict.

If the parties interested are all adult, and waive that part of the order, the question will then be open upon the will alleged, whether the verdict ought to have been special with respect to a part of the will, and negating the rest.

The Lord Chancellor: We are still under the difficulty, whether the record in the Court of Chancery authorizes the issue.

If there are a dozen other wills, this is an issue on the other wills. If the issue had been whether this was his last will and testament or not, there was no occasion for any other issue, if you intended to shew that by a subsequent will made, he revoked that will, because that would enable the Jury to find a verdict negating the validity of that will.

If it is a prior will, the latter part of the order has nothing to do with it, unless there appears to be some equity arising out of the record in the Court of Chancery, with reference to which a prior will being established, that Court would give some relief.

(Monday, 5th March, 1827.) A question arose respecting the costs of a former [448] day of hearing, which had been paid by the Appellants to the Respondents.

The Lord Chancellor*: There should be no costs of the day; for if this decree as it now stands cannot remain without some steps being taken to get rid of the additions, that would be a ground for allowing at once the present appeal. I think the Appellants should not pay the costs of the day under the circumstances.

The issue is directed, Lady Trimlestown being the Plaintiff and the two D'Altons are to appear on their own behalf and on behalf of their issue. Does it appear from the Judges' notes whether this separate and distinct question was ever agitated before the Jury, namely, whether supposing this will to be bad with respect to Lady Trimlestown, it might not be good as to several parts of it as to the others?

Lord Redesdale: The Judges in their report do not state any thing about the directions which were given to the Jury.

The Lord Chancellor: There do not appear to be decrees in any of the other cases, and the issue is directed in a case which among the three cases would certainly not be the one in which an issue would be directed here.

Lord Redesdale: As I apprehend the verdict, it has found that it was not the intention of Lord Trimlestown to make any provision for his daughter or her family, or to make any provision for the payment of his debts out of the real estate, or to make any limitation in strict settlement of his estates to his son for life, his grandson for life, and so on limiting the estates over to the persons who were to succeed to the [449] title of Trimlestown. That all those provisions formed no part of the intention of Lord Trimlestown, at the time when he executed that instrument. That seems to be the result of what has been done.

The Lord Chancellor: There was a case on the western circuit, I think at Winchester, where a gentleman made his will, and the attorney who drew it, took good care of himself; for after leaving several legacies and some small bequests to other persons, he left all the residue of the real and personal estate to himself. The direction given by the Judge (whether right or wrong is another thing), was this, "you are to consider whether that part of the will is fraudulent, but it does not follow that if it is so, all the rest of the testament may not be confirmed." Does it necessarily follow in this will that all the provisions of 1812 are void, if the provision for Lady Trimlestown is void?

Dr. Lushington: I am prepared to argue that those circumstances which have shewn it not to be Lord Trimlestown's will, qua Lady Trimlestown, all bear upon the other devises and bequests in the will, and shew that it was not Lord Trimlestown's will, qua the Countess D'Alton and the other legatees.

The Lord Chancellor: It is capable of being so made out: but the question is, whether that way of considering the case was ever put to the jury; because if it has not been so put to the jury, the case has not been tried.

There must be a mistake in this point: if it was right to direct an issue in which Lady Trimlestown was Plaintiff—certainly another should have been directed, in which the Countess D'Alton was Plaintiff.

Lord Redesdale: You begin your evidence [450] against the will, by producing testamentary instruments as the wills of the late Lord Trimlestown, by which he makes provision for these very persons, and by which he limits his estate in strict settlement. Now the effect of this verdict is to say, that it was not the intention of Lord Trimlestown to make these provisions or to dispose of the estate in strict settlement, as averred by that instrument.

The Lord Chancellor: The trial of the issue in that case could not be considered binding on the other parties, there being a great many infants concerned.

Lord Redesdale: Had the evidence produced any thing to do with the question, whether the D'Altons were to have this estate.

The Lord Chancellor: I think it may be argued, that the conduct of Lady Trimlestown vitiates the whole will: but whether it does or does not, it is material to know, whether Lord Norbury or Mr. Justice Moore put to the jury upon the trial the question whether, if the whole of the will was not good, any part of it was?

* The costs were repaid by the Respondents to the Appellants.

The question is, whether they should not have taken care that this should have gone in some shape to the jury.

Lord Redesdale: If this cause should come on to be heard in the Court of Chancery after the verdict, what is to be done?

The Lord Chancellor: We are sitting as a Court of Equity, and we cannot, as a Court of Equity, try the question relative to this will: and the consequence is, that if the questions embodied in the case, have not all been put to the jury, we have not yet got the opinion of the jury upon the questions or their finding, with respect to which alone we can [451] give any authority. It comes to be a very material question, whether there might not be an issue tried as between the D'Altons and the son!

Lord Redesdale: The issue directs that Lady Trimlestown shall be the Plaintiff; how could the verdict in this issue be a ground for dismissing the Countess D'Alton's bill? The order gives liberty to the Countess D'Alton and the husband to appear by counsel to defend their rights, and those of their children under this will.

(7th March 1827.) The Lord Chancellor: Supposing the evidence against Lord Trimlestown's intention be conclusive, every individual who claims under the former will, has a right to file a bill to set that will aside, they not being parties in this suit.

Suppose a new trial is granted, and Lord Trimlestown has the title as heir at law (whether it would be necessary to claim as such, is another thing): But, supposing he could claim as tenant for life under a former will, which former will is not capable of being effectually attacked, if Lord Trimlestown has filed this bill, making himself the sole party to the agitation of the question, whether the will of 1812 is to stand or not, if it should turn out upon the new trial that Lord Trimlestown is beaten, what is to prevent the persons claiming under the former will, to entertain a suit? Lord Trimlestown in his bill does not rely upon the testamentary papers; but if we are to argue upon some of the testamentary papers as being authentic, and shewing the testator's intention, then we are in truth setting up further papers as evidence of the will of 1812: whereas if it can be effectually done, it ought to be by other evidence, on the papers themselves being first proved.

[452] Lord Redesdale: It is singular that upon a bill where the D'Altons are Plaintiffs, Lady Trimlestown should be made the Plaintiff in the issue; but this extraordinary thing also occurs, that Lord Trimlestown is the defendant in that bill, in the character of heir at law, and in this character gives in evidence that which is to deprive him of that character, and which is not impeached.

The Lord Chancellor: We have no copy of Lord Trimlestown's bill. The issue is directed in the cause of D'Altons and others v. Lord Trimlestown; although this is to decide that which is to arise in three causes, we have no bill here except the bill in which the D'Altons are Plaintiffs.

On what principle were depositions taken in the other causes, to which some of the individuals were not parties, ordered to be read?

Mr. Horne: There was an order for it, and that order never appealed from.

The Lord Chancellor: It is not appealed from certainly.

This view of the case is extremely material, that whatever our decision might be, you cannot get through upon this state of the record.

With respect to the depositions taken in the other causes, and ordered to be read upon this trial, how can we sanction that against the infant daughters? How is it possible to proceed? We have no record upon the table, except the bill of Countess D'Alton and the answer of Lord Trimlestown; the consequence is, that it is next to impossible to judge whether evidence was not given at nisi prius which could not be given against all the parties. The bill in the D'Alton cause is originally filed by the wife only and the Kemmis's, the infant D'Altons being [453] made Defendants. After Lord Trimlestown's answer is put in, the bill is amended (under what authority I cannot tell, nor is this circumstance taken notice of at all in the printed cases,) by striking out the two infant Defendants, and making them Plaintiffs, claiming interests under this will jointly with their mother. After they are made Plaintiffs, and altering the nature of the demand made by the bill, there is no answer put in by any body. Now what we are to do, regard being had to these parties, I know not. We cannot take upon ourselves to do that which a Court of Equity cannot do: what are we to do with this cause, looking at it as matter of precedent? I cannot at present, though I struggle to do it, see how the difficulty can be overcome—how, consistently with this record we can come to a decision. I am anxious to take care that the House should not establish a precedent, which it is its positive duty not to establish. The records are extremely material to look at, to see whether we can let this verdict stand, even if we thought it was right. Lord Norbury says the codicil of 1812, is admitted to be a good testamentary paper. If so, how can we conclude the rights of parties under it?

There have been cases in the Courts below, where a person putting in an instrument containing provisions for others, intended it to be only a colour for his deriving a benefit to himself, which he fraudulently seeks by the means of that instrument. Where that has occurred, the Court will not let any part of it stand; but have the courts gone so far as this? Supposing this instrument was improperly obtained on the part of Lady Trimlestown, if there happened to be in it provisions for other individuals, but on account of her conduct the will as it regards her is rejected, does [454] that extend to the testamentary dispositions to other persons?—Was there ever a case in which such provisions were held bad as to others?

Mr. Horne: The question on that point has been a good deal discussed lately in Porrell v. Muchett (6, Mad. 216. But the discussion does not appear in the Report.)

The Lord Chancellor: The infants being originally Defendants, and afterwards being made Plaintiffs, by amending the bill, if they had a demand under the will as Plaintiffs, could the original Plaintiffs (as it appears they have done,) waive a further answer, which might have been for the benefit of the infants?

Lord Redesdale: There is no common interest between the parents and the children: the two Mr. Kemmis's were struck out as Plaintiffs, and the children were inserted.

The Lord Chancellor: The date of Lord Trimlestown's answer, and the date of the amendment of the bill, proves decidedly that Lord Trimlestown's answer was put in before the bill was amended. When those infants were made Plaintiffs, their interests were very much neglected. There ought to have been something more than their being put into the bill. Mr. Kemmis is struck out, and there is a term vested in him for raising an annuity to Lady D'Alton; and I should have thought him as material as any one could possibly be to the suit. If it became necessary to make a decree to raise that annuity, how was that to be done without Mr. Kemmis?

Lord Redesdale: Several orders, and particularly [455] an order under which the depositions were used at the trial, was made in the three causes.

The Lord Chancellor: The trial was had, this order of the 6th of June, 1818, in three causes, directing what sort of evidence was to be produced. In those three causes did all the Defendants put in Answers?

Mr. Nolan: It appears that every one of the persons who are made Defendants in these several Bills, put in their Answers.

The Lord Chancellor: Then why have you not their Answers? Where persons are suing for themselves and for the interest of infants, it will not be considered satisfactory if counsel do not take objections which they ought to have taken, because they apprehend the Court is bound to object on the part of the infants.

Lord Redesdale: A Court of Law could only obey the order. Here Lady Trimlestown was the Plaintiff in the issue, and the other persons were no parties to the issue.

Mr. Horne: It is ordered, that the Plaintiffs, Peter Count D'Alton and Rosalie Countess D'Alton his wife, be at liberty to appear in the action.

Lord Redesdale: What right had the Court to make such an order? What is to be done? The case being in the Court of Chancery, if the verdict was not impeached, there could be no motive for a new trial. What is the Court of Chancery to do? There is error on the face of the decree.

The Lord Chancellor: The effect of the order as to depositions, appears to have been utterly mistaken. It was considered as an order, that put upon the parties a duty to produce these depositions, whether the depositions would be evidence or would [456] not be evidence: whereas the order is neither more nor less than the liberty to offer in evidence depositions without reading the Bill and Answer, and all the proceedings which are usually read in order to introduce them.

Mr. Horne: The depositions read at the trial, were not the depositions of witnesses examined in the Court of Equity when the cause was in hearing, but depositions taken upon a commission issued subsequent to the decree.

Lord Redesdale: If the cause should go back in the state in which it is without any alteration, what is the Court of Chancery to do? It cannot dismiss the Bill.

All the proceedings have been so irregular, that the Court could do nothing upon it. It ought to order the cause to be set down again. Is this order which directs an issue a decree?—is it not interlocutory?

Mr. Horne: There was, as I collect from the papers, a regular decree in the cause of the Countess D'Alton, which directed the issue.

Lord Redesdale: The prayer of the Bill is, that the will may be declared well proved and so on; the order being in the nature of an interlocutory order, if the cause comes on afterwards, the Court must judge whether that order tries the merits of the cause.

The Lord Chancellor: The word decree happens to have got into the order; but looking at that part of the order which directs, that although publication has passed, they shall be at liberty further to examine witnesses, it appears to me impossible to say it is a decree before witnesses examined. That order for examination of witnesses after the issue directed must be by consent, and there was no consent here.

If there is no decree, the infants, or the persons [457] who have the care and custody of the infants, seem totally to have forgotten to inquire whether, if they could not claim a benefit under one will, they might not under another, as they could under any paper of the Testator that might have been brought before the Court, and ought to have been brought before the Court.

Lord Redesdale: This order puts the management of the issue in Lady Trimlestown and her husband. They are to strike the Jury, and so on. All that is said with respect to the Countess D'Alton is, that she might be at liberty to attend at the trial. Now Lady Trimlestown being made the party Plaintiff in the issue, a great deal might be evidence against her on the trial of the issue, which would not be evidence against the D'Altons or any other party.

The Lord Chancellor: A person meaning to commit a fraud for his benefit, might have constructed such an instrument, that the fraud should defeat the whole of the provisions of it, though some of them were made for other persons. But if it happens that the instrument does not make new provisions, but only repeats provisions which had been made in good antecedent testamentary papers, then the fraud may have introduced that, which, if it is objectionable as it regards A., may not affect every thing that is to be found in that paper.

Lord Redesdale: At present the judgment on the trial of the issue is against Lady Trimlestown; but if the D'Altons had been Plaintiffs in the issue, they might have thrown Lady Trimlestown over board. Evidence merely to affect Lady Trimlestown, and not the D'Altons, makes the trial of the issue a totally different thing.

The Lord Chancellor: In that case, which was [458] tried at Winchester, where the real estate, if it passed at all, passed by the residuary devise, Mr. Justice Buller, who tried the cause, was of opinion (right or wrong), that an attorney making himself the residuary devisee, was a fraud; which was going a little too far. In the trial of that case, nobody disputed that the other parts of the will were good, and the Jury found that he did not devise the residue of the estate; that the residuary clause was not part of the will. I do not mean to give any opinion here as to what would be the effect of putting a case of that sort in that way, but it appears to me that the trial was neither properly directed nor properly conducted; unless on the part of some of the persons who were at liberty to attend this trial, the question was either directly or actually put in that way.

Lord Redesdale: The name of Mr. Kemmis was not struck out of the bill until the 6th of December, 1817, and the order directing the issue was the 18th of June, 1817. By the subsequent order of 21st November, 1818, the issue was supposed to be affirmatively upon Lady Trimlestown.

The Lord Chancellor: Can any man take upon himself to say, that the D'Altons could not have claimed an interest under some of the former papers?

Lord Redesdale: The order of the 21st of November, 1817, varies from the order of the 18th of June, 1817.

The Lord Chancellor: The paper of August, 1812, Lord Norbury reports to be a good testamentary instrument. The passage I allude to is this:—"Here at the desire and admission of each side, several letters were proved or admitted to be read at each side, to which letters I must refer your Lordship as the best interpreters of them-[459]-selves, as well as of the competency or incapacity, if any, or the failure of the intellect of the testator, and the object of his intentions: on which letters many ingenious observations were made by counsel at both sides in this peculiar and protracted trial during many days, and embracing every part and transaction of the testator's life, from 1797 to his death in 1813, during which period it was argued by counsel for the Plaintiffs, that he manifested increasing anxiety upon the subject of his testamentary dispositions, as actuated by his various views and impressions of vicissitudes and changes (most of them towards the latter period of his life), arising from new occurrences in his affairs and new properties devolved upon him, all of which were urged with pointed observations on the codicil of the 2d August, 1812, etc., which was not impeached during the trial, but undisputed and admitted as a testamentary disposition of testator." According to Lord Norbury's description, he thought the testator capable of judging what he was about on the 2d of August, 1812.

(Monday, 19th March, 1827.) The Lord Chancellor: There are no parties to this appeal except Lord Trimlestown and Mr. Lloyd. Neither his son nor the D'Altons are named in the appeal. Lord Trimlestown put in his answer in the cause, on his own behalf and in behalf of his son, but the son is no party to this appeal. If the son is of age, he should be made a party to the appeal. Lord Trimlestown is only tenant for life under the will; it could not be competent to him to consent as against his own issue. How can we make an addition to the order directing a new trial upon an appeal which brings nobody before [460] us but Lord Trimlestown himself and the Lloyds? How can we possibly do that, having no other Appellant or Respondents than those who are now here?

Lord Redesdale: There are inaccuracies in the whole proceeding. Evidence was admitted upon the trial under the order made in the three causes, the issue being conducted in only one, and the order could not possibly have been made in that one cause.

The Lord Chancellor: Those who are the parties upon this issue were parties in those several cases. But that does not help the imperfection, because, besides the circumstance that the order was made when the persons who were parties in those causes were infants, the Court could not order evidence to be read against parties in whose cause the evidence was not taken.

Mr. Parry: The same evidence was taken in each cause. The Abbé O'Dwyer was examined, for instance, in each cause. Commissioners went from Ireland to France, where they examined him.

The Lord Chancellor: That does not appear in our proceedings. It is clear that if they had been made parties to the issue, considering that one was a married woman and that the others were infants, the Court here would have directed those points to have been made at the trial, about which not one word was said. To bring here the necessary parties, you must present another petition calling them here. Suppose a creditor files a bill against Mr. Kemmis, who has been, for some reason quite unintelligible to me, dismissed as a party to the suit: if any creditor or any legatee, under the last will of Lord Trimlestown, were to file a bill for his debt, or for his legacy, would such creditor or such legatee be bound by that issue?

[461] The Attorney-General: Any creditor might try it again; but in cases of this sort, it is not matter of necessity for the Court to have before them every possible party who might meet the question again.

The Lord Chancellor: It certainly is not; but it is extremely material, if you are trying a question before a jury, with respect to the validity of a will, to take notice that the testator has, as we are apt to say upon these occasions, not gone into his grave without taking care of his creditors. It may turn out upon inquiry, that it is impossible to make this will valid with respect to the Countess D'Alton, if it is not valid with respect to Lady Trimlestown; but whether it be so or not, in my judgment the Court of Chancery ought to have ordered the counsel of this married woman and these infants, distinctly to take the opinion of the jury upon the issue, and to make objections to the admission of a great deal of evidence, which appears to have been admitted. Suppose Lord Trimlestown had succeeded in the ejectment prayed by this bill, would that ejectment have prevented any other person from trying the validity of this will?

Lord Redesdale: As to all the interest taken by persons entitled to the remainder it is impossible that the Court can do any thing in this suit. If it were to come before the Court upon this verdict, the Court could pronounce no order.

The Lord Chancellor: Lord Trimlestown is only tenant for life, and therefore the first tenant in tail in remainder ought to be a party to this appeal.

Lord Redesdale: The whole proceeding is irregular from beginning to end. I see that Lord Trimlestown insists by his answer to the Countess D'Alton's [462] bill, that the bill is not Countess D'Alton's, but Lady Trimlestown's, and they have proceeded upon that issue to try this question, with Lady Trimlestown as the Plaintiff in the issue.

In order to do justice in this case, all the parties interested in the different instruments, ought to have been before the Court, and the Court ought to have directed an issue to try whether any and which of the instruments, or any and what parts thereof, were the will of Lord Trimlestown.

The Lord Chancellor: The House cannot do that upon these pleadings, because these pleadings take no notice of any antecedent will at all.

We should probably have no objection to the cause standing over, with liberty for you to make any application to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, but whether you will find, regard being had to the state of the record, that the Court of Chancery can do any thing, is another matter.

Lord Redesdale: Lord Trimlestown upon the pleadings in this cause, stands in the case of an heir at law, insisting that his father died intestate, and the evidence he produces upon the trial of this issue, is that very testamentary act, which he says is to be regarded as shewing the intention of his father.

The Lord Chancellor: The bill on his part, contends for an intestacy, and yet his infant son appears by him to claim a life estate under this very will.

Lord Redesdale: The justice of the case never can be attained in the suits as they are framed, and certainly not in the one suit. If it can be effected at all, it must be in the three suits. An order has been made in the three suits on which evidence was [463] admitted at the trial, and this alone is such an irregularity that it is impossible the Court can decide upon the merits of the case.

The Lord Chancellor: The Judge at Nisi Prius informs the Court that divers wills have been given in evidence, whereas Lord Trimlestown is proceeding in this case as if it were an absolute intestacy.

Lord Redesdale: It is impossible in this case to do any thing, for the issue is directed only in the one cause. It is clear from the evidence upon which the Jury have proceeded that that cause cannot try the merits between the parties, and consequently that when the cause comes on upon this verdict, the Court can make no order.

The Attorney General: If there were a remit to the Court of Chancery, in Ireland, would it not be possible to direct an issue in the three causes with the intervention of those parties who claimed separate interests; for instance, Lord Trimlestown's son may be permitted to raise a separate question upon the will.

Lord Redesdale: There are not the proper parties before the Court.

They must not only amend the order directing the issue, but they must amend all the pleadings in the cause. They must make it a new cause.

The Lord Chancellor: If the Lord Chancellor, when he directed an additional issue, had been asked upon what part of the record in those causes he made the addition, in all probability he would have found out that he could not do it upon any part of the record.

Lord Redesdale: Supposing the verdict to be in favour of the will, excepting the dispositions in favour of Lady Trimlestown, the effect will be, that all the [464] prior wills (and the interest of Lady Trimlestown under them) will be revoked by this will; so that it seems to me, that the justice of the case never can be come at but by an issue, directing the jury to try whether any, and, if any, which of the instruments that have been brought forward in this cause, and what parts of them constitute the testamentary disposition of Lord Trimlestown:—then the jury would have the whole case before them; and they must find what was the will of Lord Trimlestown, and what was not the will of Lord Trimlestown.

If you act upon this proceeding only, you must dismiss the bill: which you have no right to do.

The Lord Chancellor: Suppose it turned out that there was another will, could the Court of Chancery make any decree in the present state of the record?

Lord Redesdale: The Court must see that upon the trial of this issue, the merits have not been tried supposing the verdict was right. The justice of the case would be met by an order, referring it back to the Court of Chancery, to review all the proceedings, with liberty for the parties to reform those proceedings in such manner as shall bring the rights of the parties properly in discussion before the Court.

There is nothing so important in the administration of justice as regularity of proceeding. Wherever there is irregularity in the proceedings, it always tends to a bad administration of justice, or to injustice.

The Lord Chancellor: The question is, what the House can do. We are in this situation:—if we say there shall be a new trial, and there is a new trial, in the present state of the record the verdict upon that new trial will be in the same situation as the present is. [465] If this house were to reverse the Lord Chancellor's order, and to say there should be no new trial, and the cause were to proceed, and the Lord Chancellor were to make a decree in consequence of that verdict, that decree would be the subject of an appeal here, and then we should say that upon this state of the record no such decree could be made.

14th June. Lord Redesdale: It appeared in the evidence in this cause that several instruments were executed by Lord Trimlestown for testamentary purposes, and a Bill was filed by the Countess D'Alton, for the purpose of having that which was the last instrument alleged to have been executed by the late Lord Trimlestown, carried into effect in respect to her interests. In the course of the proceedings, before the case had come to that stage in which the Court had to pronounce a decree upon the subject, an order was made for the purpose of directing an issue to try the validity of the instrument thus alleged to have been the will of Lord Trimlestown. That was not a decretal order, but an interlocutory order, made in consequence of some application to the Court. There was also an application for the purpose of having a receiver appointed of the estates during the pendency of the suit.

The order was of rather an extraordinary nature. The plaintiffs in this cause in the Court of Chancery, were the Count and Countess D'Alton. The Defendants were Lord Trimlestown and Mr. Lloyd and Lady Trimlestown his wife, and the children of the Countess D'Alton. The issue directed was—not an issue in which the Count and Countess D'Alton were Plaintiffs, but an issue in which the Dowager Lady Trimlestown was to be Plaintiff, and the Count and Countess [466] D'Alton were to be at liberty to appear and defend their rights. Upon this issue, which ought never to have been directed in such form, it appears to me to be impossible to come at the justice of the case, considering what appeared upon the trial of the issue so directed.

Upon the trial of that issue, several instruments were produced in evidence, which had been executed by Lord Trimlestown, from time to time, as testamentary instruments. The last instrument, that with reference to which the issue was directed, was impeached because it was an instrument executed under the improper influence of Lady Trimlestown, the wife of the late Lord Trimlestown, over her husband, in consequence of which it was said to be her will and not his will. That was the great point in discussion in the case. For the purpose of establishing that fact, a great deal of evidence was entered into, evidence applicable perhaps to an issue in which Lady Trimlestown was the Plaintiff, but if in this issue the D'Alton's had been Plaintiffs, it might have been exceedingly doubtful whether much of that evidence could have been given. Several instruments were given in evidence which had been executed by Lord Trimlestown, all of which made considerable provision for his daughter the Countess D'Alton, and the great objection to the last instrument was the increase of provision for Lady Trimlestown, far beyond the original intention of Lord Trimlestown, expressed in the first will which he had executed.

The result was, that upon the trial of this issue a verdict was given against the Plaintiffs. An application was then made to the Court of Chancery for a new trial: the Lord Chancellor of Ireland directed a new trial: and the cause came by appeal from that order of the Court to this House, but [467] without the information which was necessary to enable this House to form a judgment upon the subject: because there was not a sufficient report from the Judges of what had passed upon the trial. The cause was remitted therefore to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, for the purpose of obtaining the report of the Judges. The report of the Judges then came before the Court of Chancery: there had been three Judges at the trial at bar in the Court of Common Pleas; one had died in the interim; the other two, Lord Norbury and Mr. Justice Moore, stated what had been tendered in evidence, and it appeared that the opinions of the two learned Judges differed. Lord Norbury was of opinion that the verdict was not warranted by the evidence: Mr. Justice Moore was of opinion that the verdict was warranted by the evidence. Under these circumstances the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, after hearing counsel at considerable length, ordered a new trial to be had in the Court of King's Bench. This order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland became the subject of appeal to this House, Lord Trimblestown insisting that a new trial ought not to have been granted.

When the case came to be discussed before your Lordships, it appeared that it was impossible, whatever should be done upon the verdict upon that issue, to decide the cause. How could you, or how could the Court of Chancery below, make a proper decree with respect to the late Lord Trimblestown's property, upon an issue directed, in which the whole of the case, as it affected all the persons claiming under that will, was to be operated upon, by evidence which, though it might be admissible against the Dowager Lady Trimblestown, could not possibly affect the other parties. In this view of the case, when it came before [468] the House, and was heard by the learned Lord who then sat upon the Woolsack and those who attended, it appeared absolutely necessary to consider in what manner the cause should be put into such a shape, as that something effectual could be done. In the first place, this being an interlocutory order, if the verdict had been in favor of the Plaintiff, no decree could have been pronounced upon it. Upon the return of the verdict there must have been further proceedings in the cause, and all proper parties must have been brought before the Court, who did not appear to have been brought before the Court in the cause as it stood.

There were at the same time depending two other causes, one in which Lady Trimblestown and her husband were Plaintiffs, and the other in which Lord Trimblestown was the Plaintiff, and some of the orders respecting the trial of the issues, and the evidence which had been offered had been made in one of the causes and some in others of the causes; the consequence of which was, that there was what I do not know how to express by any word so appropriate as the word jumble. There was a jumble of the three causes, which made it extremely difficult to say how, in an appeal in one cause, you could take into consideration the effect of the trial of an issue, where part of the proceedings, and particularly with respect to the admission of some particular evidence, was had in those three causes. Upon the whole, therefore, it appeared to the noble Lord who then presided and myself, that there was no use whatever in proceeding in the cause as it then stood; that all which had been done might be considered almost as expence thrown away, and that it was necessary that the cause should be put in such a state, as that finally the Court of [469] Chancery in Ireland might be able to pronounce an effectual judgment, which judgment should embrace the rights of all the parties claiming under the will of Lord Trimblestown.

It appears that Lord Trimblestown had made great provisions for different purposes. By this instrument, and I believe by every one of them, he had entailed the interest in what I should call the Trimblestown Estate, upon his son and upon his issue male in strict settlement, and he had entailed it upon the D'Alton's in remainder: he had made a different disposition with respect to another estate, the Barnewall Estate, to which he succeeded as the heir of Lord Barnewall. He had limited that estate with a view to its going (failing the descendants from himself) over to the Barnewall family, so that he had in view, unquestionably, in those different instruments a variety of objects besides Lady Trimblestown.

It was endeavoured upon the trial of the issues to connect, in some degree, the Countess D'Alton with Lady Trimblestown, and some of the evidence, which affected the Dowager Lady Trimlestown, affected also the Countess D'Alton. The evidence, however, on that subject was extremely slight: the Countess D'Alton had been unfortunate in her marriage, and had been therefore in a state of distress, and was living with her father, or dependent upon him, and she, in a letter which she had written to Lady Trimlestown, expresses her obligation to Lady Trimlestown for her kind interference, in respect of the disposition Lord Trimlestown had made in her favor and that of her children. But whatever effect that might have against the Countess D'Alton, it had none against her children.

It appears to me absolutely necessary that the [470] cause should be put into some other course, so as to present the questions which arise upon the several instruments offered in evidence upon the trial of the issue, (which are very different wills and instructions for and drafts of wills and codicils, and so offered in evidence on the trial of this issue, for the purpose principally of shewing the progress of the influence of the Dowager Lady Trimlestown on the mind of her husband,) and to bring all those properly within the view of the Court. For supposing the last will to have been made under the influence of Lady Trimlestown, so as to affect it with reference to the large provisions made for her by that will, that could not possibly affect the dispositions made in favor of the rest of the family, so that the Jury, if they had conceived that that influence had been carried to an improper length, ought not to have found against the whole of the will. If, on the contrary, it appeared to them that the whole of that will had been improperly obtained, it then became another question whether the prior will was not to be considered as the disposition of Lord Trimlestown, that prior will appearing to have been regularly executed with a considerable degree of deliberation with respect to the dispositions contained in it. If that could be affected, still there was a prior instrument, and it was a question important for consideration, whether the whole were affected in the way in which it is conceived that the will last in point of date was affected by the supposed influence of Lady Trimlestown, and the intention of the former instrument would be considered as involved in the same fate: at least it was a matter to be left to the Jury. It was clear therefore to us, that the trial which had been had could not possibly be satisfactory, and that the verdict which [471] had been given was not one, if it was to stand, on which the Court could take any proceeding in the cause, for it was upon an interlocutory order, it did not preclude the parties from amending the Bill, and the whole was thrown into a state of confusion. As it appeared to us, therefore, there could be no end in directing a new trial upon this issue, as had been done by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, or proceeding in any manner on the order made for that purpose.

Under these circumstances, I should propose an order referring the whole back again to the reconsideration of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, so that the whole case may be properly brought before that Court for its decision. It may be questionable whether the proper way of bringing the whole case before the Court for its decision, would not be by proceeding in the three causes, and bringing all the three causes together to be heard before the Court of Chancery, in one of which Lady Trimlestown is Plaintiff, in another Lord Trimlestown is Plaintiff, and in the one before your Lordships the D'Alton's are Plaintiffs. Those three causes might be brought on perhaps together, and upon those three causes being so united, such directions might be given as might try competently the rights of all the parties. Upon that point, however, it is not in your Lordships' power to give any direction—you can only make an order in the cause which is before you. I propose, therefore, to make an order, stating the opinion of the House with respect to the impossibility of doing complete justice in the appeal which is now before you: that you are of opinion that this cause ought to be referred back to the Court of Chancery for further consideration, in as much as it appears to your Lordships that having regard to all the [472] circumstances to be collected from the several matters appearing in the Judges' report to have been offered in evidence on the trial of the issue directed by the order, the merits of the whole case, as affecting the rights of the parties in this cause, and of other persons interested in the estates of the late Lord Trimlestown, as claiming under or against the several instruments given in evidence in the cause, cannot be properly tried under such issue, and that therefore it is not fit that any farther proceedings should be had under the order directing that issue, and that the parties interested should be at liberty to proceed as they may be advised, for the purpose of bringing before the Court of Chancery the question whether by all or by any one, and which of the said instruments alleged to have been executed by Lord Trimlestown, as testamentary instruments, or any and what part and parts thereof respectively, Lord Trimlestown did devise and convey all or what part or parts of his real estates, and in what manner and in and by what words, (my view in proposing that direction is that the Jury may find specially, if they shall think that a part of the instrument ought to be rejected and a part retained, and in that case that they may find what words in the will are the words which they ought to substantiate,) and that a proper issue or issues be directed by the Court, in such manner as to the Court may seem right, and in which all proper persons may be made parties.

It appears to me most extraordinary, that in an issue to try whether the Count and Countess D'Alton and their children had any interest in the estates of Lord Trimlestown, the deviser, Lady Trimlestown, whose conduct was the subject of animadversion, should be made the Plaintiff; and therefore, I [473] conceive that if the Court should finally direct issues upon the subject, it might be material to consider whether one or more issues should be directed, and also who should be the parties in those issues, so that a proper decision may be finally had upon which the Court may determine; so that upon the verdict or verdicts that may be found upon the trial of those issues, the Court may be enabled to pronounce a decree respecting the right of the parties in this cause consistently with their rights, and with the rights of all other parties claiming interests in the real estates of the late Lord Trimlestown. When a Court of Equity pronounces a decree carrying into execution the trusts in a testamentary instrument, it is necessary that it should be applied to the rights of every person interested.—Upon this issue you cannot apply it to the rights of every individual, there being several persons not named. For instance, if the rights of the Count and Countess D'Alton are to be supported, they are to be supported against the interest of the remainder man, whose estate will be charged for their benefit. If the instruments are to be considered as sustaining the rights of Lady Trimlestown, her rights will overrun, to a certain degree, the rights of the Count and Countess D'Alton and their issue as well as those of Lord Trimlestown. For such purpose it appears to me that you should declare your opinion that the Plaintiffs in the cause should be at liberty to amend their bill in such manner as they may be advised, so that they make their bill what it ought to have been originally, bringing before the Court all parties interested in the cause; particularly there are certain trustees who are not brought before the Court, whom it may be absolutely necessary to bring before the Court; and that [474] you should order this cause to be referred back to the Court below for further consideration, the Court having regard to the several matters before expressed, and the further progress of this cause, in a manner which may be just and right. Having prepared three or four forms in which I thought the cause might be disposed of, I have at last, with the concurrence of the noble and learned Lord who presided at the hearing of the cause, conceived this shorter form would best answer the purpose of justice and leave the Court below at the greatest liberty, referring the whole back to their reconsideration, and suggesting at the same time why it was so referred back for their consideration, pointing out to them, as far as it is proper to point out to them, the difficulties which prevented your making any decision, except that of referring back to them the question, upon the appeal now brought before your Lordships.

It is lamentable that so much expence should be incurred in this cause— it is unfortunate that so little success should attend the efforts of parties to cut short a cause. But the farthest way about is often the nearest way home, and I think that this cause is a strong proof of the truth of that saying and of the importance of regularity in judicial proceedings, particularly in bringing all parties before the Court, and not attempting to save expence to parties by dispensing with that which is the proper and regular mode of proceeding. I believe it will be found that it would save considerable expence to the parties to follow the ordinary rules. Where the parties are disposed to abide by the event of a trial upon a simple question of fact, and whatever the decision upon that question may be, to abstain from further litigation, they being the only parties interested, their [475] object may in that mode be effected, but when a whole family are to be affected by the decree of the Court, as it must be in this case if the decree is carried into effect, the consequence is, that the Court must give directions to carry into execution all the trusts of the will, which shall be finally established as the will of Lord Trimlestown. In such a case, I believe no advantage is ever gained by attempting to take the shorter course instead of the longer one. I beg to move your Lordships that that which I have stated from this paper be the judgment of your Lordships.

The Earl of Eldon: I am most decidedly of opinion, that no verdict whatever that can be given upon the issue which was directed in this cause, can enable the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to give any such judgment in these causes as ought to be given. The consequence of that is, that we are placed in this situation, that if we either direct a new trial, or refuse to grant a new trial and leave the old verdict in subsistence, it is equally without avail. If we grant a new trial, we are granting that for a reason which, in my opinion, can operate nothing more than to create a vast additional expence, which can be of no use. The only thing, therefore, that the House can now do that can be useful, is to intimate to the Court why we think that this new trial, if it ought to be granted, should be in a form in which it can avail the parties, and upon that subject I will take the liberty of saying, that supposing the trial to have been properly directed, it appears to me that a great deal of evidence was admitted, the admissibility of which I cannot help considerably doubting, or rather going the length of denying. I am further of opinion, that a point was totally missed upon that trial, which I take to be extremely important, [476] which is, that if there was a part of that will which, on account of undue influence, ought not to be considered as the testamentary instrument of the testator, it does not therefore follow that the whole of that will was to be condemned. We have a case * of that kind which was before Mr. Justice Buller, at the Assizes at Winchester, where the Jury found, that the residuary devise of the estate was good for nothing, on account of the conduct of the party who prepared the will, but the Jury found that all the rest was good; and a great part of this very will, even if one part is affected, on the ground of influence, may be confirmed, and may be as validly testamentary as any will that was ever made. So in the case * of Mr. Barnard of South Cave, the Jury determined that that which was presented to them contained the will of the testator, holding at the same time, however, that a considerable part of that which appeared upon the face of the will, was not any part of the will of the testator: and that points out the utility of the direction contained in this paper, that the Jury shall find in what words the testator devised: but, whatever may be found in an issue directed merely in this one cause, it is impossible that that verdict can regulate the rights of the parties in such a way, as that the Court of Chancery can give a proper direction in all these causes. The consequence of that is, that the Court must take into its reconsideration whether all the causes ought not to be heard together, and whether there ought not to be some amendment before the causes are heard together, so as to introduce all the points, which the Jury [477] ought finally to determine: and I conclude with saying, though it is only a repetition, that if a new trial were granted upon this issue, let the result of that trial be what it may, if the proceedings in the Court of Chancery in Ireland are like our proceedings in the Court of Chancery in England, they may travel through a first trial and through a second trial, and the verdict which may be so obtained will be utterly ineffectual for the purpose for which it is required.

(14th June, 1827.) Ordered and adjudged, that the cause be referred back to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, for further consideration thereof: inasmuch as it appears to this House, that, having regard to all the circumstances to be collected from the several matters appearing from the Judges' report to have been offered in evidence on trial of the issue directed by the said order of the 18th day of June, 1817, the merits of the whole case, as affecting the rights of the Appellant in this cause, and of all other persons interested, in the real estates of Nicholas Lord Trimlestown, deceased, and claiming under or against the several instruments produced in evidence on the said trial, cannot be properly tried on such issue, and that therefore it is not fit that any further proceedings should be had under the said order of the 24th day of May, 1824, complained of in the said appeal: but that the parties interested should be at liberty to proceed as they should be advised for the purpose of bringing before the said Court of Chancery the question, whether by all or any and which of the several instruments alleged to have been executed by the said Nicholas Lord Trimlestown, deceased, as testamentary instruments, or by any and what parts or part thereof respectively, the said Nicholas Lord Trimlestown, deceased, did devise all or any and what parts or part of his real estates, and in what manner and by what words, and that a proper issue or issues may be directed by the said Court in such manner as may be necessary, and in which all proper persons may be made parties, so that upon the verdict or verdicts which may be given on the trial of such issue or issues, the said Court may be enabled to pronounce a decree respecting the rights of the Appellant in this cause, consistent with his rights and with the rights of all other persons claiming [478] interests in the real estates of the said Nicholas Lord Trimlestown: And this House is of opinion, that the rights of the Plaintiffs in this cause cannot be properly determined, on the pleadings in this cause, as the same now stand: And it is further ordered, that this cause be referred back to the said Court of Chancery for the further consideration of the said Court, to the end that the said Court, having regard to the several matters hereinbefore expressed, may further proceed in the said cause in such manner as shall be just.

G. H., by a testamentary paper in the form of a regular will, naming executors and bequeathing the residue, bequeaths "to his wife £500 sterling per annum for her life, to be placed in and payable out of the long annuities, to stand in her name and etc., (Trustees) and at her decease, to my father T. H. for life, remainder to my cousin R. H., son of my uncle, absolutely," etc. By a second testamentary paper, dated four months after the first, and beginning in the regular form of a will, but not naming executors, nor bequeathing the residue, the testator gives "to his wife so much money as will purchase £500 sterling per annum, in the long annuities granted by government, the income thereof to be received by her during her life for her own use, and at her death, to my child or children for their own use and benefit equally: in default of issue, then to my father T. H. for his life, and at his death to go to my cousin R. H. absolutely," the principal to be in the name of etc. (wife and trustees).

Each of the testamentary papers contained a great number of legacies, and in a large majority of the bequests they were precisely in similar terms. In the case of two of the legacies given by the second will, the testator expresses that they are to be "in lieu of any other annuity he may have granted" to those legatees. This precaution is omitted in the case of the legacy to the wife with remainder, etc. The two papers were proved in the Ecclesiastical Court as one will.

Held in the Court below without doubt, that the second legacy was a substitution for the first. Held on appeal, that it was a case of great doubt and difficulty, but the judgment was affirmed.

The question in this appeal arose upon the construction to be put upon two paper writings, dated respectively the 28th of May, 1780, and the 26th of August, [480] 1780,—the former marked as an exhibit in the Ecclesiastical Court with the letter F, and the latter marked as an exhibit in the Ecclesiastical Court with the letter G,—of which as constituting the last will and testament of George Heming, Probate was granted by the Prerogative Court to Thomas Ludbey and James Gurry.

These paper writings were in the words and figures, and written with the inter-lineations, and in the manner following:—

“ F ”

“ In the Name of God Amen ”

“ I George Heming of Bond Street in the City of Westminster Goldsmith being of perfect mind and memory make this my last Will and Testament.”

“ Imprimis I bequeath to my dear & faithful Wife Ann Heming Five hundred pounds sterling l. annuum for her life to be placed in and payable out of the Long Annuities And to stand in her Name and in the Names of my dear Father Thomas Heming my valued friend Thomas Ludbey & my worthy Kinsman James Gurry In trust for the use of my Wife for her life payable half yearly & at her decease to my Father Thomas Heming for his life remainder to my Cousin Richard Heming Son of my Uncle George Heming & absolutely for his use upon his attaining twenty five years of age if the forenamed Parties are dead, till that time in the same Trusts the parties interested to chuse a new Trustee upon the death of either taking place ”

“ To Eleanor Gurry Wife of the aforesaid James Gurry I bequeath Fifty pounds sterling l. annuum for her life out of the Long Annuities and in the same Trusts as above remainder of the term after her death to the Children of Eleanor Gurry by James [481] Gurry share and share alike upon their becoming of age each Child to have their respective share transfer'd to them but the foregoing devise is not to take place except James and Eleanor Gurry do assign their share in an Estate called the Barrow to John Weaver and his Wife as is after directed in the fullest manner in their power ”

“ To Jane Gilley and Benetta Gilley I do bequeath Fifty pounds l. Annum to each of them for life in the same Trusts as aforesaid, but in both instances the name of the parties intended to be benefitted to stand in the Bank Books with the Trustees and in case of the death of either Jane or Benetta the deceased Interest for the remainder of the term to go to my Wife absolutely and at her disposal but in case of her death previous then to Thomas or Richard Heming as before.”

“ To Catherine Gilley Two hundred and fifty pounds sterling provided she assign all her Interest in the Barrow to John Weaver & Wife And I recommend her to place it in the Long Annuities for her Life & convey it to her Children if any as she may be married for aught I know & if so I hope happily believing her deserving.”

“ To John & Mary Weaver I bequeath the share of James Gurry & Wife Catherine Gilley & the 2 shares I bought of Jane & Benetta Gilley And I request my wife will assign her Share in the Barrow Estate absolutely to John & Mary Weaver for their joint lives & at their decease to their Children equally But I recommend them to sell the Estate But if so they must place the Money in the trusts aforesaid, for the use of their Children at their death & when of age or forfeit this Bequest.”

“ To my Wives 5 Sisters Fifty pounds each over & [482] above all the foregoing bequests they giving up all papers they may hold respecting payment of Money especially Jane & Benetta.”

“ To my dear Wife my Estate at Edgeware absolutely as she seemed fond of it But request she never Builds there to make a Residence knowing altho' she likes it now it would not be suitable for to reside at—if she does not part with it I recommend it to be left by her to Richard Heming.”

“ I leave to Felix Vaughan Son of Samuel Vaughan Five hundred pounds in the same trust till of age then absolutely hoping he will be advised by my Trustees.”

“ I leave to Thomas Laver as some return for his Fathers faithful services Five hundred pounds in the same manner as I have done above to Felix Vaughan.”

“ To my respected friend Alexr. Baxter Esqre. a piece of Plate of One hundred Guineas value if he be alive at my decease.”

“ To Mary Mapletoft and Beatrix Peirce each one hundred Guineas for their sole use & benefit.”

" Geo: Heming."

[486] The testator died in April, 1801, without leaving any children. His father, Thomas Heming, had died in his life-time.

Thomas Ludbey and James Gurry, in February 1809, with the privity of the Appellant, out of the personal estate and effects of the testator, purchased and caused to be transferred into their names and the name of Ann Heming, the testator's widow, in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, one sum of five hundred pounds per annum, long annuities, in satisfaction of the bequest contained in the testamentary papers, constituting the will of the testator.

Ann Heming died in June, 1818, and the Appellant then set up a claim to have a second sum of five hundred pounds per annum, long annuities, purchased for his benefit: and Thomas Ludbey and James Gurry declining to purchase the same, the Appellant filed his bill in the High Court of Chancery against James Gurry (Thomas Ludbey having died in the mean time) and against Thomas Clutterbuck and Edward Evans, the executors of Ann Heming, which suit upon the death of James Gurry was revived against Thomas Clutterbuck, his executor. Amongst other things, the bill, stating the facts, prayed a declaration, that the Appellant was entitled to two legacies of five hundred pounds per annum long annuities under the testamentary papers, and that the Defendants might be decreed, out of the proceeds of the testator's personal estate and effects, to purchase for the benefit of the Appellant the sum of five hundred pounds per annum, long annuities, in addition to that sum of like annuities, already purchased and invested.

The cause was heard before the Vice Chancellor, [487] on the 5th of May 1825, who dismissed so much of the Appellant's bill as sought that the Appellant might be declared entitled to two legacies of five hundred pounds per annum, long annuities. (See the report in the Court below, 2 Sim. and Stu. 310.)

Against this part of the decree the appeal was presented.

For the Appellants, Mr. Hart and Mr. Perkins.

This is a question whether one or two legacies are given by the testamentary instruments, which must depend upon the construction of the instrument. The doctrine and rule is taken from the civil law, but it has been qualified and distinguished by circumstances shewing intention, etc., and otherwise, until the rule itself is nearly extinguished. The intention is to be looked at through the medium of former decisions on the subject. The doctrine applicable to the question was settled by the case of Nooley v. Hatton (1 B. C. C. 390, n.), in which a rule is laid down to be applied to future cases. The judgment below was founded on the supposition that this was not an additional annuity, but a substitution. This was said to appear from the similarity of the two gifts.

If it be a substitution, then nothing could in any event be taken under the former gift. If the testator had a child, the legatee could take nothing under the second instrument, and the second being supposed to be a substitution for the first, he could take nothing in that event under either of the instruments. From the general repetition of the bequests in the second instrument, it was inferred by the Vice Chancellor that all the legacies were intended to be repeated. But the legacies to Jane and Benetta Gilley are in the second instrument given expressly in lieu of other annuities. This caution being omitted [488] as to other legacies, affords an inference that they were intended to be double. There are also other alterations: the legacies in the second instrument are offered, not as pure bounties, but on terms of purchase, indicating a great alteration of intention. Some are augmented, some diminished. It appears from the differences in the bequests, that his intention was fluctuating. In the second instrument there is no residuary bequest.

The Lord Chancellor: And no executors.

Mr. Hart: It was probably from these differences that Sir William Wynne thought the two instruments must stand together as one testamentary document. His opinion was—that the first document being a will was not revoked by a paper not naming executors nor bequeathing the residue: that paper he treats as a codicil. Where the same sum is given twice in the same instrument, the proof lies on the legatee to shew the intention to give a double legacy; where similar legacies are given by different instruments, it lies on those who claim against the legatee to prove the want of intention on the part of the testator. So the rule is stated by Swinburne from the civil law. In the case of the Duke of St. Albans v. Beaucherk (2 Atk. 636), the reporter has misconceived the intention of Lord Hardwicke, as to the doctrine which is to govern future Judges. The error has been set right in Hooley v. Hatton. In all the former cases it was admitted as the general rule, that where the same or different legacies were given in different instruments, they were held to be cumulative. In that case it might have been argued that the legacy of £1000 comprehended the two former legacies.

The supposed dictum of Lord Hardwicke, that one only shall be taken, is contradicted by the authorities [489] cited by himself. The rule is, that where less is given by the second than by the first instrument, the legatee shall take both. That rule applies to this case: because the legacy in the second instrument, being qualified and subject to contingency, is less beneficial than the first. The case of Hooley v. Hatton was relied on by Lord Kenyon, in Foy v. Foy (1 Cox 164, 392). In Ridges v. Morrison (in the notes, 1 B. C. C. 390), the judgment of Lord Kenyon is cited. In Hedges v. Peacock (3 Ves. 375), Lord Alvanley decided that a legacy was double, because the first was more beneficial, and argued that the testator ought to have explained that he intended to take it away, as he did in the case of another bequest. So it is here: the first legacy is more beneficial, and he does not declare the second to be a substitution, as he does with respect to other legacies. Lord Alvanley lays down the rule, that a contingent legacy by a second instrument cannot be held a substitution for an absolute legacy by a former instrument, unless it is so declared. The judgment, as it stands, must proceed on contingencies: if there should be a child, the first instrument must prevail. If no child, the second. Another principle applied in the judgment is, that from the identity of the other bequests it is to be inferred, that the same rule is intended to be applied to the legacies in question. But Sir W. Grant, M.R., was of opinion, that each legacy must be judged by itself. Benyon v. Benyon (17 Ves. 41). In Ridges v. Morrison, etc., Lord Thurlow departs from the principle of Hooley v. Hatton, which he professes to adopt. All the cases but one adopt the rule, that where legacies are different in amount, or given by different instruments, they are [490] cumulative. Inferences drawn from one class of legacies, are not to be applied to another class.

For the Respondents, Mr. Heald and Mr. Boteler. They relied chiefly on the argument drawn from internal evidence, appearing by the similarity of the great majority of the bequests in the two instruments. The authorities cited were, Cootte v. Boyd (2 B. C. C. 521), and the Duke of St. Albans v. Beaucherk (2 Atk. 636).

The Lord Chancellor: Before this case is disposed of, it will be necessary to look into the authorities which have been referred to. The question whether it be one of difficulty or otherwise, comes before the House without the assistance of full discussion upon argument in the Court below. The first duty of a Court of Justice, is to satisfy all parties that their case has been most fully heard, and the example of that practice should be set by this, the highest Court of Judicature in the Kingdom. This precept I have received from two of my predecessors: and by one of them, I was informed that he frequently derived the greatest benefit from the argument of the Counsel, who supported that view of the case, which upon the first impression he had himself taken, because he sometimes found that less was to be said on that side of the question than he supposed, and in consequence of the argument changed his opinion. The House has now been occupied six hours in hearing a case, which was dispatched in one hour in the Court below. That will always be the case where the question is not fully argued in the court of original jurisdiction.

We are bound to consider the two instruments as the will of the testator. I do not think the first impression upon the mind of any man, upon looking [491] at these two papers, would be that they make one will. A question of law is not, however, to be decided by the impression upon the mind of any individual, but by the rules of law: and Sir W. Wynne has decided by his judgment,* that these two papers are not to be considered as two wills, but as one will. The difficulty remains upon the construction of the contents of those instruments. I must look at the cases cited, and some which have not been mentioned, and which it is necessary to consider before judgment is given.

The Earl of Eldon (18th June, 1827): The question in this cause was—whether a party, Ann Heming, was entitled to two legacies of £500, long annuities, or only to one. This question arose on two testamentary papers, or rather I should say, on what was proved as the will of the testator in the Ecclesiastical Court: it consisted of two instruments, which we must consider as constituting together the will, although it is very [492] difficult, at least to my mind, to conceive how it should happen, that both those instruments should have been proved as part of the same will.

The first instrument professes, on the face of it, to be a very regularly formed will. The second instrument does not profess to be a codicil. It begins, "In the name of God Amen. I George Heming of Bond-street Goldsmith being of sound mind do make and ordain this to be my last Will and Testament." These two, however, each being in the form of a will, have been held in the Ecclesiastical Court to be one testament, and of course we are bound to consider them as such. The question in the cause is—whether a bequest of £500 per annum for life, in the first instrument, and a bequest of as much as would purchase £500 per annum in the long annuities, given by the second instrument, are both of them intended to apply to the same sum: in other words, whether these are cumulative, or whether the one is to be considered a substitute for the other.

The general principles upon which cases of this kind are to be decided, are so accurately laid down in the case of Hooley v. Hatton (in a note to Ridges v. Morrison, 1 B. C. C. 390), that it is unnecessary for me to trouble your Lordships further than by stating it. The rules of the Court of Chancery, and the rules of the civil law upon the subject, are there discussed by the late Mr. Justice Aston, and afterwards applied by the Lord Chancellor. There is this difference, however, that here the second instrument purports upon the face of it to be a will. There has been much reasoning upon the circumstance, that in that case the subsequent instrument appeared to be a codicil. On looking [493] into all the cases, which I have done, I cannot agree with the learned Judge † who decided this case, that [494] it was a very clear case,—on the contrary, it appears to me to be a very difficult one, though I concur in [495] the judgment he has given. Those cases to which the general rule of law is made to apply, are those in which there is no internal evidence in the will itself what is the intent. In all those cases in which there is internal evidence, it has been admitted to be of great weight: and the question, then, is this—[496] whether you can look merely at the different parts of both instruments which give the particular legacy, out of which the question arises, or whether you can look at that which in this case is, in my opinion, of great importance—whether you can look at the two instruments, with a view to the whole contents of each of them, in order to see whether the testator, in the case so put, did or did not mean to give not only to A, B, C, and D, and all the letters in the alphabet, but to be giving to them more than once. My opinion of the case is this, that taking the whole of those instruments together, although there is some difference between the nature of the of the argument at the bar. The report of the judgment on this point being very short in the reports of Messrs. Simon and Stuart, a full note of the judgment is here subjoined—from the Notes of the Short-hand writer.

* Extract from the Judgment of Sir W. Wynne: "Now there is nothing here to revoke paper F., which appoints executors and a residuary legatee. I take it to be quite clear that, supposing these two papers to be left in the same manner, this would not have been a revocation of the paper F. It is particularly laid down by Swinburne, in his seventh part, first section, page 527:—The former testament is not revoked, where in the latter will there be no executor named, for then the latter act is a codicil or addition to the former testament." Now in this case I think it would be so. It appears to have been a paper written probably in order to supply some defect in the former, for he was a person very much given to writing and copying papers. I think there is no reason to suppose that when he wrote paper G., he intended to revoke paper F., at least considering the way in which they are both left: and therefore I think these two papers, if they are of any validity, are to be taken together."

† The Vice Chancellor; whose judgment on this point was delivered in the course

The Vice Chancellor: “This case does not in any manner turn upon the principles stated in the case of Hurst and Beach (5 Mad. 350). Those are principles which apply to a case in which the particular legacies are not in both instruments, and where there is no question whether the two instruments were intended either wholly or substantially as a substitution for each other. This case turns entirely upon the principle which has been referred to in the case of the Duke of St. Albans and Beaucherk, and which was afterwards stated in a case which I have now before me, of the Attorney General and Harvey (4 Mad. 263), and which occurred again before me in the case of the will of General Rollo Gillespie. The question here is—whether the second instrument is not substantially a substitution for the first. Now substitution may be either total, or it may be partial. Total substitution is revocation,—partial substitution is to the extent of the exception, which is partially withdrawn from the operation of the second instrument; and in the case of General Gillespie's will, I considered it a partial substitution, as there the residuary estate was withdrawn from the operation of the second instrument, and confined to the first instrument. Now here it is quite plain that the second instrument is not a total substitution for the first. It is not a revocation, for there is no appointment of executors. The appointment of executors depends upon the first instrument, and probate has been also granted of that instrument. To what extent this may be a substitution, it is not necessary for me now to state. I am inclined to think that it might be contended, that this is a substitution in all respects, except as it regards the appointment of executors, and the gift of the residuary estate. I am not quite sure whether, when that came to be discussed, that would ultimately be the opinion of the Court, as the only question before me is—whether it is a substitution in respect to the annuity of £500.

“It is not necessary for me to say more than that I am clearly of opinion that the instrument marked G., is a substitution for the instrument marked F. I believe it to be impossible that any body could read those instruments and come to a different conclusion. I believe it quite impossible that any rational mind that is applied to the subject, can by possibility come to a different conclusion. The original paper F. begins in this way: ‘In the name of God amen;’ and the second, paper G., precisely in the same way, ‘In the name of God amen.’ The original paper F. proceeds thus: ‘I George Heming of Bond Street in the City of Westminster Goldsmith of perfect mind and memory make this my last will and testament.’ The second, paper G., proceeds thus: ‘I George Heming of Bond Street Goldsmith being of sound mind and memory do make and ordain this to be my last will and testament.’ Then the first instrument proceeds thus: ‘Imprimis I bequeath to my dear and faithful wife Ann Heming £500 sterling per annum for her life to be placed in and payable out of the long annuities.’ The second instrument proceeds thus: ‘Imprimis I give and bequeath to my dear wife Ann Heming formerly Ann Calley so much money as will purchase £500 sterling per annum in the long annuities.’ There is no difference whatever therefore thus far, and there is no variation whatever, except in the form of the expression, for there is none at all in substance. The trusts that are expressed relative to the £500 long annuities, in the first will, and the £500 long annuities in that which really I should have thought was a second will, if there had not been a decision of the Ecclesiastical Court, finding them to be one:—that looking at the whole of what the testator has done with regard to every other legatee named in the first will, and in the second will, this is not a case in which you would be fairly justified in saying there is internal evidence which ought to satisfy you that the testator meant these to be cumulative. I conceive one legacy only was intended, and upon that ground, again professing this to be, in my judgment, a most doubtful and difficult case, I am of opinion that the Vice Chancellor's judgment is right, and that therefore your Lordships ought to affirm it: I would move that it be affirmed without costs.

Judgment affirmed without costs.—18 June, 1827.

second instrument proceeds thus: 'and the income to be received by the said Ann Heming during her life for her own use and benefit and at her death to my child or children for their own use and benefit equally.' Here he introduces what he does not introduce in the first instrument, namely, a gift of the £500 to his child or children, if he should happen to have any children. He had no children either at the time of the making the first instrument, or at the time of making the second instrument. At the time when he made the first instrument, it appears he considered there was not the least probability he should have any children: throughout the whole of that instrument there is no provision for children: but on making the second instrument he does not seem to adhere to the same notion of probability, and he uses this exception, in order that if such an unexpected event should take place, there should be a provision for those children, and with that exception the gifts are precisely the same. He then proceeds in this way in the first will: 'To Eleanor Gurry wife of the aforesaid James Gurry I bequeath £50 sterling per annum for her life out of the long annuities and in the same trusts as above, remainder of the term after her death to the children of Eleanor Gurry by James Gurry share and share alike upon their becoming of age each child to have their respective share transferred to them but the foregoing devise is not to take place except James and Eleanor Gurry do assign their share in an estate called Barrow to John Weaver and his wife as is after directed in the fullest manner in their power.' This, therefore, is the gift of an annuity of £50 per annum to Eleanor Gurry, the wife of James Gurry, and after her death to the children of Eleanor Gurry by her husband James Gurry, provided she and her husband release such interest as they happen to have in a certain estate called the Barrow. Now in the second instrument we do not find that the order of the will is preserved: but there is in the second instrument a gift in the words I am now about to read: 'I bequeath to Eleanor Gurry wife of James Gurry £50 per annum in the long annuities for her life and at her death equally to the issue she may have by James Gurry in default of such issue then at her disposal.' There is not annexed to that gift the condition before stated, that she and her husband should release their interest in the Barrow estate, but that gift of £50 per annum is immediately preceded by a gift to Mr. and Mrs. Gurry, which are in these words: 'I bequeath to James and Eleanor Gurry in like manner £200 for their share in the Barrow estate.' In the first instrument he gives them £50 a-year provided they release their share in the Barrow estate: and in the second instrument he gives them £50 a-year without such a condition, and £200 for their share in the Barrow estate. Now, I need not follow this, as it goes through 14 or 15 bequests in a similar manner. I am of opinion that no one can look at this instrument, and say that, to the extent I have mentioned, this instrument is not to be considered a substitution for the first. Upon this point, therefore, you may give yourself no trouble Mr. Heald, and apply yourself merely to the question of the annuity of £180 a-year."

E. having by his will made a certain provision for his daughter, an only child—with whom he had been offended on account of a clandestine marriage—(but was reconciled to her and her husband), declares to a common friend his purpose to make a farther provision for his daughter. Being on his death bed, and unable to write, he is urged by that friend to make a gift to his daughter of certain monies secured by mortgage and bond, and expressly assents to that proposal. In the evening of the same day, being then unable to speak, he is reminded by the same friend of the transaction of the morning, and the deeds of mortgage and bond securing the monies, being produced, he is informed that it is necessary to confirm the gift by a delivery of the deeds; and the friend proposed with the father's permission, to hand over the deeds [498] to his daughter. Upon this proposal, the father made an inclination of his head, and the friend then handed the deeds across the bed where the father was lying, to the daughter on the opposite side; whereupon the father placed the hand of the daughter upon the deeds, and pressed it with his own hand for some minutes, and appeared satisfied with what he had done. The deeds in question consisted of, 1. A conveyance in fee of lands to secure £2927, with the usual covenant for payment of the money lent, and bond by way of collateral security. 2. An assignment of a mortgage debt of £30,000, and of a judgment for that sum recovered on a bond with a conveyance of the land, and the usual covenant for payment of the money.

Held that this was a valid donatio mortis causa; that the property in the deeds and the right to recover the money secured by them, passed by the delivery followed by the death of the donor, and that the real and personal representatives of the donor, were trustees for the donee, to make the gift effectual.

The original suit in this case was instituted in the Court of Chancery, by the Appellants Thomas Duffield, Esquire, and Emily Frances his wife, as Plaintiffs, with a view of obtaining the judgment of that Court upon several questions arising out of the various dispositions made by George Elwes, deceased, of different parts of his property, by way of settlement, gift and testamentary arrangement; and also for the purpose of placing the infant Defendants, the children of the Plaintiffs, under the protection of the Court.

The Appellant Emily Frances Duffield, was the only child and heir at law, and sole next of kin of George Elwes; she intermarried with the Appellant, Thomas Duffield, Esquire, in the year 1810. The children of that marriage were five; namely, the Respondent George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield, the only son of the Appellants, an infant of the age of eleven years; and four daughters, the Respond[499]-ents Caroline Duffield, Maria Duffield, Anna Duffield, and Susan Eliza Duffield, all infants, younger than their brother. George Elwes died in 1821, leaving the Respondent Amelia Maria Hicks, his widow, who, after the decree pronounced in the original cause, married the Respondent the Reverend William Hicks. The Respondent Abraham Henry Chambers was the surviving devisee in trust and executor named in the will of George Elwes; the other trustee named in the will having died in the testator's life. The Respondent William Hicks was named an executor by George Elwes in a codicil. The Respondents Robert Greenhill Russell, and George Spencer Smith were the trustees of the settlement made on the marriage of the Respondent William Hicks, and Amelia Maria his wife.

In the month of February, 1810, the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield, being then about the age of 18 years, intermarried with the Appellant Thomas Duffield, at Greta in Scotland, without the knowledge of her father, and on the 11th day of March, 1810, the Appellants were re-married in England. Shortly after this re-marriage, George Elwes and the Respondent Amelia Maria, then his wife, received the Appellants into their house, to reside with them as part of their family. George Elwes, at the time of making his will, and until his death, was seised in fee simple of divers freehold and copyhold estates, and was also possessed of a very considerable personal estate. By his will, dated the 1st March 1811, and duly executed and attested to pass freehold estates, after directing that all his debts and funeral expenses, and the expenses of proving his will, should be paid, as thereafter mentioned, and confirming a jointure of £100 per annum, and an annuity of £400 to his wife, the Re[500]-spondent Amelia Maria Hicks, he gave and bequeathed unto his dear daughter Amelia Maria Frances Duffield (meaning thereby his daughter the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield), the wife of Thomas Duffield, and her assigns, for her life, all that his leasehold messuage or dwelling-house, with the appurtenances, situate in High-street, Mary-le-bone, and he declared that the same should from and after her decease fall into the residue of his personal estate thereafter devised: And he gave and bequeathed unto his said daughter all his carriages, horses, household furniture and goods, plate, linen, china, stock of wines and other liquors, which should be in and about the said messuage or dwelling-house, or in or about any other house or houses in which he might dwell, or which he might inhabit at the time of his decease: And he gave and bequeathed unto his brother John Elwes, since deceased, and to the Respondent Abraham Henry Chambers, and their heirs, his freehold and copyhold farm and estate, in Suffolk, and also his freehold farm and estate in Essex, upon certain trusts therein expressed, for the benefit of the second or only son of the Appellants, or their daughters in failure of such son, with devises over: And the testator, after giving some legacies of stock and small annuities, and pecuniary legacies, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estates to the same trustees, upon trust to sell and convert into money all his real estates, mortgages, securities, etc., to hold the monies so produced in trust, among other things, to purchase so much 3 per cent. stock, as would yield £1000 per annum, and to pay the dividends to the Appellant his daughter, during her life, for her separate use: the principal at her death to fall into his personal [501] estate. The residue of the trust fund he disposed of, by special limitations, to the children of his daughter, and their children (if any); remainder to John Elwes.

By a codicil dated the 3d March, 1821, he declared the intent of a cancellation which he had made in that part of his will relating to the sale of his freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates: He devised his real estates to that son of his daughter, who should first attain 21; and appointed the Respondent, William Hicks, a trustee in the place of his brother deceased.

The testator, George Elwes, was entitled to the principal sum of £2927, and interest thereon due to him from Sir Edwin Bayntun Sandys, Baronet, secured by the bond of Sir Edwin Bayntun Sandys, executed by him to the testator, bearing date the 12th day of July, 1820, and further secured by indentures of lease and release and mortgage, bearing date respectively the 11th and 12th of July, 1820, whereby Sir Edwin Bayntun Sandys released and conveyed to the testator in fee simple, by way of mortgage, certain freehold estates. The deed also contained the usual covenant for repayment of the money lent. The testator, George Elwes, was also entitled to the principal sum of £30,000, and interest thereon due to him from Sir Edwin Bayntun Sandys, and secured by certain indentures of lease and release, and assignment of mortgage, bearing date respectively the 2d and 3d of November, 1820. The release recited a loan of £30,000 made by trustees under a marriage settlement to Sir Edwin Bayntun Sandys, a conveyance of lands therein described to secure the repayment, a bond executed for the same purpose, and a judgment recovered upon that bond. It [502] further recited that the mortgagee having called in the money due on the mortgage, George Elwes had advanced to the mortgagee £30,000, in consideration of which the mortgagee, etc., by direction of Sir Edwin Bayntun Sandys, assigned to George Elwes the £30,000 due on the mortgage and also the judgment, and conveyed the lands, etc. This deed also contained the usual covenant for payment of the money lent, on a day specified, with a power to sell the lands mortgaged on failure of payment.

George Elwes, shortly before his death, in conversations held with the Respondent William Hicks, frequently declared his purpose to make a further provision for his daughter. He was seized with the illness which ended in his death, on the 1st of September, 1821: on the morning of that day the Respondent, William Hicks, proposed to George Elwes to make a gift, mortis causa, to his daughter, of the monies secured by the two mortgages before mentioned, to which proposal, the nature of the gift having been explained to him by Hicks, George Elwes expressly assented. Of this proposal and assent a formal note was drawn up, and signed by Hicks and two other witnesses. In the evening of the same day, Mr. Hicks, having been informed that an actual delivery of the thing proposed to be given was necessary to the completion of the gift, caused the deeds of mortgage and the bond to be brought from the office of Mr. Law, the Solicitor of Mr. Elwes. These deeds were then, in the presence of the same witnesses, produced before the testator, and shewn to him, and he was informed by Hicks, that the same were the mortgage deeds and bond to secure the principal sums of £2927 and £30,000, and interest due to him from [503] Sir Edwin Bayntun Sandys, and he was reminded by Hicks of what had passed in the morning, and informed that the gift would be unavailing, unless he confirmed it by passing the deeds; and Hicks then proposed, with his permission, to hand over the deeds to his daughter, whereupon he signified his assent by an inclination of his head. The mortgage deeds and bond were then, in the presence and under the eye and observation of George Elwes, handed by Hicks across the bed in which the testator then lay, to the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield, and were received by the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield, in her hands; and as soon as she had received the mortgage deeds and bond in her hands, George Elwes immediately took hold of her hands, which then contained the deeds and bond, and with both his hands pressed together the hands so holding the deeds and bond, and shewed evident marks of satisfaction. During the whole of this transaction, George Elwes, according to the depositions in the cause and the judgment of the witnesses, although he was unable to write or speak, was in a state of mind competent to dispose of his property, and was aware of what he was doing, and that he was thereby making a gift to the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield, of the benefit of the bond and mortgages.

On the 2d of September, 1821, George Elwes died, leaving the Respondent Amelia Maria Hicks, then Amelia Maria Elwes, his widow, and the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield, his daughter and only child and heir-at-law, and heir according to the custom of the manors whereof his copyhold estates were holden, and also his sole next of kin.

The Appellants had, at the death of George Elwes, [504] five children, namely, the Respondent George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield, their only son, an infant, and four daughters, infants; namely, the Respondents, Caroline Duffield, Maria Duffield, Anna Duffield, and Susan Eliza Duffield.

After the death of George Elwes, the Respondent, Abraham Henry Chambers, one of the executors named in his will, and the Respondent William Hicks, appointed executor by the codicil, proved his will and codicil in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

On the 1st of October, 1821, the Appellants exhibited their original bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery, (which was afterwards amended,) against the Respondent Amelia Maria Hicks, by her then name and description of Amelia Maria

Elwes, widow, the Respondents Abraham Henry Chambers, William Hicks, George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield, Caroline Duffield, Maria Duffield, Anna Duffield and Susan Eliza Duffield, and others, as Defendants, which, among other things, stated the substance of the facts before mentioned, and prayed (among other things) that the donatio mortis causâ to the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield, of the bond and mortgage securities might be established, and that the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield, or the Appellants in her right, might be declared entitled to the bond and mortgage deeds and to the monies secured thereby, and to all benefit thereof, and that the Respondents Abraham Henry Chambers and William Hicks, as executors and trustees of the testator, might be decreed to execute proper instruments to enable the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield, or the Appellants in her right, to receive the monies due and to become [505] due on the bond and mortgages respectively, and to obtain the full benefit of the securities; and that the Appellants, in her right, might be at liberty to sue in the name of the last named Respondents in any action or suit to be brought against the obligor in the bond, and the mortgagor in the mortgages, the Appellants thereby offering to indemnify the Respondents against all the costs of such action or suit; and that the will and codicil of George Elwes might be established, and the trusts thereof executed, etc.

The adult Defendants to the original and amended bill appeared, and put in their answers supporting the claims of the Plaintiffs as to the donatio mortis causâ. The infant Defendants submitted their rights to the care of the Court.

Witnesses were examined in support of the allegations of the bill, and the cause, being at issue, was heard before the Vice Chancellor on the 17th of April, 1823, when a decree was made, by which (among other things) it was declared, that the Court being of opinion that a mortgage security cannot by law be given by way of donatio mortis causâ, the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield was not entitled to the mortgage monies secured by the indentures (of mortgage) and the bond.

In 1824, the widow of George Elwes married the Respondent William Hicks, in consequence of which marriage there was a supplemental suit and a decree in August, 1824, to carry on the proceedings.

The declaration of the decree in the original suit, as to the donatio mortis causâ, was the subject of the present appeal.

For the Appellants.

Mr. Sugden (Arg. 6th Ap. 1827): The fact of the gifts was not [506] much questioned in the Court below: the argument was upon the question of law, whether money secured upon a mortgage can be the subject of a donatio mortis causâ. That the delivery of a bond on death-bed operates as a gift of the money secured by the bond, has been decided in Gardner v. Parker (3 Mad. 184), following Snellgrove v. Bailey (3 Atk. 214), where Lord Hardwicke puts the case of an equitable interest in a chattel in possession with a legal title outstanding in a trustee, and says that the gift of the chattel would be valid as a donatio mortis causâ. At law a bond cannot be assigned. In the hands of a third party, it can only be made effectual by a power of attorney to sue in the name of the obligee. By the mere delivery of the bond nothing passes but the parchment. But it may operate as a gift of the money, and vest in the donee a right to use the name of the donor, or his representative, as if a power of attorney had been given to enforce the payment of the money. This is the principle of decision in Gardner v. Parker, and Snellgrove v. Bailey. If a sum of money is secured by bond and mortgage, the money secured is personal property. The real estate is simply a security for payment of the money. That the payment is secured by a mortgage as well as a bond, cannot alter the state of the question.

If there is a gift inter vivos of money secured by mortgage, the giver (mortgagee) becomes a trustee of the bond by which the debt is secured for the benefit of the donee. If the gift is by will, the heir of the testator becomes a trustee. The statute of frauds is out of the question: for it is a gift of the money secured, and not of the land by which it [507] is secured. The debt is the principal subject, and the real estate being a mere security for the debt, passes as an adjunct to the principal.

The question was agitated in Hassel v. Tynte (Ambl. 318), but not decided. Lord Hardwicke thought the money was the principal, but that there was an interest in land. In the Duchess of Buccleugh v. Hoare (4 Mad. 467), it was held upon a gift of heritable bonds, that the heir was a trustee of the land for the legatee, and that the money secured passed as part of the personal estate.

The case of Hurst v. Beach (5 Mad. 351), is not in principle distinguishable from the present case. A gift by the mortgagee to the mortgagor of the money secured was there held good, although secured by real estate, which could not pass without a reconveyance.

The case as to the mortgage for £2,927, is more clear, the money being secured by bond as well as mortgage. Suppose the bond alone had been delivered: the money would have passed by the delivery, and the heir of the donor would have been a trustee of the land in mortgage for the donee. The deeds of an estate are a subject of property. The estate will not pass by the mere delivery of the deeds: but having been given, they cannot be recovered. In Snellygrove v. Bailey, Lord Harwicke considered that the money secured passed by the delivery. There was no bond for the £30,000, but the money was secured by an assignment of the debt, by a conveyance of the land, and by a covenant to pay the money. The assignment of the debt existing, and the delivery of the deed of assignment, operates as a gift of the money assigned. In the case of a bond [508] assigned, the assignee may pass the money by delivery of the assignment.

The effect of these nice distinctions is to increase litigation, because no advice can be given in such a state of the law. There is no solid distinction in this respect between a bond and a covenant. The money passes by the delivery in both cases, because they are securities for money, and capable of assignment. The remedy is the same, and the circumstance that there is an additional security by a mortgage of real estate cannot alter the nature of the gift or the remedy: money secured by mortgage, may be given by a will without witness; so when there is an existing agreement, the mere delivery of deeds operates as a mortgage. These cases must be considered as excepted out of the statute of frauds; otherwise courts of equity have assumed a power of legislation. Where this depends on contract, the relief goes to the extremity of the jurisdiction. The decisions rest not merely on the ground of contract, but because the act of gift is plain and unequivocal. In this case, how in principle can it affect the right under the inferior securities, that there is also a security of a higher nature.

Mr. Longley: A mortgage, though in fee and forfeited, still continues, in equity, a mere security for money, and belongs to the personal estate of the mortgagee: while the estate in the land remains in equity, and to many purposes at law, in the mortgagor. Pawlett v. Attorney General (Hardr. 469); Thornborough v. Baker (1 Ch. Ca. 283, and from Lord Nottingham's notes in 3 Swanston 628); Yoy v. Ellis (Ch. Ca. 220); Ellis v. Graves (2 Ch. Ca. 50); Cope v. Cope (2 Salk. 419); Howell v. Price (1 P. Wms. 294.)

[509] In Chester v. Chester (3 P. Wms. 62), Lord Chancellor King observes, "An estate, though mortgaged, continues still to be the estate of the mortgagor, subject to the payment of the pledge which is upon it; and the mortgagee's right is only to the money due upon the land, not to the land itself." King v. King (Ibid., 361); Galton v. Hancock (2 Atk. 424, 435.)

In Martin v. Morlin (2 Burr. 969, 978), Lord Mansfield says, "A mortgage is a charge upon the lands, and whatever would give the money, will carry the estate in the land along with it every purpose. The estate in the land is the same thing as the money due upon it. It will be liable to debts; it will go to executors; it will pass by a will not made and executed with the solemnities required by the statute of frauds. The assignment of the debt, or forgiving it, will draw the land after it as a consequence. Nay it would do it though the debt were forgiven only by parol; for the right to the land would follow, notwithstanding the statute of frauds." Kord of Tankerville v. Fawcett (1 Cox's Rep. 237, 239.)

In Silberschildt v. Schiott (3 Ves. and B. 49), Sir William Grant, M.R., says, "If the testator's interest had been really a mortgage, there is no doubt a gift of the money would have carried his interest in the land upon which it was secured."

In Lord Cholmondeley v. Lord Clinton (2 Jac. and W. 179), Sir Thomas Plumer, M.R., says, "In the hands of the mortgagee, the mortgage is considered in equity, as a mere personal chattel which passes to the executor."

[510] On the other hand, the equity of redemption constitutes the estate in the land. It is not merely a trust—it is a title in equity (Hardr. 467.) It is of such consideration in the eye of the law, that the law takes notice of it and makes it assignable and devisable (Ibid, 469), as Lord Hardwicke held in Casburne v. Scarfe (2 Jac. and W. 194.) An equity of redemption is so completely the estate in the land, or rather the land itself, as to be capable of such an adverse possession, as, by length of time, to confer on the adverse possessor an indefeasible title. The Marquis of Cholmondeley v. Lord Clinton (Dom Proc. June, 1821, MSS.)

A debt is a chose in action; a right to a certain sum of money. This right may be secured in various ways, by record or specialty; or the debt may be allowed to remain due upon simple contract only.

Obligations by specialty comprehend both bonds and covenants for the payment of money. A single bond or bill to pay a sum of money at a day certain, is, in its nature and legal operation, precisely equivalent to a covenant to pay the same sum in the same manner. For, 1st. Each instrument creates a contract or obligation by specialty. It is laid down in Shepherd's Touchstone, chap. 21, "Of an Obligation," that, "any words in a writing, sealed and delivered, whereby a man doth prove and declare himself to have another man's money, or to be indebted to him, will be a good obligation." As, "Mem., that I. A. of B. do owe to C. of D. £20., to be paid at Easter next: or, mem., that I. A. of B. [511] do promise to pay C. of D. £20.: or, mem., that I. A. of B. will pay to C. of D. £20.: or, mem., that I. A. of B. have had £20. of the money of C. of D.," with many other examples.

2d. Each instrument binds executors and heirs, if they are named in the instrument.

3d. A bond, though usually made in the first person, may be made in the third person (Co. Litt. 230. a.) And a deed of covenant, though usually made in the third person, may be made in the first person (Litt. Sect. 371, 372.)

4th. Actions of debt or of covenant will lie interchangeably on the respective instruments.

"Debt" lies upon every express contract to pay a sum certain, as if a man covenants or grants to pay (Com. Dig. Dett. [A. 8] 1 Leo. 208., 2 Leo. 119.) If covenant be to pay rent or other sum at such a day, he may have "debt" or covenant (Com. Dig. Action M: 4 Cro. Eliz. 797.) So conversely, covenant will lie on a bond, for it proves an agreement. Per. Lord Nottingham in Hill v. Caw (Ch. Ca. 294.) Both bond and covenant to pay a sum of money, constitute an obligation by specialty to do a personal thing.

The money secured is a personal chattel, which came originally from the personal estate of the lender, and accrued to the personal estate of the borrower, and is to return from the personal estate of the debtor to that of the creditor: and the securities, whether of bond or covenant, are of a personal nature, being the foundation of personal actions. Since, therefore, the debt secured by mortgage is a personal chattel, though enjoying the benefit of a real security: it must follow that the addition of the [512] personal securities of a bond or covenant to the mortgage debt, cannot possibly diminish or alter the personal nature of the debt.

The money secured by mortgage, bond, and covenant, or by mortgage and bond, or by mortgage and covenant, still remains a personal chattel, and the debt, or the right to the money, remains a personal chose in action.

A creditor, having both bond and mortgage, may put in force which of the securities he will: he may put by the mortgage and sue only on the bond. Clarke v. Lord Abingdon (17 Ves. 106.)

In many instances it may be most eligible for the holder of both securities to put in force the personal obligation.

Suppose a mortgage and bond given by way of donatio mortis causâ, and the mortgage be a second mortgage in fee, and the real estate an insufficient security, and swallowed up by the first mortgage, it might be best to sue on the bond. The bond would, in that case, be the only valuable part of the gift.

Or, supposing the debt to be secured by a first mortgage in fee, with a covenant for payment of the money, and the mortgaged premises were destroyed by the accident of fire or flood, then the only security available to the creditor, would be the specialty obligation contained in the covenant.

If there be a debt secured by mortgage and bond, or by mortgage and covenant, the assignment of the debt will carry the trust in the mortgaged estate to the assignee.

In Bosville v. Brander (1 P. Wms. 458. 460), the question arose, whether the benefit of the [513] wife's mortgage in fee passed by the assignment of the Commissioners under the husband's bankruptcy to the assignees; and Sir J. Jekyll, in delivering his judgment, observes, "There being in the mortgage deed a covenant to pay the mortgage money to the wife, this debt or chase in action, was well assigned by the Commissioners to the assignees, and vested in them, like the case of Miles v. Williams (1 P. W. 249), where a bond made to a wife, dum sola, was adjudged to be liable to the husband's bankruptcy, and assignable by the Commissioners."

"Wherefore, if the right to the debt was vested in the assignees, (as plainly it was,) though the legal estate of the inheritance of the lands in mortgage continued in the wife, yet this was not material; it being no more than a trust for the assignees; like the common case, where there is a mortgage in fee, and the mortgagee dies, here the mortgage money belonging to the executors, though the heir takes the legal estate by descent, yet he is but a trustee for the executor; for the trust of the mortgage must follow the property of the debt."

In Bates v. Dandy (2 Atk. 207), Lord Hardwicke held that a husband may dispose of the beneficial interest of his wife's mortgage in fee, as well as of her mortgage for a term.

The definition of a donatio mortis causâ, is given in the Institutions (Lib. 2. tit. 7. s. 2), in these words: "Mortis causâ donatio est, quæ propter mortis fit suspicionem: cum quis ita donat, ut si quid humanitatis ei contigisset, haberet is qui accepit; sin autem supervivisset, is qui donavit, reciperet: vel si eum donationis penituisse; aut prior decesserit cui donatum sit." The Emperor then [514] proceeds to observe that, "Hæ mortis causâ donationes ad exemplum legatorum redactæ sunt per omnia: nam cum prudentibus ambiguum fuerat utrum donationis an legati instar eam obtinere oporteret, et utriusque causâ quædam habebat insignia, et alii ad aliud genus eam retraherant: a nobis constitutum est ut per omnia fere legatis connumeretur, et sic procedat, quemadmodum nostra constitutio eam formavit."

A donatio mortis causâ has the character of a legacy, by way of contradistinction to a gift inter vivos (Cod. lib. 8. t. 57. s. 1).

Every thing, which, by the Roman law, might be bequeathed as a legacy by will, might be the subject of a donatio mortis causâ. Thus a landed estate might be so given (Dig. lib. 39. tit. 6. s. 14), or a slave (Ibid. 11. 37. 39), or a farm subject to a mortgage (Ibid. s. 18. par. 3), or a simple contract debt (Ibid. s. 18. par. 1), or a part of a debt (Ibid. s. 31. par. 3), or a chirograph or bond for money might be given to a donee mortis causâ as a trustee for the obligor, and the beneficial interest in the debt would pass (Ibid. s. 18. par. 2).

The parity of a donatio mortis causâ, with a legacy, is summed up by Ulpian, in these words: "Illud generaliter meminisse oportebit donationes mortis causâ factas, legatis comparatas: quodcumque igitur in legatis juris est, id in mortis causâ donationibus erit accipiendum." (Dig. lib. 39. tit. 6. s. 7). And by Voet, in his commentary on the Pandects (Lib. 39. tit. 6. s. 1), in the following words—" Sed et regulariter, quales res, et quibus, et per quos legari possunt etiam mortis causâ rectè donantur."

[515] In Hedges v. Hedges (Prec. Cha. 269), Lord Chanc. Cowper says "a donatio mortis causâ is where a man lies in extremity, or being surprised with sickness, and not having an opportunity of making his will; but lest he should die before he could make it, he gives with his own hands his goods to his friends about him; this, if he dies, shall operate as a legacy; but if he recovers, then does the property thereof revert to him."

In Ashton v. Dawson and Vincent (Sel. Cha. Ca. 11) the Lords Commissioners, in their judgment, speaking of a don. m. c. say: "It is not a legacy, nor is there any occasion for the executor's assent to it: it is not a gift at common law, but in view of death: here are express words, but if he had used no words, and had been near death, it had been looked upon as a donatio mortis causâ; it is a testamentary legacy, of which the common law takes notice, but not proveable in the Ecclesiastical Court: it is only questionable here; and the executor's assent is not necessary, because he might die intestate."

There must be a delivery to perfect a don. m. c. according to the law of England.

Ward v. Turner (2 Ves. sen. 441): but then the delivery is according to the nature of the subject; if it be a small chattel in possession, the chattel itself must be delivered, or at least the key of the trunk or receptacle containing it. Jones v. Selby (Prec. Cha. 300), Bunn v. Markham (7 Taun. 224): if the gift be of bulky goods the delivery of the key of the warehouse or room containing them is sufficient. Smith v. Smith (2 Stra. 955. 1734): if it be a chose in action, a specialty debt, the instrument creating or securing the debt must be delivered. Thus a bond debt, i.e. the equitable interest in the [516] debt, may pass by way of donatio mortis causâ, by delivery of the bond. Snellgrove v. Bailey (3 Atk. 214), Gardner v. Parker (3 Mad. 184), Blount v. Burrow (4 Bro. C. C. 72. 1 Ves. jun. 546), the benefit of lottery tickets by delivery of the tickets; Gold v. Rutland (1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 346), a specie bill by delivery of the bill; Drury v. Smith (1 P. Wms. 404), an Exchequer Tally by delivery, or, what is tantamount to delivery of the Tally; Jones v. Selby (Prec. Ch. suprà), and, as we contend a mortgage debt by delivery of the mortgage deed, and a specialty debt secured by covenant by delivery of the deed containing the covenant to pay; there being in each of these cases presupposed an intention to give the debt or chose in action.

In Snellgrove v. Bailey (3 Atk. 214), Lord Hardwicke considers the question to be, not whether a bond can generally be given by way of donatio inter vivos, but whether the equitable interest in the bond can properly be made the subject of such a gift as he is treating of, namely, a donatio mortis causâ. And he decided in the affirmative.

The question now in litigation, is not whether the legal estate in the land may pass by a donatio inter vivos of the deeds, as the Vice-Chancellor seems to have considered it to be; but whether the equitable interest in the debt secured by these deeds can pass by a donatio mortis causâ of the deeds made with the intention of giving the debt by this legatory disposition.

From Lord Hardwicke's doctrine as to the nature of mortgages, and the mode of assigning a mortgage debt laid down in Richards v. Symes (Barnard. Ch. R. 90), and from [517] the case of a donatio mortis causâ of a mortgage which he puts hypothetically, in Ward v. Turner (2 Ves. sen. 443), we may infer that that learned Judge thought favorably of such a donation, although in Hussel v. Tynte (Ambl. 318) he avoided deciding the point.

The benefit of a mortgage security belongs to the personalty of the mortgagee: the mortgage debt is a chose in action due from the personal estate of the mortgagor, and any act of assignment or charge of the debt by any person having authority to assign or charge it, will operate as an assignment or charge, pro tanto, of the trust of the mortgaged land. Donationes mortis causâ have been admitted of money bonds of private persons; of bonds of the East India Company; of Exchequer Tallies; of specie bills; of lottery tickets.—To ask, therefore, of a Court of Equity to establish a donatio mortis causâ made of a mortgage deed, with the intention of giving the debt, is only requiring the Court to pursue its own principles, and to acknowledge and allow this necessary corollary from its doctrines and former decisions.

The factum of the gift is proved by three unexceptionable witnesses to the donor's declaration of giving his property in the mortgages to his daughter, Mrs. Duffield; and three, equally unexceptionable, to the fact of the delivery over of the deeds to the donee, in the donor's presence and by his desire. The gift was of several securities, and where there are several securities for the same debt, an assignment or gift by the creditor of one security is an assignment or gift of the debt, and neither the creditor nor his representatives can be permitted to set up the other security for the purpose of defeating that assignment or gift; but those who hold the legal estate in the [518] collateral securities become trustees for the assignee or donee of the debt. Duchess of Buccleugh v. Hoare (4 Mad. 476).

The donee is entitled to the bond of 12th July, 1820, and to the benefit of the mortgage and covenant for securing the same debt. The decree, however, has not only denied to Mrs. Duffield the benefit of the deed of covenant and mortgage, but has stripped her of her property in the bond, and is therefore erroneous.

As to the objection founded on the statute of frauds, on which of the sections does it rest? Is it the third section, which prohibits an assignment of an interest in land except in writing? That is answered by the consideration that the debt is the principal thing conveyed, and the gift by way of donatio mortis causâ of the debt draws after it consequentially the trust of the land, in the same manner as when an assignment for valuable consideration is made by parol, the equitable assignment of the debt draws after it consequentially the trust in the land.

Is it the 5th section which prohibits devises of freehold estate, except by will attested by three witnesses? Our answer is, that a mortgage security is mere personal property in equity: that a bequest of the mortgage money by an unattested will, will pass the mortgage money, and draw after it consequentially the trust of the land pledged for its security.

Is it the 6th section against revocations of wills of land, except by writing attested? Or the 22d section which prohibits revocations of wills of personal estate by word of mouth only? The answer to that is that a will of personality may unquestionably be revoked, pro tanto, by a donatio mortis causâ made [519] subsequent to the will of the property bequeathed by the will; and this, notwithstanding the section 22 of this statute, and a donatio mortis causâ of the mortgage, is a donatio mortis causâ of the equitable right to the money, and does not assume to revoke the devise of the legal estate in the land.

Can it be the 7th or 9th sections, which make void all declarations and assignments of trusts of land, unless made in writing? To these we reply, that the donatio mortis causâ of the deeds does not assume to convey any interest in the land whatever, by trust or otherwise; but the gift mortis causâ of the equitable interest of the debt, made by the delivery of the deeds, will draw after it consequentially the trust or benefit of the security of the landed pledge, as in cases of valid assignment of the debt merely, inter vivos.

Is it the 19th section which the Respondents rely on, which prescribes certain rules for the making of nuncupative wills? This difficulty is removed by observing, that the Appellants have never set up this gift as a nuncupative will; but they claim it as a donatio mortis causâ, a species of gift sanctioned by a series of authorities in our law, all of them posterior to this statute of frauds, which has been supposed to present such obstacles to this kind of legatory disposition.

The deeds themselves belong to Mrs. Duffield, by the gift of her father, and there exists no equity, to take them from her.

It is clear, from decided authorities, that a gift even inter vivos may be made of deeds. "A man may give or grant his deeds, i.e. the parchment, paper, and, wax, to another at his pleasure, and the grantee may keep or cancel them. And, therefore, if a man [520] have an obligation, he may give or grant it away, and so sever the debt and it. So tenant in fee simple may give or grant away the deeds of his land, and the executor in the first instance and the heir in the last hath no remedy" (Shepherd's Touch, Ch. 12, p. 241). Kelsack v. Nicholson (Cro. Eliz. 196). Again, "A man may give or grant his deed to another, and such gift by parol is good; and if a man hath an obligation though he cannot grant the thing in action, yet he may grant the deed, viz., the parchment and wax, to another, who may cancel and use the same at his pleasure" (Co. Litt. 232, b.).

An heir at law is always a favoured character both in courts of law and equity. An incumbent of a church purchases the inheritance of the advowson and dies, and the dispute being between the heir and the executor who should present to the church, it was adjudged in favour of the heir that all was but as one instant; and where these two titles concur in one instant, the heir should be preferred as claiming under the elder right. Holt v. Bishop of Winchester (3 Levinz. 17).

Lord Chancellor Macclesfield says, in Edwards v. Countess of Warwick (2 P. Wms. 176), "I take it to be clear, that if I voluntarily, and without any consideration, covenant to lay out money in a purchase of land, to be settled on me and my heirs, this Court will compel the execution of such contract, though merely voluntary; for, in all cases where it is a measuring east between an executor and an heir, the latter shall in equity have the preference."

The want of surrender of a copyhold or a defective execution of a power will not be supplied for younger children against an eldest child being the heir unpro [521] vided for. Cooper v. Cooper (2 Vern. 265); nor for grandchildren in any case. Kettle v. Townsend (1 Salk. 487), Perry v. Whitehead (6 Ves. 544). A fortiori there can be no equity in this present case; for grandchildren, amply provided for by their grandfather's will, to diminish the comparatively small provision he has made for his only child and heir-at-law.

Provision for a child is always favored in equity: Lord Grey v. Lady Grey (1 Ch. Ca. 296, 2 Swan. 594).

For the Respondents, the children of Mr. and Mrs. Duffield: Mr. Heald and Mr. M. West.

Mr. Heald: The evidence as to the delivery is peculiar.

The Lord Chancellor: It does not appear that any thing was read, or any question raised as to the fact of donation. It appears by the report to have been decided purely on the question of law, and that without hearing the counsel for the Defendant.

Mr. Sugden: The depositions as to the delivery were read. The case was argued on both sides, and the Vice Chancellor, expressing doubts on the question, recommended an appeal.

The Lord Chancellor: This should have been noticed in the report.

Mr. Heald: Mr. Hicks, in his deposition, used the word "propose;" but it does not appear that Mr. Elwes was informed what was the amount of the property proposed to be given. This case will form a precedent: and it is of great importance it should be ascertained whether he intended to give the £30,000 or the £2927, or both; for it remains in uncertainty what he intended to give. The evidence is very loose, as purporting to shew a full and perfect delivery, with a knowledge of the exact subject-[522]-matter of the gift. In these cases the same evidence should be required, whether the gift is to a child or to a stranger. Would such evidence be held sufficient in the case of a stranger? It goes further than any case in the books. The proposal is made by a third person, and the evidence of assent is by nodding. In the morning Mr. Hicks pressed for an answer, and it was given. But in the evening when they had the deeds, no answer was required, and he was in fact unable to answer. The evidence of Mr. H. Elwes is not very consistent with the other evidence. Probably he has confounded the two meetings. In Tate v. Hibbert (2 Ves. jun. 111) it was a donatio inter vivos.

It can make no difference that a bond is given with the mortgage. The destruction of the deed does not destroy the estate of the mortgagee. To encourage these donations, renders property insecure. It is against the policy of the law.

The Lord Chancellor: Suppose the bond alone is given without the mortgage,—is the mortgage not to pass, if the debt is given by the bond? The Vice Chancellor spoke to me about this case, and I then thought that there could not be a donatio mortis causâ of a mortgage. But now I confess I do not find it easy to maintain the opinion which I then held. Giving the bond must do something or nothing. If it does something, and gives the debt—will not the mortgage debt follow?

Mr. West: The question is, whether there can be a donatio mortis causâ of the beneficial interest in a mortgage, by the delivery of mortgage deeds. It is said that the doctrines and principles relating to gifts of this nature are founded upon the civil law; but the Roman [523] law is admitted in our own law, so far only as it has been received and allowed by our law; the civil law and our law differ in many respects. The civil law required many solemnities, having regard to fraud and influence—it required five witnesses: ours does not. By the civil law it partook more of the nature of a legacy than a gift; though by the early Roman law, delivery was necessary to perfect the gift: in the time of Justinian, delivery was not necessary. But our law requires delivery. Irons v. Smallpiece (2 B. and A. 553). And it is a general rule that there can be no donatio mortis causâ of those things of which the delivery will not perfect the gift: and those cases which have been determined otherwise, are exceptions to the rule, and stand upon very different grounds from the present case.

The delivery of a note not payable to bearer, cannot be the subject of a donatio mortis causâ, because it is a mere chase in action, and must be sued for in the name of the executor. Miller v. Miller (3 P. Wms. 358). Nor can the delivery of receipts for South Sea annuities (2 Ves. 432).

The exceptions to the rule are: the case of Lawson v. Lawson (1 P. Wms. 441), where the husband draws a bill upon his goldsmith, payable to his wife, with a direction indorsed upon it, that it should be applied for mourning. This was held to be a good donatio mortis causa; but stress was laid upon its being for mourning, which might operate like a direction given by the testator touching his funeral, which need not be in the will. And on another ground it was held good, as an appointment of the money in the banker's hands; it might likewise have been proved [524] as a testamentary paper. And of this case Lord Thurlow said he did not see the ratio decidendi. See Tate v. Hibbert (2 Ves. jun. 120).

Snellgrove v. Bailey (3 Atk. 213), is the case of a bond, but the reasons which Lord Hardwicke gives for that determination in Ward v. Turner (2 Ves. 112), are technical and unsatisfactory; and they don't apply to the case of a mortgage: first he says, that some property is conveyed by the delivery; for the person to whom this specialty is given, may cancel, burn, and destroy it; the consequence of which is, that it puts it in his power to destroy the obligee's power of bringing an action, because no one can bring an action on a bond, without a profect in curia; but this reason does not apply in respect of a mortgage debt; for an action may be maintained in respect of a mortgage debt, though the deeds are destroyed; and there is no necessity for a profect in curia of deeds which take effect under the statute of uses, because the deeds belong to the grantee to uses; see Whitfield v. Faussett (1 Ves. 394). Another reason Lord Hardwicke gives, that the law allows it a locality; and therefore a bond is bona notabilia, so as to require prerogative administration, where a bond is in one diocese, and goods in another; this reason does not apply to the case of a mortgage debt; and Lord Hardwicke, probably upon consideration, thought he had gone too far: for he says in Ward v. Turner, "If I went too far in Snellgrove v. Bailey, it is not a reason I should go further, and I choose to stop there."

But there is a great difference between a bond and a mortgage debt. If a scrivener be entrusted with [525] the custody of a bond, and he receive the principal, and deliver up the bond, being entrusted with the security itself; it shall be presumed that he is entrusted with a power over it, and with a power to receive the principal and interest; and the rather, because the giving up of the bond upon the payment of the money, is a discharge thereof, otherwise if the obligee take away the bond, for then he had no authority to receive any money; but if the scrivener be entrusted with the mortgage deed, not the bond, he hath only authority to receive the interest but not the principal, because the giving up the deed is not sufficient to restore the estate; but there must be a re-conveyance to restore the estate, whereas the giving up a bond in law is an extinguishment of the debt, Whitlock v. Walham (1 Salk. 157).

But then it is said there is no difference between the delivery of mortgage deeds by a mortgagee to the mortgagor; and the delivery of mortgage deeds by the mortgagee to a third person. And it has been decided that by a delivery by a mortgagee to a mortgagor of mortgage deeds, there can be a donatio mortis causa of the mortgage. Richards v. Symes (Barnard. 90). Hurst v. Beech (5 Madd. 351). But there is a great difference where deeds are delivered to a person who has an interest and a person who has no interest.—And this difference is established both in the civil law and our own law. By the civil law—Si debitori meo reddiderim cautionem videtur inter nos convenisse non peterem. So by our own law, delivery of a bond to a debtor is a discharge of the debt (2 Roll. Abr. 56). But by the delivery of a bond to a third person, no presumption arises of a gift to that person, either by the civil law or our own law. A lessee of tithes cannot grant tithes without deed; yet a parson may grant tithes to [526] him that is to pay them without deed (Shep. Touch. 230). So common of pasture cannot be granted without deed, but it may be without deed to a person who has land to which common is appurtenant, and in Hassel v. Tynte (Ambler, 318), Lord Hardwicke recognizes the distinction, for he says, it was a very considerable question whether, by the delivery of mortgage deeds, there be a good donatio of the mortgage, and he there says Richards v. Symes was a slight precedent.

This case, therefore, is brought within none of the exceptions, and where such an immense mass of property is invested upon mortgage, it would be dangerous to make a precedent, by which large property might be disposed of upon the testimony of one witness; with none of the checks which the law imposes upon nuncupative wills. I admit that it has been decided both in Cashburne v. Inglis (2 Eq. Ab. 728, 1 Atk. 603), and in various other cases, that the person having the equity of redemption of the mortgage, is considered as owner of the land, and the mortgagee is only entitled to retain it as a security for his debt; and that a mortgage in a Court of Equity is only considered as personal assets ; but still it is a debt, and only a chose in action ; and being an incorporeal thing does not pass by the delivery ; but then it is said by Mr. Sugden to be like the case of an equitable mortgage where a Court of Equity would compel an actual mortgage to be made, where deeds have been deposited to secure money lent ; but of these cases Lord Eldon said in ex parte Mountford (14 Ves. 606), that the first determination establishing a mortgage by a deposit of deeds, surprised the bar considerably. The present case, however, is different. Here the party comes as a volunteer ; the case of an equit-[527]-able mortgage rests upon contract and a valuable consideration. There are two mortgages in this case ; one is a mortgage alone ; the other mortgage is secured by a bond ; but if there can be no donatio mortis causâ of a mortgage, the fact of there having been a bond given can make no difference ; the bond is only collateral to the mortgage, and the incident must follow the principal.*

Mr. Sugden in reply : The gift took place in the morning in the absence of the deeds. Gesture is sometimes stronger than words ; which may be extorted. In Gardner v. Parker, the Vice Chancellor compelled the executor to lend his name to the donee for the purpose of suing upon the instrument. This was one step. The Duchess of Buccleugh v. Hoare provided another step, where the Vice Chancellor held that the heir was a trustee to make the heritable bonds effectual for the donee. The fallacy of the judgment is in supposing the claim to be against the donor, whereas it is against his representatives. In mortgages the estate in the land waits on the money. The debt is the principal thing. The land is the incident inseparable from it. When the debt is assigned, the security must follow.

The Earl of Eldon : In the first of these causes there is an appeal (29th June, 1827) from the Judgment (1 Sim. and Stu. 244) of the then Vice Chancellor, the present Master of the Rolls, in which he makes this declaration, and from that part of the judgment the present appeal is brought. " This [528] Court doth declare, that this Court being of opinion that a mortgage security cannot by law be given by way of donatio mortis causâ, the Appellant, Emily Frances Duffield, was not entitled to the mortgage monies secured by the indentures of the 2d and 3d of November, 1820, and the bond of 12th July, 1820, and by the indentures of lease and release and mortgage, dated the 11th and 12th of July, 1820."

This judgment, therefore, proceeds upon the expression of an opinion, that a mortgage security cannot by law be given by way of donatio mortis causâ ; and if it be true that a mortgage security cannot by law be given by way of donatio mortis causâ, it certainly then would be unnecessary to inquire whether the mortgage of November, 1820, and the bond of July, 1820, and the indentures of mortgage also of the 11th and 12th July, 1820, have been given by way of donatio mortis causâ ; because if a mortgage cannot be so given, it is quite unnecessary to consider whether, under the circumstances of this case, it can be held that there was a donatio mortis causâ.

Before I proceed to state the opinion which I have formed upon this subject, it is my duty to the learned Judge, from whose judgment this is an appeal, to say, that probably he has been influenced in the opinion which he has expressed by something which had fallen from me in a conversation with him, in which I had certainly expressed very great doubt whether a mortgage could be made the subject of a donatio mortis causâ. I consider it just to state that this is so.

The judgment is commenced by the learned judge in the words I am now about to read. " The case of a bond, I consider to be an exception and not a rule : property may pass without [529] writing either as a donatio mortis causâ, or by a nuncupative will according to the forms required by the statute. The distinction between a donatio mortis causâ and a nuncupative will is, that the first is claimed against the executor and the other from the executor. Where delivery will not execute a complete gift inter vivos, it cannot create a donatio mortis causâ, because it will not prevent the property from vesting in the executors ; and as a Court of Equity will not inter vivos compel a party to complete his gift, it will not compel an executor to complete the gift of his testator. The delivery of a mortgage cannot pass the property inter vivos:—first, because the action for the money must still be in the name of the donor; and secondly, because the mortgagor is not compellable to pay the money without having back the mortgaged estate, which can only pass by the deed of the mortgagee, and no Court would compel the donor to complete his gift by executing such a deed. As to the case where a bond accompanied the mortgage deed " (I shall have occasion to state presently the distinction between the two mortgages). "I was at first inclined to think that as the bond alone, if it had been the only security for the debt, would under the decisions have passed as a donatio mortis causa, so it would draw after it the mortgage as being a collateral security for the same debt,—but upon further consideration I think that the delivery of the bond, where there is also a mortgage, cannot be considered as a gift completed. The mortgagor has a right to resist the payment of the bond without a re-conveyance of the estate, and it cannot be maintained that the donor of the bond would be compelled to complete his gift by such re-conveyance."

The principle which is applied in the decision of [530] this case, is the principle upon which Courts of Equity refuse to complete voluntary conveyances. No Court of Equity will compel a completion of them, and throughout the whole of what I have now read, the donor is considered as a party who may refuse to complete the intent he has expressed; but I think that is a misapprehension, because nothing can be more clear than that this donatio mortis causa must be a gift made by a donor in contemplation of the conceived approach of death,—that the title is not complete till he is actually dead, and that the question therefore never can be what the donor can be compelled to do, but what the donee in the case of a donatio mortis causa can call upon the representatives, real or personal, of that donor to do; the question is this, whether the act of the donor being, as far as the act of the donor itself is to be viewed, complete, the persons who represent that donor, in respect of personalty—the executor, and in respect of realty—the heir-at-law, are not bound to complete that which, as far as the act of the donor is concerned in the question, was incomplete; in other words, where it is the gift of a personal chattel or the gift of a deed which is the subject of the donatio mortis causa, whether after the death of the individual who made that gift, the executor is not to be considered a trustee for the donee, and whether on the other hand, if it be a gift affecting the real interest,—and I distinguish now between a security upon land and the land itself—whether if it be a gift of such an interest in law, the heir-at-law of the testator is not by virtue of the operation of the trust, which is created not by indenture but a bequest arising from operation of law, a trustee for that donee. I apprehend that really the question does not turn at [531] all upon what the donor could do, or what the donor could not do; but if it was a good donatio mortis causa, what the donee of that donor could call upon the representatives of the donor to do after the death of that donor.

With respect to the question of fact, whether those mortgages and the bond were or were not given in such a manner as constituted a good donatio mortis causa, if there be no objection to the fact, that the subject of the mortgage was an interest in real estate, I do not apprehend that the gentlemen at the bar, though they criticised very much the nature of the evidence which has been given, meant to ask for any issue to try whether there was or was not a good donatio mortis causa, if a mortgage can be the subject of a donatio mortis causa. In some of the cases which I shall have occasion to mention, it will be seen that where there is any doubt whether in point of fact there was that which would constitute a good donatio mortis causa, if in point of law the subject of it can be made the subject of a donatio mortis causa, it is a very familiar thing to direct an issue or issues to try that fact. That not having been desired, the case is to be considered on its merits. Supposing the testator to have the power, has he fallen into a mistake with respect to the subject which he did intend so to give, and has he attempted to make a good donatio mortis causa of property which he could not so transfer?

It is necessary to state, first, what these two mortgages are, for they differ in their nature. The first is a mortgage for a sum of between £2000 and £3000, and there is the usual bond. The other is the case of an interest conveyed by indentures of lease and release and assignment, the contents of [532] which are such as I am about to state. There being property considerably more than £30,000 vested in trustees under a marriage settlement, they have advanced £30,000 to Sir Edwin Bayntun

Sandys upon a mortgage of his estates and a bond, and judgment recovered upon that bond. The person who is supposed to have made this gift causa mortis afterwards advanced to the mortgagee that sum of £30,000, the mortgagor joining in the trust assignment of the mortgage. There was first an assignment of the money, the £30,000; secondly, an assignment of the judgment; and, thirdly, it contained a covenant to pay the money secured by the mortgage, which covenant formed a species of debt affecting the inheritance—the subject of the assignment to Mr. Elwes.

It appears that Mr. Elwes had been extremely angry with his daughter, who had married Mr. Duffield; but towards the close of life, and particularly when he came very near his death, he became very desirous to make a larger provision for his daughter; and, accordingly, in a conversation which he had upon the subject, he mentioned that there were these mortgages, one of two thousand odd hundred pounds, and another of thirty thousand pounds. Nobody, I think, who looks to the evidence, can doubt that it was his intention to make a gift of those mortgages for the benefit of that daughter whom he had restored to his favour, and, accordingly, he stated his purpose. He died the next morning. He was at the time in circumstances in which, it is clear, he apprehended that his death was approaching, and being extremely desirous to make some provision for his daughter, in the course of that morning he stated an intention upon the subject, which could leave no doubt in the mind [533] of any body what that intention was. It occurred afterwards that a declaration of this purpose should be made, and the question is, whether the form of that declaration was sufficient to constitute a gift of the property! There was no time to draw out a regular transfer of the property, but in the course of the morning there were brought to him the instruments,—the mortgages, the bonds, and so on; and it being suggested that it was necessary, in order to make a good donatio mortis causa, that there should be delivery of the instruments, subject to the question, whether such delivery constituted a good donatio mortis causa; it appears by the evidence of the gentleman who had all these instruments in his hand, that Mr. Elwes took the hand of his daughter and laid it upon these instruments. The evidence presents an accurate account of the clear manifestation of his purpose to give, although that manifestation was accompanied with this circumstance—that he was so near the termination of his life, and so reduced, that he could hardly utter the words, but that it was more by a look than a word that he expressed his approbation of what was done. This was therefore a case where one cannot help feeling a very strong wish that it should take effect; but, it must be remembered, we cannot give that effect unless the law enables us to do it.

Improvements in the law, or some things which have been considered improvements, have been lately proposed; and if, among those things called improvements, this donatio mortis causa was struck out of our law altogether, it would be quite as well; but that not being so, we must examine into the subject of it.

I apprehend that the question is not a question between the donor and donee, but that the question is, whether the act is complete to this extent—that the [534] donor gave this in such a manner as to constitute a good donatio mortis causa which will bind the interest in the executor as to the personal estate, and bind the interest in the heir at law with respect to the mortgage security as to the real estate? Because, I apprehend, that in a case where a donatio mortis causa has been carried into effect by a Court of Equity, that Court of Equity has not considered the interest as vested by the gift, but that the interest is so vested in the donee, that that donee has a right to call on a Court of Equity, and, as to the personal estate, to compel the executor to carry into effect the intention manifested by the person he represents. The only authority it will be necessary to cite for that doctrine is referred to in this decision. The case of Gardner v. Parker (3 Madd. 184), is a decision by the same Judge, and was under these circumstances:—It was a gift of a bond by delivering the same and saying, "There, take that and keep it," in the last sickness of the donor—the donor dying two days afterwards. This was held to be a donatio mortis causa, and it was directed that the donee should be at liberty to use the executors' names in suing on the bond, he indemnifying them, and the costs of the suit to be paid out of the testator's estate, which is founded on this reason, that the money may be recovered in a proceeding at law, by an action in the name of the executors; but if the executors refuse to permit their names to be used, a Court of Equity will compel them to permit their names to be used in consequence of the trust which arises from the act of the donor himself.

In another case of Snellgrove v. Bailey (3 Atk. 214), "A bond for £100 was given by one Sparkman to Sarah [535] Bailey, which Sarah Bailey delivered to the defendant, saying, 'In case I die, it is yours, and you will have something.' The plaintiff, as administrator to Sarah Bailey, brought a bill to have the bond delivered up." There was a question whether there had been a donatio causâ mortis, and the administrator there brought a bill to have the bond delivered up, as being in the hands of the alleged donee. Lord Hardwicke, however, decided, that this was a sufficient donatio causâ mortis to pass the equitable interest, not the legal interest in the bond, upon the intestate's death. I find that Lord Hardwicke, in the case where there was a gift in the nature of a donatio mortis causâ, directed that the representatives should be at liberty to file a bill to have the deeds delivered up, although he said they might bring traversi for the deeds: but if the act of the donor had vested the deeds in the hands of the person in such a manner as to give an interest in the nature of a donatio mortis causâ, there could be no equity to obtain the delivery up of those deeds unless the title had been settled at law.

The real question in this case is—not whether this was good as a donatio causâ mortis, if the subject of delivery had been a bond alone, but whether the subject of delivery being mortgages, that is, estates in land in one sense of the word, such interests in land as those are can or cannot be made the subject of a donatio causâ mortis?—A question which is left in a state of great uncertainty—a question noticed in some cases, but still left in a state of great difficulty: and I cannot but extremely lament that there should have been a decision upon a question of this importance with so little said either in argument or judgment upon the hearings of the cases to be found [536] with reference to this subject. Upon looking into the cases, I observe that in the very first case I can find Lord Hardwicke to have decided, he expressed more doubt upon the subject than, in my humble judgment, speaking with great deference when looking at that great man's authority, former decisions upon the subject would have induced me to expect to find in his Lordship's expressions.

In the case of Hussel v. Tynte (Ambl. Rep. 318), in which a lady claimed to have a sum of £1000 secured by mortgage, which she said she had become entitled to by a donatio causâ mortis made by the donor (the testator is a wrong term in such a case)—there were two questions, one was a question of fact, namely, whether the circumstances were such as to constitute it a gift, if it was a proper subject of gift? The other—whether it was a proper subject of gift? Lord Hardwicke expressed a doubt whether a mortgage deed could be made the subject of a donatio causâ mortis, and he finished the case by saying, "I observe that this lady, when she becomes twenty-one, is to be the residuary legatee of the testator, and as she will very soon attain the age of twenty-one, I will not keep up this controversy between her as claiming this £1000 and the person entitled to the residue if she dies under twenty-one: the probability is she will arrive at the age of twenty-one, and then, as residuary legatee, she will be entitled to all the residue, and then it will become unnecessary to determine whether this £1000 shall be settled upon her or not."

In the case of Hard v. Turner (2 Ves. sen. 431), which is a leading case upon this subject, Lord Hardwicke entered into a very long consideration of the case in his judgment. [537] The question there was, whether some receipts for stock having been delivered over, it was a good donatio causâ mortis? He was of opinion it was not: that the mere certificate of the stock was not a document of the title, and where no document of the title has been delivered there can be no transfer of the property, and he held that that was not a good donatio causâ mortis.

In Richards v. Symes (2 Atk. 319, 3 Barnard. 90, and 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. 617) Lord Hardwicke is represented as having decided, that if a mortgagee gave to his mortgagor the deeds of the mortgage, and that fact was proved, that was a gift of the money for which the deeds were a security, and not within the statute of frauds. Now the whole, or the greater part of the difficulty in determining whether the gift of a mortgage can be a good donatio causâ mortis, turns upon this, that the question arises how far the statute of frauds will allow of that. Lord Hardwicke was of opinion, according to this case of Richards v. Symes, that if a mortgagee gave to a mortgagor the deeds, the statute of frauds would not stand in the way: he held clearly that the mortgagee cannot get back the deeds from the mortgagor; then he said that the documents, the deeds being in the hands of the mortgagor, though the estate in the land was still in the mortgagee, yet by operation of law a trust would be created in the mortgagee to make good a gift of the debt to the mortgagor, to whom he had delivered the deeds, as the evidence that he forgave the debt and gave it up. We must consider the difference between the actual estate and a mortgage—and recollect that although a mortgage vests an estate in land, (a fee simple mortgage of course vests [538] a fee simple estate in land,) yet it may be represented that there are two estates, one in the mortgagor and another in the mortgagee. A mortgage, for instance, does not revoke the will of the testator. A mortgage does not give dower—it is, in truth, nothing more than a pledge, and if the right to the principal is divested out of the mortgagee by a valid act to divest the right of the principal, the other is considered as what they call an accident, and then the question arises—not whether the land can be got out of the mortgagee without a conveyance, but whether, if the land is to be considered as still remaining vested in the mortgagee, he is not, by operation of law, a trustee for the mortgagor, bound to answer the subpoena of that mortgagor to reconvey the estate to him, and to execute the requisites of the statute of frauds.

In the case of Hassell v. Tynte, Lord Hardwicke makes the observation in giving his judgment:—that the case of Richards v. Symes was not a precedent of very considerable value; because, he says, that he had directed issues to try whether there was a gift by the mortgagee to the mortgagor, and those issues having ended in deciding that there was not, he considered that a precedent of very little authority. I consider it, however, as a precedent of very considerable authority in such a case as this. It is reported at length in Barnardiston's Chancery Cases, and when I mention that reporter, I am sorry to have to add, that I am old enough to remember Lord Mansfield, who practised under Lord Hardwicke, by whom all these cases were decided, state his opinion of these reports, for he knew the man. I take the liberty of saying, that in that book there are reports of very great authority. The case happens to be reported likewise in [539] another book of no very high character. I mean the second volume of the Equity Cases abridged. It is not so high in character as the first volume of the Equity Cases abridged, but the case as there reported, is reported from a manuscript note, and from a manuscript note which I think is better entitled to credit for this reason; that having called in assistance in this case (which I believe will be the first absolute determination upon the subject, though I think there is a great deal laid down in the cases which ought to lead us to decide what ought to be a good donatio mortis causa), I have found authority to consider that report to be a very correct report, in the library and in the mind, which are both equally large storehouses of equity learning—I mean the library and mind of Lord Redesdale. Upon this occasion, he has had the goodness to hunt through all the books he has upon the subject, as well manuscript as printed, and I come to the foundation of my opinion, with all the assistance I can have from that quarter.

According to both the reports, an issue had been directed. If there had been a good delivery, Lord Hardwicke seems to consider that the interest in the land would have passed: "But in all these cases," he says, "there is a difference, both at law and in equity, between absolute estates in fee or for a term of years, and conditional estates for security of money. In the case of absolute estates, it cannot be admitted that parol proof of the gift of deeds shall convey the land itself. But where a mortgage is made of an estate, that is only considered as a security for the money due, the land is the accident attending upon the other (and principal object), "and when the debt is discharged the interest in the land follows of course." A trust [540] of the land then arises by operation of law: when a deed is given a trust also arises by operation of law. "At law, the interest in the land is thereby defeated, and in equity a trust arises for the benefit of the mortgagor;" and his Lordship said, that "if an obligee delivers up a bond with intent to discharge the debt, the debt will certainly be thereby discharged, and the mortgage with it;" and if the bond is discharged in the present case, it is very difficult to say that the mortgage debt, as debt, will not be discharged also.

In reasoning the case of Ward v. Turner, and pointing out the distinction there is between the delivery of a mere chattel, and the delivery of any thing which forms part of the title, Lord Hardwicke says this—and I find by a manuscript note in the possession of the noble Lord I have mentioned, that this is exceedingly correct—“Suppose it had been a mortgage in question, and a separate receipt had been taken for the mortgage money, not on the back of the deed (which was a very common way formerly, and is frequently seen in the evidence of ancient titles), and the mortgagee had delivered over this separate receipt for the consideration money, that would not have been a good delivery of the possession, nor given the mortgage mortis causâ, by force of the act.” (2 Ves. 143.) To be sure, that reasoning is quite idle, unless Lord Hardwicke meant to say that delivery of the deed, with a receipt upon the back of it, not by force of the delivery of the receipt on the back of it, but by force of the delivery of the deed, would be a good donatio causâ mortis.

The case of Richards v. Symes was argued by Lord Mansfield, then Mr. Murray. The case of Ward v. Turner was also argued by Lord Mans[541]-field, then Mr. Murray; and he appears to have a strong recollection of it, when he got into the Court of King's Bench, where sometimes equity has been rather more misunderstood than it ought to be, which has perhaps led some men belonging to that Court to abuse equity, when they knew nothing about the matter. There is a case in the second volume of Burrows' Reports (Martin v. Moulin, 2 Burr. 979)—a case of very great importance—a case in which a man devised lands: the will, I think, was not attested by three witnesses, but he described the object of his devise of land. There was enough in his will to shew that he meant to pass the personal interest in his property, and it was a question, whether there was a good devise of the mortgage or not. The land itself could not be said to be devised: but the Court of King's Bench held that it was a very good bequest of the personal interest: and Lord Mansfield, in summing up all this sort of doctrine, says—“A mortgage is a charge upon the land, and whatever would pass the money will carry the estate in the land along with it to every purpose.” (That I admit is equity.) “The estate in the land is the same thing as the money due upon it—it will be liable to debts—it will go to executors—it will pass by a will not made and executed with the solemnities required by the statute of frauds. The assignment of the debt or forgiving it, will draw the land after it as a consequence: nay, it would do it, though the debt were forgiven only by parol, for the right to the land would follow notwithstanding the statute of frauds.”

I ought to do it in a spirit of great humility, when I question the doctrine of Lord Mansfield. If he meant by that to say that such acts done with the [542] money will have the effect in a Court of Equity of enabling you to call for a conveyance of land, I am ready to agree with him; but to say that the land is to be considered as passing under such circumstances, is that to which I cannot agree; but still I maintain that the doctrine from first to last is correct, provided you lay the foundation in the intent of the gift, that the debt is well given or well forgiven; and then, as the result of that interest so given, you say that the party who has the land becomes in equity a trustee for the person entitled to the money and to the personal estate.

Lord Hardwicke, with respect to the bond (and it is necessary that I should take some notice of this, because there has been a change in the law which that great judge did not foresee, but which, in later times, and in my own time, has become very familiar in the courts of law,) Lord Hardwicke states, as one ground of his opinion in the case of the bond, that it is a good gift causâ mortis, because he says he who has got the bond may do what he pleases with it. He certainly disables the person who has not got the bond from bringing an action upon it: for, says Lord Hardwicke, no man ever heard (and I have seen in the manuscript of the same Lord Hardwicke, that he said no man ever will hear) that a person shall bring an action upon a bond without the product of that bond; but we have now got into a practice of sliding from courts of equity into courts of law, the doctrine respecting lost instruments: and I take the liberty most humbly of saying, that when that doctrine was so transplanted, it was transplanted upon the idea, that the thing might be as well conducted in a court of law as in a Court of Equity, a doctrine which cannot be held by any person who knows what [543] the doctrine of Courts of Equity is as to a lost instrument.

Then, if the delivery of a bond would, as it is admitted, (notwithstanding any change in the doctrine about property)—if the delivery of a bond would give the debt in that bond, so as to secure to the donee of that bond the debt so given by the delivery of the bond, the question is, whether the person having got, by the delivery of that bond, a right to call upon the executor to make his title by suing or giving him authority to sue upon the bond, what are we to do with the other securities if they are not given up? But there is another question to which an answer is to be given:—what are we to do with respect to the other securities, if they are delivered? In the one case, the bond and mortgage are delivered: in the other the judgment, which is to be considered on the same ground as a specialty, is delivered—with that, the evidences of the debts are all delivered. The instrument containing the covenant to pay is delivered. They are all delivered in such a way that the donor could never have got the deeds back again. Then the question is, whether, regard being had to what is the nature of a mortgage, contradistinguishing it from an estate in land, those circumstances do not as effectually give the property in the debt as if the debt was secured by a bond only?

The opinion which I have formed is, that this is a good donatio mortis causâ, raising by operation of law a trust: a trust which being raised by operation of law, is not within the statute of frauds, but a trust which a Court of Equity will execute; and therefore, in my humble judgment, this declaration must be altered by stating that this lady, the daughter, is entitled to the benefit of these securities, and with a [544] direction to the Court of Equity to proceed in the cause, on the ground of the principle to be found in such a declaration to be made by your Lordships, which, with respect to that part of the case, I take the liberty to advise your Lordships to adopt.

29 June, 1827. Ordered and adjudged by the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled, that the said decree of the Court of Chancery of the 17th April, 1823, be, and the same is hereby reversed, in so far as it declares, "That the said Court being of opinion that a mortgage security cannot by law be given by way of donatio mortis causâ, the Plaintiff, Emily Frances Duffield, is not entitled to the mortgage monies secured by the indentures of the 2d and 3d days of November, 1820, and the said bond of the 12th day of July, 1820, and by the said indentures of lease and release and mortgage dated the 11th and 12th days of July, 1820." And it is further ordered, that the said cause be referred back to the Court of Chancery, to proceed therein in such manner as shall be consistent with this Judgment.

Upon immaterial issues it is not necessary that verdicts should be given. The jury may be discharged from giving such verdicts without consent of the parties.

This was a writ of error, brought on the affirmance by the Exchequer Chamber of a judgment of the Court of King's Bench, in an action of assumpsit.

The action was commenced in Michaelmas Term, 1824, issue was joined as of Hilary term, 1825, and the cause was tried in the vacation after Hilary Term, in that year.

The declaration consisted of twenty counts. The twelve first counts were for special damages, alleged to have been sustained by the Plaintiffs below, and their late partner, Francisco Bernis, in his lifetime, and by them after the death of their late partner, in the sale by the Defendants below, and their late partner, Robert Mitchell, of a quantity of wool consigned to them by the Plaintiffs below, and their late partner, Francisco Bernis, for sale. The 13th, 14th, [546] 15th, and 16th counts, were for money paid, laid out, and expended; money had and received; money due for interest, and upon an account stated in the lifetime of Francisco Bernis and Robert Mitchell; and the 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th counts were similar counts, except that they were laid after the deaths of Francisco Bernis and Robert Mitchell. The Defendants below put in several pleas. To the first sixteen counts of the declaration, they pleaded the general issue, and to the four last counts, they also pleaded the general issue; they then pleaded the statute of limitations to the whole declaration, and to the eight last counts they pleaded a set off.

Upon the two first pleas the Plaintiffs below joined issue: to the third plea they replied, that before and at the time when the several causes of action in the declaration mentioned arose, the Plaintiffs below resided, and from thence had been resident beyond the seas, and that Francisco Bernis at the time when the causes of action in the first sixteen counts mentioned arose, and from thence until the time of his death, was resident beyond the seas; and to the last plea they replied, that they were not indebted to the Plaintiffs below in the manner and form pleaded: on which issue was joined.

To this replication of the Plaintiffs below as to the third plea, so far as the same related to the first sixteen counts of the declaration, the Defendants below rejoined, that the Plaintiffs below and Francisco Bernis were not resident beyond the seas, on which issue was joined: and so far as the same related to the four last counts, the Defendants below rejoined, that the Plaintiffs below were not resident beyond the seas, on which also issue was joined.

[547] On the trial of the cause below, a verdict was found for the Plaintiffs below, on the general issue, as to the twelve first counts of the declaration, with £24,000 damages, and for the Defendants below, on the general issue, as to the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th counts; and also on the general issue, as to the four last counts of the declaration. And as to the issue joined on the rejoinder of the Defendants below, to the replication of the Plaintiffs below, to the third plea of the Defendants below, so far as the same related to the twelve first counts of the declaration, a verdict was found for the Plaintiffs below; but as to the same issue, so far as it related to the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th counts of the declaration, and also as to the issue joined on the rejoinder of the Defendants below, to the replication of the Plaintiffs below, to the third plea of the Defendants below, so far as it related to the four last counts of the declaration; and also as to the issue joined on the replication of the Plaintiffs below, to the last plea of the Defendants below, as to the eight last counts of the declaration, the Jurors were discharged from giving any verdict.

In Easter Term, 1825, judgment was given in the Court of King's Bench, for the Plaintiffs below, as to the twelve first counts of the declaration, and for the Defendants below, as to the eight last counts. Upon this judgment a writ of error was brought in the Exchequer Chamber, and the Plaintiffs in error assigned for error the common errors, and also that it appeared by the record, that as to the eight last counts of the declaration and the several issues respectively joined thereon, the Jury were discharged from giving their verdict thereon; nevertheless it did not appear in and by the record, that the [548] Plaintiffs in error consented that the Jury should be so discharged.

In Michaelmas Term, 1825, the Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed the judgment of the Court of King's Bench.

Upon this judgment of affirmance, the Plaintiffs in error brought their writ of error in Parliament, and assigned for error the common errors, and also that by the record it appeared, that as to the issue joined between the parties on the rejoinder of the Defendants below, to the replication of the Plaintiffs below, to the plea of the Defendants below, by them thirdly pleaded, so far as the same relates to the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th counts of the declaration; and also as to the issue joined between the parties upon the said rejoinder of the Defendants below, to the replication of the Plaintiffs below, to the plea of the Defendants below, by them thirdly pleaded, so far as the same relates to the last four counts of the said declaration; and as to the issue joined between the parties on the replication of the Plaintiffs below, to the plea of the Defendants below, by them lastly pleaded, as to the several promises and undertakings in the eight last counts of the said declaration mentioned, the Jury were discharged from giving any verdict thereon, nevertheless it did not appear in and by the said record, that the Defendants below consented that the Jury should be so discharged. And also, that by the said record it appeared that as to the several issues thirdly and lastly joined between the parties, the Jury were discharged from giving any verdict thereon, nevertheless it did not appear in and by the said record that the Defendants below consented that the Jury should be so discharged.

[549] The Defendants in error pleaded in nullo est erratum.

For the Plaintiffs in error: The Solicitor-General and Mr. Pattison.

After the Jurors appointed to try the cause below, had been sworn to try the several issues joined between the parties in the cause, and a true verdict give according to the evidence, it was not competent for the Court below to discharge the Jurors from giving any verdict, as to any of the issues, without the consent of the parties, and it does not appear that the Plaintiffs in error consented to their being so discharged.

By such discharging the Jury the situation of the Plaintiffs in error, as to their claim for costs, has been altered. For the Jurors having returned a verdict for the Defendants in error, on all the issues joined between the parties, so far as they relate to the twelve first counts of the declaration, the Defendants in error became intitled to the general costs of the cause, deducting the costs of such issues as were found for the Plaintiffs in error; but in consequence of the Jurors being discharged from finding any verdict on the special issues joined between the parties, as to the eight last counts of the declaration, the Plaintiffs in error have been chargeable with the cost of such special issues, instead of the same being deducted as they would have been, had the Jurors found a verdict for the Plaintiffs in error thereon, as they ought to have done.

For the Defendants in error: Mr. Gurney, Mr. Brodrick (and Mr. Tidd).

The jury having found a verdict for the Defendants in error, on the issue joined on the first plea, so far as the same relates to the promises and [550] undertakings in the first twelve counts of the declaration mentioned, with £24,000 damages, and costs of suit, and for the Plaintiffs in error, on the same issue, so far as it relates to the promises and undertakings in the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth counts, and also on the issue joined on the second plea, as to the promises and undertakings in the last four counts of the declaration; and having also found a verdict for the Defendants in error, on the issue joined on the rejoinder to the replication to the plea of the Statute of Limitations, as to the first twelve counts of the declaration, it became, and was wholly immaterial and unnecessary for the jury to find any verdict on the last-mentioned issue, as to the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth counts, or on the issue joined on the rejoinder to the Replication to the last-mentioned plea, as to the last four counts of the declaration, or on the issue joined on the replication to the plea of set off, as to the several promises and undertakings in the last eight counts of the declaration mentioned; and the jurors were therefore properly discharged from giving any verdict thereon (see Barnes, 461. 2 H. Blac. 393. 2 Barn and Ald. 546).

The jury having so found a verdict for the Plaintiffs in error, on the issue joined on the first plea, so far as the same relates to the promises and undertakings in the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth counts; and also on the issue joined on the second plea, as to the promises and undertakings in the last four counts of the declaration mentioned, and thereby negatived the supposed causes of action in the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth, and also in the last four counts respectively mentioned, could not have found whether the Defendants [551] in error, and Francisco Bernis, were or were not at the respective times, when those several causes of action did respectively accrue to them in parts beyond the seas (2 H. Blac. 246); or that the Defendants in error, before or at the time of the commencement of the action, were indebted to the Plaintiffs in error, in any sum of money exceeding the damage sustained by the Defendants in error, by reason of the not performing of the several supposed promises and undertaking in the last eight counts of the declaration mentioned.

If the jury had found a verdict for the Plaintiffs in error, on the issue joined on the rejoinders to the replication to the plea of the Statute of Limitations, as to the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth, and last four counts of the declaration, or on the issue joined on the replication to the plea of set-off, as to the several promises and undertakings in the last eight counts of the said declaration mentioned, the Plaintiffs in error would not have been entitled to any costs thereon. Postan v. Stanway, Exrtr (5 East, 261), House v. Thames Commissioners (3 Brod. and Bing. 117), Edwards v. Bethel (1 Barn. and Ald. 251).

At common law (Com. Dig. Title, Pleader S. 27), it was sufficient if the substance of the issue were found, or so much of it as would have maintained the action or defence. And since the statute, 4 Anne, c. 16, sec. 4, which allows the Defendant to plead several matters, if any one or more of the issues joined on several pleas be found for the Plaintiff or Defendant, which entitle him to judgment on the whole record, the Court will give judgment thereon, notwithstanding there be no verdict, [552] or a bad or imperfect verdict on other issues, the finding upon which, in consequence becomes immaterial. Bartlett v. Spooner (Barnes, 461), Barber v. Dixon (1 Wils. 11), Cossey v. Diggon (2 Barn and Ald. 546), Rawlins (2 H. Blac. 391, n.).

As it appears by the postea, returned by the Chief Justice, before whom the cause was tried, and is certified by him, as part of the proceedings at the trial, that the jurors were discharged from giving any verdict as to the issues joined on the rejoinder to the replication to the third plea of the Statute of Limitations, so far as the same relates to the thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth, and last four counts of the declaration, and also on the issue joined on the replication to the last plea of set off, as to the several supposed promises and undertakings in the last eight counts of the declaration, it must be presumed, that the jurors were duly and rightly discharged from giving any verdict thereon (3 Bing. 381).

The Plaintiffs in error could not have sustained any damage by the jurors having been so discharged from giving any verdict on the last-mentioned issues; and, it was not the business of the Defendants in error, but of the Plaintiffs in error, to have the last-mentioned issues determined, if they had been so disposed, or imagined that thereby they might be entitled to costs, or any other advantage (Barnes, 462).

The Lord Chancellor (Lyndhurst): The jury having found a verdict for the Plaintiffs on the material issues, the cause was in substance at an end. To what purpose should any thing further have been done.

The consent of parties to the discharge of the jury, is now held unnecessary. The judges of their own authority in many modern cases have dis-[553]-charged the jurors without finding verdicts upon all the issues, and without consent of parties. Applications upon this ground for new trials have frequently been refused, which is, in principle and substance, the same thing.

Judgment affirmed, with £ costs.

ENGLAND.

(CHANCERY.)

JOHN VERNON, Esquire.—Appellant; The Right Honourable JOHN Earl of EGMONT, ARCHIBALD MORTON, and ARCHIBALD RODICK, Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. vi. 1303. See Dobson v. Carpenter 1850, 12 Beav. 372; and 22 and 23 Viet. c. 35, s. 29.]

E. being tenant for life under a deed of settlement, with a power to lease under certain restrictions, grants leases not in conformity with the power and dies, leaving by will the residue of his personality to J. E. his son, the next remainderman under the settlement.

J. E. having called upon the executors to pay the residue, they require an indemnity against the contingent claims of the tenants in case of eviction, and upon the refusal of J. E. to give such indemnity, he files a bill against them for an account and payment of the residue.

Held, (reversing the judgment of the court below) that as J. E. had the power to disturb the leases, he was bound either to confirm them, or to give the indemnity required, and that the executor had a right to hold the residue, till he obtained the confirmation or indemnity.

On the 2d day of November, 1822, the Respondent, the Earl of Egmont, filed his original bill against the Appellant, stating the will of his father, John James, late Earl of Egmont, dated the 26th July, 1813, whereby, amongst other things, he gave and bequeathed to his wife Isabella Countess of Egmont, during her life, one annual sum of £500, to be chargeable upon and payable out of the manors of Spaxton, Aley, and Plausfield, in the county of Somerset, (except the estates comprised in his marriage settlement) and subject thereto, and also charged with the sum of [555] £12,000 due on mortgage of the said estates, or some part thereof; the testator devised the same to the use of his son the Respondent, then John Lord Viscount Percival, and the heirs male of his body with various remainders over; and after reciting that he was entitled to the reversion in fee simple of and in divers estates in the said county, and also of other estates in the county of Cork, in the Kingdom of Ireland as therein mentioned, he gave and devised the same to the same uses as before expressed concerning his estates in the county of Somerset; and after bequeathing to his wife as therein is mentioned, directed that the monies in the hands of his bankers should be applied in payment of his debts, (except mortgage debts, which were to be raised out of the estates whereon the same were respectively charged) and of the legacies given by his will, and such other legacies as he might give by any codicil thereto. The surplus of such monies and all other his monies and personal estate, he gave to his son the Respondent; and he appointed his wife and the Appellant executrix and executor of his will, and gave the Appellant £100 for his trouble in the execution of his will.

The bill further stated that the testator by a codicil to his will, dated the 5th of May, 1820, gave to Elizabeth White, then in his service, an annuity or yearly sum of £150 during her life, and for securing the same, directed his executors, out of his personal estate, to invest a sufficient sum in their names to produce such annuity; and he gave the interest of the sum so to be invested to the Respondent, John, Earl of Egmont, until the decease of his (the testator's) wife; and he likewise gave to the Respondent the principal and any arrear of interest on the decease of Elizabeth White. The bill further stated, that Isabella, Countess of Egmont, died in the lifetime of the testator, whereby all the [556] bequests given to her by the will lapsed; that the testator died in the month of February, 1822, without having altered or revoked the codicil; and that the Appellant duly proved the will and codicil in the proper Ecclesiastical Court.

The bill prayed that an account might be taken of the personal estate and effects of the testator, and of all such parts thereof as were possessed or received by the Appellant, or by any person by his order or for his use, and the funeral and testamentary expences of the testator and of his debts, as well those due on mortgage as others, and of the legacies and annuities bequeathed by his will and codicil; and that a competent part of the personal estate might be applied in the payment and discharge of such of the testator's debts and legacies as then remained unsatisfied, if any such there were; and that a competent sum of money might be set apart and invested, if the same had not already been done, in the purchase of stock in the public funds to answer the annuity of £150, and that the clear residue of the testator's personal estate and effects might be ascertained and paid to the Respondent, John, Earl of Egmont, as such residuary legatee, and that all proper and necessary accounts might be taken, and directions given for effectuating the said purposes.

The Appellant, John Vernon, on the 10th day of December, 1822, put in his answer to the Respondent's bill, and thereby admitted the will and codicil, the decease of the Countess of Egmont and of testator, that the Appellant had proved the will and codicil, and had possessed himself of the personal estate and effects of the testator, or as much as he was able, and had, out of the produce thereof, paid the funeral and testamentary expences of the testator, and such of his debts as had come to the Appellant's knowledge, and had set apart and invested a sufficient sum of money to secure the payment of the annuity of £150 and certain other annuities which the testator before his death desired might be paid to certain of his servants; which annuities the Respondent, by deed under his hand and seal, dated the 4th day of March, 1822, authorised the Appellant to pay and provide for out of the testator's personal estate; and that after such payment and appropriation, and after retaining the legacy of £100 bequeathed to the Appellant by the will, there remained in the hands of the Appellant a considerable surplus of the testator's personal estate and effects: but the Appellant submitted whether he ought to have paid over such surplus to the Respondent, in as much as he had received a formal notice from Messrs. Morton and Rodick of an assignment by way of mortgage, bearing date the 19th day of April, 1822, whereby the Respondent assigned to Archibald Morton and Archibald Rodick all the monies and balances of the testator at the time of his decease, in the hands of his bankers, and all other the personal estate bequeathed to the said Respondent by the said will for securing to the said Archibald Morton and Archibald Rodick the sum of £2031 10s. and interest.

The Appellant by his answer further stated, that the testator, being tenant for life of certain real estates in the county of Somerset, and also in the kingdom of Ireland, with remainder to the Respondent, John, Earl of Egmont, in tail, with powers to the testator, under certain restrictions, to grant leases of the estates; he, the testator, had granted various leases of the estates, with covenants for quiet possession; and that such leases, or some of them, were not warranted by the power which the testator possessed; [558] and the Appellant, having been informed that the Respondent intended to avoid the leases, and being apprehensive that he, the Appellant, would be liable to costs and damages as executor of the testator, in actions to be brought by the tenants, under these circumstances submitted, that some indemnity should be provided against such claims, before he paid to the Respondent, the Earl of Egmont, the balance of the testator's personal property.

The bill was afterwards amended, and the Respondents, Archibald Morton and Archibald Rodick, were made defendants, who put in their answer, claiming to be paid a debt due to them from the Respondent, the Earl of Egmont, out of what might be found due to him in respect of the residue of his father's estate.

On the 15th February, 1823, the cause was heard at the Rolls, when a decree was made, directing an account of the personal estate of the testator, not specifically bequeathed, which had come to the hands of the Appellant, the surviving executor, or to the hands of any person or persons by his order or for his use; and it was ordered that the Master should also take an account of the testator's debts, funeral expences, and legacies, and of the annuities given by his will and codicil, and that the personal estate of the testator, not specifically bequeathed, should be applied in payment of his debts and funeral expences, and then in payment of his legacies and of the arrears of the annuities given by his will and codicil; and it was ordered that the Master should enquire and state to the Court whether there were any and what claims affecting the testator's personal estate in the hands of the Appellant, in respect of any leases executed by the testator not in conformity with his power of [559] leasing; and the Master was to be at liberty to state any special circumstances relating thereto as he should think fit; and it was further ordered that the Master should ascertain and certify of what the clear residue of the testator's personal estate would consist, and the Court reserved the consideration of all further directions and of the costs of the suit until after the Master should have made his report.

In pursuance of the decree, the Master made his report on the 20th February, 1824, and thereby stated, among other things, that the sum of £585 11s. 11d. was then remaining in the hands of the Appellant on the balance of his account of the testator's personal estate not specifically bequeathed; that other part of the testator's personal estate consisted of the sum of £2000 received by the Respondent; of sundry arrears of rent due from the testator's estate in the county of Somerset at the time of his decease, which were received by the Respondent by virtue of a power of attorney from the Appellant; of £3000 exchequer bills; also of £10,000 three per cent. consolidated annuities, appropriated to answer the several annuities given by the will and codicil, and confirmed by the Respondent's deed of the 4th day of March, 1822; of sundry jewels, a carriage and horses, and harness, which were possessed by the Respondent upon the decease of the testator; and of the principal sums of £12,000, £3000, £710, £9000, and £11,000, due on mortgage at the testator's decease, and paid by the Appellant out of the personal estate, together with interest thereon from the day of the decease of the testator.

The Master further reported that the debts due from the testator proved before him, were of the [560] nature of simple contract debts, and amounted in the whole to the sum of £568 11s. 8d. and that no other debts of the testator remained due and unsatisfied; and that he had proceeded to enquire whether there were any and what claims affecting the testator's personal estate in the hands of the Appellant, in respect of any leases granted by the testator not in conformity with his power of leasing; that the Respondent had been examined upon interrogatories, and there were not, as he knew or believed, any claims affecting the personal estate in the hands of the Appellant, in respect of any leases, executed by the testator not in conformity with his power of leasing.

The Master further reported, that a state of facts and charge had also been laid before him on behalf of the Appellant, thereby stating that by indentures of lease and release, dated the 17th and 18th January, 1791, the release made between the testator of the first part, the Respondent, then John Percival, Esquire, commonly called Lord Viscount Percival, of the second part; Samuel Vines, therein described, of the third part, and John Vernon, the elder, therein also described, of the fourth part; the testator and the Respondent duly conveyed all the honors, manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments therein mentioned and described, in the county of Cork, in Ireland, unto and to the use of the said John Vernon, his heirs and assigns, in order to make him tenant to the precipe, that common recoveries might be suffered thereof, which recoveries were thereby declared to enure to the use of the testator for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to and for such uses, trusts, intents, and purposes, as the testator and the Respondent, John, Earl of Egmont, during their joint lives, should ap-[561]-point; and in default thereof, and in case any appointment should be made of only part of the premises, or of only part of the whole estate and interest therein, then as concerning the premises which should remain unappointed and undisposed of, or concerning which no complete appointment should be made, and when the estates thereby appointed should respectively determine to such uses as the Respondent, in case he should survive the testator, should appoint; and in default of such appointment, and in case any such should be made of only part of the premises, or of only part of the whole estate and interest therein, then as concerning the premises which should remain unappointed or undisposed of, or concerning which no complete appointment should be made, and when the estates thereby appointed should determine to the use of the Respondent during his life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder to the use of the said John Vernon and Samuel Vines and their heirs, to preserve contingent remainders with remainder to the use of the first son of the body of the Respondent, lawfully to be begotten in tail male, with divers remainders over; and it was thereby declared that it should be lawful for the testator from time to time during his life, and after his decease for the Respondent during his life, to demise any part of the premises to any person or persons for any term or number of years not exceeding twenty-one years in possession and not in reversion, and so as there should be reserved on every demise the best and most improved yearly rent to be incident to the immediate reversion that could be reasonably had or gotten for the same, without taking any fine premium or foregift, and so as there should be therein contained conditions of re-entry for non-payment of the rents; and so as the [562] same were so framed as there be not therein contained any clause whereby any power should be given to the lessee to commit waste, or whereby any lessee should be exempted from punishment for committing waste, and so as the lessees executed counterparts of their respective leases; and further stating that by indentures of lease and release, dated respectively 21st and 22d January, 1791, the release made between the testator of the 1st part, the Respondent of the 2d, the said Samuel Vines of the 3d part, and the said John Vernon the elder of the 4th part; the testator and the said Respondent conveyed certain estates therein mentioned and described, situated in the county of Somerset, unto and to the use of the said John Vernon, his heirs and assigns, in order to make him tenant to the precipe, that common recoveries might be suffered thereof, which recoveries were thereby declared to enture to the same uses, intents, and purposes as were declared by the indenture of release of the 18th January, 1791, concerning the estates therein comprised, with the like powers for the testator during his life, and after his decease for the Respondent during his life, to demise any part of the said premises, except the castle or capital messuage of Enmore, and the gardens, demesne lands, and appurtenances therewith held and enjoyed, for any term or number of years not exceeding 21 years in possession and not in reversion, in like manner as was provided in and by the indenture of the 18th January, 1791, as to the estates therein comprised.

And the Master further reported, that by such state of facts it appeared that recoveries were duly suffered pursuant to the covenants contained in the two several indentures of release; and that the testator continued during his life in possession of the hereditaments and premises by virtue of the limitations [563] contained in the said indentures, and the recoveries suffered in pursuance thereof, and that the said estates were of the annual value of £14,000; and that the testator, while he was in possession thereof, alone executed many leases of the same estates, or the greater part thereof, upon the terms mentioned in such leases, and that they contained covenants on the part of the testator for quiet possession; and that the said leases, or most of them, were not in conformity with the testator's powers of leasing, inasmuch as they were for longer terms, and conferred greater powers on the lessees than the testator by the said powers was authorized to grant; and that some of the tenants paid fines for the granting of their leases, and that others had laid out considerable sums of money in improving the estates so demised to them; and that the Respondent was in the possession of the estates by virtue of the limitations aforesaid, and that the Respondent, having a son who might upon the Respondent's decease become entitled to the said estates under the aforesaid limitations, the Appellant charged that so many of the leases granted by the testator as were not in conformity with his powers of leasing, might be avoided, and the lessees might, upon eviction under such leases, have claims against the personal estate of the testator upon his covenants for quiet possession.

The state of facts and charge being admitted by the Respondent, the Master allowed the same, and found that as to such leases as had been granted by the testator not in conformity with his power of leasing, the lessees upon their eviction might have such claims affecting the testator's personal estate in the hands of the Appellant in respect of such leases; and the Master found, that subject to the payment of the testator's debts proved before [564] him, and also subject to any claims which might affect the testator's personal estate in respect of any leases executed by him not in conformity with his power of leasing, the clear residue of the same consisted of the sum of £585 11s. 11d. in the hands of the Appellant; of the sum of £10,000 Bank 3 per cent. annuities, standing in the name of the Appellant, set apart to answer the payment of the several annuities aforesaid; of £3000 exchequer bills; of £1000 cash advanced to the Respondent by the Appellant out of the testator's personal estate; of the sum of £2000 received and possessed by the Respondent as aforesaid; of the arrears of rent due at the testator's decease and possessed by the Respondent; of the jewels and other articles mentioned to have been possessed by the Respondent; and also the several mortgage sums mentioned to have been paid out of the testator's personal estate.

On the 29th July, 1821, the cause came on to be heard before the Right Honorable the Master of the Rolls for further directions upon the Master's report.

It was contended on the part of the Appellant, that before the residue of the testator's personal estate was ordered to be paid to the Respondent the Earl of Egmont, or his assigns, the Earl of Egmont should either confirm the leases granted by the testator, not in conformity with his power, or otherwise that he should give a satisfactory indemnity to the Appellant against any claims which might be made against him as the personal representative of the late Earl, in respect of the said leases, and all costs, charges, damages and expenses which the Appellant might incur or be subjected to in respect thereof.

On the part of the Respondent it was contended, that he was not bound either to confirm the leases or give an indemnity.

[565] The Court ordered that it should be referred to the Master to tax all parties their costs of the suit as between solicitor and client, and that it should be referred back to the Master to carry on the account of the testator's personal estate from the foot of his report come to the hands of the Appellant, or to the hands of any person by his order or for his use; and that the Master should take an account of the amount and value of testator's personal estate possessed and received by the Respondent as in the Master's report mentioned; and it was ordered that the following exchequer bills, (that is to say,) Nos. 2963, 2964, and 2965, dated the 14th day of June, 1824, for £1000 each, part of the testator's personal estate in the hands of the Appellant, should be deposited in the Bank by the Appellant with the privy of the Accountant General of the Court in trust in the cause; and it was ordered that the same when so deposited should be sold with the privy of the Accountant General, and for that purpose the exchequer bills were to be delivered out to one of the cashiers of the bank, who was to receive the money to arise by such sale, and upon receipt thereof was to pay the same into the bank with the privy of the Accountant General, to be there placed to the credit of this cause, and out of the money to arise by sale of the exchequer bills when paid into the bank. It was ordered that such costs when taxed should be paid to the solicitors for the respective parties; and it was ordered that the several sums by the Master's report, dated the 26th day of February, 1824, reported to be due to the several creditors therein named should be paid to such creditors respectively, or to the legal personal representatives of such of them as might be dead; and it was referred to the Master to take an account of what [566] was due from the Respondent the Earl of Egmont, to the Respondents Archibald Morton and Archibald Rodick for principal and interest upon the security for the assignment of the 19th day of April, 1822; and it was ordered, that the residue of the monies to arise by sale of the exchequer bills, after payment of the debts and costs, should be applied as follows, (that is to say) so much thereof as the Master should find to be due to Archibald Morton and Archibald Rodick, upon the security from the Respondent, should be paid to them, and the residue thereof should be paid to the Respondent, John, Earl of Egmont; and it was ordered, that the £10,000 3 per cent, consolidated bank annuities, reported to be standing in the name of the Appellant, should be transferred by the Appellant into the name and with the privy of the Accountant General, in trust in the said cause, to an account to be entitled, "the annuity account;" and out of the dividends to accrue thereon from time to time, it was ordered that the several annuities should be paid in manner therein mentioned; and upon the death of the annuitants respectively, any person or persons were to be at liberty to apply to the Court concerning the bank annuities as they should be advised, and the Master was to be at liberty to make a separate report or separate reports of any of the matters thereby referred to him as he should think proper, and any of the parties were to be at liberty to apply to the Court as they should be advised.

This order was enrolled.

Against so much of this order as directs that the residue of the money to arise by sale of the exchequer bills after payment of the debts and costs should be applied in manner directed by the decree (that is to say), that so much thereof as the Master should find to be due to [567] Archibald Morton and Archibald Rodick, from the Respondent the Earl of Egmont, on their security, should be paid to them, and that the residue thereof should be paid to the Respondent, without making a provision for the protection of the Appellant against the claims of the lessees under leases granted by the testator, the Appellant presented a petition of appeal.

For the Appellant, Mr. Shadwell and Mr. Pemberton.

The judgment in this case rested upon the ground that this was a contingent covenant (Arg. 30 March). But in Simmonds v. Bolland (3 Mer. 547) the covenants were various, and the indemnity was given accordingly; so in Hawkins v. Day (Amb. 160), it was doubtful whether the executor would ever become liable upon breach of the covenant which depended upon a contingency. Eeles v. Lambert (Ayleyn, 38, Styles, 37, 54, 73), and Nector and Sharp v. Gennet (Cro. Eliz. 466), were cases at law in which it was decided that a court of law should not interfere on the ground of outstanding covenants unbroken, to prohibit proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court to recover a legacy. But the jurisdiction of equity was at that time, and even as late as the time of the Commonwealth unsettled.

It was then an unsettled question whether an action might not be maintained for a legacy—Deeks v. Strutt (see 5 T. R. 690—the judgment of Lord Kenyon). If such were the law, at present, the ground of the judgment might be more solid. In those early times a legatee was compelled to give bond to the executor, on payment of the legacy to refund, in case [568] any debts should appear to be unsatisfied—Chamberlain v. Chamberlain (1 Ch. Ca. 257). That practice has been discontinued, because the law does not order the payment of legacies until the debts are ascertained. Where a debt from its nature cannot be ascertained, not being an existing liquidated demand, but one which may become a charge upon the estate, the principle of the ancient practice gives to the executor a right to indemnity. What defence would the executor have in a court of law upon action for damages in consequence of a breach of covenant? Could a Court of Equity protect the executor in such a case. Executors are protected in equity, and creditors excluded, because they have notice under the decree and the opportunity of receiving their debts, which if they neglect they are restrained by injunction if they proceed at law. But in this case, as there is no existing debt, there can be no notice, and therefore no injunction.

The executor has notice of the covenant, and that in effect it is broken—because his testator covenanted to secure that which it was not in his power to secure. The Respondent who makes the demand against the Appellant, as executor, may himself bring the charge upon the Appellant by ejecting the tenants. Could the tenants have any remedy in equity against the residuary legatee? Or ought the executor to be put to file a bill against the legatee to refund. In the case of the Queensberry Leases (Thomas v. Montgomery, in Chanc.), a large amount of assets was retained in court to answer the demands of lessees under similar circumstances.

Suppose the residuary legatee had also been ex-[569]-ecutor, could he say that he held the money not as executor, but as residuary legatee. The peculiarity of this case is, that as soon as the order issues to pay the money, the Respondent may bring ejectments against the tenants. If this be law, a tenant for life may grant leases exceeding the power at small rents, and upon large fines—the executor upon his death may hand over the assets to the younger children of the tenant for life, according to his will, and the tenants are left without remedy. It is asked whether an estate is to be kept for ever in chancery to abide a contingency. But here is a covenant ascertained to be incapable of being performed. We ask only for indemnity to be settled by the Master—an equity on behalf of creditors against volunteers.

For the Respondents, Mr. Horne and Mr. Roupell.

It is a startling proposition that estates are to be locked up for an indefinite time. The estates of deceased persons are generally subject to contingencies. Here is no creditor making a claim against the assets. The bill claims a residue, all questions of demand against the estate having been satisfied. The fund, it is stated, is subject to a contingent demand, and they ask for indemnity. The executor is always protected by a Court of Equity. In Vector and Sharp v. Gennet, a prohibition was refused, and the Ecclesiastical Court decreed the legacy, notwithstanding the existence of a bond, on the ground that the bond was contingent. It is said that the bond given by legatees to the Ecclesiastical Court, is a protection to the executor. But here the Appellant asks something more than a bond. As to Eeles v. Lambert, no judgment is to be found in either of the reports. In former times the Court of [570] Chancery required security from the legatees, but since the modern practice of inquiry as to debts has been introduced, the court has ceased to require such security (Anon. 1 Atk. 5).

The legacies may be recalled, if prior claims upon the assets should arise (Anon. 1 P. W. 195). In Noel v. Robinson, it is said that “common justice requires the legatee to refund.” The court now, never requires security. Suppose a creditor refuses to come in, does the court retain the fund? No; it distributes and gives to the executors equitable indemnity by injunction, as contradistinguished from legal defence. The case of Simmonds v. Bolland, is not precisely similar to this. There the executor was also a trustee, and there had been notice of a breach of covenant. The indemnity they seek must be by real, not personal security; and the practice would be attended with general inconvenience.

The Lord Chancellor: Lord Egmont has the power to dispute, or to confirm the leases: may he not be required before he receives the assets to confirm the leases? If a creditor, having a present debt, omits to claim it under the decree, he may be excluded. But this is the case of creditors who are not qualified to claim—even upon ejectment, not till after judgment. The case is of the utmost importance. A residuary legatee, having the power to disturb leases made by the testator, should confirm, or undertake not to disturb them before he takes the assets. Some security is necessary notwithstanding all the inconvenience attending that course of proceeding.

Mr. Horne: I only argue against indemnity. Lord Egmont is willing to consent that it should be [571] put on record, that he will not disturb the leases. As to the case of the Queensberry leases—the claims had been actually made, and the money was in court.

The Lord Chancellor: There being in that case so many claims by tenants, the court thought it right to retain the fund, while the numerous knotty points of Scotch law were investigated.

The bill, in this case, prays either indemnity or undertaking; and as the Plaintiff is willing to give the latter, does not this make an end of the cause? But this is not done till the parties come to the bar. It is not offered by the answer. There should be no costs on either side.

Upon this offer made by the Respondent's counsel, the case stood over that the Appellant, with the advice of his counsel, might consider whether he should accept the Respondent's undertaking. But it was afterwards ascertained, that the Respondent having assigned his interest and estate in the land, had deprived himself of the power of confirming the leases: whereupon the cause was again brought on for argument:

The Lord Chancellor said (6 April, 1827): that if it were necessary to decide the general principle, although he was inclined to think that the Appellant had a title, he should take much time for consideration: but that the case was special, as the Respondent had the power to confirm, or to disturb the leases, and that he ought not to take the fund out of the hands of the executor, without giving indemnity against any action which might be brought by the tenants, in case of eviction, on which special ground he should advise the House to reverse the decree.

[572] The Earl of Eldon: In this case, which has stood over for judgment, the residue of personal estate is demanded by the Respondent, who has the power to rescind the leases granted by the testator: and if he should do so, the Appellant, as executor of the lessor, will be liable in damages to the extent of assets received by him. Under these circumstances, the judgment, which, in substance, I propose, is, that the Appellant, upon having indemnity from the Respondent against the disturbance of the leases, should pay over the residue of the personality.

The Lords declare (29 June, 1827), that before the residue of the testator's personal estate shall be paid to the Respondent, the Earl of Egmont, or his assigns, the said Earl of Egmont ought either to confirm, or in case he is unable to confirm by his own act, to procure to be confirmed, the said Leases granted by the said testator, not in conformity with his powers, or otherwise give a satisfactory indemnity to the Appellant, against any claims which might be made against him, in respect of the said leases, and all costs, charges, damages, and expenses, which the Appellant might incur, or be subjected to in respect thereof: And it is further ordered, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery, to proceed therein, as shall be just and in conformity with this declaration.

[Mews' Dig. ii. 1073; S. C. 1 Dow and Cl. 15. Followed in Anstey v. Newman, 1870, 39 L. J. Ch. 770.]

H. R., being possessed of a leasehold estate, by a gratuitous deed in 1731, limited the term to himself for life, with remainder to his son R. R., quasi in tail.

In 1739, upon the marriage of R. R., then an infant, a deed, to which he was a party, was executed, whereby the term, the subject of the former settlement, was limited in trust to provide annuities to R. R. and his wife, till 1742; and until that time, and subject thereto, to permit H. R. to receive the rents, and then to raise £1200 for the use of H. R.; and from 1742, to permit R. R. to receive the rents, subject to the charges, and after the deaths of H. R., R. R., and H. R., in trust for the sons of the marriage, as R. R. should appoint, etc. with divers limitations over in trust to raise portions, etc.; and in case there should be no sons of the marriage, or by any future wife, etc. that the term should revert to H. R., his executors, etc.; and H. R. by the deed covenanted to provide for R. R., his wife, and children, board and lodging until 1742, and at that time to pay R. R., his executors, etc., £300 in money or stock, etc.

This deed was executed and acted upon by all the parties.

R. R. came of age in 1741, and died without issue male.

In 1743, H. R. made an appointment under a power in the deed of 1731. By his will also reciting and executing a power in the deed of 1731, and without noticing the limitation of the deed of 1739, he gave to his daughters A. and B., under whom the Appellants claimed the residue of his personal estate.

Held in the Court below, and on appeal that the term did not pass as part of the residue, but vested in R. R. by operation of the deed of 1731, or by operation of the deed of 1739, vested in H. R., subject to the trusts of the deed of 1731, in favour of R. R.

Held also that it was not a case of election, as R. R. had no power to reject the whole of the deed of 1739.

By a deed dated the 19th of May, 1731, and made between Hodder Roberts, of the one part, and John [574] Watkins, Michael Roberts, and the Reverend Randall Roberts, of the other part, after reciting that Hodder Roberts had received as a marriage portion with his wife Jane, lately deceased, £800, and that he had eight children, and was desirous to make a provision for each of them, by conveying the lands thereafter mentioned to the several uses, trusts, and purposes, and subject to the several powers thereafter contained, it was witnessed, that out of his fatherly affection for his said children, and in consideration of the said sum of £800, he gave, granted, etc., unto the said John Watkins, etc., all the lands of Bridgetown, Grange, Clonmore, and various other leasehold estates therein described, to hold, etc., to the several uses, etc.; that is to say, as to Bridgetown and Clonmore upon trust, to permit Hodder Roberts to hold the said lands, and receive the rents and profits thereof during his life; and after the decease of Hodder Roberts, to stand possessed of the said lands to the use of Randall Roberts, eldest son of Hodder Roberts, his executors, administrators, and assigns, subject to the entire yearly rent payable out of the said lands, together with the lands of Grange, unto Francis Hodder, with remainder to Watkins, second son of Hodder Roberts, and several limitations over, if Randall Roberts should die without issue male of his body before he should attain the age of twenty-one years, and also subject to a power for Hodder Roberts, by any deed or writing, or by his will, to be attested by two or more witnesses, to charge the said lands with any sum of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of £2000 sterling, to be raised out of the rents, etc., or by mortgage, etc., and to be paid to his daughters by Jane Roberts, at such times and in such proportions, and with such interest as he should direct and appoint, etc.; and it was also provided, that it should [575] be lawful for him to make leases of all or any part of the said lands for any term whatsoever, so as two-thirds of the most improved yearly rent should be reserved.

This deed was registered on the 23d of November, 1736.

By an indenture, dated the 29th of December, 1739, and made between Hodder Roberts of the first part; Randall Roberts, the eldest son of Hodder Roberts, of the second part; John Watkins and Matthias Smith, of the third part; Catherine Kift, widow, of the fourth part; and Mary Kift, spinster, daughter of Catherine Kift, of the fifth part; after reciting that Francis Hodder, by indenture of lease, bearing date the 1st of May, 1724, demised unto Hodder Roberts, the town and lands of Bridgetown and Grange, to hold, etc., for the term of 982 years and a half, at the rent of £200: And also, that a marriage was intended to be shortly thereafter solemnized between Randall Roberts and Mary Kift; It was witnessed, that Hodder Roberts, in consideration of the marriage, and for the preferment of his son, and in consideration of the sum of £1000, the marriage portion of Mary Kift, which she was entitled to by the will of her father, which sum was to be paid to Hodder Roberts, and for settling and securing a jointure of £100 per annum unto Mary Kift, during her life, in case she should survive Randall Roberts, and for making some provision of maintenance for Randall and Mary, and the issue of the marriage, Hodder Roberts granted, etc., to John Watkins and Matthias Smith, their executors and administrators, those parts of the lands of Bridgetown, which were thereafter described, amounting to 798 acres, to hold, etc., for all the remainder of the term of 982 years, then unexpired of the lease, at the yearly [576] rent of £200 sterling, payable to the heirs and assigns of Francis Hodder; and it was thereby declared, that the said lands were granted upon trust for Hodder Roberts, etc., until the marriage, and after the solemnization thereof, to the intent that Randall Roberts, and his assigns, should yearly receive out of the said lands an annuity of £100 until the 1st of May, 1742; and upon trust to permit Hodder Roberts, and his assigns, to receive the rents of the said lands, subject to the annuity of £100 to Randall Roberts, and also subject to the like annuity of £100 to Mary Kift, in case Randall Roberts should die before the 1st of May, 1742: And upon further trust, that the trustees should, out of the profits of the said bonds by sale or mortgage, or otherwise, raise £1200 for the use of Hodder Roberts, his executors, etc., and to be paid on the 1st of May, 1744, with interest, etc.; and upon further trust, from the 1st of May, 1742, to permit Randall Roberts and his assigns, to receive the rents of the said lands, charged as aforesaid: And upon further trust, that after the death of Randall Roberts and Hodder Roberts, the trustees should, subject to the said several charges and payments, permit such of the son or sons of Randall Roberts on the body of Mary his intended wife to be begotten, to hold the said lands, in such manner and form as Randall Roberts should direct and appoint; and for want of such direction and appointment, then that the lands should go to such son or sons equally, with divers limitations over in case there should be no sons in trust, to raise portions for daughters of the marriage, and to sons of any future marriage of Randall Roberts, according to his appointment, and in default, etc., for raising portions for the daughters of any such future marriage; and upon further trust, that immediately [577] after the said portions should be raised, or if there should happen to be no such daughter by any such after taken wife, then that the said thereby granted lands and premises should, for and during the residue and remainder of the said term, revert to Hodder Roberts, his executors, administrators, and assigns; and upon farther trust, that in case Randall Roberts should die without any son or sons, or issue male by Mary Kift, or any after taken wife, and should leave one or more daughter or daughters, the trustees should raise £1500 for the portion or portions of such daughter or daughters, with interest at five pounds per cent.; and Hodder Roberts covenanted to provide Randall Roberts, and his wife and their children, board and lodging; and on the 1st day of May, 1742, to pay to Randall Roberts, his executors, administrators, or assigns, £300 sterling, or in lieu thereof to deliver cattle of that value, and also as many cattle as should be sufficient to stock certain lands then in the possession of Hodder Roberts.

This deed was registered on the 28th of January, 1740, and the marriage between Randall Roberts and Mary Kift having been shortly after solemnized, they lived with Hodder Roberts, according to the provisions of the deed, till 1742: Randall Roberts receiving the annuity of £100 during that period. He attained his age of twenty-one on the 20th of February, 1741. On the 1st of May, 1742, Randall Roberts took possession of the lands, and received from Hodder Roberts £300 in cash, and stock according to the provisions of the deed of 1739, and signed a receipt to that effect, which was indorsed on the deed. By a deed dated the 8th of June, 1743, to which Randall Roberts was a party, Martha and Elizabeth, the sisters of Randall Roberts, having, under the grant of [578] their father, a charge upon the lands comprised in the settlement of 1739, released their claims and confirmed the deed of settlement. Randall Roberts also entered into divers agreements for granting leases of the lands comprised in the settlement of 1739, and upon bills filed to compel the execution of those leases respectively, in his answers recognised the deed of 1739.

Upon a marriage between William Freeman and Elizabeth, daughter of Hodder Roberts, by indenture, dated the 14th of October, 1743, Hodder Roberts demised the lands of Clonmore, and the other lands of Bridgetown not included in the settlement of 1739, to Mr. Freeman, for the term of 960 years, at the yearly rent of £88; being, according to the power reserved to him by the settlement of 1731, more than two thirds of the real value of the premises.

By a deed dated the 15th of October, 1743, after reciting among other things the settlement of the 19th of May, 1731, and the power thereby reserved to Hodder Roberts to charge the lands of Clonmore, and the other lands of Bridgetown, with any sum of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of £2000; and that Hodder Roberts, on the marriage of Randall Roberts, by indenture, bearing date the 29th of December, 1739, conveyed to John Watkins and Matthias Smith, as trustees therein mentioned, 798 acres of the lands of Bridgetown, and excepted out of such conveyance all the residue of the lands of Bridgetown, to the intent that Hodder Roberts might charge the residue of the said lands with such part of the sum of £2000 as he should think proper, as a provision for his daughters; and reciting that on the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth with William Freeman, he agreed to give as a marriage portion with his said [579] daughter the sum of £600 sterling, and that the same should be charged on the said lands; it was witnessed, that in consideration of the marriage, and in execution of the agreement, and by virtue of the power so reserved to him, Hodder Roberts granted, etc. the lands demised, as aforesaid, to William Freeman, to trustees, subject to redemption upon payment of the sum of £600 by Hodder Roberts, etc.

A deed similar in effect was executed on the marriage of Martha, another daughter of Hodder Roberts, with William Verling.

By a deed dated the 6th of June, 1743, Hodder Roberts conveyed to his son Watkins his own life-interest in the premises to which Watkins was entitled in remainder under the settlement of 1731, and procured the concurrence of the surviving trustees in the deed of the 19th of May, 1731.

In the year 1747 Hodder Roberts died.

By his will, dated the 4th of March, 1747, he recited and executed the power reserved to him by the deed of 19th of May, 1731, of charging £800 upon certain lands therein mentioned, and he specifically bequeathed the lands of Clonmore and Paul, otherwise Coolrahaderig, (being the lands of Bridgetown excepted out of or not included in the settlement of 1739,) to his two daughters, Arabella and Harriet, subject to the mortgage for £600, and he bequeathed to his wife Catherine all his household goods, linen, and plate, then in the city of Cork, and the residue of his personal fortune, to his said two daughters, equally to be divided between them.

In December, 1748, Randall Roberts filed a bill to set aside the deed of 1743, claiming the lands of Clonmore and Paul as part of the lands settled on him by the deed of the 19th of May, 1731. Answers to [580] this bill were put in, and witnesses were examined, but what was finally done in the cause did not appear.

In May, 1751, the trustees of the settlement of the 29th of December, 1739, mortgaged the lands comprised therein, to Richard Bradshaw, for £1200, in which mortgage Randall Roberts joined, and the mortgage money was applied in payment of £1200 remaining due upon an old mortgage affecting those lands in common with other lands of Hodder Roberts. The £1200 in the above deed mentioned, was the residue then remaining due of a sum of £2100, for which the lands of Bridgetown, together with other lands, had been mortgaged by deed, bearing date the 21st of August, 1716, by Randall Roberts, the father of Hodder Roberts, to one Ralph Westrop, whose representatives received the £1200.

Randall Roberts having a daughter, named Catherine, an only child, a marriage took place between her and the Respondent Richard Martin, in the year 1773, previous to which articles were entered into, dated the 2d of January, 1773, by which Randall Roberts granted to trustees an annuity of £300 a year for five years, commencing the 1st of May, 1776, to be issuing out of certain parts of the lands of Bridgetown, and another of £300 a year for five years, commencing the 1st of May, 1784, out of the same lands, as the portion of the said Catherine, with clauses of distress and entry.

In the year 1777 Randall Roberts having neglected to pay the annuity and the head rent of £200, and the landlord having threatened an ejectment, the Respondent Richard Martin, (after paying £300 head rent, to prevent the ejectment,) filed his bill in the Court of Chancery, in Ireland, in which he obtained a decree for an account of what was due to him, and [581] ultimately a final decree for payment of the amount, together with his costs.

By deed dated the 29th of September, 1786, Randall Roberts assigned to the Respondent Richard Martin, a part of the lands of Bridgetown, called the West Inches, for a term of four hundred years, at £129 rent, in satisfaction of £2193, part of the money reported due to the Respondent.

By indenture bearing date the 25th of October, 1788, after reciting that £1651 4s. 8d. would be due to the Respondent Richard Martin, on the 1st of May, then next, in consideration of the same being remitted, and of £360 then paid by Richard Martin, etc. Randall Roberts assigned all the town and lands of Bridgetown, not already sold, to the Respondent Martin, to trustees, to the use of himself for life, with remainder, subject to some small charges, to the Respondent Richard Martin for life, with remainder to Catherine his wife, for life, and after her death, to their only child, Mary Martin, her executors, administrators, and assigns.

In the year 1795 Mary Martin intermarried with John Southcote Mansergh; previous to which articles were executed, dated 6th of January, 1795, whereby the Respondent Richard Martin and Catherine his wife assigned the lands of Bridgetown to trustees, discharged from their life interest, and the Respondent Richard Martin also gave up £100 14s. 3d. a year of the rent of West Inches, to the use of John Southcote Mansergh and Mary his wife, and the issue of the marriage, and in consideration of that settlement lands were at the same time conveyed by John Southcote Mansergh and his father to the same uses.

On the 15th of June, 1795, Randall Roberts died; [582] whereupon John Southcote Mansergh and Mary his wife entered into possession of the lands of Bridgetown.

In Hilary term, 1796, John and Mary Mansergh, then lately before come of age, levied a fine of the lands of Bridgetown, to the use of the articles of the 6th of January, 1795.

In February, 1796, the Appellants, Henry Croker and Harriet Jane his wife, and Watkins William Verling, filed their original bill in this cause, in the Court of Chancery, in Ireland, which was afterwards amended, whereby they claimed all the lands comprised in the settlement of the 29th of December, 1739, as having passed under the residuary clause contained in the will of Hodder Roberts, to his daughters Arabella and Harriet Roberts, under whom the Appellants set up a title.

To this bill the Respondents put in their answers in the month of December, 1796, but no proceedings were taken by the Appellants in the cause (except amending their bill in the year 1797,) until the year 1805.

In 1805 the Appellants moved for a receiver, but their motion was refused, with costs.

The progress of the cause having been delayed by various abatements, in February, 1816, the Appellants brought their cause to a hearing. The Appellants contended that Randall Roberts, under the deed of 1739, took a more beneficial interest than under the settlement of 1731, and that he had accepted the latter provision after he came of age, in lieu of the former; and in support of that allegation, they insisted upon several answers put in by Randall Roberts to bills filed against him, one of them by Wrottesley de la Rue, another by one John Mannsell, and another by [583] Alice Widenham, whereby he set up the strict limitations and leasing powers comprised in the deed of 29th of December, 1739, in bar of executing certain leases which were claimed from him by the Plaintiffs in those suits.

After a full argument, which lasted for several days, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland dismissed the Appellants' bill without costs.

The appeal was presented against this decree by parties claiming under Arabella and Harriet, the daughters of Hodder Roberts.*

For the Appellants: Mr. Shadwell and Mr. Phillimore.

For the Respondents: Mr. Horne and Mr. Sugden.

For the Appellants it was argued (11th June), that although by the voluntary settlement of 1731, Randall Roberts was entitled on arriving at the age of twenty-one, to the absolute interest in these lands, subject to his father's life estate, yet having by the deed of 1739 entered into a new arrangement, whereby his father gave up his life estate and other considerable benefits to Randall Roberts, and the ultimate reversion had been by that deed expressly limited to Hodder Roberts, the father, his executors, administrators, and assigns, Hodder Roberts thereby became a purchaser [584] for full and valuable consideration of that reversion; and Randall Roberts having, when he came of age, taken all the benefit provided for him by that deed, and so frequently and deliberately recognised and confirmed it, it was not in his power to resort to any title under the deed of 1731, and any attempt to do so was a manifest fraud on Hodder Roberts and those who claimed title under his will to this reversion, as limited to him by the deed of 1739: that it was incumbent on Randall Roberts, on attaining his age of twenty-one years, to elect between the settlement of 1739 and the voluntary deed of 1731, and either to ratify the settlement of 1739, or to abandon it and the benefit he was enjoying under it; and that he so did, or must in equity have been presumed so to have done, because he took possession of his father's life estate, and received the sum of £300, neither of which he would have been entitled to if he had insisted on a title under the deed of 1731, in opposition to that of 1739; and therefore the Appellants insisted that Randall Roberts and all persons deriving title under him with notice, are bound to give full effect to that deed in all its parts, and consequently to the ultimate limitation to Hodder Roberts, his executors, administrators and assigns, under which the Appellants derive their title.

For the Respondent.

The deed of 1739, though competent to supersede that of 1731, so far as the considerations of the portion and marriage extend, is, as to the ultimate limitation to Hodder and his representatives, a voluntary deed, posterior in time and operation to that of 1731; it is as if Hodder had then mortgaged the estate for a sum of money, and that by the terms of the deed the equity of redemption had been limited to him. The ultimate limitation in the deed of 1739, on default of male issue [585] of Randall Roberts, is merely that the premises should go and revert back to Hodder Roberts, his executors, administrators, and assigns: words which import not any new provision or stipulation for his benefit, but simply a declaration that in that event (all that was then contracted for being done and satisfied,) the premises should stand as if the deed of 1739 had never been executed, whereby, according to the strict terms used, they must vest in Randall Roberts, he having been, under the deed of 1731, the assignee of his father. It would be strange to give any other construction to such a clause in the deed of 1739, in which the only party interested under the deed of 1731, was a minor, and could not contract, in which the deed of 1731 is not recited, and in which the family of the wife, the only parties contracting with Hodder Roberts, had no estate in the premises in question, nor power of giving the ultimate right to him, and in which the words used shew that they intended only to leave that right untouched, and as they found it. That this was the understanding of the parties appears from the several acts above referred to, and particularly from the recitals in the deed of 1743, and the terms of Hodder's will, which, if they are in law sufficient to convey this reversion, are such as to shew that it was not in his contemplation.

* After the decree and before presenting the appeal, John Southcote Mansergh died, having made his will in March, 1817; whereby, in pursuance of the powers vested in him by his marriage settlement, he appointed the lands of Bridgetown as a provision for his second son, the Respondent, Charles Carden Mansergh, an infant, subject to a charge of £1020, with which he encumbered the same for his two daughters, the Respondents, Catherine (since become the wife of George Walker,) and Mary Martin Mansergh, an infant.

If the import of the deed of 1739 was, that the ultimate remainder should vest in Hodder Roberts, that deed could have no such effect, the only party thereto who was competent to convey such remainder being a minor, incapable by law of doing so; nor were there in the deed any words of conveyance from him: and if it be said that at his full age he elected to take under that deed present maintenance, and therefore cannot contest any part of it: the answer is, that as to such maintenance he had no election, it was created by a contract between his father and the family of his wife. They had paid the fortune which purchased it; and though the husband had the power to squander or part with it, yet his father could not call on him to make an election to that effect, and consequently cannot found any right on his having omitted to do so. A wife is interested in the present maintenance of her husband, and shall not by such means be deprived of the benefit of it. It would be a fraud on her and her family if the father had required him to relinquish his present maintenance, under the coercion of facts arising out of the deed of 1731, which was known to the father at the time of the marriage, and not disclosed by him to the wife or her family.

But the answers of Randall to bills filed by tenants have been relied on. These answers alleged no election. They merely stated the deed of 1739 as it was, and submitted the effect to the Court, which decreed against him as entitled to the ultimate remainder, thereby negating the inference now sought to be drawn from those causes. It cannot be conceived that he meant to make such election then, when he had been so many years married, and had no son to take benefit from the deed of 1739, to the injury of his daughter, the first and natural object of his affection: such answers do not afford any evidence of an antecedent election, and the decrees made thereon are strong evidence to the contrary.

The Lord Chancellor (2d July): This case arises out of deeds executed at a very considerable distance of time. Various proceedings have been had in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and at length the cause was heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, in [587] the year 1816, when the bill was dismissed, but without costs. About two years afterwards, namely, in the year 1818, the Plaintiffs appealed to this House. The circumstance of there being so many parties upon the record has occasioned considerable delay, in consequence of the deaths of some of those parties during the pendency of the proceeding, and the necessity of reviving the suit.

The case arose out of two deeds, one executed in the year 1731, and the other executed in the year 1739. A person of the name of Hodder Roberts was possessed of a very long term in certain lands in Ireland. By the deed of 1731 he settled the term upon himself for life, with remainder to his eldest son, Randall Roberts, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and in the event of Randall Roberts dying without male issue under twenty-one years of age, it was limited to Watkins Roberts, the second son, and so on. But the property being leasehold, vested absolutely in the first tenant, quasi in tail. This was a purely voluntary settlement.

There was afterwards, in the year 1739, another deed executed of a great part of the same property. That was executed on the occasion of a marriage being in contemplation between Randall Roberts, who was a party to the former deed, and Mary Kift. The settlement was made in consideration of that marriage and the fortune of the lady. That settlement, therefore, was made for a valuable consideration: by that settlement an estate for life was given to Randall Roberts—certain interests were given to the wife—interests were given to the male issue of Randall Roberts, if he should have any, and there was power given to raise portions for the daughters of that marriage. That marriage took effect. Randall Roberts [588] however, afterwards died without leaving any male issue: portions were raised for the daughters, and there was an end of the limitations under the deed of 1739. But there was a provision in the deed, that after all the limitations should be satisfied, the estate should revert to Hodder Roberts: and the question, and the only question in the cause was, whether the estate should go back to Hodder Roberts, he taking a new estate in the property, or whether it should go back, and be held subject to the trusts of the voluntary settlement of the year 1731.

The Lord Chancellor of Ireland was of opinion that the estate, after all the limitations under the deed of 1739 were satisfied and exhausted, went back, and was held subject to the trusts of the former deed of the year 1731; and I should submit to your Lordships, that the opinion of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in that respect is correct. The deed of 1731 was a purely voluntary settlement, binding against Hodder Roberts, but not binding against a purchaser for a valuable consideration. The deed of 1739 was granted for a valuable consideration, and to the extent therefore of the limitations under that deed in favour of Randall Roberts, and the issue of the marriage, and the parties who took as purchasers, to that extent, the deed of 1739 would prevail over the deed of 1731; but it would not prevail over the deed of 1731 any further, and therefore, when it was provided by an express stipulation in the deed of 1739, that after all the interests that had been created by the purchase, were satisfied the estate should revert to Hodder Roberts, that estate would be held by Hodder Roberts, subject to the trusts of the voluntary settlement of 1731, which, though not binding as against a purchaser, was binding against him. I apprehend the [589] Lord Chancellor of Ireland, therefore, in deciding that the estate reverted to Hodder Roberts, subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1731, decided correctly and properly.

The question arose out of the will of Hodder Roberts, by which Hodder Roberts had in general terms disposed of all the residue of his personal property to persons under whom the present Plaintiffs claim. If Hodder Roberts therefore took no interest or estate by virtue of the deed of 1739, but it reverted back to him, subject to the trusts of the settlement of 1731, it would be bound by the provisions of that deed, and would not pass to the Plaintiffs under the residuary clause in the will to which I have adverted.

It is perfectly clear, independently of the construction of the deeds to which I have adverted, and the language of the deeds, that Hodder Roberts never meant that the deed of 1731 should be rescinded or altered, except to the extent of the provisions contained in the deed of 1739, with reference to Randall Roberts and the issue of his marriage, because after the deed of 1739, Hodder Roberts, over and over again, recognised the existence of the deed of 1731, and acted according to its provisions.

In the year 1743, which was four years after the execution of the deed of 1739, upon the marriage of his daughter Martha, with a person of the name of Verling, in the settlement made upon that occasion, he recited the deed of 1731, as an existing deed, referred to the powers in that deed, and executed a power conformably to the provisions of the deed of 1731: so that it appears not only that the language of the instrument supports the judgment given by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, but that it was the obvious and manifest intention of Hodder [590] Roberts, who was the party under whom the present Plaintiffs claim, that the deed of 1731 should be an operative deed, and that it should be broken in upon, only to the extent of the particular interest created by the deed of 1739. It is also a remarkable circumstance, that no mention whatever is made by Hodder Roberts in his will, (although that will is sufficiently particular,) of the supposed interest he had at that time, with respect to that property, so as to enable him to dispose of it. The language of the instrument is confirmed by the obvious intention and meaning of Hodder Roberts, and that tends to shew that the judgment pronounced by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, was perfectly correct.

It was argued for the Plaintiffs that Randall Roberts, who took under the deed of 1731, and also under the deed of 1739, ought, after he came of age, to have made his election to take under one deed or the other; and it was argued that in fact he had made his election, but it was impossible that Randall Roberts could make his election, he was not the only party to the deed of 1739, there were other parties to that deed; he was not therefore in a condition to get rid of the obligation and renounce the provisions of the deed of 1739 altogether, and take under the deed of 1731, because the parties to the marriage settlement were interested in the preservation of the deed of 1739, and therefore it was impossible he could make such election.

But it is said that he recognised over and over again, by his own acts, the deed of 1739, long after he came of age. It is true he did recognise by his acts the provisions of that deed, because they were all binding and operative provisions: they were provisions made for a valuable consideration under his [591] marriage settlement, he could not get rid of those provisions: they existed in conjunction with the deed of 1731, qualifying that deed, but not extinguishing and annihilating that deed, prevailing over it only to the extent of the provisions contained in that deed; and therefore this recognition of the deed of 1739, an operative deed which he could not get rid of, is no argument to shew that he or his descendants are not entitled to come in and claim under the deed of 1731. The arguments, instead of shewing that the judgment was incorrect, fail altogether. The judgment therefore should be affirmed.

In disposing of the original bill, in the Court below, the Lord Chancellor dismissed it without costs; but as the parties have thought fit to appeal against that decision, I would propose that the judgment be affirmed, with £100 costs.

Judgment affirmed, with £100 costs.

(COURT OF KING'S BENCH.)

LANCEFIELD.—Plaintiff in Error; ALLEN and others.—Defendants in Error.

In a declaration by executors, a count stating that the Defendant had accounted with the Plaintiffs "executors as aforesaid," etc., was joined with counts, stating promises to the testator: Held not a misjoinder of action, or if so cured by verdict.

The Defendants in Error brought an action against the Plaintiff in Error, for goods sold and delivered to him by one N. G., deceased, their testator. The declaration in all the counts but one, stated promises made to the testator. In the last count, the Plaintiffs declared that J. L., the Plaintiff in Error, "had accounted with them, A. and C., (the Defendants in Error) executors as aforesaid, of and concerning divers sums of money from the said J. L., to the said A. and C., executors as aforesaid, due and owing, and in arrear; and that he, J. C., upon that account, was found in arrear and indebted to the said A. and C., executors as aforesaid, in the further sum of £150, etc.

This, it was contended, was a misjoinder of action, as the declaration contained counts upon promises, alleged to have been made by the Plaintiff in Error to the testator, and also a count upon a promise alleged to have been made by the Plaintiff in Error, to the Defendants in Error, in their own right, and not as executors; and that it was [593] necessary that it should have been expressly alleged, that the promise was made to them as executors.

On the part of the Defendants in Error, it was contended, 1. That the action being brought by them, as executors, it must be presumed, with reference to the other counts of the declaration, that the last count was founded on an account stated by the Plaintiff in Error, with the Defendants in Error, as executors of N. G.; and that the promise declared on, in that count, was made to them accordingly, as such executors. 2. That after verdict, it must be presumed that evidence was given of these facts at the trial, which would be sufficient to support the judgment, and that the objection to the last count being matter of form, is cured by the verdict.

The judgment was affirmed, with £120 costs.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

DAVID DA SILVA JOCHEBED BERNAL, ESTHER BERNAL, and MIRYAM BERNAL, Executor and Executrixes of ISAAC BERNAL, deceased.—Appellants: The Most Honourable GEORGE AUGUSTUS, Marquis of DONEGAL, —Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. vii. 270, 271, 285; xi. 579. See notes to Chesterfield v. Janssen, 1 Wh. and T. L. C. 7th Ed. pp. 289, 318; Sales of Reversions Act (31 Vict. c. 4), and Moneylenders Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict. c. 51).]

D. having filed against M. and B. a bill in Equity to cancel, for want of consideration, certain post obit bonds, and a general bond which D. had executed and delivered to B. to secure the balance of account between M. and B., and future advances by B. to M., and D. having afterwards dismissed the bill as against M., and examined him as a witness, it was decreed on appeal, reversing the judgment below, that D., having deliberately executed a deed acknowledging that the bonds were given to secure certain sums actually advanced by B. to D., and a bond in a penalty defeasible on payment of monies advanced and to be advanced by B. to M., and accounts stated and settled between B. and M., and as no account could be taken in the cause between B. and M., who was no longer a party, D. had debarred himself from impeaching the securities or the consideration stated in them: but on reference to the Master to take an account of what was due from D. to B. on the securities, although it was directed that D. should be bound by the accounts stated and settled between M. and B., he was to be at liberty to falsify the same, or shew any errors or overcharges therein.

In proceeding under this decree upon the account in the Master's office, a book of accounts was produced containing a general statement of accounts between M. and B., and a particular [595] entry as to an alleged purchase by M. from B., of certain bonds executed by W. This entry appeared in the midst of the general account upon two leaves, having an appearance of being inserted in the place of two which had been cut out, but which might have been brought into that state by continued use. Many of the items extending over a considerable period of time, were in the same ink and handwriting. Payments of prior date were entered after payments of subsequent date; and the account, as it appeared, laboured under other suspicious circumstances. There were also produced before the Master, by consent of all parties, plain copies, to save examined copies of the proceedings in a certain cause in which one W. was Plaintiff, and M. and B. with other Defendants; and in which cause it was found upon the decree, (the same books and account having been produced in the cause,) that no money had been advanced, or bond fide allowed by B. to M. on the bonds in question. Under these circumstances the Master disallowed the charge of B. against D., in respect of the alleged sale of W.'s bonds by B. to M., and his report to that effect was confirmed by the Court below.

Held on appeal that under the circumstances above stated, and the liberty given by the order to falsify the account, &c. the order confirming the report was right.

Where a Master, by his report, certifies a fact, and exceptions are taken to the report, it lies upon those who are to uphold the report, to produce the evidence of the fact. So if he certifies the result of an account upon the allowance or disallowance of items in dispute, and one of the parties excepts to the report, both as to the principle on which the account is taken, and the evidence in support of the allowance or disallowance of the items, the parties in whose favour the report is made, must produce the evidence on the hearing of the exceptions.

Whether upon leave "to surcharge and falsify," equities can be administered. Quære.

Whether such consent to admit copies of such proceeding as before mentioned, precludes the party who consents from objecting that the originals are not evidence. Quære. But if he permits them to be read before the Master and the Court without efficiently raising a distinct objection upon this ground, although by his exception he objects to the report generally, as not supported by evidence; seem, that the Master, acting upon the re[596]ference, with leave "to surcharge and falsify," may administer such equity as above mentioned, by disallowing the items which such evidence applies.

In the month of June, 1803, the Respondent filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, against Isaac Bernal and Edward May; impeaching certain securities executed by the Respondent when Earl of Belfast, to Bernal, such securities being four post obit bonds, payable in the event of the Respondent surviving his father, the late Marquis of Donegal; one bearing date the 8th of June, 1795, in the penal sum of £48,000, conditioned for the payment of £24,000; two others bearing date respectively the 20th of June, 1795, in the penal sums of £24,000 and £1000, conditioned for the payment of £12,000 and £500; and the 4th, bearing date the 6th of July, 1795, in the penal sum of £20,000, conditioned for the payment of £10,000; and likewise a general bond (in which May was bound jointly with the Respondent,) and warrant of attorney for the penal sum of £40,000. The bill stated in effect, that he Respondent had received no consideration for the post obit bonds, except certain bonds executed by one Wharton to May,* and which it was alleged virtually

* For the clear understanding of the case it is expedient to state shortly the facts of the suit between Wharton and May.

On the 7th of February, 1795, John Wharton filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in England, against Edward May, Isaac Bernal, Joshua Mendes Da Costa, and other parties, stating in substance, divers pecuniary transactions with Bernal and Da Costa, in the result of which they had obtained from Wharton divers bonds and securities, the considerations for which Wharton thereby impeached. The bill also stated transactions of a pecuniary nature between Wharton and May; and that Wharton having commissioned May, by compromise or otherwise, to get back from Bernal and Da Costa the securities above mentioned, May, upon the pretence that he had paid off, or by payment got rid of such securities, obtained from Wharton post obit bonds executed by Wharton to him, for divers large sums of money, to the aggregate amount therein mentioned. The bill then went on to state, that May had not paid any money, or other valuable consideration to Bernal, for the original securities; and that May was in fact trustee for Bernal and Da Costa, of the securities executed by Wharton to May, and treated them as a substitution for the original ones given to Bernal and Da Costa. The bill prayed in substance, that all the bonds and warrants of attorney, executed by Wharton to May, might stand as securities, only for what was really due from Wharton to the Defendants, or any of them, on the balance of all accounts between them. It then prayed that such accounts might be taken, and for appropriate relief and an injunction.

To this bill May put in several answers, in which he represented himself to have given Bernal bonds and securities of value, as a consideration for Wharton's original securities; which he had, with the concurrence of Wharton, destroyed; and, claimed to be a purchaser, for valuable consideration, of the securities executed by Wharton to himself.

Bernal and Da Costa also put in answers; and Bernal, by allegations, similar to those of May, endeavoured to place May on the footing of a purchaser.

In the course of the cause, it appearing that Wharton's bonds to May had come into the hands of the Respondent, he was, by supplemental bill, made a party; and on the 25th of January, 1797, Respondent put in a short answer, in the nature of a disclaimer, stating that May had some time before, for valuable consideration, assigned, deposited, or delivered, to or for the benefit of the Respondent, certain securities executed by Wharton; but that he, Respondent, did not then hold them, or claim any interest therein.

The Respondent was debited with the amount of these securities, or a large portion of them, in account with May. The bill was dismissed as against Respondent, upon the coming in of his answer, and the suit proceeded without his participation. Evidence was entered into on both sides, and divers proceedings were had in the cause, which was heard on the 25th of November, 1799, and the Court declared, that the bonds given by Wharton to May, and particularly mentioned; as well as a bond and warrant of attorney given by Wharton to Da Costa; appeared to have been the result of a confederacy between Bernal, Da Costa, and May, to defraud and impose on Wharton; and to have been obtained by an abuse of confidence reposed in Da Costa and May, (who pretended to act as his agents,) with the privity and knowledge of Bernal, who shared in the unjust gains of the several transactions in the pleadings mentioned; and it was decreed, that the bonds, and the judgments entered up, should stand as a security, only for the sums which should appear really due from Wharton, on the accounts thereafter directed; and it was referred to belonged to [597] Bernal. The bill prayed in substance, that the four post obit bonds, and the general bond and warrant of [598] attorney for £40,000, might be given up to the Respondent to be cancelled;—that satisfaction might be [599] entered on the records of the judgments which had been entered up;—and that an account might be taken of all monies received by Bernal, or for his use, by virtue of the post obit bonds—executions in the bill mentioned—or otherwise; and that Bernal might refund; the Respondent offering to give up to him the bonds of Wharton, and to pay to certain third persons, certain monies lent to the Respondent, in a degree, upon the credit of them; and the bill went on to pray all necessary accounts and an injunction to stay proceedings at law.

The injunction was granted upon motion, before answer.

In the month of January, 1801, Bernal put in his answer, wherein he detailed the transactions between himself, May, and Wharton; and stated, that in the month of July, 1794, he had delivered up to May, bonds and notes of Wharton, amounting with interest to £19,212 12s. 10d., and afterwards, upon the persuasion of May, consented to abate £8000 in his demand against Wharton; and that May executed to him, Bernal, his own bond and warrant for the amount of such securities, subject to such reduction as aforesaid; that is to say, for the sum of £11,212 12s. 10d.; and further secured the same by the assignment of a mortgage of property in Dorsetshire; and that a short time subsequently, he deli-[600]vered up to May, for £7500, two post obit bonds for £6000 each, the only remaining securities of Wharton which he then held; and May, to secure the payment of the said sum of £7500, executed to him a bond and warrant of attorney to confess judgment to that amount.

Bernal, by his answer, went on to state the origin of his connexion with May, representing that he had for some years acted as the agent of May, and been in the habit of accepting bills for him; and that on the 8th of June, 1795, May was indebted to him, on the cash and bill account between them, in the sum of £18,032 7s. 6d. for money actually advanced for the use of May, over and above various acceptances which he was under for May, amounting to £3486, and independently of £6781 10s. 3d. which he represented to be the balance remaining due to him from May, in respect of Wharton's securities, after making the aforesaid deduction of £8000; the answer went on to state, that May, being thus indebted to Bernal, and representing that the Respondent was largely indebted to him, at the solicitation the Master, to take an account of all dealings and transactions between Wharton and Bernal, Wharton and Da Costa, and Wharton and May.

Wharton and May appealed against this decree, which was affirmed, with some variations, one of which seems important with reference to the present appeal. The decree, among other things, having declared, that Edward May was entitled to hold the two bonds dated the 3d November, 1794, which he obtained from Wharton, in lieu of the bonds for £6000 each, payable on the death of Mrs. Anne Hall Stevenson, and Mrs. Frances Farquharson, (and with which he was entrusted by Wharton, to compound and settle with Isaac Bernal,) as a security only for such sum as was really paid or allowed in account between him and the Defendant Isaac Bernal, when the last mentioned bonds were given up. The House of Lords varied this part of the decree, by introducing the words "bonâ fide," and directed that May should hold said two bonds of 3d November, 1794, as a security only for such sum as was really paid; or "bonâ fide" allowed in account between May and Bernal, when the two last mentioned bonds were given up. Upon inquiry before the Master, consequent upon this variation, several meetings were had; and Bernal's book of accounts hereinafter mentioned, was produced; and the account in page 11, in which credit is given for £7500, on account of the two bonds, payable on the death of Mrs. Stevenson and Mrs. Farquharson, was relied upon by May; but the Master, in his report, dated 19th January, 1809, found that no sum was paid or bonâ fide allowed in account between May and Bernal, when the said two bonds were given up. It further appeared by the report, that the sum of £657 19s. 3d. only, was due from Wharton to May in respect of Wharton's securities, and an order on further directions was afterwards made on the basis of this report. See Wharton v. May, 5 Ves. 27.

of the Respondent and May, he allowed the latter credit in account for the several sums of £12,000, £6000, £250, and £5000, which allowance to May in account, was in fact the consideration for the Respondent's post obit bonds. The answer then went on to state certain indentures of lease and release, dated respectively the 26th and 27th of February, 1796, between the Respondent and May, the effect of which appeared to be that May, according to the recital, standing indebted to Bernal in the sum of £23,250, and the Respondent to May in the like or a larger sum, the Respondent had, upon the application of May, executed to Bernal the securities above men-[601]-tioned; and the Respondent thereby assigned to May his life interest, expectant on the death of his father, in the estates therein mentioned, on trust, among other things, to apply the rents and profits in payment of what might be due from May to Bernal; the answer then went on to state an indenture or deed of covenant, dated the 18th of October, 1800, and made between the Respondent and Bernal, whereby the Respondent ratified and confirmed to Bernal the several sums secured by the post obit bonds, with interest from the 5th of January, 1799.

In the month of July, 1804, the Respondent filed an amended or supplemental bill, impeaching the consideration of a bond for £60,000, dated the 18th of October, 1800, conditioned for the payment by the Respondent of sums due, and which might thereafter become due from May to Bernal, and the bill praying corresponding relief, prayed a discovery as to other securities obtained from the Respondent.

Bernal put in his answer on the 28th of May, 1806, in which he stated transactions between himself and May, as forming the consideration of the last-mentioned bond, which was conditioned for the payment by the Respondent of the sums due, and which might become due, from May to Bernal, and was in its nature similar to the bond for £40,000 (which had been given up to May) but covering other transactions of a later date, and Bernal relied on circumstances, from which he inferred that the Respondent had executed both the bond and deed of the 18th of October, 1800, with due deliberation.

On the 23d of January, 1804, Bernal filed a cross bill against the Respondent, and Edward May and others, stating, among other things, the execution of certain indentures of lease and release, dated the 26th [602] and 27th of February, 1796, between the Respondent and Isaac Bernal, which deed of release recited, amongst other things, a certain bond executed by the Respondent and Edward May to Isaac Bernal, bearing date the 24th of December, 1795, in the penal sum of £40,000, and conditioned to secure the payment to Isaac Bernal of all monies paid and advanced, and to be advanced by him, and acceptances entered into for Edward May; and by the cross bill he prayed an account of what was due to him on the foot of the several securities, and payment out of the estates vested in trustees as therein mentioned.

In the cross bill it was suggested as a pretence on the part of the Respondent and May, that the bonds of Wharton were the consideration for the Respondent's post obit bonds, which is negatived in the usual form, and the cross bill charges, that the real consideration was credit given by Bernal in account to May.

The Respondent put in his answer, and afterwards two further answers to the cross bill.

On the 18th of July, 1805, an order was made in the cause and cross cause, by consent of the parties; whereby it was referred to the Master, to inquire and report whether Isaac Bernal had entered into any and what other securities for the Respondent, besides those mentioned in his answer in the cross cause; and if so, to state the same specially to the Court, and to take an account on foot of all dealings and transactions between Edward May and Isaac Bernal, etc.

This order was afterwards, on the 1st of March, 1806, discharged by the Court; and the Master's report had thereon set aside; but Bernal obtained permission to use, at the hearing of the cause, the depositions which had been taken before the Master.

[603] On the 22d of July, the Respondent dismissed his bill against May, and afterwards examined him as a witness, but he continued a Defendant in the cross cause.

The Respondent and Bernal went into evidence in the original cause, and cross-examined the witnesses of each other. Publication having passed, both causes were set down and came on to be heard together, and on the 9th of June, 1807, the Lord

Chancellor pronounced his decree, whereby it was declared, that the four post obit bonds, amounting together to £46,500, and the bond for £10,000, and also the warrants of attorney to enter judgment on the same, were obtained by fraud and imposition practised on the Respondent, then an expectant heir, and that the bond for £60,000 was obtained by fraud and imposition upon the Respondent, and that the several bonds and judgments should stand and be a security only for the sums which, on the accounts thereafter directed, should appear to be really due from the Respondent to Bernal; and that the deeds of the 27th of August, 1795, and 18th of October, 1800, were fraudulent and void as against the Respondent: And it was referred to the Master to take an account of all dealings and transactions between the Respondent and Bernal, and of all and every the sum and sums of money received by the Respondent of Bernal himself, or by advances made by Bernal to May, or any other person, for the use of the Respondent, and which came to the hands of the Respondent; and the Master was also to take an account of all sums of money levied by Bernal, under executions issued against the Respondent, and also an account of all sums paid to Bernal by or on account of the Respondent, from time to time; and the Mas-[604]-ter was directed to set the amount of what should appear to have been levied and paid, against the sum which should appear due on the dealings, transactions, and advances before mentioned, and strike a balance; and the Respondent was ordered to deliver up to Bernal, the several bonds of Wharton then remaining in his possession or power, and to indemnify Bernal against any demand of Symmons, and Bloxam, and Hartsinck, for or on account of any of their demands in the pleadings mentioned; and the Respondent was to have an injunction as prayed, till further order, and all the parties to proceed with effect before the Master, from day to day, and either party was to be at liberty to make up the decree; and in case of the Respondent not speeding the cause before the Master, Bernal was to be at liberty to apply for a receiver, as he might be advised, and on return of the Master's report, such further order would be made as should be fit; and in the cross cause, Bernal's bill was dismissed with costs as to the Defendants who had never appeared thereto, and against whom the bill had been taken pro confesso; being all the Defendants, except the Respondent and May; and against them, without costs.

The accounts thus directed were not taken, but on the 3d of February, 1809, Bernal presented a petition of appeal to the House of Lords, in the original cause, praying a reversal of the order of the 1st of March, 1806, entitled in both the causes; and all subsequent orders in such causes, or either of them, and particularly the decree of the 9th of June, 1807, in the first mentioned cause; and on the 6th of February, 1810, (having in the meantime procured the decree in the cross cause to be drawn up) he presented another petition of appeal in the [605] cross cause, praying a reversal, not only of the order of the 1st of March, 1806, and the orders mentioned in the former petition of appeal, but also the order of the 9th of June, 1807, in the second mentioned cause, and to grant such relief as by the bill in the cross cause was prayed.

The two appeals (MSS. Cases, 1811 and 1815, and Dow. vol. iii. p. 133) were heard together, on the 26th and 28th of March, 1811; and on the 29th of July, 1811, judgment was pronounced therein, whereby the order of the 1st day of March, 1806, was affirmed, but the decree of the 9th of June, 1807, in the first mentioned cause, was reversed; and it was declared, that the Respondent, by the indenture of the 18th of October, 1800, having acknowledged that the post obit bonds of the 8th day of June, 1795, for £21,000, of the 20th of June, 1795, for £12,000, and £500, and of the 6th of July, 1795, for £10,000, had been given in consideration of the sums of £12,000, £6000, £250, and £5000, advanced, lent, and paid by Bernal to the Respondent, or for his use, and at his direction and request; and it also appearing that the Respondent's bond of the same 18th day of October, 1800, was defensible on payment by the Respondent to Bernal, of several sums of money, advanced and to be advanced by Bernal to or for the use of May, in manner therein mentioned; and such costs, charges, damages, and expenses as therein mentioned; and it appearing by the evidence in the cause, that the drafts of the deed and bond of the 18th of October, 1800, were taken by the Respondent, for the purpose of laying the same before Francis Const, Esquire, in the pleadings named, on behalf of the Respondent, and were afterwards returned by the Respondent to the solicitor for Bernal, [606] with a declaration that the same had been perused and approved of by Francis Const, and that the deed and bond were afterwards deliberately executed by the Respondent; and the Respondent having dismissed his bill against May, and examined him as a witness, so that no account could be taken against May, either of his dealings and transactions with the Respondent or with Bernal, the Respondent had debarred himself from impeaching the considerations of the said several securities, as appearing thereon, and as stated in the said deed and bond of the 18th of October, 1800, and that he could not then impeach the said securities for fraud or imposition, or the considerations of the same; but it was further declared, that under the particular circumstances of the case, the said post obit bonds ought to stand as a security only, for the principal sums stated in the said deed of the 18th of October, 1800, to have been the considerations for the same respectively, with interest thereon, at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum from the date of the said bonds respectively: And it was thereby further ordered, That it should be referred to one of the Masters of the said Court of Chancery in Ireland, to take an account of what was due to Bernal for principal and interest on the said post obit bonds, according to the declaration aforesaid, and to take an account of what was due to Bernal on the said bond of the 18th of October, 1800, according to the declaration aforesaid: And it was thereby further declared, that on taking such accounts the Respondent must, under the circumstances, be bound by the accounts settled and stated between May and Bernal, except so far as the Respondent should be able to falsify the same, or shew any errors or overcharges therein: And it was thereby further ordered, That the said Master should compute interest on the several [607] sums of money which should appear on taking the said accounts to be due to Bernal, for advances made by him to or for the use of the Respondent or May, and for the debts due from May to Bernal, according to the terms of the said bond, bearing date the 18th of October, 1800: And it was thereby further ordered, That the said Master in taking such accounts, should make to both parties all just allowances, subject to the declarations and orders aforesaid: And it was thereby further ordered, That the Master should inquire and state, whether the Respondent had discharged the demands of Hartsinck and Co., John Symmons, and Wilkinson, Bloxam, and Co.; and if not, it was thereby ordered, That the Respondent should forthwith discharge the same, and fully indemnify Bernal therefrom; and in case Bernal should have paid, or should pay the same, or any part thereof, then that the said Master should take an account thereof, and charge the Respondent therewith in the accounts before directed, with interest for the same, at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum, from the times of such payment respectively: And it was thereby further ordered, That the Master should inquire into whose hands, possession, or power, the bonds of Wharton, in the pleadings mentioned, had come, and how the same had been disposed of, and where the same then were respectively: And it was thereby further ordered, That all further directions should be reserved to the said Court of Chancery, until after the said Master should have made his report: And it was thereby further ordered, That in the mean time, Bernal should be restrained by the injunction of the court from proceeding at law against the Respondent, as to the Court should seem meet: And it was thereby further ordered, That all parties should be [608] examined upon interrogatories, touching the matters aforesaid, and produce all deeds, instruments, accounts, papers, and writings, as the said Court should direct: And it was thereby further ordered, That the decree of the 9th of June, 1807, made in the cross cause, dismissing Bernal's bill, should be reversed, and that Bernal should be at liberty to proceed in the said cause, as he should be advised; but in case Bernal should be allowed to proceed at law against the Respondent for any part of his demands, it should be without prejudice to any application which the Respondent might think fit to make to the Court of Chancery, to compel Bernal to make his election, whether he would proceed at law or in Equity: And it was finally ordered, That the Court of Chancery (in Ireland,) should proceed to give all the orders necessary for carrying that order and judgment into execution in both the causes."

May, dying intestate, in the year 1814, subsequently to the hearing of the appeal, Bernal filed his bill of revivor and supplement, to which the Respondent and Sir Humphry May put in their answers, the latter admitting himself to be the brother and heir-at-law of Sir Edward May, deceased; but no further proceedings were had in the cross cause.

The order of the House of Lords having been transmitted to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, was made an order of that court; and it was accordingly referred to Thomas Ball, Esq., one of the Masters of the court, to take the accounts directed by the order; and thereupon Isaac Bernal filed two charges, one on foot of the post obit bonds, and the other on foot of the bond of the 18th of October, 1800; and the Respondent filed discharges thereto; but before any effectual progress was made in the ac-[609]-counts, Isaac Bernal died, whereupon the present Appellants, as his executors, on the 27th of September, 1821, filed their bill of revivor in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, against the Respondent, praying that they might be at liberty to revive the first mentioned cause, which had abated by the death of Isaac Bernal, and that they might have the benefit of the judgment pronounced in the appeal; and the Respondent having appeared to the bill of revivor, it was ordered by the Court, on the 10th of November, 1821, that the first mentioned cause should stand and be revived.

To support the latter charge, the Appellants produced before the Master the bond and deed of the 18th of October, 1800, and also the book in which was contained the accounts alleged to have been stated and settled between Bernal and May, on the foot of the last of which there appeared a balance due from May to Bernal, on the 1st of June, 1801, of £21,372 12s. 4d, which the Master admitted as prima facie evidence of the amount of the charge.

The book so produced, commenced with an account current between Bernal and May, of their general bill and cash transactions, beginning in the year 1791, which account is continued to the end of the tenth folio of the book, from whence it is carried to folio fifteen. In two of the intervening folios, namely, eleven and twelve, is contained the statement of the accounts settled between May and Bernal, on foot of the alleged transfæ from the latter to the former, of Wharton's original securities.

The transaction is there stated in this way: the first set of securities, amounting to £19,212 12s. 10d. sterling, is stated to have been delivered to May, for which he gives his bond, dated the 3d of July, 1791, for £11,212 12s. 10d. bearing interest, and [610] gives credit for two sums of £1000 each; one stated to have been paid to a Mr. Williams; the other, Bernal is to deduct from Joshua Mendes Da Costa; making altogether £19,212 12s. 10d.;—another set of Wharton's securities, to wit, two post obit bonds for £6000 each, are stated to be sold to May for the sum of £7500, for which sum he gives his bond to Bernal, dated the same day, bearing interest.

In the twelfth page of the book, the two bonds which May had passed for Wharton's securities, to wit, the one for £11,212 12s. 10d., and the other for £7500 are charged to him with a sum of £637 12s. 6d. stated to be agreed to be charged for interest on the account, making together the sum of £19,350 5s. 1d.; and this sum is written off on the credit side, by cash, and by sundry bills, notes, and other securities received by Bernal, amounting precisely to £19,350 5s. 1d., the greater part of which, namely, £12,804 2s. 9d., appears to have been paid and given by May after Wharton's bill had been filed to impeach the securities, and pending the litigation with him. Amongst these credits, in order to make up the precise sum, are portions of the Respondent's post obit bonds, entered as follows: "1795, June 8th, by money secured on bonds of Lord Belfast, £3000," and (after intervening payments,) "September 17th, by money secured on bond of Lord Belfast, £1000."

In this way, the alleged sale of Wharton's securities to May, appears by the book to be closed, settled, and paid for.

In his answer to the Respondent's original bill, Bernal stated, that he gave credit to May for two sums of £3000 and £1000, part of the said bonds, in liquidation of the balance then due from May to him, on the foot of Wharton's securities, and for the remainder of [611] the post obit bonds, by applying them in part and further liquidation of the cash and bill account between him and May.

Two leaves of the book, containing part of the last mentioned account, namely, the credit side of folio 11, and the debtor and creditor sides of folio 12, appeared to have been either cut out, or worn and detached by use.

From folio 15, the account current which had been brought over from folio 10, is continued with occasional interruption, and occupies the greater part of the book; balances are from time to time struck and signed by May; by the last balance so signed, the sum of £24,372 12s. 4d. appears due from May to Bernal, on the 1st of June, 1801.

The Master having admitted the book as prima facie evidence, that the sum of £24,372 12s. 4d. was due from May to Bernal on the 1st of June, 1801, as the balance of the last account stated and settled between them, the Respondent proceeded to falsify these settled accounts, under the liberty given to him by the order made on the appeal.

With this view, the Respondent insisted that the different payments made by May to Bernal, from August, 1794, to September, 1795, and which in the book as it appeared, are placed to the credit of the alleged sale of Wharton's securities, ought to be placed to the credit of the general account of bills and cash transactions between May and Bernal, at the respective dates when such payments took place, without having regard to the pretended sale of Wharton's securities from Bernal to May. Because, as he contended, there was evidence on the face of the book of accounts, and in the nature of the dealings between Bernal and May, and also in the proceedings in the [612] cause of Wharton v. May, Bernal, and others (5 Ves. p. 27), to warrant a presumption, that these payments were made by May to Bernal, on account of the bill and cash transactions between them, and that the same were originally placed to the credit of the bill and cash account, and that afterwards, when Mr. Wharton, by his bill in the Court of Chancery in England, (filed in February, 1795) had impeached the securities which had been obtained from him, as obtained by fraud, and without consideration, the accounts between Bernal and May were fraudulently altered, with a view to impose on the Court of Chancery in that cause, by representing May as a purchaser of Wharton's securities, for valuable consideration; that with this view, the account now appearing in the 11th and 12th pages of the book was made out, and credits to the exact amount necessary to balance that account, were withdrawn from the bill and cash account; and this fraud, which was originally resorted to against Wharton, was afterwards turned against the Respondent, thus making a large balance appear to be due from May to Bernal, when, in truth, none was due.

At folio 10 of the book, the left-hand side being insufficient for the debits, they are brought over to the right-hand or credit side of the book, under the credits; and in performing the operation, entries under date of the 20th of June, 1795, have been placed immediately under the credits of the 17th of September, in the same year; so in folio 24, entries of the 5th of September, 1797, occur under entries of the 17th of November. The credits in folio 12, purporting to be payments at different times, from August, 1794, to September, 1795, from the colour of the ink, and the [613] manner of the hand-writing, appeared to have been written at one time. This book was represented by Bernal to be the original book, containing the only account of these transactions, and no other was produced.

Daniel Collyer, a solicitor, proved in the cause, that in the year 1804, May had, in his presence, taxed Bernal to his face, with fraud in the accounts between them, and undertook to point out the places in which Bernal's account book had been mutilated, and that upon Bernal's producing the book as he then did, May opened it, and pointed to the part in which the leaves had been torn out. The Respondent also produced plain copies of the proceedings in the cause of Wharton v. May, which, to save the expense of attested copies, were admitted by the Master, by the consent of all parties, the Master certifying such admission and consent.

On the 29th of November, 1822, the Master made his report, whereby he certified that he had proceeded in the accounts and inquiries directed, and found, "that there was then due from the Respondent to the Appellants, (as executor and executrixes of the will of Bernal,) the sum of £23,470 13s. 5½d. British, for four principal sums of £12,000, £6000, £250, and £5000, and a small arrear of interest, after crediting the monies theretofore received and levied, under the several judgments obtained on the authority of the several warrants of attorney, collateral with the bonds, (the particulars of which he had set forth in the Schedule to his Report): And he further certified, That in proceeding to take the accounts directed on the foot of the before-mentioned bond, bearing date the 18th day of October, 1800, he found that the last settlement of accounts between Bernal and May, was [614] up to the 1st day of June, 1801, and that on that day, it was agreed between them, that there was £24,372 12s. 4d. British money, due from May to Bernal, including four bills of exchange amounting together to £2602 12s. then outstanding, over-due and unpaid, which he found, by an indenture bearing date the 4th of February, 1802, and made between May of the one part, and Bernal of the other part, were severally and respectively to be deducted from the said £24,372 12s. 4d. when the same should severally and respectively be delivered up by May to Bernal, to be cancelled, and exclusive of three several collateral securities which Bernal had entered into for May to Messrs. Wilkinson, Bloxam, and Co., John Symmons, and Messrs. Hartsinck and Co.; but the Respondent having made it appear to him, that such balance of £24,372 12s. 4d. ought not only to be reduced by the amount of three out of the before-mentioned bills, amounting together to £2392 12s. (the fourth having been paid by Bernal), but also by the amount of sundry payments which May made to Bernal in the years 1794 and 1795, to the extent of £19,350 5s. 4d. British, for divers securities of Wharton to the nominal amount of £31,212 12s. 10d. British, but for which it appeared May ultimately recovered only £354 3s. 3d. exclusive of interest: he had in taking the said last-mentioned accounts, made what he conceived to be the proper additions and deductions on foot of the said last settled account of the 1st of June, 1801, between May and Bernal, and in so doing he had, as against the said £19,350 5s. 4d. charged May's account with the amount of one of Wharton's securities for £2900, which, antecedently to the 1st of July, 1794, had been passed by May to Bernal, because Bernal [615] originally received the same from, and gave May credit for the full amount thereof, and he had also charged May's account with the before mentioned sum of £354 3s. 3d., and the amount of sundry costs, which had been proved before him to have been paid by Bernal on May's account, and two sums of £75 2s. 5d., and £81 2s. 5d., the amount of two bills of exchange originally received of, and credited to May, but not paid when due; and he had deducted from the said account all interest charged in the said settled accounts, by which the balance of the last settled account ending the 1st of June, 1801, was ultimately reduced from £24,372 12s. 4d. to £4164 4s. 7d., from which £4161 4s. 7d. he had afterwards deducted the amount of a bill of exchange of £592 12s. 0d., which Bernal originally accepted for the accommodation of May, and which he found May ultimately got up and returned to Bernal in the year 1802, and also two other sums of £800 and £1000 for two other bills of exchange originally accepted by Bernal for May's accommodation, which were yet outstanding unpaid by Bernal, and against the payment of which with interest, the Respondent was to indemnify the Appellants as executors of Bernal, by which the ultimately reduced balance of the last settled account between May and Bernal was brought to the sum of £1771 12s. 7d., from the foot of which he had taken the subsequent account, and calculated interest as directed, and he found that there was a sum of £215 2s. 3d. British money, over-paid and in favour of the Respondent, as appeared by the second Schedule annexed to his Report, which £215 2s. 3d. he had deducted from the before-mentioned sum of £23,470 3s. 5½d. remaining due at the foot of the first Schedule, whereby the whole sum then due from the Respondent to the Appellants, (as [616] executor and executrixes of the will of Bernal,) was reduced to the sum of £23,225 11s. 2½d. British, making £25,161 0s. 5d. sterling Irish money," etc. The Master then went on to state in the Report the result of the other matters referred to him.

To this report the following exceptions were taken by the Appellants:

First Exception: FOR that the Master in taking that part of the account directed to be taken on the foot of the bond of the 18th of October, 1800, had certified, "that on the last settlement of accounts between Isaac Bernal and Edward May, it was agreed between them, that £24,372 12s. 4d. British Money, was due from the said Edward May to the said Isaac Bernal, (including four bills of exchange and some other securities therein particularly mentioned,) yet the Marquis, having made it appear to the Master that the said balance of £24,372 12s. 4d. ought not only to be reduced by the amount of certain bills therein mentioned, but also by the amount of various payments which Edward May made to Isaac Bernal, in the year 1794 and 1795, to the extent of £19,350 5s. 4d. for divers securities of John Hall Wharton, to the nominal amount of £31,212 12s. 10d. but for which Edward May ultimately recovered only £354 3s. 3d. exclusive of interest, and that the said Master had deducted from the last settled account of the 1st of June, 1801, the monies and securities to the amount of £19,350 5s. 4d. so paid by Edward May to Isaac Bernal for Wharton's securities, and all interest charged on the settled accounts therein referred to, by which the balance of the last settled account, ending the 1st of June, 1801, was reduced from £24,372 12s. 4d. to £4164 4s. 7d. British, and by means of which with some other debits and credits, the report found, that there was a sum of £245 2s. 3d. British, [617] overpaid and in favour of the Marquis," which finding, so far as related to Wharton's securities, the Master was not warranted in adopting, by the decree therein mentioned, (giving to the Marquis a right to falsify or shew error or overcharges in the said settled accounts,) or by the evidence before him.

Second Exception: FOR that the said Master varied the balance of the said settled accounts, by debiting the said Isaac Bernal with £19,354 5s. 4d. as the amount of various payments made by Edward May to Isaac Bernal, in the years 1794 and 1795, for divers securities of the said John Hall Wharton, to the nominal amount of £31,212 12s. 10d. and did not credit the said Isaac Bernal on the foot of the said security, with the sum which Edward May had agreed to credit, and did actually credit the said Isaac Bernal with, whereby the balance appearing by the last settled account, in the said decree mentioned to be due from the said Edward May to Isaac Bernal, on the 1st of June, 1801, namely, £24,372 12s. 4d. was reduced to £4,164 4s. 7d. British: And the report also stated, "That the whole of the said balance was not only discharged, but the balance turned against the said Isaac Bernal, by a sum of £245 2s. 3d.," in which variation the Master was not warranted by any evidence laid before him, even though he was warranted (which the Appellants denied,) in entering into an investigation of the equities between the said Edward May and Isaac Bernal, touching Wharton's securities, or into the considerations given for the same, according to the agreement of the parties.

These exceptions being over-ruled, the cause was heard upon further directions, on the 3d of February, 1823, when it was decreed, "That the receiver in the cause should forthwith account, and pay over to the Appellants the balance in his hands, in liquidation-[618]-tion of the £25,161 0s. 5d., reported due to the Appellants, and that the Respondent should pay to the Appellants the balance (if any should appear due to them, after such payment,) within six months, with interest, at £5 per cent. from the date of the said report, until paid, and that in the mean time, the receiver should be continued, with liberty to the Appellants to apply, from time to time, as they should see fit, and that the receiver should pay over to them such further sums as he might receive, until the said principal sum, reported due to the Appellants for principal and interest, should be fully paid off, and that all parties should be at liberty to apply to the Court, as they should be advised, and that each of the parties should abide their own costs.

Against this order of the 3d of February, 1823, the appeal was presented.

In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor made the following observations (16 Feb. 1826): *

The Lord Chancellor: I wish the Respondents first to state, whether a sum is not agreed on as the result of a settled account, which is to be surcharged and falsified: And then to point out what are the sums which they mean to withdraw from that account on the ground of what is called falsifying. Neither party, as it appears to me, object on the record to the £24,372 being taken as the result of a settled account: then, the question is, what is the meaning of the words "falsify or surcharge" in this decree? The next question will be, in pointing out what it is that they mean to withdraw from that account, how they are to make it out that that can, according to [619] the true intent and meaning of the words "falsify or surcharge," be withdrawn.

How does it appear that this part of the book laid before the Master makes the balance £24,372? Do not understand me that I cannot find such and such evidence; I want to see the course of the thing. What the Master says is this, "and in proceeding to take the accounts directed under the before mentioned bond, bearing date the 18th of October, 1800, in the penal sum of £60,000 British money. I find that the last settlement of accounts between the said Isaac Bernal and the said Edward May, was up to the 1st of June, 1801." First of all I want to know what it is the Respondent objects to? Not how he makes it out. The ordinary course of falsifying is, to point out some sum. You must begin by shewing that what is in pages 11 and 12 forms part of the charge in this book.

The case stated by the Respondent, as I understand it, is this: May is made debtor for £19,350 on two bonds that are mentioned, one of the 21st of July, and the other of the 12th December, and interest on those; and on the other side he has credit given to him for a great number of bills, amounting to the sum of £19,350. The Respondent contends that he ought to have credit given to him for that £19,350, but that he ought not to have been debited with the other. The Master's report is to this effect:—he says, that on that day it was agreed between them that there was £24,372 12s. 4d. British money, due from May to Bernal, including four bills of exchange, amounting together to £2602 12s., then outstanding, over due, and unpaid, which I find by an indenture bearing date the 11th of February, 1802, made between Edward May of the one part, and Isaac Bernal of the other part, were severally to be deducted from [620] said £24,372 12s. 4d., when the same should severally and respectively be delivered up by May to Bernal to be cancelled.

Then the first thing to be proved here is, that it does appear by that indenture of the 4th of February, 1802, that these bills were to be so delivered up. What is the evidence of that? Where is that indenture? How does that appear? The report goes on to say, "but the Defendant having made it appear to me that such balance of £24,372 12s. 4d. ought not only to be reduced by the amount of three out of the before mentioned four bills, amounting together to £2392 12s., (the fourth having been paid by Isaac Bernal) but also by the amount of various payments which May made to Bernal in the years 1794 and 1795, to the extent of £19,350 5s. 4d. British, for divers securities of said John Hall Wharton, to the nominal amount of £31,212 12s. 10d. British, but for which it appears May ultimately recovered only £354." Now it is upon those who are to support the Master's Report to prove those facts as there stated. The Appellant quarrels with the Master's Report because it has stated such and such deductions to be made, and such and such evidence to be referred to. Then I say you are not at liberty here to prove that those deductions ought to be made, except on the evidence on which the Master has made the deductions.

They take the exceptions in two ways;—they say, first, that the exceptions are such that the report ought to be reviewed; and further, that the whole Judgment should be set aside: And then they put it very fairly again in their exceptions, that you are to shew that these deductions made by the Master, are made properly on the effect of the evidence on which he has proceeded, and not on all the rest of the evidence which you may think proper to bring to this [621] bar; and then that being so properly made, they fall within the meaning of the word "falsifying."

You must shew that the Master is authorized by the evidence to which he there refers to have made that report. You see their exceptions expressly mention the evidence. I allude to that part which goes to the extent of £19,350, and that as a part of £31,212. There you see the exception expressly says, " (that so far as relates to the payments made or securities given to Bernal by May, on account of Wharton's securities, handed to May by Bernal) he ought not to have come to or adopted such report; not being warranted so to do by the true construction of the judgment or decree in the report mentioned (giving to the Defendant a right to falsify or shew error or overcharge in the settled accounts)." That is one principle of opposing it "or by the evidence appearing before him on the taking of the account." Then you must point out what was the evidence before him on taking the account.

If the decree in Wharton v. May is to be considered as evidence, (and the Master, in his Report, states that was agreed to be evidence,) you must state the case of Wharton v. May. We must see how you apply Wharton v. May to the question of May v. Bernal.

The Master says, that it was consented between the parties to save the expense of bringing over and proving attested copies thereof, that plain copies of the following orders, reports, exceptions, decrees, and proceedings, in the cause of Wharton against May and others, should be read in evidence before me in those causes as if duly proved, and which were accordingly read in evidence before me, namely; Decree dated 25th of June, 1799; The Master's report and [622] Schedules pursuant thereto dated 30th of July, 1806; Plaintiffs and Defendants exceptions thereto; Order of the House of Lords on the appeal in the cause, bearing date the 10th of August, 1807; Order on hearing exceptions to the Master's report bearing date 11th of February, 1808; Order bearing date 9th of December, 1808, that Master's report should state result of Schedules on the exceptions sent back; Report of the Master, dated 19th of January, 1809; Decree dated 25th of July, 1809. These were read by consent.

How do you understand that at the bar!—were the proceedings in Wharton v. May agreed to be read in evidence? If not, you must state the case of Wharton v. May, so as to shew that in taking the account between May v. Bernal, those proceedings should have been received. The great difficulty that one has in the case is this, that all that the Master says in his report is, that “the Defendant having made it appear to me that such balance, etc.” The Court is to know in what way the Defendant had made that appear to the Master; what have we in proof as to how the Defendant made it appear. Instead of printing this immense mass of evidence, they should have put in the evidence, which the Master had before him. That would have been in compliance with the rules and orders of the House. The rules of the House require that the evidence should be printed, on which the Master proceeded. It appears by these papers that the Lord Chancellor called on the Master to certify on what evidence he had proceeded, and accordingly he certified that he had proceeded on all these causes and reports and so on, and all this seems to have been without objection; then we have in the Irish cause the notes on the hearing, and I do not find there was any objection made in the argument before the Chancellor to reading all these.

[623] It appears on the notes which I have been reading, that a great many deeds were read before the Chancellor, not one of which have been read to day. The Master, in answer to the application of the Lord Chancellor, says, “I certify that it was admitted by all the parties before me on the enquiry, directed by the order of the House of Lords, that the securities of John Hall Wharton mentioned in these causes, and also in the accounts between the said Isaac Bernal and Edward May deceased, were the same as those mentioned in the cause instituted in England by the said John Hall Wharton against the Defendant, the Marquis of Donegal, and the said Edward May and Isaac Bernal; and it was also consented to save the expense of bringing over and proving attested copies thereof, that plain copies of the following orders, reports, exceptions, decrees, and proceedings in the said cause of Wharton v. May and others, should be read in evidence before me in these causes, as if duly proved, and which were accordingly read in evidence before me.” (He does not state that there was any objection to their being read in evidence)—“Namely a decree, etc.”—and he goes through all these particulars. Then upon the hearing of the cause these are all offered in evidence, no objection is made to them on the part of Mr. Bernal's counsel, and a great many deeds are stated as being read. This account also was stated as having been produced in evidence, and then the Court decides on the matter which now appears on the exceptions.

The question therefore is, what was the view of the case taken in the Court below. There is no doubt that in an order giving leave to surcharge and falsify as far as the word “falsify” is concerned, it is neither more nor less than an authority under which due proof and evidence ought to be produced. But, in this case, it [624] comes to be a matter of question, quite different as to the word “falsify,” whether the narrow or strict sense of falsifying is to be adopted by this House. If that is to be so, the fact then is this, that the parties in the Court below proceeded on one ground, and then they come here to undo all that has been done there, as it is represented. The fact may be in dispute. The question is, what was the matter disputed before the Court below? And undoubtedly that again gives rise to another observation, which is this; if the Court below decided in confirmation of the Master's report upon the evidence on which he should have made that report and other evidence, then the Court was wrong: Unless that other evidence was by consent of the parties.

Mr. Hart: The gentleman who attended this cause in Ireland happens to be at the bar of the House. He says he took the objection over and over again that it was evidence which did not apply to this cause before the Master.

The Lord Chancellor: He might take the objection, but did he take any objection to the admission of it as evidence, leaving the Court and Master to decide?

Mr. Hart (23d Feb. 1826): At the instance of May, Bernal had given up these bonds, and as I apprehend on the principles of every court of justice, if Mr. May perfectly conusant of all the circumstances between himself, Mr. Wharton and Mr. Bernal had thought fit to make a purchase of those securities of Mr. Wharton's for a specified sum, giving his bond by way of payment, it was quite immaterial whether the securities that he so purchased, turned out to be worth one farthing or not.

The Lord Chancellor: Was the point you now make, entered into in the Court below?

[625] Mr. Hart: I cannot tell what points were made in the Court below.

The Lord Chancellor: According to the notes, no such thing appears to have been mentioned. There are two points: first, whether the evidence in the cause of Wharton and May, was to be received at all; and secondly, if that evidence was to be received, whether the securities may not be taken at the value represented in this account.

It may be necessary to enquire of the Court below, what were the grounds of decision. If cases come here on points which were not discussed, it is not an appeal, but a new cause. I do not mean to stop you; on the contrary, I think it a very material point.

Mr. Hart: I hope your Lordship will not think the Appellant bound by the omission of his counsel below.

The Lord Chancellor: Perhaps not; but if the client comes here to state points that were not made before the Court in Ireland, he ought to pay the expenses of coming here, if the thing is sent back again. He must do that at least.

What they say is this: here is a bond or security, which was sold by May to Bernal, apparently for so much money; they say, that notwithstanding that appears on the face of the instrument, it is worth only so much less, and that therefore they ought not to be charged with such a sum of money. Then comes the question, was it or was it not before the Court in Ireland, alleged that what appeared on the face of the instrument could not be disputed? You see the allegation on the one side is "you owe me such a sum of money, on such a bond:" the allegation on the other side is, "no, I do not owe you that money on [626] the bond, because whatever appears on the face of the bond is not what is due between you and May." It is on the party who thinks that he can make out this point that the bond shall be the rule of evidence, and that no further enquiry shall be made but what appears on the face of the bond, to insist on that bond.

I am not saying, or presuming to say, what the effect of this "falsifying and surcharging is," as to whether it falls within that rule; I never can suppose the Master went on falsifying and surcharging in the way he has done, unless the parties called on him to do so. His report is to that effect.

Can we understand that unless we have the information on both sides, from gentlemen at the bar, to say that was the case. The first exception goes on the point, that the equities as between Wharton and May, were not to be considered as equities as between May and Bernal, that is a succinct and distinct proposition of law. The second exception is, that the Master would not be warranted in his conclusion, even if he did take those equities into consideration, by agreement of the parties; and therefore the Court refers to him to know what the parties have done before, and he makes a certificate, which seems to me to imply that this was by agreement of the parties, and the Court seems to have proceeded on that. It is very material that we should know what the Court really proceeded on, because, if it was upon an agreement between the parties (and that it might be so is clear from the language of the second exception,) we ought to know whether there was such an agreement as that—that is, whether the Court proceeded on the notion that there was such an agreement.

Take Mr. Wallace's view according to the exceptions. Mr. Wallace is the counsel who signs the ex-[627]-ceptions; and the second exception is, "that the Master was not warranted in what he has done by any evidence laid before him, even though he was warranted (which the Plaintiffs deny,) in entering into any investigation of the securities between May and Bernal touching Wharton's securities, or into the considerations given for the same according to the agreement that was entered into between the parties." Now what was that agreement?

Mr. Hart: That agreement was to substitute attested copies instead of originals.

The Lord Chancellor: That is not the effect of the certificate. Your first exception is, that there was no ground for the decision from any thing that passed between Wharton and May. The second exception is, that if there was an agreement between the parties to admit that evidence, it did not authorize the report.

If Bernal sold to May post obit bonds, stating that he had paid £6000, or any other sum, and it should appear in the proceedings of the other cause that he had not paid one farthing for them; supposing it to be open to Bernal in the other cause to have contended if such thing should appear, that amongst the bonds he had given to May—(sold to May, if you please so to put it): that he stated that, in consideration of a sum of £1000, or any other sum to be mentioned, he had got a post obit bond for a sum of money payable on certain conditions, and that it should appear on evidence that should bind him in the cause, that he had paid nothing for that post obit bond, would that be conclusive as to May unless he had subsequently acquiesced? That leads me to ask you whether there was any evidence in the Court below [628] of Bernal's state of facts carried in before Master Ball (see the Appendix to the printed cases)? It would be open to a question of a rather singular nature, because that state of facts seems to contend this, that if at any time May had had an equity of the same nature of Wharton's, yet that May's subsequent transactions might deprive him of that equity: whether that would be a consideration that the Master could have gone into, consistently with the order of the House of Lords, may be another question: but whether the House of Lords may not, on that footing, if there was evidence with respect to the state of facts itself, direct some enquiries in order to get at the fact of such subsequent conduct on the part of May, would be another question.

The report takes no notice at all of that state of facts which was carried in by Bernal, nor could the report take any notice of it, because there was no evidence given in support of that state of facts. There do appear to me to be some considerable points mentioned in Bernal's state of facts.

You see Bernal in his state of facts means to establish that May cheated Wharton, and cheated himself beyond all example; and he means also to state that the transactions which May was concerned in, subsequently to the sale of these securities to May, were such as would cut all equity from under his feet, even if there could have been equity at the moment of that sale of the bonds to him. For that reason I ask whether that state of facts was at all supported before the Master.

Mr Hart: I have made no observation on what has been said impugning the book about spoliation, because the intrinsic evidence of that paper itself, is [629] only that time and use have separated those sheets from the mass of the book itself.

The Lord Chancellor: I think that appears to be the case.

After the Argument which took place in 1826, the case stood over for judgment.

On the 25th of June, 1827, the judgment of the Court below was affirmed, on the motion of Lord Eldon, without further observation.

Judgment Affirmed.

APPENDIX.

(SCOTLAND.) COURT OF SESSION.

HUGH ARBUCKLE,—Appellant; CAMPBELL INNES and others,—Respondents.

In a proceeding under the stat. 7 Geo. 2. c. 16. sec. 7 and 16. Geo. 2. c. 2. sec. 24.—a party having appeared as proxy for an elector at the annual election of Magistrates and Councillors of a borough,—leaves Scotland in a ship, of which he is Master, upon a voyage to France and back,—having before his departure communicated with his legal agent upon the subject of a petition to the Court of Session, against the proceedings at the election; and during his absence, and before the expiration of two months from the election, he transmits to the same agent a letter upon the subject. The agent, thereupon, presents the petition in the name of the proxy, and the proceeding is commenced before the expiration of the two months. The proxy does not return to Scotland until after the expiration of the two months, but then recognises the proceeding as instituted by his authority. Held by the Court of Session that there was not, under these circumstances, a sufficient mandatory for the proceeding, and this judgment was affirmed on appeal, but with much hesitation.

On the 25th of November, 1825, a petition and complaint was presented to the Court of Session, at the instance of the Appellant Hugh Arbuckle, and of James McBain, deacon of the incorporation of tailors of the Burgh of Queensferry, both of them constituent members of the meeting for the annual election of the magistrates and councillors of that burgh, held on the [632] 29th day of September preceding, complaining of certain wrongs and abuses committed in the course of the election, and praying that the election of magistrates and councillors, said to have taken place at that meeting should be found to be illegal, and should be reduced and set aside.

The petition is in name of James McBain, and Hugh Arbuckle, proxy, chosen in room of one of the electors of the magistrates of the burgh, constituent members of the meeting for the annual election of the magistrates and councillors of the burgh of Queensferry, held on the 29th day of September last.

It sets forth, "That by act of the 7th Geo. 2. c. 16. s. 7. relating to the election of magistrates of royal burghs, it is declared, 'That it shall and may be lawful to and for any magistrate or councillor of the burgh, who apprehends any wrong was done at any annual election, to bring his action before the Court of Session in Scotland, for rectifying such abuse, or for making void the whole election (if illegal) only within the space of eight weeks after such election is over.'"

"That by another act passed in the 16th Geo. 2. cap. 2. sect. 21." it is further provided and declared, "That it shall and may be lawful to and for any constituent member, at any meeting for election of magistrates and councillors, or of any meetings previous to that for election of magistrates and councillors respectively, who shall apprehend any wrong to have been done by the majority of such meeting, to apply to the said Court of Session, by a summary complaint, for rectifying such abuse, or for making void the whole election made by the said majority, or for declaring and ascertaining the election made, by the majority, so as such complaint be presented [633] to the said Court of Session, within two calendar months after the annual election of the magistrates and councillors."

Then follows a statement of the particular grounds of complaint.

The petition and complaint was boxed on the 25th of November, 1825.

The petition being served upon the persons complained of, they lodged their answer, which, besides a statement of the Respondents' pleas upon the merits, contain an objection to the title of both the complainers. But the title of the complainer McBain was not at issue under the present appeal, which involves merely the title of the complainer Hugh Arbuckle, and the competency of the complaint, so far as at his instance.

"The objection as to Hugh Arbuckle was, that he left Scotland a day or two after the Michaelmas election, on a foreign voyage, and was out of the kingdom at the time when the complaint was presented: that no mandate, or other authority granted by him, has been produced, authorising the complaint to be presented."

On the part of the Appellant it was alleged that he had given verbal instructions for the proceeding before his departure.

And afterwards addressed to his legal agent in Edinburgh, the following letter, which was received and acted upon before the expiration of the two months from the election.

"Dieppe, in France, 7th Nov. 1825.

"Dear Sir,—I have been detained here with contrary winds for this fortnight. I expected when I saw you, to have been on my passage home from Rotterdam before this time. I have to go there for a cargo, and I [634] hope not to be long detained. Prefixed I send you a memorandum about our Michaelmas election. I expect that you have got the minutes of election. Should you want any farther information on the subject, write me, to the care of Messrs. D. Barger and Son, Rotterdam, and I will attend to it immediately. I think the burgh will be very easily got set aside; and should it be necessary for you, I will rather come home from Rotterdam, by the way of London, as you should be disappointed. I have no doubt that Deacon McBain will allow you to use his name in the petition and complaint. Mr. Melville could speak to him, or I could send word over from Rotterdam to my mother for him to go into Edinburgh to speak to Mr. M. Perhaps in the petition and complaint it might be as well to conclude for the penalties of £100 for each person acting, who may be found disqualified. I remain, dear Sir, yours truly (Addressed) "James Gibson Craig, North Street, Andrew's Street, Edinburgh."

(Signed) HU. ARBUCKLE.

The following pleas, in point of law, were submitted on the part of the complainers, in regard to the title of the Appellant.

"1. The complainers, being both natives of this country, no written mandate was required before this complaint could competently proceed at their instance, even though it be true that one of them was out of the country in the course of his business on the particular day on which the complaint was presented."

"2. The complainer, Hugh Arbuckle, having been chosen a proxy for an absent elector, and the [635] other complainer, James McBain, as deacon of the incorporation of Taylors, having been one of the body of electors, they were both constituent members of the meeting of election, and entitled to bring the present complaint, under the statutes there founded on."

There was a third plea on the point of title: but it relates solely to the title of McBain.

The following are the pleas which were stated for the Respondents, with regard to the Appellant's title:

"1. As to the title of Hugh Arbuckle. The Respondents maintain, in point of law, that the present petition and complaint cannot be insisted on, in the name, and at the instance, of Hugh Arbuckle, because,

"1. At the time when the present petition and complaint, at the instance of Hugh Arbuckle, was presented, Hugh Arbuckle, being forth of the kingdom and beyond seas, and having left no mandate to enable any one to appear as his mandatory, no petition and complaint was, in law, presented within the statutory period at the instance of the said Hugh Arbuckle.

"2. As Hugh Arbuckle was forth of the kingdom, and beyond seas, no complaint or the nature of the present one could competently be presented, without an express mandate to that effect, granted by him in favour of the counsel who signed it, or of some individual who, in the complaint, caused himself to be designed as the mandatory of Hugh Arbuckle. 1681, February 3. ——— against Stuart of Archattan, Morr. 353. 1780, July 30. Major Alexander Dundas against Alexander Ferguson, Morr. 8837. 1802, July 6. Davidson against [636] Elphinstone, Morr. 8842. 28th February, 1818, Cameron against McNab, F. C. 436.

"3. The Respondents maintain that the letter which has been produced by the complainers, although it contains memoranda and information as to the election at the burgh of Queensferry, at Michaelmas, 1825, for the use of 'James Gibson Craig, Esq.' to whom it is addressed, and states the writer's willingness to promote the wish of that gentleman, in regard to the politics of the burgh, contains no mandate which could legally have authorized Mr. Gibson Craig to have raised the present complaint as at the instance of Hugh Arbuckle, or in it to have designed himself Arbuckle's mandatory, and still less any counsel to have signed such complaint, or any other party to appear for Arbuckle as mandatory.

"4. This complaint was not originally presented at the instance of Hugh Arbuckle. Nothing done by him, after the statutory period had elapsed, can have the effect of causing this complaint to be considered as having been presented at his instance within the period prescribed by the statute. 1804, February 24th. Gray against Spens. Morr. App. No. 14."

No interlocutor was pronounced declaring the record to be closed; but the case having been taken up by the First Division of the Court on the 11th March, 1826.

the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords having advised, etc., dismiss the petition and complaint in so far as it is made by Hugh Arbuckle, and decern, etc."

Against this judgment the Appeal was presented.

[637] For the Appellants: Dr. Lushington and Mr. W. Adam.

For the Respondents: Serjeant Spankie and Mr. Alderson.

Trevenen*, 2 B. and A. 339. 479.

The Lord Chancellor (22d Feb.): In the cause in which Hugh Arbuckle was Appellant, and Campbell Innes and several other persons were the Respondents, the question was whether Mr. Arbuckle, who was absent at the time, had given authority for the institution of certain proceedings upon the election, of which he complained and the case having been heard before the first division of the Court of Session, the Court ex-[638]-pressed their opinion in the following interlocutor. "Having advised, etc., dismiss the petition and complaint, in so far as it is made by Hugh Arbuckle; and decern, and find him liable in one half of the expenses incurred in process, in terms of the statute." The Judgment expressed in this interlocutor, proceeds upon the opinion of the Court of Session, that it was necessary Mr. Arbuckle should prove that he had given mandatory for the institution of suit.

This case, in my Judgment affords a question of very great importance, in every way of considering it; but in a case of this nature, in which it appears to me that the Court of Session, in all human probability, must understand a matter of practice of this sort better than we can understand it, and there being great inconvenience, either in holding that they are right, or that they are wrong, I cannot form so clear an opinion that they are wrong, as to take upon myself to advise your Lordships to reverse the Judgment. I should, therefore, propose that the Judgment should be affirmed, and that the cause should be sent back to the Court of Session, to proceed as to the matter of James McBain, the other party according to the reservation in the interlocutor, as they should be advised. Having stated this, as my Judgment upon this extremely difficult question, and as there are great difficulties in adopting the one or the other view of the case, it does not appear to me, that this is a case in which your Lordships ought to give costs.

(1827.) Ordered and adjudged, that the appeal be dismissed, and the interlocutor, so far as complained of, affirmed; and it is further ordered, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session to proceed therein, with respect to the complaint made by James McBain, as shall be just.

[639] TOD and others. Appellants; TOD and others. Respondents. Et c Contra

[Mews' Dig. iv. 854, as to appeal for costs. See now Judicature Act, 1873, s. 49 and notes thereto in Annual Practice, 1901, ii. 139.]

An election of Magistrates in a Royal Burgh, which takes place under a warrant from the crown restoring the Burgh, is an annual election within the meaning and provisions of the 7 Geo. 2. c. 16, s. 7, and 16 Geo. 2. c. 11, s. 22.

An action of reduction and declaratur at common law, to set aside the proceedings, may be competent; but it must be brought within the two months prescribed by the statutes.

An appeal will not lie for costs only, where costs are in the discretion of the Court; But where the Court is directed by an Act of Parliament to give costs, it is a proper subject of appeal if they are not given according to the requisition of the Act.

The Lord Chancellor : * If this were a question arising upon the law of England, there would be no doubt about it, for I do not apprehend that a statute which gave a summary complaint, is a statute which would take away the common law remedy, but the case of Young v. Johnson (Jan. 1766 : Wight, p. 339), in the House of Lords, at a date pretty nearly contemporaneous with the statute, appears according to Mr. Wight's note of it, to have decided, as it has been alleged from the bar, that the action of reduction must be brought within two months. Now, I cannot satisfy my mind on what ground it should be held that the action of reduction should be brought within two months, unless the statute related to actions of reduction as well as [640] summary complaints. Considering the nature of the evidence as we find it in the printed cases in the House of Lords, and that there is not a single word that would support the judgment in that evidence unless it was given upon the point, whereas, on the other hand, that point does not appear to have been mentioned in the printed cases, there appears to be something hanging about that case, which makes it look very much like an authority of the House of Lords upon the point. Whether that case which has been so represented as of authority has been well decided, is a matter which I apprehend this House could not trust itself to examine.

This is an action of reduction and declaratur for setting aside the proceedings at an election, which were had in consequence of His Majesty having been pleased to restore the Burgh of Pittenweem. It has been very much discussed in the papers as well as at your Lordships' bar, whether this was to be considered as within the meaning of the words of the Act of Parliament, an annual election ; whether it was to be considered as a proceeding to be distinguished by majority and minority. Strictly speaking, on looking at the numbers, John Tod, and ten other persons made eleven, and James Tod, and ten others made eleven also, so that you can hardly call it a majority or minority.

But the question is, whether regard being had to the nature of the proceeding this is not within the term, intent, and meaning of the Act of Parliament to which reference has been made ; and on the best consideration I can give to the subject, I think that although this was an election held in consequence of His Majesty's restoring the Burgh ; and although there was this most unseemly diversity of opinion, and very singular conduct in the proceeding when the [641] election was had, yet that still it is to be considered as an annual election, and a complaint within the intent and meaning of the statutes.

Then, the question is reduced to this, namely, whether it is competent to bring this species of action, which is an action of reduction and declaratur, after eight weeks or two months have expired since the election, and before the institution of the proceeding. On the one hand, it has been contended, that this is not to be considered as a proceeding under the statutes which regulate the election of councillors and other persons, at these Burgh meetings, but that it is to be considered as an action brought according to the common law of Scotland, and that being an action brought according to the common law of Scotland, there is no statute which ought to be considered as a bar ; and I have no hesitation in stating that if we were here to judge of the law of Scotland upon English principles, which we ought never to do, and which I believe we have never intentionally done, that it might be a difficult thing to say, where a special proceeding is provided by Act of Parliament, and without words excluding the general operations of the common law, that that general operation of the common law would be to be considered as taken away ; and yet I cannot go the length of saying, that if there are statutes in pari materia, you may not infer such a shutting out of the remedy under the common law without any expression in the Act of Parliament which you have to construe.

But I find in this case a difficulty which I apprehend is quite insuperable, because my humble opinion is, that this point has been already determined by your Lordships, and that we cannot now alter it, whatever might have been our opinion upon the question, [642] whether this common law jurisdiction was shut out or not, by these special provisions.

The case of Johnston v. Young (January, 1766, in the Court of Session, D. P.), has been alluded to, together with the authority of Mr. Wight and Mr. Bell. With respect to the first named of the gentlemen, I think I am old enough to have had the honour of practising along with him at your Lordships' bar; and that he was a very great authority upon these subjects, nobody can deny; nor did I ever hear any dispute, with respect to the correctness of his representation as to matters of law in which he had been concerned. I need not state to your Lordships who Mr. Bell is, because you are all aware that he is a person whose authority is of considerable weight, though still he is a gentleman practising at the bar.

Upon looking at the case of Johnston v. Young, I have not been able to find that there is one word in the printed cases upon the subject; and yet it would be extremely difficult, upon looking at the evidence in that case, to conceive how this House could have made the decision which it has, unless the decision that it made went upon a ground that formed no part of the allegations in the printed case, or the evidence; and accordingly Mr. Wight has recorded in his work that the reversal in this case went upon a ground neither mentioned in the Court of Session in Scotland, nor mentioned in the printed cases laid upon your table; that it went upon this ground, that the action of reduction was competent, but still that it must be brought within two months.

It has been supposed that there is some mistake upon that subject, but when we come to look at a subsequent case that is to be found, which has been decided by your Lordships, it appears to me that it is quite impossible to contend with any hope of [643] persuading the House that Mr. Wight is mistaken as to that fact. It was a case which was heard at your bar in the year 1785, in which Robb Miller and others were Appellants, and Thompson and others, magistrates and councillors of the Burgh of Anstruther Wester, were the Respondents. In the printed case, in that proceeding this reason is stated, "Supposing it were competent to the Appellants, though not constituent members of the council of Anstruther Wester, to insist in the present action, yet as the Acts of 7th and 16th of his late Majesty have expressly limited the time for preferring actions or complaints to two months after the election complained of, and the present action was not brought till near twelve months after the election complained of, it is therefore incompetent, and could only have been brought with an intent to create trouble and confusion at the Michaelmas election, which was to come on a few days after the summons was raised, the prevention of which was the principal object of the statutes." Then this reason, which has the signature of Mr. Wight, goes on, and it may be considered, therefore, that this representation was made to this House with respect to what it had done in the case of Johnston v. Young.—"This point has been already determined by your Lordships, who reversed a judgment of the Court of Session upon this single ground, and that, though in a case where a complaint of the same election had been brought within two months, but had been dismissed on account of a mistake in the name of one of the Defendants, after which an action of reduction, similar in form to the present, was brought by several constituent members of the council. No objection was taken to the action in the Court below, nor in the cases upon the appeal. The Court of Session reduced the election, but upon this objection [644] being taken at your Lordships' bar, your Lordships reversed the decision of the Court below without even going into the merits of the case, upon the single ground, that the intention and purpose of the Acts above quoted, was to form a code for the election of magistrates and councillors in Scotland; and while it gave remedies in cases where there was formerly no remedy, it also cured evils which arose from the old laws; and among the other evils the Act intended to remedy, there was no greater than that it was in the power of persons, by bringing actions of declarator and reduction, to reduce elections made many years before and long after the persons whose elections were complained of, were out of office. This question was very fully entered into by your Lordships, and has ever since been understood to be finally settled," and in that case also the appeal was dismissed.

When we are looking at these statutes, which are all made in pure materia, it would be a very singular thing to say, that though the magistrates and councillors are in the form of action required under these statutes to proceed within eight weeks, yet that there is another form of action at common law, in which they need not proceed for eight years, or any given time. I look upon it, therefore, that these cases of Johnston v. Young, and Robb Miller v. Thompson, decide this point; and I dare not venture to give your Lordships any advice which shall militate against the decision of this House pronounced in those cases.

There is a cross appeal which I feel some difficulty how to deal with. That is about the costs. That those costs should have been given is pretty clear. This House never does entertain an appeal for costs where costs are in the discretion of the Court below; but where the legislature, by statute, has expressly [645] required that the Court of Session, in the case of an action which is brought under the authority of that statute, and in the case of a summary complaint which is brought under that statute, shall make the party who fails pay the full costs of suit, it appears to me, that the party is in fact entitled to full costs of suit, and that being so entitled to full costs of suit, the Court below ought, by their judgment, to have given full costs of suit unless they were prepared to say that this was a case out of the statute. If it is a case out of the statute, it would be a question of discretion, and therefore no appeal would lie; but on the other hand, if this is a case within the intent and meaning of the statutes to which I have referred, it appears to me that the costs ought to be given. The great difficulty is to decide in what form we are to give that judgment. Being desirous that we may be quite right, I would propose that I should have the opportunity of seeing the agents before I move your Lordships to proceed to judgment in the precise terms in which it should be entered. I am, however, of opinion, that this judgment ought to be affirmed, and in some way or other this House must take care to provide that the party who has not failed shall have full costs of suit paid to him by the party who has failed.

(20th March, 1827.) Ordered and adjudged, that the interlocutors complained of in the original appeal be affirmed, except in so far as it omits to give costs; and it is declared, that the Respondent ought to have had the costs of proceeding in the Court of Session, according to the true intent and meaning of the statutes, relative to proceeding in such cases; and it is further ordered, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this declaration; and it is further ordered, that the said interlocutor, so far as complained of in the cross appeal, be reversed.

COURT OF SESSION.

GARDNER and others,—Appellants; REEKIE and others,—Respondents.

In corporate bodies the form of election is of the substance and essence of their constitution. Upon a petition to the Court of Session, against the election of Magistrates for a Royal Burgh; if it should appear that the proper form of Election has not been observed, it is not competent to the judges to sustain the Election, upon the ground that the result is the same as if the form had been observed.

The constitution of a Burgh in Scotland may be altered by a uniform usage of Forty years. Semb.

The Lord Chancellor* (10th March, 1827): This case depends very much upon the question, whether there has been any such usage for any given period of time, as has altered the sett of the Borough, with respect to the mode of carrying on elections. If it depended upon this, that the same persons appeared to be elected in the form in which the election was made, as might have been elected in that form, which if there had not been a usage, would have been the prescribed form, it does not appear to me that the consideration, that the same persons had been elected, would by any means support the election, because I take the form of the election to be of the essence of the election, and more particularly if there are special officers, who are to name individuals, out of which individuals a choice is to be made by the general electors.

* See the facts on which the question arises stated, post, p. [649], and seq.

I take it to be a principle of our constitution, and I think the Scotch courts follow the principle, that there is first to be the judgment of particular individuals recommending other individuals and then to be a choice by the electors, in general out of those individuals who are so recommended; and I cannot conceive, at least according to any English doctrine, that if nine individuals are proposed, out of whom the whole body of electors are to chuse, that the mere circumstance that they happen to chuse three, who might be the same individuals, if instead of there being one list of nine, there had been three lists of three, out of each of which lists the general body of electors were bound to chuse one: I do not apprehend that the circumstance of the election falling upon the same individuals, if it could be demonstrated that it would have fallen upon the same individuals in either case, would support an English election; because, if the constitution of a Burgh election is, that the individuals who are to name those respective lists of three, have a duty to give a protection to the proceeding which is to place in the situation of Magistrates the individuals who are to be chosen, the mere accident if there is one list of nine, instead of three lists of three, of the same individuals being recommended, by those who had a duty according to the constitution imposed upon them, of pointing out in the first instance who are the individuals that they think ought to be trusted, those out of whom the choice should be made, is not sufficient: I think the departure from that form which would be considered in our courts as of the essence of the proceeding, if it were challenged, would not stand.

It remains, however, to be examined most carefully [648] and most industriously, whether there be any such usage or not, as that which is said to have varied the sett of the Burgh; because, if the usage does not exist, if there has not been a consistent usage for a certain number of years, (I think the law of Scotland requires forty,) if a usage has not existed which varied the sett of the Burgh, no question arises, and I entertain very considerable doubt upon this whether it has, or has not been too hastily taken for granted that no further proof should be entered into before the decision was made in the court of Scotland. Having just broken this subject, I will proceed, on the second day of causes in the next week, to propose the judgment in this case.

The Lord Chancellor (19th March): In this case of Gardner v. Reekie the question is, whether nine persons should be named from among the Burgesses at large, out of which there were three to be chosen, or whether there should be three lists of three persons, from each of which three lists one individual should be named. After again thinking on the subject I am satisfied upon two points: first, with respect to a usage which is not exactly conformable to the sett of the Borough but which is a mode of qualifying the proceedings in carrying into effect what the sett of the Borough requires, it is necessary to enquire whether there is a clear usage of forty years of delivering three lists of three each; and if that fact could be established, that there was a clear distinct usage of forty years, then the circumstance that in this case it happened that the same individuals probably would have been chosen if there had been three lists of three, as were chosen out of the one list of nine, does not make it a good election; for it is clear that if the three old Baillies were, [649] according to the usages of the election, each of them to name a list of three, comprehending in each list themselves, and two other persons, and that out of the first of those lists an individual should be chosen, which individual should be one of the Magistrates in the next year, and that out of the second list another individual should be chosen, who should be another Magistrate in the next year; and that out of the third list another individual should be chosen, who should be another Magistrate in the next year, the constitution of the Borough, so looked at, would authorize us, or indeed require us to say that there was a duty devolving upon the old Magistrates, to take care to name distinct individuals who should be the objects of choice by the Burgesses at large; and their not having exercised that duty will not permit of this answer being given, that the same individuals were chosen as if they had exercised that duty; because in that mode the election could not have that sanction which under that rule it was intended to have. I come, therefore, to this conclusion, that it is advisable, before you proceed to judgment in this case, to see whether there was before the Court of Session clear proof, that such a usage was established. On Friday morning I intend to give my final opinion on this case.

The Lord Chancellor (23d March): In the cause of Gardner v. Reekie it became necessary, upon reference to the circumstances of the case, to see the agents on both sides, which I have taken an opportunity of doing.

The question in this case arises upon the election of the Magistrates and town council for the Burgh of Kilkenny in the year 1823. In the sett of the Burgh the form of the election is stated thus: "first of all the [650] Baillies," (of whom there are three) "give in their leet of nine persons, whereof they themselves are always three, out of which they are to choose the three Baillies for the year ensuing, and the treasurer gives in a leet of three persons, whereof he himself is always one: out of which they are to elect the treasurer for the said year, which being read over in presence of the council, and approved of by them, is read publicly in an audience of the Haill Burgesses, who are to vote. This being done, the clerk is appointed to sit in the council-house and mark the votes, there being always one of the council appointed to see his right marking, and accordingly first the Baillies, then the Treasurer, Council, and thereafter the Haill qualified Burgesses, one by one, give their several votes for the Baillies and Treasurer for the said ensuing year; and the persons chosen by plurality of votes, together with the new council, immediately convene within the council-house, and accept of their respective offices, and give their oaths de fidei administratione, the same being tendered to the three Baillies by the clerk, and by them first to the Treasurer, and then to the Council, which being done, they adjourn."

In this case a complaint was made against the election on two grounds: first, that the leet of nine given in by the Baillies, was not subdivided into three leets. Your Lordships will observe that according to the original sett of the Borough, which I have read, the Baillies are stated to give in one leet of nine persons, out of which three Baillies are to be chosen for the year ensuing; but the Complainants insist that instead of a leet of nine being given in, there should be a subdivision into three leets, "the first containing the name of the first Magistrate of the former year, and two other names, from which alone the new first Ma-[651]-gristrate should be elected; the second containing the name of the second Magistrate of the former year, and two other names, from which alone the new second Magistrate should be elected, the third containing the name of the third Magistrate of the former year, and two other names, from which alone the new third Magistrate should be elected. They alleged that there had been a usage to that effect." This allegation that there had been a usage to that effect, as to the importance of it, depends upon this, whether admitting that the sett of the Burgh in 1710, was of a certain nature, there has been a usage—a uniform usage—such a usage, as would amount to a regulation of the mode of election, from and after the time that that usage took effect by continuance, which would, in the respect I have mentioned, admit of being considered as having become a valid modification of the sett of the Burgh, or a valid alteration of the sett of the Burgh.

There was another ground taken, namely, that the oath against bribery and corruption had not been properly administered. I do not think that it has been successfully contended at the bar, that the case proves any thing like what would be enough, (if any thing could be enough) to set aside the election, and therefore I need not trouble your Lordships any further upon that part of the case.

All that we have heard from the bar with respect to the opinion of the learned Judges, who decided this matter in Scotland, before whom it was brought by petition is, that they were of opinion that an election which produced the same result by one leet of nine persons, as would have been the result if there had been three leets of three given in according to this modified sett of the Burgh, was not subject to ob-[652]-jection. Now attending to what is necessary to be done in this case, I cannot think that it would be right to proceed as stated in the Judgment, upon a representation of that kind. I should certainly feel strongly disposed to say, (and I think I am right in that, unless my mind is influenced by English principles more than it ought to be with respect to a Scotch case,) that according to my notion of the matter the identity of the result, if the form of the election has not been right, would not make the form of the election or the election good: because I take the form of the election in these corporate bodies to be of the substance and essence of their constitution: and if the result upon which the choice is made of three persons, out of one leet, might in some cases be exactly the same as the result when the choice is made of three persons, out of three leets, upon reasoning as applied to corporate acts it might be clearly shewn that such might very often not be the case, where the proceeding was in truth upon one leet of nine, instead of being a proceeding by three leets of three: in the one case three individuals recommending each a separate leet, and in the other case three individuals recommending one leet, and not three separate leets. I think it might be so clearly shewn that in many cases the result would not be the same, that at least according to our laws of election, and the way in which we should treat the subject here it would be impossible to say, that the casual identity of the result would render such an election good.

But in order to see whether you can get at that question you must look at another question, and you must look at the effect of the evidence in the cause. I cannot collect, either from what is in the printed papers or from what has been stated at the Bar, that we have [653] had the opinion of the Court of Session upon the point I am now alluding to. If I must give an opinion I should say, without having been better assisted upon that point, that if there was a clear uniform usage for forty years together, which forms a kind of prescription in the law of Scotland, according to which uniform usage they have proceeded by three leets, composed by three Baillies, instead of proceeding in the old mode of one leet, according to the sett of the Burgh in 1710, that that uniform usage made out distinctly in point of evidence, and shewn by evidence to have existed, might, according to the law of Scotland, either be considered as such a modification of the sett of the Burgh, or such an alteration of the sett of the Burgh, as that it ought to be proceeded upon as the true construction of the sett of 1710, or such an alteration as might be available according to the law of Scotland; but notwithstanding I have said thus much, in the result it is not my intention to prejudice either of the questions of law, upon which I have taken the liberty to say a word, or two.

If I understand the course which the case took in the Court of Session in Scotland, it does not appear to me that the Court went so far as to enquire whether there had been such a usage, or to give any judicial opinion upon the question of what would, or what would not be according to the law of Scotland, the effect of such a usage, the Court of Session being of opinion that the result being the same, therefore it was unnecessary to enquire any further. I am afraid that, according to our laws, we can not go on in such a state of the cause; and that it is necessary to do that, which, for various reasons, I have a great objection to doing, I mean to remit this cause back again to the Court of Session, with a direction that they should enquire whether [654] there is in this case sufficient proof, or whether, according to their practice, sufficient proof can be given upon a further enquiry by referring it to a Jury, or in whatever other way, that for the period I have mentioned there has been a clear uniform usage to substitute three leets instead of one leet, and that they should enquire what, according to the Scotch law, is the effect of that usage, either in modifying or in altering the sett of the Burgh. If the proof that is given is not sufficient to make out that there has been such a consistent and uniform usage for such a given period (if any given period be sufficient) as would amount to a valid modification of the sett of the Burgh, or an alteration of the sett of the Burgh, then to be sure, if the question is to be decided upon the want of evidence of that usage, that would make it unnecessary to determine the point of law that would arise if there were distinct evidence of such a uniform usage. On the other hand we are not informed here, whether if it should turn upon the question of insufficient evidence, it would be the bounden duty of the Court, according to their practice, to enquire further into the fact of the usage, or the means which they would adopt in order to give themselves the benefit of such further enquiry.

23d March, 1827. Ordered, that the cause be remitted to the Court of Session to inquire, whether any and what usage differing from the sett of the Burgh has taken place as to the form or number of the leets and mode of election of the three Baillies of the said Burgh, and for what length of time such usage has prevailed, and whether, having regard to the nature of such usage, (if any shall be found upon such inquiry to have taken place) and the length of time during which it shall be found to have prevailed, such usage ought, according to law, to be considered as modifying or altering the sett of the said Burgh, as to the form or number of the leets and the election of Baillies; and after such consideration and inquiry, to proceed further upon this petition and inquiry as is just.

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

JOHN DICK.—Appellant: JOHN DONALD, (deceased) and, by Revivor,DONALD CUTHBERTSON,—Respondent.

[Adopted in Southby v. Hutt, 1837, 2 My. and Cr. 219; and see also Upperton v. Nickolson, 1871, L.R. 6 Ch. 443; In re Johnson and Tustin, 1885, 30 Ch. D. 42; In re Moody and Yates' Contract, 1885, ib. 349; Truitt v. Cannon, 1877, 5 Rettie, 25.]

A., the wife of a bankrupt, her husband being abroad, without the consent of her husband, or a legal ratification by herself, conveys to Trustees under his sequestration, lands of which she was seized to her and her heirs. Upon a sale of these lands by public roup, the vendor by the articles of roup undertakes to execute to the purchaser a valid irredeemable disposition of the subjects as described in his own or constituent's title thereto. He also thereby undertakes to deliver certain specified deeds, etc., which are described as "all the title-deeds of the property in his custody." Upon a suit by the vendor to enforce the payment of the purchase money, and a proceeding for suspension by the vendee; held, on appeal reversing the judgment below, that it is not such a title as a purchaser is bound to accept, and that the title is not limited by the terms of the articles of roup.

The appeal in this case related to a question of the title to a small property, which was exposed to sale by the Respondent, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of James Corbet, a bankrupt, and was purchased at a public roup by the Appellant.

By the articles of roup, the exposor bound himself to execute and deliver a valid irredeemable disposition of the subjects, as described in his own or constituent's title thereto, upon the usual terms, and [656] to deliver to the purchaser the disposition and instrument of sasine thereon in favour of Mrs. Janet Gillies, and the disposition by her in the exposor's favour, with the instrument of sasine thereon, "which are all the title deeds of the property in his custody."

Mrs. Janet Gillies was wife of James Corbet. The lands in question had been conveyed by a disposition dated the 14th of April, 1813, to the wife of the bankrupt, Janet Gillies, her heirs, and disponees.

Upon this disposition, she was infeft, and her infeftment was recorded on the 16th of April, 1813.

After the sequestration of the husband, by a disposition reciting that her husband had purchased the land when he was insolvent, Janet Gillies conveyed them to the Respondent.

On the 31st of January, 1817, the Appellant purchased the property, at the price of £1300, being the upset price.

The Appellant was bound by the articles of roup, to give bond for the price, but that condition was waved; and it was agreed between the parties that the price should be paid, and the title granted immediately, without entering into the bond. A draft of the disposition was accordingly sent to the Appellant's agent, with the relative title-deeds for the purpose of revisal. Upon perusing these deeds, objections were taken to the title, and the Appellant refused to proceed with the purchase. Upon this the Respondent insisted that the Appellant should find caution, which he refused; and being charged in virtue of letters of Horning at the Respondent's instance to grant bond in terms of the articles of roup, he brought a suspension of that charge.

The reasons of suspension were, inter alia, 1st. That the trustee, before he could call for payment of [657] the price, must produce a legal and valid title to the property, which he had taken upon him to sell: 2d. That the disposition by Mrs. Corbet to the trustee, without the consent of her husband, and without a legal ratification by herself, was not a valid and indefeasible title, but was a deed in itself null and void, and which might at any time be recalled or brought under reduction, by the grantor or her heirs or creditors, or even by her singular successors, to whom she and her husband might afterwards concur, in giving an effectual right to the property.

The Court of Session held that the Respondent was not bound at the expense of the bankrupt estate to make any addition to the title offered by him, but that he was bound at the risk and expense of the Appellant, to concur in any supplementary title which he might wish to have executed.

The appeal was against this decision.*

For the Appellant: Mr. Shadwell and Mr. Campbell.

For the Respondent: Mr. W. Adam and Mr. Abercrombie.

For the Appellant, upon the general question the following authorities were cited (Arg. 26th Nov.):

Rowan v. Cochrane, Dict. 14178: a case where the buyer engaged, by the conditions of roup, to accept a specified title. Nairne v. Seruingeour, Dict. 14169: a decision that a buyer is not bound to accept warrandice to supply a defective title. Lockhart v. [658] Johnson, Dict. 14176: that a purchaser is not bound to complete his purchase where the power of the vendor of tailzied lands was doubtful. Tait v. Lord Maxwell, Dict. 14177: that a purchaser of lands under a tailzie not recorded, might suspend the minute of sale.

As to the disposition, by the wife to the husband, the Appellant made two objections, viz. 1st. That it does not bear to be granted with the advice, or by the consent or concurrence of her husband: and 2dly. That it was not ratified by Mrs. Corbet.

Upon this head the following authorities were cited: The Regiam Majestatem, "de pactis utilibus et inutilibus," where the law is laid down in these words, "Sunt etiam pacta inutilia, ut in viro et uxore, ubi uxor nihil potest ducere in pactum, sine auctoritate viri sui." In the Quoniam Attachiamenta, it is said, "Nulla foemina virum habens potest nec debet, sine viri sui licentia, dare aliquid vel vendere de bonis suis, ultra valorem quatuor denariorum." Craig, treating of those "qui feudum dare possunt," says: "At qui liberam rei suae administrationem non habent, ut nec alienare, ita nec in dare possunt. Nam ubi alienatio rei suae aliquibus interdicta est, sive à lege, sive à iudice, hi nec feuda possunt concedere. ITAQUE NUPTA SINE VIRI CONSENSU NON POTEST, neque papillus, omnino, neque prodigus, neque furiosus, neque ullus alius qui veri consensum non habet." "So Stair, by the same custom of Scotland, the wife is in the power of the husband; and, therefore, first, the husband is tutor and curator to his wife; and, during her minority, no other tutor or curator need to be concerned, or concur to authorize her." Lord Bankton, speaking of the rights and duties of a husband, says: "As to the wife's person, he is her [659] curator; the wife, though major, being always sub cura mariti, or under coverture; and, if she was minor at the time of her marriage, having other curators, their power ceased, and is by law transferred to the husband. It is on this ground that the wife cannot subscribe deeds inter vivos, without the husband's concurrence to authorize her, even though they respect only her own heritage, to take effect after dissolution of the marriage."

Erskine says: "It also proceeds from the curatorial power of the husband, that all deeds done or granted by a wife, without his consent, are in themselves null, though they should relate to her own property, and make no encroachment on any right competent to the husband. The rule that wives are under the curatory of their husbands, is applicable even to brides; for, though a bride be truly sui juris while she continues unmarried, yet on her actual marriage, the husband's curatorial powers draw back to the time of proclaiming the banns, after which, the bride is disabled from contracting debts, or granting deeds, not only to the prejudice of her future husband, but her own. She cannot, therefore, after the proclaiming of the banns is begun, contract any debts which will be effectual, either against herself or the bridegroom, nor can she dispose of any part of her estate by donation, or even as a provision to the children of a former marriage without his consent." And,

* Pending the process the Respondent offered to procure an adjudication of the subjects in question, declaring them to belong to the estate of the bankrupt; and he procured a deed executed by the bankrupt confirming the disposition of his wife to Donald, and also a judicial ratification by her upon oath.

speaking of the curatorial powers of the husband, Erskine says: "That if the wife should, without his consent, make a grant of lands, though with the reservation of her husband's jus mariti, and the courtesy, the grant would be void, for he is her guardian for the security of her and her heirs, as well as for himself."

[660] It was further argued that the fact (if proved) of the husband being abroad, and his subsequent ratification, did not cure the defect. Bullions v. Bayne and Hepburn, Fac. Col. 4th Dec. 1793. Melville v. Dunbar, Dict., p. 5993: that the conveyance, if, as contended, it was virtually a donation to the husband, was gratuitous, and revoked by the subsequent disposition. Ersk. b. i. t. 6. sec. 29. 31; Stair, b. i. t. 4. sec. 18; Ersk. i. t. 6. sec. 32; Bank, i. t. 5. sec. 102. Scott against Lady Cranston, Dict., p. 6108. That the deed could not be considered a donation by the husband to the wife: because it purports to be purchased with her money. Ersk. b. 3. t. 3. sec. 92; and if so, being a provision, was not revocable; Ersk. b. i. t. 6. sec. 30; or reducible as gratuitous under the act 1621; Ersk. b. 4. t. i. sec. 33.

For the Respondent it was contended that the title was limited by the terms of the articles of roup, and was otherwise unexceptionable. The following authorities were cited: Currie v. Churnside, Fac. Coll., 11 July, 1789; Erskine's Inst. b. i. t. 6. sec. 27, 29, and 36. Dr. Clark v. Lady Sharpe, Dalrymple, 31 Jan. 1717.

The Lord Chancellor (at the end of the Argument): Upon the merits of this case there is no doubt. The Appellant has a right to call for a good and valid title. The question is, whether according to the articles of roup, the purchaser may insist upon a good title. By the mere effect of the contract he is clearly so entitled, unless the right is narrowed by the very terms of the contract. The judges in the court below say, that it is not so good a title as it might be. Some of them admit that it is a doubtful title. One of the judges says, there is no great danger of eviction. The [661] Lord Justice Clerk says, that the purchaser may insist upon a good title. I can see nothing in the article of roup to take away the right. A valid and irredeemable disposition which the articles undertake to give, must be by some person having the right to dispose. As to the condition with respect to the title deeds, I never heard that, because the vendor provides by the conditions of sale that he will give to the purchaser only certain specified deeds, the purchaser must take a bad title, or such title as appears upon the deeds. If there is any thing special in the transaction between the parties, it may be difficult to give judgment on the case, as it appears in the articles of roup. It may be necessary to look carefully into the papers, and see if there is any ground for objection.

(12th Dec. 1826.) Ordered and adjudged that so much of the interlocutor of the 11th of March, 1818, as finds that the Respondent is not bound at the expense of the bankrupt's estate, to make any addition to the title offered by him, but that he is bound at the risk and expense of the representer (Appellant), to concur in any supplementary title he may wish to have executed be reversed: And it is declared that the Respondent is bound to make to the representer a good and valid title, and that the title offered to the representer is not such good and valid title, and with this reversal and declaration.—It is ordered that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session, to review the several interlocutors complained of, and to do therein as is consistent with this reversal and declaration, and the practice of the Court in proceedings of the nature of that in which these interlocutors have been pronounced.

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

JOHN WILLIAM HENRY, Earl of Stair,—Appellant; Sir JOHN DALRYMPLE HAMILTON MACGILL, of Cousland, Baronet, ROBERT DALRYMPLE HORN ELPHINSTONE, of Horn and Logie, Esquire, ANTHONY GOOD-EVE, Esquire, of Gray's Inn, London, and JOHN SMITH, Esquire, Writer to the Signet, Trustees of the late JOHN, Earl of Stair,—Respondents.

A., by a trust disposition, directed trustees therein named to lay out the residue of trust funds therein specified, and the interest and proceeds thereof in purchasing lands, which he thereby directed to be settled upon a certain series of heirs named in a deed of tailzie, to which he referred; and afterwards by his will directed that the residue of his personal estate should be invested in government securities, which he gave, together with all the funds, etc., of which he should die possessed, to the same uses as before provided by the trust disposition.

The funds having remained uninvested, held, reversing the decision of the Court below, that after the lapse of one year from the death of the testator, each successive heir of tailzie is entitled to the beneficial enjoyment of the "interest and proceeds" of the funds until invested, and that these words do not import an intention that the interest and proceeds should accumulate for the benefit of the heir who should happen to be intitled at the time when the funds are invested according to the trust.

John, Earl of Stair, by a trust disposition, dated the 18th of December, 1815, disposed to certain [663] trustees, who were the Respondents in this appeal, all and sundry lands and heritages, (other than excepting those contained in any deed of entail executed, or that might be executed by him,) and also all and sundry debts and sums of money, heritable and moveable, owing to him in England or in Scotland, or elsewhere, rents of land, goods, gear, and moveable effects whatever, presently pertaining and belonging to him, or that should pertain and belong to him at his death, with all writs relative to the same, (excepting therefrom the furniture in his house at Culhorn) and that in trust for the uses and purposes after mentioned, and particularly after his debts and legacies were all paid, and a sum set apart for the payment of the annuities, or the same otherwise well secured; he appointed his said trustees and their foresaids to lay out the residue of the trust funds, and interest and proceeds thereof, in purchasing lands in the shires of Wigton, or Ayre, or Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, and at the sight and with the advice and consent of the Lord President of the Court of Session, and of his Majesty's advocate for Scotland for the time being, to annex the same to his entailed estate by taking the rights and securities of the lands so to be purchased, etc., "and under the same conditions, provisions, clauses, irritant and resolute, contained in the disposition and tailzie of his lands of Culquhassen and others, executed by him," and the appointed heirs of tailzie, "and under the conditions aforesaid, and to get the dispositions thereof recorded in the registers of tailzies."

Trustees are then appointed in trust for the uses and purposes contained in the trust deed mentioned, being his sole executors and legates and intromit-[664]-ters, with his whole goods and gear, and other moveables, falling under the testament, (with and under the exceptions aforesaid,) and excluding all others from that office.

Besides this trust deed, which was executed according to the forms of the Scotch law, the late Earl of Stair also left a will drawn up in the English form. By that will, which was dated the 5th of June, 1819, after making certain bequests, he gave the rest, residue, and remainder of his personal estate in England, which should not consist of real or government securities, and directed his executors to convert the same into money, and, after payment of his just debts, to invest such money in government securities; and he thereby gave and bequeathed all such stock, together with all such other stocks, funds, and securities, which he might be possessed of at the time of his death, to such uses and for such purposes as he had, in and by a certain deed and writing, prepared according to the Scotch form, executed by him, and bearing date the 18th of December, 1815, declared of and concerning his personal estate, and as to all estates which, at the time of his death should be vested in him upon any trusts whatsoever, or by way of mortgage, he gave, devised, and bequeathed the same to the Respondents in this cause, according to the nature and quality thereof, upon the trusts and subject to the equity of redemption which, at the time of his death, should be subsisting or capable of taking effect therein. By the effect of these instruments, the whole of the property, except the entailed estates of Lord Stair, under any deed executed by him for that purpose was to be laid out in the purchase of lands to the same uses as the entailed estates of Culquhassen.

[665] John, Earl of Stair, died in 1821, leaving the Appellant the first heir of tailzie and provision.

The question which arose in this cause was, with respect to the proceeds of the personal estate, from the time of the death of Lord Stair, until the whole fund should be laid out in the purchase of lands. The property amounted to £200,000. The trustees invested about £120,000 in the purchase of lands: but as they were by the will directed to invest the whole, the question which was raised was, whether the Appellant was not entitled to the interest from the death of the late Earl of Stair, until the trustees had invested the fund in the purchase of land: or whether, under the words of the trust designation, they were to invest the proceeds as well as the capital, in the purchase of land.

This question came first before the House during the time when Lord Gifford acted as Speaker, in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, upon a suit instituted immediately after the death of the testator. The Appellant in that suit, claimed the interest of the fund, from the death of the testator. Upon this claim, the Court of Session, by interlocutor, dated in February, 1823, decided against the claim. In March, 1825, this judgment was affirmed on appeal, Lord Gifford in moving the judgment (D. P. March, 1825. MSS.), recommending such affirmance, only upon the ground that the claim was made of interest, from the death of the testator; and that, according to the law of Scotland, a year was allowed to the executors to convert the property and provide for the trusts directed by the will.

In April, 1825, the Appellant brought another action, claiming the interest of the fund from the end of twelve months after the testator's death. In Fe-[666]-bruary, 1826, the first division of the Court of Session decided against the claim: because the testator had directed "that the whole produce of the estate, both principal and interest accruing thereon, should be laid out in the purchase of lands; and that it was the first attempt made in Scotland, for having any part of the trust estate allotted to the heir in the mean time, under such circumstances; and also because there had been no undue delay on the part of the trustees, in laying out the trust funds as appointed by the testator."

The Appellant having appealed to the House of Lords against this judgment, upon the hearing of this appeal, Lord Gifford, considering the case as one of very great importance in the law of Scotland, and as it did not appear to him that there were decisions in the law of Scotland ruling the point, moved the House to remit the case to the division of the Court of Session, from which it came for the purpose of their taking the opinion of the Lords of the other division. An order to this effect was accordingly made by the House, in May, 1826 (MSS. D. P. May, 1826).

Upon this remit, with the exception of Lord Eldon and Lord Alloway, the Lords of the two divisions were of opinion, and by interlocutor, dated in March, 1827, decided that the whole interest and proceeds of the fund, were to be laid out in the purchase of lands, and that until the lands were purchased, the Appellant was not entitled under the trust disposition, to any part of the interest or proceeds.

Against this decision the appeal in this case was presented.

[667] For the Appellant: Serjeant Spankie and Mr. Keay.

For the Respondents: Mr. Shadwell and Mr. Miller.

The Earl of Eldon (upon the conclusion of the argument): I propose to proceed on Monday to give judgment in this case. If any of your Lordships have formed opinions already upon the case, yet upon looking back to what was stated by the late Deputy Speaker, Lord Gifford, and looking to the opinions that have been expressed by all the learned Judges, in Scotland, it seems to me that, from a regard to the proper consideration that belongs to such a case, your Lordships should at least take some short time to consider of it before you finally decide. Personally, I am desirous of a short interval: because it is quite impossible I think, in giving judgment in this case, not to refer in some measure to some of those decisions which were pronounced by me when I had the honour of holding the Great Seal in the Court of Chancery:—not for the purpose of doing what I must ever protest I have been most anxious to avoid, namely, determining that any case which belongs to the law of Scotland should be affected, because we have adopted a rule, or have adopted a particular mode of administering the law in England: but for the purpose of considering what were the real principles of those cases, and whether, regard being had to the law of Scotland, they will or will not authorize us to say, that, according to the law of Scotland, this demand can be sustained. It is for that reason that I should rather wish that the opinion of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Redesdale) who is now in the House attending the hearing of this cause, should be [668] given, before I address your Lordships on the subject; because I may possibly have some impression which his observations may correct. In my opinions, I keep in view the distinction between what is the law of England, and what is the law of Scotland; because I apprehend this case must be decided, not according to the law of England, but according to the law of Scotland. Still, the question will result to this, whether in this particular case, if it were an English will, instead of being a Scotch will, the rule of the law of England will not be the same as the rule of the law of Scotland; and whether the converse of that is not true, that the rule of the law of Scotland is the same as the rule of the law of England, and whether this view may not be taken, not for the purpose of adopting the rule of the law of England, but the rule of the law of Scotland. On these grounds I trust your Lordships will not think it inconvenient that the judgment on this cause should be postponed to the sitting of this House on Monday morning.

Lord Redesdale: I have viewed this case as important in point of principle, for this reason, because, in the argument at the bar, it has been conceived on the part of the Respondents, that there was some inclination to make that which was the rule, adopted by a Court of Equity in England, the rule of the law of Scotland. Now, I apprehend, that this case is to be decided simply upon the intent of Lord Stair, expressed in the instrument which he had executed. That instrument is to be construed so as to carry into effect the principal intent, and the intent is not to be inferred from that which he has not clearly expressed. The doubt which I have upon my mind, particularly upon this subject, is, whether the judges of the Court in Scotland have not added words to [669] this will, which are not in the will; whether they have not to the words "interest and proceeds," added the words "until an investment shall have been made;" it appears to me that in the construction they have given to this will, they have added those words. I have found it difficult, viewing the will, to conceive how that addition can be made to those words. If they are so strongly expressed that it is impossible to give them a different interpretation, to that I must submit, but I cannot find any thing from which I can collect such an intention on the part of the testator. There is another part which I think has been very much overlooked, if I may use the expression, in what has fallen from the learned judges, who decided the case in Scotland. I conceive they have overlooked that which I should have thought the clear rule of the law of Scotland, in construing a disposition of this description, namely, that they are to look to the main intent of the person making the disposition. The main intent appears to be in the view I have taken of it, (subject of course to further consideration,) that his personal estate should be applied for the purpose of creating a property that should go in succession to the several heirs of entail, of a particular estate which he describes, and he means that all his lands, exclusive of entailed estates, should go in the same way. Now it appears to me, therefore, that the will should be construed according to the law of Scotland, as laid down by Lord Stair, the disposer. It is meant for the equal benefit of all the several heirs of entail, and not the preference of one to another.

I have also called to mind circumstances which have occurred in other cases; for instance, that relating to the late Duke of Queensberry's property. The late Duke of Queensberry's property was in litigation for [670] a greater number of years than this; he had made a similar disposition with that which is made in this case. The principal object in that disposition, the creating a settlement of lands to go with his entailed estates, according to the doctrine of this case, would, during all that period of time necessarily have been defeated. Now I think that, in construing a will, you must consider those subjects as operating to defeat the principal intention, which are wholly out of the control of the testator himself, and which he does not mean should control his disposition, and upon that ground therefore it seems to me, that I must look, in judging of this instrument, to what was the main intent of Lord Stair. The main intent of Lord Stair seems to me to have been, to convert his personal estate, and any lands which he should have, and which were not subject to a particular entail, into lands to be settled upon the same heirs of entail who were included in the disposition which had been made of the particular lands to which he refers: now that intent cannot be carried into execution in the manner in which this instrument appears to me to have been construed in the Court below:—that is a difficulty which strikes my mind; I should certainly wish to give more consideration to that subject, and more especially as the Courts in Scotland appear, with the exception of two of the judges, to have been of a different opinion.

I believe that it is as much the law of Scotland as of every other country, that, in construing a disposition of this description, you are to look to the main intent of the person who makes such a disposition, and that you are not to look at the particular words and expressions, unless they are clear, plain, and explicit, or that you cannot give them another construction. As to the words “interest and proceeds,” it [671] appears to me that unless you add words not in the will, they cannot have the construction attempted to be given by the Courts in Scotland. Under these circumstances I shall certainly consider this case until Monday next, and on Monday I should wish more at large to give my opinion upon the subject.

Although my noble friend may think it necessary to advert to the cases which have been decided, and particularly those decided by himself in the Courts in England, I shall lay those cases wholly out of my consideration, and I shall do so for this reason, that it may be understood, whatever opinion I may form upon the subject, that it is not guided at all by those decisions—I mean any otherwise than as I would guide my decision in this case, by reference to a decision in any foreign Court of justice. In the decision of all cases, we frequently refer to what are the opinions of judges. To the decisions in the Roman law, the Courts of Scotland pay great deference in the rules which they lay down. For what reason is that? It is, because they conceive that what has been the judgment of persons of considerable learning and discretion in other countries, is a very good ground for guiding the decision in a country where there is not a positive rule laid down upon the case. If there had been here a positive rule in the law of Scotland, laid down upon the subject, to that it would be the duty of this House to defer; but where there is no such positive rule, and you are to decide entirely upon the circumstances of the particular case, then I conceive the use that can be made of decisions of that description, is entirely to guide our own discretion, not as decisions, but as the opinions of learned men upon the particular subject. Under this impression I wish to give the subject fur-[672]-ther consideration: my present opinion upon the subject is, that there has been a mistake in construing the intent of Lord Stair, which is to be collected from the disposition he has made.

Lord Redesdale: The question in this case is upon the proper construction of this instrument, and it appears to me that the Lords of Session in Scotland have mistaken the meaning of the disposition of the late Lord Stair. They have supposed that Lord Gifford acted upon an analogy between dispositions of this kind in England and dispositions of this kind in Scotland, and they seem to think that it was a sort of attempt to make what they call the Scotch law conformable to the law of England. It seems to me that they have totally mistaken the subject; the question is not a question of law, the question is a question of intent. What was the intent of the late Earl of Stair? The late Earl of Stair has unquestionably used these words:—that he gave “all his personal property, after his debts and legacies are all paid, and a sum set apart for payment of the annuities, or the same were otherwise well secured, appointing his trustees to lay out the residue of the trust funds, and interest and proceeds thereof in purchasing lands.” But the interest and proceeds are not expressed definitely. They are words which are very properly thrown in as necessary to include whatever interest or proceeds shall be due to him at the time of his death, and whatever interest and proceeds shall accrue (in the same way as in this country we have similar dispositions) during the period allowed to the executors to collect the effects. According to the law of England twelve months are allowed for that purpose. According to [673] the law of Scotland twelve months are allowed for the same purpose. No person has a right to claim against the executors of a testator before the end of a twelvemonth. Six months for the collection of the debts, and six months for the distribution of them, according to the disposition of the testator: that time is allowed by the law of Scotland.

It appears to me that the true construction of this instrument is this, to give all the personal estate to the persons who shall from time to time be entitled to the lands : it is a gift to them—a gift through the medium of a trust, but a gift to them ; and it would be absurd to suppose that he did not mean it equally to them. If the construction which has been contended for by the trustees in Scotland were to take effect, the consequence would be, that there would be an inequality ; for if it should so happen (which might very well happen) that the personal estate, through debts and mortgages, and so on, could not be all collected for the course of twenty or thirty years, the present Lord Stair, and two or three other persons succeeding to the estate, might have no enjoyment of the bequest whatever, but on the contrary, the fund would be augmenting for the benefit of the successors. It appears to me perfectly clear, that the intent of this testator was an equal benefit to all the persons who should succeed each other in the heritages and lands taken under the deed of entail ; and although this is through the medium of a trust, it is in effect a disposition for their benefit, and it strikes me that that is the mistake which has been made by the Court of Scotland. Some of the learned Judges appear to be of opinion, and they have in truth considered the words “ interest and proceeds ” introduced in this disposition, as constituting no interest [674] and proceeds, but, until lands shall be purchased, as part of the substance of the gift. Now I apprehend the meaning of those words is simply this—the interest and proceeds which shall not have been received at the time of the testator's death, and the interest and proceeds which shall accrue until the ordinary time of the disposition of the personal estate. If the words had been added, “ until the money shall be laid out in the purchase of lands,” then undoubtedly that might have been the construction, but there are no such words, and I do not conceive that there is any ground for inferring that it was the intention of the noble Lord to give to his will a construction as if it contained those words, those words not being to be found there.

It strikes me, that even in the argument on the part of the Respondents, and of the learned Judges in Scotland, they really do introduce those words into the will which are not there, and that they have founded their decision upon that opinion.

You will be pleased to recollect some of the circumstances which happen in the disposition of trust property, in order to see to what extent this will go. Suppose this had happened in the case of the Duke of Queensberry, where for twenty years together his whole property was subject to such claims that the executors could not execute his will, would that circumstance alter the intent of the testator ? would it make the disposition different from that which it would have been if that circumstance had not occurred ? So, suppose this trust disposition or will had been disputed, as was the case in the instance of Lord Eife. Suppose the question to be, whether this disposition could or could not take effect, a considerable time might be employed in litigation. You [675] will observe, this extends to all and sundry lands of inheritance, except those contained in the deed of entail, so that it applies to all his lands of inheritance as well as the rest of the property. I take it, that whatever is not within the power and control of the testator is not to be conceived to be within his mind and meaning. It is important to consider within what time he might expect this to be concluded ; there might be debts claimed by persons to whom they were not due—there might be mortgages, and it might be necessary for his executors in England to proceed to foreclose the mortgages ; they might have to sell the mortgages. Under such circumstances, that which they had to perform might have occupied a considerable length of time before the will could be executed, and in the mean time the persons designated as the object of the testator's bounty might not have the benefit of the disposition at all. In this very case part of the property given is lands, but if those lands are not in the particular counties that he mentions, I apprehend those lands must be sold, and the price of them laid out in the purchase of lands in other counties ; that conversion of property it might require a considerable time to execute, and it is impossible to conceive that Lord Stair, when he made this disposition, meant to make the favour which he intended to give to his immediate successor, so very different from that which would be given to future successors which must happen if the construction put upon this disposition by the Court of Session were to prevail.

Under this impression, it has struck me that the proper manner of disposing of this case would be simply to declare your opinion upon the subject, and to refer it back with that expression of opinion to [676] the Court of Session. I think that will be the best way, because, having declared your opinion upon the subject, the Court of Session will be then able to execute the intention in such manner as to prevent any mistake on the part of your Lordships. I have always thought that, when dealing with the law of Scotland, where you are not so perfectly well acquainted with all the forms and the little difficulties which occur in the execution of a decree, it is best, generally speaking, only to declare your opinion upon the subject, and to leave the execution of that opinion to the Court below; and feeling this to be the proper mode of proceeding, I would propose to your Lordships so to declare.*

This litigation has arisen upon a question not properly respecting the capital of the estate, but respecting the interim profits, and therefore it appears to me referring to the words of the will, in which he appoints factors, and trustees, and persons to collect the effects, etc. that it was his intention that whatever expences occurred with respect to the produce of his property whilst in the hands of trustees, should be paid out of that produce. If a fund is set apart to answer the annuities, that fund cannot be laid out in the purchase of land until the annuities are determined. Now your Lordships will perceive the lands at Bellhaven were to be settled according to the entail: the lands at Bellhaven, therefore, could not be charged with these annuities; they were not within the provisions of the entail, nor could the lands to be purchased be charged with them. It appears to me, therefore, obvious that these words interpret, (if there was any necessity for interpretation,) what was the intention of Lord Stair: [677] that he meant the whole property should go from the time when, according to the law of Scotland, the effects would be considered as collected to the same uses to which he had given the estate of Bellhaven by his will. Under these circumstances, therefore, I would present this † to your Lordships as the proper finding in this cause.

The Earl of Eldon: I agree with the learned Lord in the propositions which he has stated, and particularly in the propriety of remitting this case back to the Court of Session in Scotland, because the execution of the trust must be carried forward in the Court of Session in Scotland. Having, in Scotch causes, been in practice as a counsel at your Lordships' bar, and in judicial proceedings in this House, having been concerned for upwards of forty years, I must take the liberty now of saying (and I shall never have occasion, perhaps, to repeat it) that it has always been an acknowledged maxim in this House, that you are not to make the laws of Scotland in your decisions and by your judicial proceedings similar to the laws of England. That is a purpose which can be accomplished only by legislation. It is not to be attempted in the distribution of justice. You are to decide here as if you were sitting in the Court of Session in Scotland: and I beg your Lordships to attend to what I have now stated, because it is quite obvious that an opinion has been entertained elsewhere that we are proceeding on a different principle. We have never proceeded on a different principle in the long period to which I have been now advert- ing. At the same time it is idle to deny that it is extremely possible that a person whose mind is constantly [678] intent upon what is the law of England, may sometimes feel that mind more influenced by considerations arising out of the law of England than if he were a pure Scotch lawyer, sitting in the Court of Session in Scotland: but I can take upon myself to say for Lord Thurlow, Lord Rosslyn, and myself, that as far as, consistently with human infirmity, we were enabled to guard ourselves against being misled from that influence which our early occupations might introduce into our minds, to the utmost extent we have endeavoured to avoid it; and I therefore preface the few words I have to state, with professing my entire concurrence with that which is expressed by Lord Alloway and Lord Eldin, (both great authorities in Scotch law,) that, "with regard to the English cases so much founded on by the parties, they are not authorities sufficient to warrant the proceedings of that Court, which must be directed by their own laws and by their own rules." This is therefore a case that must be decided according to the law of Scotland.

* Here the noble Lord read the minutes which he proposed as the subject of the Order. (See the end of the case.)

On the other hand, there can be no manner of doubt that, in considering what the law of Scotland is to be in a case where we have not before us any decision in the law of Scotland which forms a precedent by which we ought to be governed, it is perfectly competent for us to obtain what assistance we can derive in forming a proper judgment by looking at the law of England; not by transfusing the law of England into that of Scotland, but to see how far those principles, which are applicable to every law, and capable of application in the law of every country, can be or not made serviceable for the decision of a case which stands before you for determination. We have not many cases, at least I am not aware of many cases which have been decided in the [679] law of England proceeding from courts of equity and courts of law—not many cases upon this question. I think one of the first is that strong case before Lord Thurlow, of Hutchin v. Mannington (1 Ves. J. 366, 4 B. C. C. 491, note), which was a case in which a person, if I recollect the circumstances accurately, had died possessed of a very considerable personal property at Bath, and had left considerable sums to different individuals, with a direction that those sums were to go over to others in case those individuals died before they were received. Lord Thurlow was of opinion, and whether the principle is accurately or inaccurately applied in the particular case, is a question that must be submitted to the mind of the man who is considering whether that principle is properly applied or not; but Lord Thurlow was of opinion that there was a rule of law, which rule of law has been applied through all the subsequent cases, namely, that you are not to look at a particular intention of the testator particularly expressed, with a view to carry that into execution, if you find that the primary and principal intention of the testator, declared by the same instrument, must be disappointed by carrying into effect that particular intention, that a different rule would lead to the laying aside all attention whatever to that which was the primary purpose of the testator. Lord Thurlow was therefore of opinion that as it was utterly impossible to inquire how far all the different sums which were to constitute the different legacies given to particular persons, could or could not, with reasonable diligence, have been remitted from a distant country and actually received; it was competent to him, to look into the whole of that instrument, and not laying it down [680] as a rule of equity, but laying it down as a principle on which he could act, to guide himself by what he satisfied himself was the intention of the testator. That was a strong decision, undoubtedly; but he was of opinion that he must sacrifice one intention of the testator or the other, and he thought he was justified in sacrificing that which required the money to be received, to that general intention of the testator, that the persons who were the objects of his bounty should enjoy the benefit of that bounty.

Then came the case of Sitwell v. Bernard (6 Ves. 520), as to which I should be extremely sorry to think that I was wrong, because I never certainly in the whole course of my judicial life took more pains to be right than I did in that case. In subsequent cases, in the case (Angerstein v. Martin, 1 Turn. 232. See also Horvitt v. Morris, id. 241) of Mr. Angerstein's will, I had an opportunity of stating that it was not my opinion that there was a general rule, which, let the will be what it might in its terms and its expressions, must be acted upon by a court of justice; but that you are to look to the whole, as Lord Kenyon expressed it, to look to every thing within the four corners of the will, and to see what was the intent of the testator on any point, with respect to which you would be justified in thinking he was not anxious it should be carried into execution. I thought that the will in that case entitled the individual to the interest before the money was laid out, and I cannot in the least agree to the proposition which has been stated in the opinions of high and learned Judges in this case, that the mere object of this testator was to annex this property to the title of Stair; my opinion upon that question being that this testator's primary intent was that all who were to succeed to that title should, as it is to be collected from the text and language of the will, take a benefit under that will; that looking not to a particular intent, but to the leading intent, it appears that he was anxious that each and every of the heirs in succession should have their proportion of the enjoyment of that fund which, as it appears to me, was meant to be a fund to be enjoyed for the benefit of all of them.

Then, the question here is, what was the particular intent of this testator, and what was his general intent. When you see a general intent, I apprehend that will authorize you to say that although there is a particular intent expressed in particular words which may have a more or less extensive meaning, and where the general intent cannot be carried into execution unless you give those particular words a limited meaning, according to all cases in English law and in Scotch law, in all law relating to the construction of wills, you must give that construction which, upon the whole, best and most effectually carries into execution that which was the primary intent of the testator; and I cannot bring myself to think, because the words "interest and proceeds" are in this will, there not being according to what we find very frequently in wills and in deeds—a particular direction that where money is laid out in land, all the interest that shall accrue upon that money shall also be laid out; there not being to be found on the other hand, that which is very common in wills of this description, particular clauses that until the money is laid out the interest shall be enjoyed as the rents and profits would be enjoyed if the money was laid out in land; but that the question here is, whether it being the clear intent of this testator to give a beneficial interest to [682] every one who was to succeed to his real property purchased in those counties in which he directed the purchase to be made: these words, "interest and proceeds" may not be satisfied by a much more limited construction of them than that construction which would make them mean interest and proceeds as they accrue, and may be received until the money shall be so laid out: so that though this should happen to be a title which is to last for ever, if we were to apply such a principle to money to be laid out in lands, the subject of inheritance, as other lands are in Scotland, it might turn out that no one person to whom the benefit of that devise was intended might enjoy any part of that benefit but the ultimate remainder-man.

It is therefore, I apprehend, not upon any purpose of your Lordships of applying this general rule which has been laid down in the Courts of Equity here, that you are now called upon to reverse, in effect by expressing your opinion, this determination of the Court of Session in Scotland; but you are called upon to do so, because, at least, according to my view of the case, you are thereby effectuating what upon the legal and best construction of this will is the authorized construction of this will; authorized I mean by the principles on which you are authorized to construe all wills. Upon the authorized construction of this will you are determining that that benefit shall be given to Lord Stair which you think it consistent with the true intent and meaning of this will should be given to him.

Upon these grounds, therefore, it is that I perfectly agree in the general purpose expressed in the proposition stated by my noble friend. I am also of opinion that as the late Lord Stair has created this question himself by the manner in which he has ex-[683]-pressed himself respecting this purchase and this interest, the expense of deciding this question must fall upon the fund with reference to which the question has arisen.

This House is of opinion that, according to the true construction of the trust disposition in question, the same ought to be considered as containing a gift of all and sundry lands and heritages of John, late Earl of Stair, other than and except those contained in any deed of entail executed by him, and also all and sundry debts and sums of money, heritable and moveable, owing to him in England or in Scotland, and elsewhere, rents of lands, goods, gear, and moveable effects whatever presently pertaining and belonging to him, or that should pertain and belong to him at his death, excepting the furniture in his house at Culhorn, together with the interest and proceeds of such several funds after mentioned to the Appellant, and the several persons who may become entitled in succession to the lands of Culquhasen and others, by virtue of the disposition and tailzie of the said lands of Culquhasen and others, according to the several rights and interests of the Appellant, and of such several persons successively in the said lands of Culquhasen and others, by virtue of such entail, subject nevertheless to the costs and expenses of the execution of the trusts of the trust-disposition in question, except the particular costs and expenses after mentioned, and also subject to the payment of the several legacies and annuities in the said trust-disposition mentioned: And this House is therefore of opinion that the Appellant was and is entitled, and that the several persons who shall from time to time succeed him in the entail of the said lands of Colquhassen and others, according to the course of such entail, will be from time to time entitled to the interest and proceeds of the whole of the trust funds which have arisen from the end of the twelvemonth usually allowed, according to the course of the law of Scotland, for payment of the debts and legacies, and which shall arise until the whole of the capital of the said trust funds with the interest and proceeds thereof, which have accrued prior to the expiration of the twelvemonth shall have been applied in the purchase of lands according to the directions contained in the trust-disposition, after deducting out of such capital, and out of the interest and proceeds accrued prior to the expiration of such [684] twelve months, all costs and expenses attending the execution of the trusts declared by this trust-disposition, except the costs and expenses attending the collection and application of such interest and proceeds which have accrued, and which shall accrue after the expiration of such twelve months, which last-mentioned costs and expenses this House is of opinion ought to be deducted out of such interest and proceeds only; and this House is therefore of opinion that the costs of all parties to this suit, including the costs of this appeal, in as much as the same particularly concern the question respecting the right to such interest and proceeds, ought to be paid out of such interest and proceeds, as part of the costs of the application thereof; and this House is of opinion that according to the directions contained in the said trust-disposition, the annuities thereby given ought to be secured by the appropriation of a sufficient part of the capital of the said trust funds; that funds should be set apart to answer those annuities, and that the funds which shall be appropriated for such purpose ought from time to time, as such annuities shall respectively cease and be determined, to be applied in the purchase of lands as part of the capital of the said trust funds, and that the interest and proceeds of the funds which shall be so appropriated after payment of such annuities respectively, but subject thereto, ought to be paid from time to time as the same shall accrue to the Appellant, and to such other person and persons as shall from time to time succeed to the Appellant under the entail aforesaid, as part of the interest and proceeds of the capital directed to be applied in the purchase of lands as aforesaid: And it is therefore ordered that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session to review all the several interlocutors pronounced in this cause, and to make such orders respecting the same, and in execution of the trusts aforesaid, as shall be consistent with the opinions so declared by this House, and as shall be just.

REPORTS OF CASES heard in the House of Lords upon Appeals and Writs of Error, and decided during the Session 1828. By RICHARD BLIGH, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. II.

IRELAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

Sir GEORGE FITZ-GERALD HILL, Baronet,—Appellant: BENJAMIN BALL,—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. i. 727. S.C. 1 Dow and Cl. 164.]

Upon a bill by the assignee of a judgment against the conusor, stating an award in which a certain sum was found due upon the judgment, and praying that accounts might be taken against the conusor upon the foot of the award, and the judgment, the Defendant, the conusor, cannot by his answer impeach the award, and raise questions which had been discussed before and decided by the arbitrators, as to the state of accounts between the Defendant as conusee, and the conusor of the judgment.

In 1793, John Claudius Beresford and James Woodmason were bankers and co-partners in Dublin. The Appellant, who had married the sister of J. C. Beresford, kept an account there. Various money transactions had for many years passed between the Appel-[2]-lant and J. C. Beresford, without any settlement having been made. In a letter dated the 22d of December, 1808, J. C. Beresford called upon the Appellant to settle all the accounts between them, and to pass his bond for the balance; and the Appellant shortly afterwards executed his bond to J. C. Beresford, in the penal sum of £31,000, to secure £15,500, being the balance of the account then stated as due.

In 1807 the partnership with Woodmason was dissolved, and John Claudius Beresford, on the 1st of January, 1808, formed a partnership with the Respondent, Benjamin Ball, Matthew James Plunkett, and Philip Doyne, as bankers. On that occasion an arrangement was made, that the notes and engagements of the old firm should be paid by the new firm, and for that purpose the property of the old firm was assigned to trustees. John Claudius Beresford, having been largely indebted to the old firm, he, in part satisfaction of his debt, delivered over to the Respondent, various securities, and amongst others, the bond of the Appellant. The bond was so given in trust for the Respondent and his partners. Judgment was entered up on this bond in Hilary term, 1810. By an indenture of the 24th of March, 1810 duly registered, John Claudius Beresford assigned the judgment for £31,000, to the Respondent.

A memorial of this assignment was, pursuant to the Act 9 Geo. II., enrolled on the 24th day of March, 1810; and the Respondent became, under the provisions of that Act, the legal owner of the judgment, and entitled as such, to issue execution and levy the amount of it in his own name.

By deed dated 27th of December, 1810, the partnership between John Claudius

Beresford and the Respondent, and Matthew James Plunkett, and [3] Philip Doyne, was dissolved. John Claudius Beresford afterwards became a bankrupt, and a commission of bankruptcy, dated the 22d of March, 1811, was issued against him.

In Trinity term, 1811, the Respondent obtained a judgment in the Court of King's Bench in Ireland, against the Appellant, for £16,585 12s. 6d. debt, besides costs.

The Appellant having questioned the validity of the judgment, and the correctness of the account upon which the bond and judgment were founded, it was agreed between the Appellant and the Respondent, that all matters in dispute relating to the judgment, should be submitted to arbitration.

By indenture bearing date the 18th day of February, 1812, made between the Appellant and Respondent, all matters in dispute between them on foot of the judgment for £31,000, and all matters in difference relating thereto, and the credits claimed by the Appellant against the same, were referred to the determination and judgment of the Right Honourable William Cunningham Plunkett and John Radcliffe, who were thereby appointed arbitrators, to hear evidence and determine what sum or sums of money, if any, was actually due or payable by the Appellant on foot of the judgment; and that such award as they should make, should be conclusive, and be made the judgment, order, and decree of the Court of Chancery, etc.

This deed of submission was, by order dated the 3d day of March, 1812, made a rule or order of the Court of Chancery.

The arbitrators having been attended by the counsel and solicitors on both sides, and having heard and read all the evidence brought before them on behalf [4] of the Appellant and Respondent respectively, touching the matters in difference, published their award, bearing date the 19th of May, 1812, whereby they awarded that the judgment obtained against the Appellant, and assigned to the Respondent, was a good and effectual security for the principal sum of £15,500 with interest thereon from the 1st of December, 1809, on which day the bond was handed over to the Respondent; and the arbitrators further awarded that there was then due to the Respondent by the Appellant, for interest on the foot of the security, from the 1st of December, 1809, to the 19th of May then instant, the sum of £2,295 18s. 3d., and also a sum of £1 10s. 3d. for costs for entering judgment on the bond, and assigning the judgment, making together the sum of £17,810 8s. 6d.; which sum the arbitrators awarded to be justly due and owing to the Respondent by the Appellant, for principal, interest, and costs on the foot of the judgment, and further ordered payment thereof to the Respondent, with the costs of arbitration, and that the principal sum of £15,500 should bear interest from the date of the award, until the same should be paid.

This award was by order of the Court of Chancery, dated the 20th day of June, 1812, absolutely confirmed.

After this award was made, the Respondent called upon the Appellant to pay the amount; but the Appellant refusing to pay, the Respondent sued out a writ of elegit to the sheriff of the city and county of Londonderry, dated the 23d of June, 57th George III. marked for the sum of £21,611 3s. 1½d. whereupon the sheriff duly held an inquisition, whereby it was found, that the Appellant was then possessed of the lands for the several terms of years therein re[5]cited, and was also seised in fee of the several other lands and premises therein also recited. In order to get possession of these lands and premises, it became necessary to bring an ejectment on the title grounded on the inquisition, but the Respondent having discovered, that the Appellant had, previously to the entering up the judgment, charged or incumbered all the lands and premises comprised in the inquisition in July, 1817, filed his bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

The bill stated the several conveyances and leases found upon the inquisition and the judgments, and that an elegit had been sued out, and an inquisition taken; and that by means of the mortgages, the Respondent was prevented from proceeding at law. The bill did not state the award. It was filed against Sir George Fitz-Gerald Hill, John Claudius Beresford, Hall Chambers, who was the assignee of John Claudius Beresford, William Goslin, John Chambers Irwin, Sir Harvey Aston Bruce, John Wilson and William Warren, who claimed two separate judgments against Sir George Fitz-Gerald Hill and John Claudius Beresford, in the penal sum of £2000 for securing £1000, praying, that the Respondent, Benjamin Ball, might be decreed to be entitled to redeem the mortgages, so far as the same affected the estates and properties of Sir George Fitz-Gerald Hill; and that so much of the mortgage debts as were the proper debts of John Claudius Beresford, might be levied and raised out of the estates of John Claudius Beresford alone, so that the estates of the Appellant might be exonerated therefrom, and for that purpose, that the estates of John Claudius Beresford, or a competent part thereof, might be sold; the Respondent thereby undertaking to pay to William Goslin and John [6] Chambers Irwin, such sums as they should appear entitled to for the redeeming of the Appellant's estates; and that after payment thereof by the Respondent, the Appellant might be ordered to repay the same to the Respondent, and in default thereof, that the Appellant and the Defendants to the Bill entitled to redemption of the mortgaged premises, might be for ever barred from all equity of redemption; and that the mortgaged premises, or a competent part thereof, might be sold; and that all such sums of money as the Respondent should be obliged to pay for the redemption of the mortgaged premises, with interest, and all costs to be incurred by him, might be repaid to him; and that all incumbrances prior to the mortgages might be paid out of the produce of such sale; that all necessary parties might be compelled to execute conveyances; that an account might be taken of what was due on the mortgages as the debt of the Appellant, and also what was due thereon from John Claudius Beresford, and of what was then due to the Respondent on the judgment so assigned to him by John Claudius Beresford, and of the judgment obtained by the Respondent against the Appellant; and that all other just and necessary accounts might be taken; and that in the mean time a receiver might be appointed; and for general relief.

The bill was afterwards amended to make other parties Defendants who claimed an interest in the premises.

The Appellant, by his answer to the amended bill, contended that the bond on which the judgment stood for £31,000 was passed by him, not for a sum mutually agreed upon as due from him to Mr. Beresford, but as a cover or guarantee to secure Mr. Be-[7]-resford in such sum as might appear, on an examination of their accounts, to be due; and he stated money transactions which had subsisted between him and Mr. Beresford, with a view of making it appear that no accounts were ever finally settled between them; that there was not so much due by him to Mr. Beresford as the bond was given to secure, inasmuch as he had after the date and execution of the bond made several payments to Beresford, and that he was entitled to as much equity against the Respondent (the assignee of the judgment) as against Mr. Beresford himself.

In consequence of this answer, the bill was again, on the 2d of January, 1819, amended, for the purpose of setting up the award, thereby stating the deed of submission and the rules thereon; and also stating, that all the matters set up by the Appellant in his answer, as impeaching the judgment, were the same which he had set up before the arbitrators.

To this bill the Appellant put in an answer on the 28th day of June, 1819, recapitulating all the evidences and accounts which he had gone into before the arbitrators, and contending, that though he attended before the arbitrators by counsel and solicitor, his defence was not sufficiently explained and understood. It appeared in evidence that the Appellant's defence, then set up, was by claiming certain payments made by the Appellant to John Claudius Beresford, and certain equities which he also claimed against John Claudius Beresford, and this defence was insisted upon by Appellant's counsel before the arbitrators.

The Defendants Beresford and Bruce not having appeared, a decree of sequestration issued against them. The other defendants by their answers admitted the facts.

[8] The cause was heard on the 3d of August, 1821, on the 16th of August a decree was made by the Lord Chancellor, according to the prayer of the Bill.

The Appellant, being dissatisfied with this decree, obtained an order for a re-hearing, and the cause was re-heard at great length, when a consent was entered into by the counsel of the Appellant and Respondent, that all the correspondence on both sides should be produced to the Court, and read.

On the 22d of November, 1821, the decree was affirmed. The appeal was against the original decree, and the order affirming it.

For the Appellant, Mr. Sugden and Mr. Koe.

For the Respondent, The Attorney General and Mr. Pepys.

It was contended on behalf of the Appellant that judgment should stand only for what should appear to be due from him to Beresford, on taking the account between them and that the objection to the award being introduced by way of equitable defence to a claim in equity ought to be entertained.

The Respondent's counsel relied upon the award as concluding the question between the parties.

The case was argued in part, in June, 1827, and was further heard on the 14th of February, 1828—when the decree was affirmed without observation and with costs.

Decree affirmed with £100 costs.

(KING'S BENCH.)

JOHN DOE, on the several Demises of RICHARD HENRY TOLSON, THOMAS AKENHEAD WARD, and WILLIAM COCKBURN,—Plaintiff in Error;
JOHN SANDERSON FISHER,—Defendant in Error.

[Under the existing rules of procedure, a plaintiff cannot elect to be non-suited. The only way in which an action can be discontinued is by discontinuance under R. S. C. 1883, Ord. 26, rr. 1-1: For v. Star Newspaper Co. (1900), A.C. 19 affirming C.A. (1898) 1 Q. B. 636.]

The opinion of a judge directing the Plaintiff in an action to be nonsuited, if it does not appear on the record, cannot be questioned in a writ of error.

The Plaintiff, if he intends to bring a writ of error on the ground of misdirection, in point of law, should not submit to be nonsuited, but appear, and put the judge to express such opinion, by way of direction to the jury; and thereupon tender a bill of exceptions to the judge, and procure his signature thereto.

This was an action, commenced by the Plaintiff in error, against the Defendant in error, by original writ in the King's Bench; the declaration in four counts, stated in various ways, leases by Tolson, Ward, and Cockburn, to John Doe, with entry and ouster, by the Defendant in error.

The Defendant in error pleaded the general issue, upon which issue was joined. Upon the trial, at York, the Defendant in error, who claimed as issue in tail, proposed to give evidence of the intail, and his right under the gift, as issue in tail; but he was unable to produce any evidence of seizin and possession under the intail, within twenty years before the action commenced, whereupon Halloch, B., the Judge before whom the cause was tried, being of opinion that [10] John Doe had failed to prove his title to recover, directed a nonsuit, and judgment of nonsuit was afterwards signed against the Plaintiff in error, and final judgment was afterwards signed for damages, costs, and charges. Whereupon the Plaintiff in error brought a writ of error, returnable in parliament, and assigned the general errors, and particularly the direction of the judge, that the Plaintiff must be nonsuited, and prayed a certiorari for the purpose of verifying his allegation; to which assignment the Defendant in error rejoined generally.

For the Plaintiff in error: The Attorney General and Mr. Sugden.

For the Defendant in error: The Solicitor General and Mr. Ford.

The argument on the part of the Plaintiff in error, raised the long disputed question, whether each successive tenant in tail may assert his right within the statutory time of limitation after his title accrues, or whether one period only of limitation is allowed after the time has once begun to run upon an estate under the entail vested in a person not under incapacity.*

The case on the part of the Defendant in error, stood upon the technical ground that the opinion and direction of the Judge, could only appear upon a bill of exceptions which had not been tendered to him at the trial; and that therefore the legality of such supposed opinion, could not be discussed; and upon this ground the judgment was affirmed.

(COURT OF EXCHEQUER.)

JOHN TRANT,—Appellant; JOHN DWYER,—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. viii. 832., S. C. 1 Dow and Cl. 125. As to what is reasonable time under the Irish Tenantry Act (19 and 20 Geo. III. c. 30 Ir.), see Dyott v. Viscount Massareene and Ferrard, 1874, 1r. 9 Eq. 149: ex parte Peyton, 1888, 21 L. R. 1r. 371; Hussey v. Donville (1900) 1 Ir. Ch. 417.]

A lease of lands in Ireland contained a covenant on the part of the lessor for perpetual renewal: and a covenant on the part of the lessee, to pay £1 sterling, for every perch of bog, cut otherwise than thereby covenanted, and to be distrained for as additional rent. Upon a bill filed by the assignee of the lease and his mortgagee against the assignee of the lessor, for a specific performance of the covenant for renewal, it appeared that three years before the filing of the bill, a notice had been given by the landlord to the tenant to name new lives in the place of those which had expired, and to pay the fines with interest, etc.; but in the interval, a correspondence had taken place, from which it was to be collected, that the tenant had always been ready to pay the fine; but that the landlord alleging, by his answer in the suit supported by evidence, that the tenant had cut large quantities of turf in breach of his covenant, and had also made encroachments upon other lands, refused to renew until those two questions were settled; and although no actual tender of the fines had been made, it was clear from the correspondence that they would have been refused, if made.

Held affirming the decree of the Court below, that under these circumstances, the delay of three years was not under the Irish Tenantry Act [19 and 20 Geo. III., c. 30, Ir.] such gross laches as ought to deprive the tenant of the right of renewal, and work a forfeiture of the lease; but that the landlord ought to be compelled specifically to perform the covenant for renewal. Held also, that in making this decree for the performance of part of the contract between the parties, it is not necessary for a Court of Equity to provide for the performance of the other part; namely, the covenant against cutting turf, otherwise than by leaving the landlord at liberty, by the decree upon further directions to bring an action at law upon that covenant, especially as that liberty [12] had been given by the original decree; and an action brought against the tenant which abated by his death, and thereupon no application had been made by the landlord to the Court of Equity for its assistance.

Stephen Rice, being, in the year 1748, seized in fee of the lands of Lower Dovea, Killaghara, Ballybrist, and Ballynahow, in the County of Tipperary, including a turf bog, which lay contiguous to the several lands, by lease bearing date the 7th of January, 1748, demised the lands of Ballynahow, with its appurtenances, unto Samuel Hughes, for three lives therein named, at the yearly rent of £150.

* See an argument and decision upon this question, in Moore's Rep., vol. vi. p. 542, Tolson v. Kaye, and in 3 B. and B. 207, S. C.

The lease contained a covenant on the part of the lessee, "that he, his heirs, or assigns, should not commit, or wilfully suffer to be committed, any waste on the premises, and should cut his or their turf in straight drains, to be cut sloping one foot narrower for every foot in depth, and agreeable to the natural fall of the land, and of such an equal depth as to preserve a hanging level at the bottom, and to begin at the lowest part of the ground where such drain or drains should from time to time be cut, and that he or they should leave at convenient distances on such drains, parts uncut, of ten feet in breadth each part for bridges, and bore holes underneath on a level with the bottom of such drains, to let the water pass; and that he or they should pay £1 sterling for every perch of bog, which should be cut on the premises during said demise, other than as is thereby covenanted, and that yearly, to be recovered and distrained for as an additional rent."

Stephen Rice, by indenture of lease and release bearing date the 21st of February, 1748, and duly registered, in consideration of £50, assigned the lands [13] of Lower Dovea, Killaghara, and Ballybrist, and also the lands of Ballynahow, to Dominick Trant, and his heirs for ever, reserving thereout a yearly rent of £471 5s.; but Dominick Trant subsequently reconveyed to Stephen Rice the fee of the several lands, and took a lease thereof for lives renewable for ever, subject to the same rent of £471 5s.

Stephen Rice having by articles, agreed to renew the lease of the lands of Ballynahow; Dominick Trant afterwards, by deed dated the 3d of December, 1755, agreed with Samuel Hughes to renew the lease accordingly for ever, on payment of a renewal fine of £10, on the fall of each life.

The Appellant on the death of his father, in the year 1790, having become seized of Dominick Trant's interest in the lands, and Peter Latouche, being seized of Stephen Rice's estate and interest therein, the Appellant, soon after he attained his age, purchased the head rent, and reversion in fee of the three other denominations from Peter Latouche, in June, 1805, and afterwards, in December, 1806, purchased the reversion and head rent of the lands of Ballynahow, and took assignments thereof respectively from Peter Latouche, dated respectively the 15th of June, 1805, and 5th of December, 1806, and thereupon became seized absolutely in fee thereof, subject to the lease to Hughes.

The lessee's interest in the lease of 1748, after the death of Samuel Hughes, in 1785, became vested in Charles O'Neill, who paid to Dominick Trant, the Appellant's father, a sum of money in discharge of renewal fines due upon the fall of the lives of Samuel Hughes, and Edward Dawson, two of the cestui que vies named in the original lease of 1748, and thereupon nominated Francis Annesley Hughes [14] and Mary Hughes as two lives to be substituted in the room of the deceased cestui que vies under the agreement for renewing the lease.

Charles O'Neill afterwards assigned his interest in the lands to Cooper Crawford, who, by deed of the 30th of October, 1792, reconveyed the same to O'Neill, in mortgage to secure a sum of £2000 with interest.

The mortgage to Charles O'Neill having subsequently been assigned to the Respondent, John Dwyer, the Respondent obtained a further mortgage of the equity of redemption in the lands, from Cooper Crawford, in the year 1801, to secure a further sum of £1000 with interest to the Respondent.

In the year 1808 a dispute arose between the Appellant and the Respondent, respecting the bogs contiguous to the lands occupied under the lease: the Appellant contending that no part of the bog was demised by the lease; that even if a proportional part was demised, the lessee had encroached upon the bog and occupied more than his due proportion; and that he had broken the covenant in the lease, by cutting turf for public sale, and otherwise contrary to the provisions of the covenant, by which large penalties had been incurred. The Respondent contended that he was intitled under the terms of the lease, to the proportion of the bog, occupied by him, and that no breach of the covenant by cutting turf had been committed.

On the 24th of December, 1810, the Appellant served on Cooper Crawford, a notice which, reciting the lease of 1748, and his own and Crawford's title, and that all the lives had expired, and the encroachment upon the bog, and the alleged breach of the covenant by cutting turf, proceeds thus:—"Now take notice, That I require you forthwith to [15] pay me up all rent due out of the said lands, together with the sum of £372 12s. due for renewal fines, septennial fines, and interest due upon the deaths of the said Samuel Hughes, Mary Hughes, and Edward Dawson. And I also require you to restore me to the possession of such parts of the said bog of Lower Dovea, as you have so possessed yourself of, and likewise to pay to me the sum of £1 sterling, for every perch of turf cut on the said bog, contrary to the covenant in said lease of 7th of January, 1748. And take notice, That unless you forthwith comply with this reasonable request, (which I have heretofore repeatedly called upon you to do without effect,) I will not hereafter consider myself bound to renew your lease of the said premises, and will take such proceeding, as I shall be advised to recover the possession thereof, discharged of any lease or claim you may have for a renewal."

The fines, as stated in the notice, were calculated as upon the three lives named in the lease of 1748, as if no fines had ever been paid since the execution, as the Appellant then conceived to be the fact; but it appeared at the hearing of the cause, that two renewal fines had been paid to Dominick Trant, in the year 1787, and that thereupon he gave a receipt for the same, nominating Mary Hughes a minor, and Francis Annesley Hughes, as cestui que vies in the lease of the premises, in place of Edward Dawson and Samuel Hughes deceased; but no deed of renewal was executed.

At the time of the service of the notice there was one fine of £10 and interest thereon from the death of Mary Hughes the elder, the survivor of the original cestui que vies in the lease of 1748, who died in the year 1808, [16] due to the Appellant; and it was suggested by the Appellant that Francis Annesley Hughes, one of the substituted lives nominated in the receipt, was also dead at the time, in which event a second fine had become due to Appellant. Mary Hughes the younger, the other life nominated in the receipt, and survivor of all the original cestui que vies, died in February, 1812, and from thenceforth there remained no life in being, if Francis Annesley Hughes had previously died.

After service of the notice, several meetings between the parties and a long correspondence ensued on the subject of the encroachments on the bog, and the breach of the covenant in cutting turf. But the parties being unable to effect any amicable adjustment of their mutual claims, the Appellant, by letter dated in October, 1812, altogether declined to renew the lease.

On the 1st of March, 1814, Cooper Crawford, together with the Respondent, John Dwyer, as mortgagee of Crawford's interest in the lands, filed a bill against the Appellant, in the Court of Exchequer, in Ireland, for a renewal of the lease of 1748, having, on the 25th of February, 1814, caused a sum of £50 to be tendered to Appellant in discharge of the fines for renewal and interest due thereon.

The bill insisted that the parts of the bog improved and taken in by the tenants of the lands belonged to the demised premises of Ballynahow, and that neither O'Meara, nor any undertenant of Plaintiff's was in possession, save rightfully under the lease, of any part of the Appellant's estate. The Appellant by his answer, insisted upon the grounds stated in the notice, and also because the Respondent had neglected within a reasonable time after notice, to pay or tender the fines, that he was not bound by law to grant the renewal.

[17] The cause was heard on the 2d of June, 1815, when it was ordered, "that the cause should stand, with liberty for the Appellant to bring an ejectment for such part of the premises as he should be advised; and on the trial of such ejectment the statute of limitations not to be set up, and that the Defendant should be also at liberty to bring any action of covenant he might think fit, and upon any action of covenant to be brought against Plaintiff Cooper Crawford, that service of process upon his attorney should be deemed good service, and that Cooper Crawford should plead issuably, and go to trial in both causes, or which ever of them Defendant might proceed on, at the then next Assizes at, etc.; and that Cooper Crawford should admit that the term in the lease of the 7th of January, 1748, in the pleadings mentioned, was still in being and vested in him, and the lessor's interest vested in the Defendant, and that ejectment or action, or both, should be brought forthwith and be tried by a special jury, and that the Plaintiff should waive all temporary bars, and that the question to be tried on the ejectment should be whether the Plaintiff Cooper Crawford, or his undertenants, were in possession of any, and what quantity of land or bog not demised to Samuel Hughes, deceased, by Stephen Rice, deceased, by the lease of the 7th of January, 1748, in the pleadings mentioned."

The Appellant thereupon brought an ejectment on the title in pursuance of the order, to which a defence was made in the name of Cooper Crawford. The Appellant also commenced an action of covenant to recover damages for the breaches in the lease against Crawford, and issue being joined, and both causes ready for trial, Crawford died, and the Respondent [18] having refused to become a defendant in his place, the causes abated.

The Appellant thereupon served an ejectment in Hilary term, 1816, upon John O'Meara, the occupying tenant of the lands, who consented to be bound by the decretal order of the 2nd of June, 1815: but the action of covenant was abandoned, as the Respondent would not allow his name to be made use of.

Upon the trial of the ejectment, the jury found "that Crawford, or his under-tenants, were in possession of 234a. 2r. 3p. more than were demised by the lease of 1748 of land and bog."

On the 29th of May, 1817, the Appellant took possession under an habere of the 234a. 2r. 3p.

The suit in the Exchequer having abated by the death of Cooper Crawford, the Respondent in February, 1818, filed a bill of revivor against the Appellant, and made William Cooper Crawford, a minor, as heir at law of Cooper Crawford, a defendant: the representatives of Cooper Crawford, deceased, having declined interference therein, Cooper Crawford having died in embarrassed circumstances, and his property being insufficient to pay the amount of his debts.

John O'Meara was committed to prison, and afterwards discharged as an insolvent, and died.

The cause in the Exchequer was finally heard in 1820, when the Court pronounced the following decree:

"Upon reading the Judge's report and certificate of the verdict, and it appearing to the Court, that the Defendant, John Trant, has since executed an habere and taken possession of the lands so recovered; decree the Plaintiff entitled to a renewal of the lease of the 7th of January, 1748, according to the covenant contained in the deed of [19] the 3d of December, 1755, upon payment of all sums due for rent and renewal fines, to be calculated according to the usual course of the Court, and of all costs at law, and the costs of this cause; and in case the parties differ about the description of the premises, or otherwise respecting the terms of the said renewal, refer it to a Baron, to settle and approve of the draft thereof having regard to the said verdict, so as not to include in the said renewal, a demise of any part of the land or bog so recovered from John O'Meara, under and by virtue of the said ejectment: and let the names of John S. Dwyer and Francis D. Dwyer, being those named in bill by the Plaintiff for that purpose, be inserted in the place of Mary Hughes the elder, and Mary Hughes the younger, and refer it to the Chief Remembrancer or his deputy, to take an account of the rent due and of the renewal fines, and interest thereon, according to the usual course of the Court: and upon payment of such rent, renewal fines, and interest thereon, as shall be found by the said officer to be due as aforesaid to the Defendant, John Trant, let him execute the said lease, and declare such renewal to be made to the Plaintiff as mortgagee, liable to the equity of redemption reserved upon the mortgages of the original lease vested in the Plaintiff, and decree him entitled to tack to his said mortgages what he shall so pay in pursuance of this decree: and let this decree be without prejudice to any action which the Defendant, John Trant, may be advised to bring against the representatives of the said Cooper Crawford or John O'Meara, or either of them, for breaches of any covenant contained in said original lease since the same vested in the said Cooper Crawford."

[20] Against this decree the appeal was presented.

For the Appellant: Mr. Brougham and Mr. Stephenson.

The Respondent must be affected by the gross laches of the tenant in omitting to pay the renewal fines and to take out the required renewal: no tender of any fine for renewal, or of any compensation to the landlord for the tortious acts of the tenant, and those claiming under him, having been made by the Respondent or any other person until after more than three years from the service of Appellant's notice. The Respondent was bound at his peril to act upon the service of the notice to renew, made on Cooper Crawford, his mortgagor, particularly as the Appellant, until the filing of Respondent's original bill, was unapprised of the Respondent's title or interest in the lease. Although the Appellant may by his notice of the 20th of December, 1810, have demanded a greater sum for renewal fines and interest thereon, than he was then entitled to demand, yet the lessee seeking the benefit of such renewal was bound thereupon to have set his landlord right as to his mistake, and to have ascertained and tendered to him the sum really due for such fines without further unreasonable delay, which he did not do, nor tender any sum whatsoever for the fines for upwards of three years after the service of the notice.* A tenant abusing the trust which subsists between him and his landlord, wilfully violating the covenants in his lease, and converting the possession with which he has been entrusted into the means of encroachment on his landlord's adjoining estate, and of defacing the bounds [21] and landmarks of the farm committed to his possession, and after so doing claiming to retain such encroachment for his own benefit against his landlord, and obliging such landlord to bring an ejectment in order to recover possession, forfeits all claim on such landlord for a renewal of his original lease, as well as all title to assistance from a Court of Equity to compel such renewal.

Even if any renewal of the tenant's interest ought to be decreed in this case, such decree ought at least to have imposed upon him the terms of making full satisfaction or compensation to the Appellant for his damages by reason of such breaches of covenant, as also for the mesne profits due to Appellant in respect of such wrongful encroachments on his estate, the ascertainment and payment of which damages and mesne profits ought to have been made preliminary to any such renewal. The Appellant under the circumstances is left without remedy for the recovery of such damages; the legal estate under the lease of 1748 having expired, and the covenants contained therein determined. It was the more incumbent on the Court to impose such terms on the party seeking the renewal in this case, since it appeared that Cooper Crawford and John O'Meara, the undertenant of the lands, have both died insolvent.

The decree, in professing to leave the Appellant at liberty to prosecute any action he might be advised to bring against the representatives of Cooper Crawford and John O'Meara, or either of them, for breaches of any covenant contained in the original lease since the same had vested in Cooper Crawford, altogether omits to provide any means whereby the Appellant might be enabled to maintain any such action, or to recover any fruits from it, such action not being [22] at all maintainable without the aid of the Court imposing terms similar to those contained in the decretal order of the Court, of the 2d of June, 1815, in pronouncing which order it appears to have been the opinion and intention of the Court, that the immediate tenant of the lands should be held responsible for such breaches of covenant committed by his undertenants.

The Respondent in this case, is to be considered as standing in the situation either of immediate tenant of the Appellant, in which case he must be held responsible for the fraudulent misconduct and waste committed by his undertenants, and by reason thereof to have forfeited his claim to any renewal of his lease, or else in that of a mortgage creditor of such tenant, in which character he cannot be entitled to any relief in the premises beyond the preservation of his mortgage security for his own benefit alone, which relief ought not to be extended incidentally, (as has been done by the decree appealed from,) to give the benefit of a renewal to the representatives of the mortgagor, and to fraudulent and defaulting undertenants, who had forfeited their right to renewal: and the rather in this case when the Appellant by his counsel at the hearing below offered, as he now again does, in case the Respondent is entitled thereto, to pay the Respondent the balance due on the foot of his mortgage, on having the bill in this case dismissed.

For the Respondent: Mr. Pepys and Mr. Tinney.

No such fraud has been proved against the tenants of the leasehold premises, or their assignees, within the meaning and scope of the Irish tenantry Act, as to deprive them of the benefit of the Act. The Appellant, in case of any such fraud, or in case any for-[23]feiture of the lease had been committed, and had not been waived, has by his proceedings in ejectment, in which he has recovered only lands found not to be comprised in the original lease, and by not bringing any action of covenant under the liberty given him in that behalf, by the decree of the 2nd of June, 1815, waived such matters, and precluded himself from setting up the same. No demand and refusal of the fines for renewal, so as to deprive the tenant of the benefit of the Act, has been proved, even as against the original complainant, Cooper Crawford, who, on the contrary, was always anxious to pay the same when ascertained. No such demand was ever made against the Respondent, nor was there any such difficulty of finding him as to excuse the want of such demand; nor, if there had been, do the steps prescribed by the Act, in case of such difficulty, appear to have been taken.

The Lord Chancellor (Wednesday, 2nd April, 1828): The question in this cause arises under a lease which was made as far back as the year 1748. It was a lease held for three lives, with a covenant for perpetual renewal. The freehold ultimately vested in the present Appellant, Mr. Trant, and a person of the name of Cooper Crawford, became interested in the leasehold estate. Cooper Crawford mortgaged this property, and Mr. Dwyer stood in the situation of mortgagee. Cooper Crawford, or the person under whom Cooper Crawford held under-let the estate to a person of the name of O'Meara, for three lives renewable for ever. In the year 1787 two of the original lives fell in, and those lives were renewed and the fines were paid in that year. In the year 1808 Mary Hughes, who was one of the three lives then existing, died; the lease was not renewed at that time.

[24] In the year 1810 Mr. Trant, having gone over to Ireland, made some enquiry as to the state of this property, and had reason to believe that encroachments had been made upon his adjoining estate, by the tenant of this property, which had been leased. Mr. Trant at that time was not at all aware of the renewal in the year 1787. On looking at the lease he had reason to believe, from the information he had received, that the covenant had been broken with respect to the manner in which the turf should be cut; and under those circumstances, and with this information, he gave a notice to the tenant of Mr. Cooper Crawford, who was the owner of the leasehold interest, that he should expect forthwith that the three lives should be renewed, and the encroachment on the adjoining estate should be abandoned, and a compensation, according to the terms of the lease, made for the breaches of the covenant; and that unless those terms were complied with, he should not feel himself bound to renew the lease. Upon enquiry, it was found, however, that the two lives I have mentioned had been renewed in the year 1787. This part of the case, therefore, may be left entirely out of consideration. There was at that time, in respect of the life which had fallen in the year 1808, one fine due for the renewal—there was a question with respect to the encroachment on the adjoining estate—and a question also existing as to the turf.

In point of fact, no tender of this fine was made until the year 1814, three years after the notice had been given—and it was contended upon these circumstances, that under the Irish tenantry Act, three years having been suffered to elapse after notice had been given to renew and to pay the fine, that was an unreasonable period, and there was such an omission [25] on the part of the tenant, that he had forfeited his right to renew—and this was the main question in the cause: it was the main question in the Court below, and the main question on the appeal; and if the questions stood on these facts, I think your Lordships would be clearly of opinion that the tenant having suffered three years to elapse after notice had been given, calling on him to pay the fine on the renewal, that was more than a reasonable period; and he would, under the clause of the Irish tenantry Act, have lost his right to claim the renewal. But in point of fact, almost immediately after the notice was given, a correspondence took place between the tenant, Mr. Cooper Crawford, on the one side, and Mr. Trant, the landlord, on the other, and the agent of Mr. Trant, Mr. Dickson, with respect, not to the fine which does not appear to have been a matter of contest between them after the explanation had been given as to what had taken place in the year 1787, but as to the encroachment—and as to the breach of covenant—and particularly as to the encroachment on the adjoining estate of Mr. Trant. It appears in the whole course of that correspondence, that Mr. Crawford, the tenant, was ready at any moment to have paid the fine, and to have obtained the renewal, but that Mr. Trant was unwilling to grant a renewal unless the question as to the encroachment on the adjoining estate was settled, or unless that part which was in question was altogether abandoned. At last, in the month of October, 1812, Mr. Trant was perfectly satisfied that an encroachment had taken place; and it turned out afterwards, on enquiry before a jury, that very large encroachments had been made by Mr. Crawford, or his undertenants.

Now the question is under these circumstances; [26] Mr. Trant having refused to renew, and Mr. Crawford having been constantly ready to renew and pay the fine, whether the tenant has lost his right from the neglect of not paying the fine, and I think clearly that he has not. The tenant was ready at any moment to renew; it is quite clear from the language of the correspondence, that he was ready to renew, and it would have been altogether an idle ceremony for him to have tendered the money. In point of fact, no tender did take place till the year 1814; nor do I conceive, under these circumstances, and from the nature of the correspondence, that a tender was at all necessary. Both the parties understood that Mr. Dwyer or Mr. Crawford was ready to pay the fine, and it is perfectly clear that if he had offered it, Mr. Trant would not have accepted it: since the question in agitation between them related entirely to the encroachment on the adjoining estate.

But it was argued, that it turned out in the result, that this was really an encroachment on the part of the tenant—that he had committed a wrongful act—that he had been aware himself of this wrongful act, and could not avail himself of his own wrong to suspend the payment of the fine. That does not at all vary the question. If the landlord had been at all anxious about the fine, if that had been the real object of contest between the parties, it was easy for him to offer to renew the lease on the old terms, in the language of the original lease, and without any prejudice to the question of encroachment. As the parties were really in litigation about another matter, and as there was no contest between them on this subject: as it is quite clear that the landlord would not have accepted the fine if it had been tendered, the failure in the condition to tender the fine, could [27] not, under those circumstances, be considered as depriving the party of his right to a renewal of this lease.

It is said that at a subsequent period in the year 1814 a tender was made. A tender might have been considered necessary, with a view to institute this suit, but if the party would not have accepted the money if offered to him, an actual tender on the part of the tenant was not necessary for the purpose of protecting himself against the forfeiture of his right to renew.

It is said that another life afterwards fell in. Mary Hughes died in 1812, but she died in the early part of that year while this correspondence was going on, and therefore that makes no alteration. As it appears to me as far as relates to the main question, the decree of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland was right.

A suggestion was thrown out in the course of the argument that in point of fact none of the lives were in existence: that as to Francis Annesley Hughes there was no proof that he was living; but it appears if it were necessary to go into that question that there is evidence of that fact: for a witness is interrogated as to whether or not Annesley Hughes, not Francis Annesley Hughes, but Annesley Hughes, named in the pleadings of the cause, is living: and he answers, that that Annesley Hughes, that is, the Annesley Hughes named in the pleadings in the cause is living. Now there is no Annesley Hughes named in the pleadings in the cause, but there is a Francis Annesley Hughes. That I apprehend is sufficient to identify that Francis Annesley Hughes, as being the party to whom the witness alludes, and whom he describes as the Annesley Hughes named in the pleadings in the cause, there being no Annesley Hughes, except the Francis Annesley Hughes to whom I have alluded.

[28] Another question arose in the course of this argument with respect to the form of the decree. There is no provision made in the decree against the Defendant with respect to the loss that has been sustained, in consequence of the breach of the covenant of the lease. It is contended that some provision in that respect ought to have been made. Now the facts as far as they relate to this part of the case are shortly these. By the original decree in the year 1815, the landlord was empowered to bring two actions, an action of ejectment, and also an action of covenant—an action for the purpose of trying the case as to the encroachment: and an action of covenant for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there had been any breach of covenant, and if so, what damage had been thereby sustained. Those two actions were brought by Mr. Trant against Cooper Crawford, and those two actions were at issue when Cooper Crawford died. By his death there was an end of the actions, but it was very easy for the landlord to go on with the action of ejectment, for as O'Meara was the tenant in possession, all that it was necessary to do was to serve an ejectment, and he being served in ejectment, was willing to adopt the regulations which had been laid down by the court for the purpose of trying the ejectment. The ejectment therefore proceeded, a verdict was obtained, judgment was entered up, and Mr. Trant was put into possession of about 200 acres, which was the amount of the encroachment. So far, therefore, that part of the proceeding was effectual, but nothing was done in respect of the action of covenant, and it is perfectly clear that nothing could be done in respect of the action of covenant, without another step being first taken, but it was competent for Mr. Trant [29] to have applied to the Court, to put Mr. Dwyer under terms after the cause was revived, with respect to that action of covenant. The cause was revived early in 1818, and the final decree was not pronounced until the Summer of 1820. There was a period, therefore, of two years and a half after the revival of the suit in the Exchequer, during which time Mr. Trant might have applied for the purpose of putting Mr. Dwyer under terms, in order to try this question with respect to the breach of covenant, but he made no application for that purpose. I think, therefore, that as Mr. Trant took no proceedings for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Court upon those questions, it is now too late to find fault with the decree for making no provision with respect to the supposed loss upon the breaches of covenant. Under these circumstances the decree of the Court of Exchequer should be in all respects affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with £100 costs.

This was an action, brought in the Court of Exchequer for an excessive distress levied by the Plaintiffs in error on the goods of the Defendant in error, attended with very aggravated circumstances. Upon the trial of the action, a verdict was given for the Defendant in error, with £550 damages and £40 costs. In Easter term, 1827, upon a notice for a new trial the damages were reduced by consent to £400. Final judgment was thereupon entered up, in Trinity term following. A writ of error being brought in the Exchequer chamber, the judgment was affirmed without argument.

Upon this affirmance a writ of error was brought in the House of Lords. The case was heard on the 5th of March, 1828, the Plaintiffs in error not appearing; whereupon the judgment of the Exchequer chamber was affirmed, with £120 costs.

By a treaty between the governments of France and Spain, it is agreed, that France shall pay to the king of Spain a certain sum of money to be distributed by him among his subjects having claims against the government of France. This sum, by the terms of the treaty, is made payable to an agent to be appointed by the king of Spain. He accordingly appoints an agent, who receives the sum stipulated, and afterwards deposits part of it in the hands of merchants in London, in the name of his secretary. But accounts of the money so deposited are rendered by the merchants to the depositor, and not to his secretary.

Upon a bill filed in equity, in the name of the king of Spain as Plaintiff, against the depositories and the depositor, stating these facts, and praying a discovery, account, and payment of the money into Court, etc. the Defendants demurred upon the grounds of a defect of parties, and that a foreign sovereign cannot sue in a court of equity in England: held affirming the order of the Court below, that the demurrer was properly overruled: that a foreign sovereign may sue as Plaintiff in equity: and that under the circumstances of the case, it was not necessary that the cestui que trusts (the Spanish claimants) or the nominee of the agent should be parties to the suit.

Whether after the money has been brought into Court the parties having an interest in the final distribution could sustain a bill to effectuate their claims. Quære.

On the 22d day of December, 1827, a Bill in the name of the king of Spain as Plaintiff was filed in the Court of Chancery, against the Appellants, and one Don Justo José de Maclado.

[32] The bill stated, That in the years 1814 and 1815, two public treaties, the one bearing date the 30th day of May, 1814, and the other the 20th day of November, 1815, took place between the governments of France, Russia, Austria, Prussia, and England, to which the government of Spain was an acquiescing party, whereby, (among other things,) the French government undertook to indemnify (in manner therein mentioned) the subjects of Spain in respect of the losses sustained by them in consequence of the invasion of the Spanish territories by the French government in the year 1808.

That a convention, bearing date the 25th day of April, 1818, took place between the governments of France, Russia, Austria, Prussia, and England, to which the government of Spain was also an acquiescing party, whereby, in order to effect the total extinction of the debts contracted by France, in consequence of the treaties, the French government engaged to cause to be inscribed in the great book of the public debt of France, from the date of the 22d of March, 1818, a rente of 12,040,000 francs, representing a capital of 240,800,000 francs of the money of the kingdom of France: And it was by the convention declared that the rente to be created by virtue thereof, should be divided amongst the therein-named powers, in manner therein mentioned: the portion whereof allotted to the kingdom of Spain, amounted to the sum of 850,000 francs de rente.

That although it appeared by the convention that in consideration of 850,000 francs de rente, or 17,000,000 capital in French inscriptions, the French government was exonerated from all claims on the part of the Spanish government by virtue of the treaties: and that the settlement of the claims of the subjects of Spain upon that fund, and the division [33] thereof, were to be arranged by Spain, by means of commissioners to be named for that purpose: yet in point of fact, such was not the case, in as much as, prior to, and at the time of, the execution of the treaty of the 30th of May, 1814, the governments of France and Spain had mutual claims one upon the other in respect of many particulars which are not mentioned or provided for in that treaty, which mutual claims formed the subject of an additional article bearing date the 20th of July, 1814, annexed to the last-mentioned treaty, and to which the respective governments of France and Spain were alone parties.

That with a view to the final adjustment of the mutual claims of the governments of France and Spain, a secret convention took place between the governments of France and Spain, by which it was recited that, in order to remove the difficulties calculated to obstruct, so far as Spain is concerned, the conclusion of the general arrangement which France is at present negotiating with the Courts which signed the treaty of the 20th of November, 1815, for the purpose of definitively settling and extinguishing the sum total of her debts to the subjects of the said Courts, as well as to the Powers, which were parties to the said treaty, and thereupon it was agreed as follows:—ART. I. The sum total to be paid by France to the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, whose claims are founded both on the treaty and the additional article of the 20th of July, 1814, and the stipulations of the convention concluded in conformity with Article IX. of the treaty of the 20th of November, 1815, is determined and fixed at 1,850,000 francs de rente in inscriptions upon the great book of the public debt of France, representing a capital of 37,000,000 of francs. ART. II. In case the part which shall or may be assigned to Spain, in the divi-[34]-sion to be made of the total sum which France will bind herself to the Courts which signed the treaty of the 20th of November, 1815, to apply to the payment of the claims of the subjects of the Foreign Powers, should be below the sum stipulated in the preceding Article, the French government engages to supply the means for making up the difference and completing the same. ART. III. The said sum of 1,850,000 francs de rente shall be divided into two equal parts, one of which shall be paid into the hands of such person or persons for that purpose to be authorised by the Spanish government, upon the same terms and at the same periods, as those determined with regard to the payments to which France shall bind herself to the other Powers; the other shall remain deposited in the hands of Commissioners appointed for that purpose in equal numbers on both sides, and who shall receive the interest accumulating in a compound ratio in favour of His Catholic Majesty's subjects, creditors of France, until such time when the mixed commission to be intrusted with the investigation and liquidation of the claims of His Most Christian Majesty's subjects against Spain, shall have terminated its labours, and when His Catholic Majesty shall have provided the needful means for the payment of the said claims. ART. IV. In order to remove all the obstacles which might retard the liquidation of the claims of the subjects of His Most Christian Majesty against the Spanish government, a special convention shall be concluded, having for its basis, with regard to the various classes of the claims to be admitted, and the mode in which the same are to be paid, the stipulations of the treaty, and the additional article of the 20th of July, 1814, and those of the convention of the 20th of November, 1815.

[35] The bill then proceeded to state, that in pursuance of the secret convention, the Respondent appointed Don Justo José de Machado, (one of the liege subjects of Respondent, and then residing at Paris, and exercising the functions of Consul General from the Court of Spain to the Court of France,) the agents of the Spanish government, to receive the moiety of the sum of 1,850,000 francs de rente, which by the convention was to be paid by the French government into the hands of such person or persons as might be authorised by the Spanish government to receive the same; and that the French government had since paid over to Machado the whole of the moiety of the sum of 1,850,000 francs de rente, according to the secret convention; and that Machado had duly accounted for the same with the Spanish government.

That after payment to Machado of the moiety of the sum of 1,850,000 francs, the remaining moiety was left in the hands of the French government as a deposit, in pursuance of the provisions in the secret convention, in order that the same might be applied as directed by the convention; and that with a view of finally settling the mutual claims of the respective subjects of France and Spain, with respect to that fund, on the 30th of April, 1822, a convention was concluded between the governments of France and Spain, which recited that His Catholic Majesty and His Most Christian Majesty being alike animated with the desire of putting an end to the difficulties which have hitherto retarded the liquidation and payment of the claims of the subjects of His Most Christian Majesty against Spain, and wishing, with a view to the common benefit of their respective subjects, to settle the concern by a definitive adjustment, had for that especial end and purpose agreed, etc. as follows:—[36] ART. I. In order to effect the reimbursement and total extinction of His Most Christian Majesty's claims, the payment of which is demanded from His Catholic Majesty in virtue of the first additional article of the treaty of the 20th of July, 1814, the sum of 425,000 francs de rente, representing a principal of eight millions and a half of francs (8,500,000), shall be deducted and taken by the French government from the sum which now lies as a deposit in the hands of the latter, and belongs to Spain in virtue of anterior conventions. ART. II. Upon the preceding stipulation being carried into execution, His Most Christian Majesty engages to discharge and satisfy the above-mentioned claims of his said subjects upon Spain, founded upon the first additional article of the treaty of the 20th of July, 1814, and His Catholic Majesty does thereby remain fully acquitted of and from all and whatsoever His Catholic Majesty owed to them in virtue of the said article. ART. III. Immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention the French government shall cause payment to be made into the hands of such person or persons as may for that purpose be authorised by His Catholic Majesty, of the overplus of the rente which the said French government kept as a deposit, including the whole amount of the compound interest that has hitherto accrued thereon.

That in pursuance of the last mentioned convention, the Respondent appointed one Don Jose Noguira, who had been employed by the Spanish government in negotiating the convention, the agent of the Spanish government to receive the surplus mentioned in Article III. of the convention, which surplus, exclusive of compound interest, amounted to a sum of 703,010 francs de rente, or 14,060,200 francs in inscriptions.

[37] That the French government shortly after the ratification of the convention, and in pursuance thereof, paid over to Noguira, by inscribing the same in his name in the great book of the public debt of France, several instalments in respect of the surplus.

That Noguira was afterwards removed from his appointment, and Machado was duly appointed his successor therein, and that thereupon the French government paid over to Machado the whole or the greater part of the residue of the surplus, which had not been previously paid over to Noguira, by inscribing the same in the name of Machado in the great book of the public debt of France.

That Noguira, immediately after his removal from his appointment, transferred into the name of Machado the whole of the instalments which had been so inscribed in Noguira's name in the great book of the public debt of France.

The bill then proceeded to state, that in the early part of the year 1823, a civil war broke out in the kingdom of Spain, and that in consequence thereof, Machado, (who was then residing at Paris,) some time in the course of the year 1823, sold out and converted into money the whole of the funds which then stood inscribed in his name in the great book of the public debt of France, in pursuance of the convention, and quitted France and came to England, having in his possession, either in specie or bills upon this country, the whole or the greater part of the proceeds of the sale, to the value of £500,000 sterling.

That immediately upon the cessation of the civil war, with a view to secure the proper application of the funds, a royal decree was made and promulgated by the Respondent, on the 21st of March, 1824, directing the formation of boards for ascertaining and [38] deciding upon the claims of Spanish subjects against the funds in question.

That in pursuance of the decree, two public boards, the one of them styled "The Board of Examination and Liquidation," and the other of them styled "The Board of Appeal," were appointed, and were both of them still in active operation; that Senor Don Bruno Vallarino was the president of the Board of Examination and Liquidation, and Senor Don Anselmo de Ribas president of the Board of Appeal; that both the boards held their sittings at Madrid; and that all the members comprising the respective boards resided at Madrid, without the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in England.

That shortly after the promulgation of the royal decree, a copy was sent to Machado, by the order of the Respondent; and at the same time an official dispatch was written and sent to Machado, by Count D'Ofalia, then secretary of state for foreign affairs in Spain, requiring him to transmit duplicates of the official letters which he might have transmitted to the constitutional government on the subject of his agency.

That in reply, Machado remitted to the Spanish government the accounts required, by which it appeared, that he had received on account of the Spanish government, by virtue of the convention of the 30th of April, 1822, a sum of 446,403 francs de rente; and that he had brought over to England, and then had in his possession, the proceeds thereof either in specie or bills, amounting to the sum of £500,000 sterling.

That on the 15th of June, 1824, the Count D'Ofalia wrote and sent another official letter to Machado, signifying that the boards charged with the adjudication and distribution of the funds for the indemnification of the parties interested therein, being created, the funds must consequently be at the immediate disposal of the boards, subject to the necessary guarantee and security on behalf of the creditors.

That Machado, on the 11th of June, 1824, wrote and sent to Count D'Ofalia, a letter, stating that he acted under an impression of the funds in question being the property of the parties concerned in the claims; and that he should be ready to pay thereout such claims as the boards might recognise as legal, and definitively liquidated, conformably to the treaties.

That on the 19th of July, 1824, a letter was written and sent to Machado by Don Bruno Vallarino and Don Anselmo de Ribas, whereby they directed Machado to deposit the funds then remaining in his hands in a public bank in England, at the disposal of the boards, as the representatives of the creditors, and for the liquidation of their claims, inasmuch as it would be attended with the advantage of producing to the general body of creditors an annual interest, which would increase the original funds for their benefit, and the funds would remain invested with all due security.

That on the 26th of November, 1824, Machado wrote and sent to Senors Don Bruno Vallarino, and Don Anselmo de Ribas, a letter, whereby Machado promised to deposit the balance of the monies then in his hands on account of the Spanish government (after deducting the expenses he had incurred) in the Bank of England, at the disposal of the boards, as the representatives of the creditors, and for the liquidation of their claims; and that the letter of Machado contained the passage following—"I deem it incumbent on me to observe to you, that it appears to me highly expedient, that no time should be lost in proceeding to a definitive settlement of this point, because, should the English subjects, who are or conceive themselves creditors of our government, on any grounds or account whatsoever, (and they are by no means inconsiderable in point of number,) happen to discover the existence of the funds, it is much to be feared that they will resort to all possible judicial measures for the purpose of paralyzing them, and whilst their claims are in a course of discussion and decision before these Courts, which will not only occupy a considerable period of time, but also be attended by a very heavy expense, the Spanish parties and legitimate owners of the funds will be deprived of the enjoyment of their property, if not totally lose it."

That Don Anselmo de Ribas and Don Bruno Vallarino thereupon wrote and sent a letter to Machado, whereby they directed him immediately to deposit in the Bank of England the resulting balance of the monies in his hands, then belonging to the Spanish government, placing it at the disposal of the boards, as the representatives of the creditors, and for the liquidation of their claims.

The bill then proceeded to state, that Machado did not, as required, deposit the balance; and that without the knowledge of the boards, or of the Respondent, and in direct breach of his duty as agent of the Spanish government, some time in the month of December, 1824, he deposited with the Appellants £200,000 sterling, being part of the proceeds of the funds received by him by virtue of the convention of the 30th of April, 1822; and that the Appellants had not, at the time when the monies were so deposited with them, and had not then, and never had, [41] any just claims whatsoever either upon the said monies, or upon the funds received by Machado by virtue of the convention of the 30th of April, 1822, or upon the Spanish government in respect thereof.

That the Appellants had then, or ought to have, in their custody, possession, or power, the monies so deposited with them: and that the said monies then, according to the laws and constitution of Spain, justly and of right belonged to the Respondent, as the head and sovereign ruler of the Spanish government, to be applied by the Respondent, as such head and sovereign ruler, according to the provisions for that purpose contained in the treaties of the 30th of May, 1814, and the 20th of November, 1815: and that the Respondent had by his agents applied to the Appellants, and requested them to furnish the Respondent with an account of the monies which were so deposited with them, and of their application thereof, and to pay over the amount thereof to the Respondent, or his agents, in order that the same, when so received, might be applied according to the provisions contained in the treaties.

The bill also contained charges that the Appellants admitted that Machado had paid over to them part of the funds: that the whole of the funds delivered by Machado belonged to the Respondent, to be distributed by him pursuant to the treaties: that Machado in November, 1823, inserted a paragraph in a public newspaper called Le Constitutionnel, denying assertions of his having placed the funds at the disposal of the constitutional government, and stating that the funds belonged to the claimants under the treaties.

The bill further charged, that the several boards of examination and liquidation, and of appeal, were then still subsisting, and actively engaged in the ex-[42]-amination of the claims of the subjects of Spain, founded on the several treaties, upon the funds which the government of France contracted to pay to the Spanish government by the convention of the 30th of April, 1822, but that none of such claims had been then definitively liquidated and allowed: that the Appellants had not, and no one could have any claims upon the funds, unless the same were grounded upon the treaties: that such claims were altogether of an equitable nature, and could not be properly determined except in a Court of Equity, if any court of justice in England could take cognizance thereof.

That the Appellants alleged, that the monies were deposited with them, by Machado as the agent and in the name and on the behalf of one Achilles de Pereira; whereas Pereira had not then, nor ever had, any claims whatsoever upon the monies, and that Achilles de Pereira was at that time, and had ever since been, and then was, the secretary of Machado, and that the monies were so deposited in the name of Pereira, solely for the purpose of preventing any attachment or other legal process.

That Pereira was then residing in the Netherlands with Machado, beyond the jurisdiction of the Court; that the Appellants had never disposed of any part of the monies deposited with them, except under the express direction of Machado, and had always acknowledged themselves to be the holders of the monies merely as the trustees and agents of Machado: that in the month of January, 1826, they delivered an account to Machado, containing a statement of the payments made by them on account of Machado, out of the monies so deposited with them, and also an account of all the monies so deposited, making a balance of £100,000 in favour of Machado, which balance the Appellants then had in their hands.

[43] That the funds were in great danger of being wholly wasted and lost, unless the same should be immediately ordered to be paid into the Bank of England, in trust in the cause.

That the monies were deposited in pursuance of a fraudulent concert, between Machado and the Appellants, and for the purpose of withdrawing the funds from the claimants, who might ultimately be declared entitled thereto: that when the monies were deposited with them they well knew, or suspected, that the same were not the proper monies of Machado, but that they were actually part of the proceeds of the funds so received by Machado, by virtue of the convention of 30th of April, 1822, and then actually belonged to the Spanish government, to be applied by that government in manner thereinbefore mentioned: that Machado had no right or authority whatsoever to deposit with them any part of the proceeds of the funds: and that in so doing, Machado was committing a direct breach of trust.

The bill also charged that Machado was without the jurisdiction of the Court, but intended shortly to return to England, and to commence legal proceedings against the Appellants, for the purpose of recovering from them the monies deposited with them, and thereupon to apply the same to his own use: That the Appellants threatened and intended to apply the monies to their own use: That the monies ought forthwith to be paid into the Bank of England for safe custody, for the benefit of all parties who should be declared ultimately to be entitled thereto, or otherwise that the same ought forthwith to be paid over to the Respondent, or his agents; and that the Appellants ought in the meantime to be restrained by injunction from disposing of the monies, otherwise than under the direction of the Court.

[44] The bill finally charged, that Machado and the Appellants then had in their custody, etc., accounts, etc., which they refused to produce.

The prayer was, that the Appellants, and Machado, when he came within the jurisdiction, might answer the matters of the bill; and that an account might be taken of all the money which had been deposited with the Appellants by Machado, etc., and that the amount thereof might be ascertained, and paid over by the Appellants to the Respondent, or his agents, or otherwise that the Appellants might be ordered forthwith to pay the same into the Bank of England, in trust in the cause; and that Machado might in the meantime be restrained, by injunction, from commencing or prosecuting any action, or taking any steps against the Appellants, for the purpose of obtaining repayment of the monies deposited with them; that the Appellants might also be restrained from paying over the monies to Machado, or parting with the same, without the direction of the Court; that the Appellants might set forth the claims (if any) which they had upon the monies deposited with them, or upon the funds received by Machado, by virtue of the convention of the 30th day of April, 1822, and the particulars thereof, and how they make out the same; and that the said claims might be disposed of by the Court.

Process to appear to and answer the bill was prayed against the Appellants, and Machado when he should come within the jurisdiction of the Court.

The Appellants appeared to the bill, and on the 31st day of January, 1828, filed a Demurrer, and for cause of Demurrer shewed, that the Respondent had not by his bill made such a case as entitled him in a Court of Equity to any relief against the Appellants, [45] or either of them; and for further cause of Demurrer they shewed, that the Respondent had not made Achilles de Pereira a party thereto, nor prayed process against him; neither had the Respondent made parties to the bill, nor prayed process against any or all of the persons who, according to the statements in the bill, had or were entitled to claim a beneficial interest in the monies in the bill mentioned, or some part thereof.

The Demurrer came on to be argued on the 22d of March, 1828, before the Lord Chancellor, when it was ordered and adjudged that the Demurrer should be overruled, and that the Appellants should have a month's time to put in their answer.

From this order the appeal was presented.

For the Appellants: Mr. Pepys and Mr. Russell.

For the Respondents: The Attorney General and Mr. Horne.

For the Appellant: It has never been held, that a Foreign Sovereign can sue in Courts of Equity in England; and according to the principles of such Courts, such a plaintiff ought not to be allowed to sue therein, inasmuch as by no possibility can process be issued with effect, or equity done, or a decree enforced against him. The pretended rights, on which the Plaintiff in this bill relies, are rights which he claims merely by virtue of his prerogative as King of Spain; and it is not according to the law or constitution of England, that an English Court of Equity should be made instrumental in enforcing in England the prerogative of a Foreign Sovereign. The pretended right of the King of Spain to the monies sought to be recovered by the bill arises out of [46] a treaty with France, which was inconsistent with the existing relations between each of those countries and his Majesty the King of this country. An English Court of Equity, therefore, will not lend its aid to enforce any such pretended right. This is a bill in Equity, according to the statement of which not one of the parties before the Court has any right to the beneficial enjoyment of the property which is the subject of the suit, and no decree could be made upon it, which would do complete justice. The bill does not bring before the Court all the parties interested in the matters of the suit, and in the questions raised by the statement in the bill, nor any persons who represent those parties or their interests. Achilles de Pereira is not made a party to the suit, though the bill states, that the monies of which the plaintiff seeks to obtain possession, were paid to or deposited with these appellants in the name of Achilles de Pereira.*

In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor made the following observations.

The Lord Chancellor: The treaty on the subject of the claims of French subjects, creditors of Spain, says that the sum of one million eight hundred and fifty thousand francs de rente to be received, shall be divided into two equal parts, one of which shall be placed in the hands of persons appointed by the Spanish government to receive it, and the other is to remain in France, and is to be deposited there for the purpose of meeting the claims which the subjects of France have on the government of Spain.

Half of the fund was to remain as a species of secu-[47]-rity to the French government, that the Spanish government would pay the claims of the French subjects on the Spanish government. Half of the entire sum stipulated by the convention was to remain in deposit as a security for the purpose of guarding against any default on the part of the Spanish government, with respect to any claims of the French subjects under that commission. It was divided by agreement between the governments.

It has been argued (by Mr. Pepys) that political reasons might have rendered it necessary to recognise the right of some other sovereign; and a case has been supposed, of a bill filed when the French were in possession of Spain, by the individual who exercised the authority over Spain, at that time; the individual who here appears as the Plaintiff, asserting his title as King of Spain, being no doubt deposed from his throne by power, not by right: his father then living, and claiming the throne against the person in possession, and his son against both: as to this and the objection that the title of Ferdinand may be disputable, it is admitted upon the record that he is the King and sovereign ruler of Spain.

That a King is entitled to sue as a King cannot be disputed. As a suitor he submits himself to the jurisdiction of the Court, otherwise it might be an objection that you could not control him. But if he comes here as a suitor, he submits himself to the jurisdiction. Has not the sovereign power of another country the common privilege of mankind? Do you say that by the law of nations he is deprived of that privilege being the King of Spain?

As to the doctrine in Barclay v. Russell (3 Ves. 431: see the note in p. 58), are there not some opinions pronounced in some of [48] the cases (see Dolder v. Lord Huntingfield, 11 Ves. 283) by Lord Eldon on the dictum of Lord Rosslyn in the Judgment given in that case.

As to the objection that the cestui que trusts are not parties, it does not appear that any of the claims are ascertained, and all the claimants are abroad; it does not appear that any of the claims are yet substantiated.

Do you mean to say, that the King of Spain is not entitled to take money out of the hands of his own agent, having by his authority received the money from the French government?—It is alleged by the bill, that the person appointed to receive this money, was the agent of the King of Spain, and we must take it as a fact. Whose agent was he, if not the agent of the King of Spain?

The French government expressly stipulated, that they will pay the money into the hands of such person as shall be named by the King of Spain. The King of Spain appoints Machado as his agent, and by virtue of that agency and appointment, the French government allow him to inscribe the rentes in his name, and he is allowed to act as the agent of the King of Spain. Only consider it. An arrangement is entered into, not between the subjects of Spain, creditors of France, and the French government, but the King of Spain and the King of France, which ultimately the subjects of the King of Spain were to have the benefit of, but the acting parties were the head of the respective governments.

* The Judgment was given at the close of the argument for the Appellant. Such parts of that argument as are not stated above, are incorporated in the observations made by the Chancellor during the argument.

Why are we to assume on this record that the King of Spain is suing for the purpose of destroying the right: we are rather to assume that he is suing to establish the right. Machado takes possession of this money and gets out of the reach of the King of Spain [49] and the creditors. You will find, taking the whole of the record as it stands, the transaction is this; the government of France contracts with the government of Spain, to pay the government of Spain a sum of money which is to be eventually distributed among certain persons who are the subjects of Spain, who have sustained losses and injuries in consequence of the invasion by France, of Spain. By that treaty between France and Spain, the King of Spain is the party to see the money properly applied; he is the party to see to its application. These very tribunals which are established for the investigation and liquidation of these claims are tribunals established by the will and arbitrary act of the King of Spain. He it is who establishes the tribunal of liquidation. He it is who establishes the court of appeal. They were not existing tribunals; they are tribunals established by him and under his authority. He is to see, as the governing power of that country, to the application of these funds. In the mean time these individuals under his authority get possession of the funds as agents. Then is not the King of Spain (provided a king can sue in our municipal courts) is he not entitled to come here and sue for the money so obtained?

As to the objection that two of the parties to the general treaty had no right to alter that treaty by a private convention, to the prejudice of the parties beneficially intitled under the general treaty, the question is, what construction a court of law would put on the treaties taken together, and not merely on particular passages. The government of France having a counter claim against the government of Spain, by the treaty of 1815 say to the government of Spain, although I agree to pay you this sum, I shall keep it in deposit as a security for the liquidation of the claims of my sub-[50]-jects on you; and the moment you liquidate those claims, the funds shall be handed over to you, and in order to prevent the delay and inconvenience that might be occasioned by the investigation of those claims which France had on Spain, it is at last agreed that France should take upon herself the liquidation of those particular claims, and that the residue of the money should be at once paid over to Spain. There is first a general treaty to indemnify: then comes this private treaty, in which they agree between themselves whatever may be the amount of the claims arising upon the public treaties that this particular arrangement should take place between these two powers. Then comes the treaty of the 21st of April, 1818, by which 850,000 francs de rente were allotted to Spain; but Spain had in the mean time provided, in a secret treaty with France, for a different sum.

Supposing the private treaty to be in contravention of the public treaty, do you mean to say that would apply to a question between the King of Spain and his own agent, having received money under that treaty? is that a defence which the agent could set up? I am not quite sure that the transaction was not in all other respects free from all objection. There were counter claims; they agree that the claims which the Spanish government have on France shall amount to so much, on the other hand you have a counter claim on Spain; the question would be whether the 850,000 francs applied only to the claims on the one side, or the balance of account between the parties. If it was to be applied to the balance of account, it was quite unnecessary to ascertain it.

The Lord Chancellor * (June 18th): It is argued that the pri-[51]-vate treaty was a fraud upon the parties to the public treaty, and the parties materially interested in it: but it appears that the fund of 850,000 francs de rente was stipulated by the public treaty for particular objects, and for particular claims; and it is with reference to those mutual claims not provided for in that treaty, that the two powers came to an agreement that these mutual claims not included in the sum stipulated by the general treaty, should be regulated and fixed at a certain amount. What is there fraudulent in that? There were other claims not included in the original treaty which led to the alteration of the sum, which is provided for by the secret treaty; that there were mutual claims not included in the other treaty, must be taken as a matter of fact on this record, that is a ground therefore for the treaty regulating the sum at an amount different from that which is contained in the general treaty. What is there fraudulent in that, even supposing that we could enter into the question upon this record, and with reference to this subject? Suppose it had been a transaction between private parties, what is there fraudulent in it? It has reference to particular objects. The record states what must be taken as a fact on the demurrer, that there were other claims. By your demurrer you admit this statement to be correct, that there were mutual claims one on the other, in respect of many particulars not mentioned or provided for in that treaty; how then can you say it is a fraud? A certain sum remains as a deposit in France, and an agreement was come to between the King of Spain and the King of France with respect to the sum so in deposit, and the French government in consideration of being allowed to take to their own use a certain part of that sum, agreed to pay over the rest to such persons as should [52] be nominated by the King of Spain to receive it. The King of Spain nominates Machado, and he receives it: and then he says he is not accountable to the King of Spain.

The whole transaction shows that the boards as they are called, can have no property in the fund. They are merely boards of liquidation, a species of tribunal established for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the claims; they have no interest in the property; they were merely acting judicially.

The effect of the letters is nothing more than an admission on his part, that he is in possession of the fund. It is an admission on the part of Machado, that he got possession, (as appears also by the record,) under the authority of the King of Spain. The only contractors in these treaties are the governments of the two countries. Whatever the subjects take, they take by virtue of the treaties entered into by these governments. The subjects have nothing to do with it; the governments are parties to the treaties, and they are entitled in the first instance to the money; there is no such thing as a treaty between the governments of one state, and the subjects of another state. It is the money of Ferdinand, in the first instance he has the control over it, it is he who is the contracting party. It is his duty as the King of Spain, to distribute it to the subjects. We cannot assume that he will not so distribute it, we have nothing to do with that question. We cannot assume that Ferdinand, when he is in possession of the money, will not distribute it, according to the spirit of the treaty. In fact he has established tribunals for that purpose; but we cannot enter into that question at all. It is money belonging to Ferdinand under that treaty, received by Machado by the authority given to him by Ferdi-[53]-nand, and he is accountable to Ferdinand for it, whether it is, or is not his property.

As to the case of Mendizabel v. Machado, it is different from this case. There Machado being in possession of this money, some bills were drawn upon him by Mendizabel, and the money was under those bills to be applied to some objects, foreign to the treaties and the trust. The decision rested upon the misapplication of the funds. In this case it appears that there are tribunals established for the purpose of liquidating the claims, arising under the treaties. That there are tribunals appears on the record, and the claims are in a train of settlement.

It has been asserted that no case has occurred, in which a sovereign was permitted to sue in the municipal courts of England. Can no case be found in which the King of Spain has sued at law? What is that case in Rolle's reports,* where he was directed to bring an action of trover, and he did so? In another case there was a bill filed by the Ambassa-[54]-dor of the King of Spain, but the bill was dismissed on the ground that it ought to have been filed by the King of Spain.*

* The case is mentioned in Rolle's abridgement. Tit. Court de Admiraltie, E. 3. Ils (the Court of Admiralty) ne poient tener plea d'un suit per le Roy de Spaine, pur succider de Brasill bois en Brasilia pur ceo que est sur le terre. Hill. 12. Ja. B. R. enter le Roy de Espagne et Pountes resolve et prohibition graunt et ceo apres trie al common loy en un trover et conversion. See 2 Bulst. 322.

In Rolle's Reports, p. 133, the case is again mentioned.

Where after reciting the application for and the granting of the prohibition, the report goes on thus:—P. 13. Ja. le Court fut de mesme l'opinion, mes tenus per Coke et Doderidge que l'Embassador puissoit aver action pur ceo en cest court et al auter jour le Counsell del Embassador vient en Court et dit que il voilt surcesser son suite en l'Admirall Court et port action icy, per que fut order per Curiam per consent des parties accordant et issint nul prohibition grant et puis le Roy de Spaine port action vers luy en B. R. See Bulst. 322. s. c.

Suppose the King of Spain were to send jewels to be set to Messrs. Rundell and Bridge, and the jewellers were not to deliver them up to the King, do you mean to say that the courts of the country could not interfere? that the King of Spain could not recover the jewels? do you think there would be no redress in a case of that kind?

The action was not by the Ambassador. How can an Ambassador bring an action at law? the party was never in possession of the property. If you look at the reports in Rolfe's, Butstrode, and Rolfe's Abridgment, you will see in some places it is entitled the [55] King of Spain v. Pountes. How could an Ambassador bring an action of trover, the property never having been in his hands.

Has the record been examined in the case cited from Rolfe, to see whether the Ambassador was the Plaintiff on the record? It was brought by his direction very likely, but how could an Ambassador bring an action for property belonging to the King? it is quite out of the question. I wish to point your attention to that case in Hobart (Hob. 113, ante, p. 51, note), in which the bill was dismissed on the ground that the bill should have been in the name of the King, and not in the name of the Ambassador, as the Ambassador was the agent to the King for political, but not for private purposes. Have you observed what Lord Kenyon says in Ogden v. Folliot (3 T. R. 731)? These are his words, "if we were to consider the acts of the province of New York as binding as has been contended, I am at a loss to know why all the property of those persons which was said to be confiscated, did not pass to the executive power of that state, to whom it was said to be forfeited, and why an action might not have been brought in the name of such executive power, to enforce the payment of this bond." † I think you will find in one of those cases (I have not the books here,) that the King of Spain brought an action of trover against a party who had got possession of some property, and he recovered. It is quite clear it must be in his own name. There are several other cases he-[56]-sides that. What reason can you give why the King of Spain should not maintain an action?

It is argued that the Allies, including England, abandoned part of their claims for the purpose of exonerating France, and that the arrangement could not be altered by a private convention which increased the charge.

Supposing any thing to turn on that view of the question, by what documents does it appear that this country abandoned any part of her claim? It does not appear that any party abandoned its rights for the purpose of getting rid of the liabilities on the part of France; but they agreed to fix their claims at certain specified sums. There might be a clear gain by fixing on a precise sum. What is the fact? How has it turned out? Is not the sum larger than the claims which have been allowed? I do not think the parties to the general treaty abandoned any claims: there is nothing to shew such abandonment: it is a mere arrangement.

* See the Spanish Ambassador v. Bingley, Hob. 113. The bill was filed in Chancery by the Spanish Ambassador, as Plaintiff suing for all the King of Spain's subjects, for the recovery of goods which were stated to belong to such subjects generally, and not to any individuals named. To this bill a demurrer was filed; and the matter was referred by the Lord Chancellor to the Judges of the Common Pleas, who thought that the Ambassador ought not to be answered. The case was afterwards tried by consent, in a course prescribed by the Judges, and forming no precedent as to jurisdiction.

There had been a previous proceeding in the same matter, which is reported in Hob. 78, under the title of Don Diego Serviento de Aenna, Ambassador Leiger for the King of Spain, against Jolliffe, Tucker, and Sir Richard Bingley. The Plaintiff sued in the Court of Admiralty, as procurator general for all his master's subjects; stating in his libel a case of piracy, by Jolliffe and Tucker, against ships with cargoes, of subjects of the King of Spain; and that the ships, etc. were taken into a port of Ireland, and came to the hands of Sir Richard Bingley, who converted them to his own use. A prohibition was prayed, and "Montague, the King's serjeant for the Ambassador, said that he could not sue for these goods at common law, because he was not proprietary." See Hob. p. 113.

† He said also, "if the treaty of peace has reference to the first declaration of independence, the bond in question was lawfully transferred to the executive power; and if so, I do not see why an action may not be brought."

I have directed your attention to what is said by Lord Kenyon, and the case in Rolle (1 Rolle's Rep. 133, ante, p. 53); can you state any opposing authority? I think we may assume that a sovereign can bring an action at law. As to the case in Hobart (Spanish Ambassador v. Bingley, Hob. 113, ante, p. 54), the objection was that he could not maintain a suit in the name of the Ambassador instead of his own name. The matter was disposed of by the Court upon agreement between the parties. It was not a case of regular jurisdiction.

There was a case (Dolder v. Lord Huntingfield, 11 Ves. 283) from the canton of Berne, in which certain persons filed a bill on behalf of them-[57]-selves and the canton of Berne: the only objection made, was that it was a bill not filed by an established government recognized by this country.

As to the objection that in the case of a sovereign justice cannot be done: if he appears as Plaintiff, you can do complete justice—you can impose any terms you think proper—you have him in your power—you may file a cross bill, and then you have him completely under your control and jurisdiction.

In the case of the Colombian Government v. Rothschild, the objection was that it was not a proper designation of the executive. I was not aware that the present Master of the Rolls had expressed himself so strongly: * but it is quite clear from the observations of the Judge, that if there had been a proper designation of the executive they would have had a right to sue.

In the case of Dolder v. Lord Huntingfield, the Lord Chancellor, speaking of Maryland, says, "that state was only a corporation under the great seal dissolved by means which a court of justice was obliged to consider rebellious, and then the transfer of the title from Maryland to any other state was a question a court of justice could look at as a question of law only in one way, and the principle was that the Court could not admit that the title passed to the independent states of America by an act which we are obliged to call rebellion." He goes on to say with respect to [58] that case † before Lord Loughborough, "the question of merits is not decided by the Maryland case, which does not touch such a case as this, a foreign independent state." The inconvenience in many of the cases has arisen out of the shape of the record, but the Lord Chancellor admits most distinctly in that case, that an action can be brought or a bill filed in the name of an independent power, or the executive power of an independent state.

As for the objection that the money might be recovered at law, Machado is the agent, and he received the money as agent of the King of Spain. The jurisdiction is concurrent, and they want discovery and account.

The cestui que trusts are not necessary parties, for there is no person who has established any right as appears by the record itself. It is stated that there is no person who has yet established a claim: therefore, there is no person whom you can make a party to the record.

As to the necessity of making Pereira a party, is it stated that the funds are now in the name of Pereira? Is it stated that Pereira acted as the agent of Machado in paying the monies over, or that he has any interest in them at all? They were deposited in the name of Pereira, Pereira being out of the jurisdiction of the Court.

It is stated on the face of the record that Pereira had no interest—he did not claim any interest. All [59] the circumstances which are connected with paying

* The expression alluded to, is in the case of the Colombian Government v. Rothschild, 1 Stu. 94. The report of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment contains the following passage: "A foreign state must sue in the names of some public officers who are intitled to represent the interests of the state, and upon whom process can be served by the Defendants."

† Barclay v. Russell, 3 Ves. 431: in the report of which the following passage occurs: "I wish it to be considered whether any foreign sovereign under any denomination, can sue in a municipal court of this country. Whether it is not matter of application from state to state. I doubt, whether in a municipal court the right of a sovereign independent state can be recognised" it over, and every thing relating to it, shew distinctly that he had no interest and no claim whatever. All that is admitted by the demurrer. There is no colour of interest, provided it is stated how, and under what circumstances it is paid. Take it as a naked fact unaccompanied with other circumstances there may be a colour of interest; but you are not to take a part of the averment and reject the rest—you must take the whole—you must take the whole averment together—and the whole averment is admitted by the demurrer to be true. The Master of the Rolls, it is said, has decided * that where it appears on the face of the bill a party has an interest, but it is averred that he is out of the jurisdiction of the Court, it is necessary to pray process against him. But there is no colour of title in Pereira on this record.

It has been argued that the trusts of the original treaties have never been rescinded by competent authority. Upon that point the case stands thus: In the original treaty there was no particular sum stipulated. France was to indemnify the subjects of the different powers for the amount of their claims; then there was to be a mixed commission to adjudicate the amount of the claims. It was afterwards considered most convenient that a precise sum should be appropriated by France: there was an end of the mixed commission; and the surplus under such circumstances belonged to the respective powers. However, that has nothing to do with the present [60] question, there is a subsequent and distinct arrangement made by France with Spain, by which it is agreed that a part of this sum of money on which France had certain claims, should be paid to France, and the rest be paid over and be the property of the King of Spain, that is the distinct language of the treaty. France has certain claims against Spain, and she did not choose to part with the fund till those claims were liquidated. In the mean time the fund was to remain in France accumulating in compound interest for the benefit of the Spanish claimants until the claims which France had were liquidated. Then, Spain and France, by a subsequent treaty, agree to put an end to this arrangement, the French agreeing to take a part of these funds in liquidation of the claims of the French subjects, and the remainder of the sum was to be paid over to the Spanish government. That was the final arrangement—it was under that arrangement that Machado received the money. It is quite clear from this final arrangement that France abandoned all claim on the fund.

Lord Redesdale: This is one of the clearest cases that can possibly be stated. I conceive that there can be no doubt that a sovereign may sue. If he cannot, there is a right, without a remedy: for it is only by suit in Court, that the Respondent can obtain this money: he sues as every sovereign must sue, generally speaking, either on his own behalf, or on behalf of his subjects. If the courts of justice were to refuse to receive his suit, I apprehend that it might be a just cause of war. All transactions on behalf of nations, must be transactions with the sovereign power of those nations: it cannot be transacted otherwise, and what is the subject of the present suit? If any person had a right to object to the authority of Machado in receiving this money, it was the government [61] of France. The French government did not object to it: they paid the money to Machado, and he is put in possession of the fund. Machado receives it as the agent of the King of Spain: it was in that character alone that he received it. The only persons who had a right to dispute the authority of Machado to receive it, were the government of France, and the government of France did not dispute it. Machado, having received the money, deposits it in the hands of Messrs. Hullett and Brothers; and the single pretence, on which there can be the slightest objection in this case, is, that he deposited it in the name of Achilles de Pereira. This man, it is stated, was a person whose name was made use of by Machado, for a particular purpose, and it is so admitted by the Appellants in this case. It is stated that the Defendants have rendered all the accounts to Machado, and never pretended that this man had any interest in the fund in their subsequent transactions with Machado. The bill states, therefore, that this is a mere pretence on their part, and that in truth they have acknowledged Machado to be the person to whom they are to be accountable. Who is Machado on the statement of these proceedings, but the agent of the King of Spain, in his sovereign capacity? It is in his sovereign capacity that he appoints Machado as his agent, and Machado is responsible to the King of Spain. Having received the money in this character, what have the Appellants to do with all these treaties? Nothing: as I apprehend. They have this money in their hands, as the depositaries of Machado, the agent of the King of Spain; that is the truth of the case, as appears on the record.

Under these circumstances, therefore, the Appellants ought to answer this bill, and to say what is the [62] money they have in their hands and to pay that money as the Court shall think fit to direct. If there existed such claimants as are stated, and who might perhaps, some of them, be sufferers if the money was disposed of, without the control of the Court, the bill only prays that the money should be paid into Court; and if there are any persons who have claims, the money being there, they may exhibit any suit they think fit for that purpose: but that is no reason whatever why the Defendants should not answer this bill, admitting what money is in their hands, and paying that money into Court. I conceive, therefore, that this Demurrer ought not to be allowed. Such has been the decision of the Court below, and I am disposed to move your Lordships to affirm that decision: for I cannot find any ground whatever, on which it can be resisted.

As to the proposition that a sovereign Prince cannot sue, it would be against all ideas of justice. In what manner is this money to be got out of the hands of the Defendants, if a sovereign power cannot sue for it. He is bound with a trust for his own subjects when he has obtained the money; but with the execution of that trust you have no more to do, than you would have in many proceedings in this country: as where Commissioners are appointed, for the purpose of adjusting claims between different governments, with respect to which you would not interfere in courts of justice: because the sovereign power of the country must have a power to appoint proper boards for that purpose. It is stated, that such a board is appointed, and that board is in Spain, and not amenable to the jurisdiction of this Court. I cannot, therefore, find any ground on which these parties can refuse to answer this bill; certainly, in honesty, they cannot refuse: they do not pretend, they cannot [63] pretend, that the money is their own. By answering the bill, and submitting to pay the money into Court, they would be free from all further responsibility, and then it would remain to be disposed of, as might be just.

If there were such persons as is suggested having claims on this sum of money, and they had a right to institute a suit on the subject, it would be their business to institute that suit: but at the same time I should doubt extremely whether the Court of Chancery could entertain such a suit under the circumstances, any further than to order the transfer of these funds to the boards which the bill states are constituted by the King of Spain for the purpose of liquidating the claims of his subjects with respect to that fund. What has been done in this country, where boards of a similar description have been instituted? The sovereign power of every state must be entrusted with such an authority, and there cannot be any transaction between nation and nation carried on if this Demurrer should be allowed. It is a transaction of such a description, that the right necessarily accrues to the sovereign power in Spain. That the Spanish sovereign is a trustee for his own subjects, may be true; but the Court of Chancery cannot enforce properly that trust. The hand entitled to receive the fund, according to what may be deemed the law of nations, is the King of Spain, or the person whom he appoints for that purpose. Accordingly, the French government allowed Machado, as the agent of the King of Spain, to receive the money; and the French government were the only persons who had any right to dispute the authority of Machado to receive it. Machado did receive it, under the authority of the King of Spain, and the money is now in the hands of these persons, under the autho-[64]-rity of Machado. On these grounds I submit that this Demurrer ought to be over-ruled.

An objection was made that Pereira was not a party. There is a statement in the bill sufficient to shew that he has no interest in this money, and the circumstances which are stated, must be considered as admitted by the Appellants in their Demurrer. They admit, therefore, that so far from this man having any interest in the fund, the Defendants have constantly rendered their accounts, not to him, but to Machado:

that is the statement in this bill, therefore they have themselves, by admitting that statement in the bill, admitted that this man has no interest. On these grounds it appears to me, that the decision of the Court below is right, and therefore I move that the judgment pronounced by the Court below be affirmed. I do not wish you to consider my opinion as of considerable force on this subject, but it certainly is a subject, on which, in the early part of my professional life, I bestowed a good deal of pains and attention.*

The Lord Chancellor: I see no reason to alter my opinion, the grounds of which I have stated in the course of the argument.

Judgment affirmed, without costs. (The reason given was the dignity of the Plaintiff.)

(COURT OF KING'S BENCH.)

The Reverend EDWARD DRAX FREE, D.D.—Plaintiff in Error; MONTAGUE BURGOYNE, Esq.—Defendant in Error.

[Mews' Dig. v. 1246. S. C. 1 Dow, and Cl. 115; and in K. B. 6 B. and C. 27, 538; 9 Dow, and R. 11.; and in Eccles. Ct. 2 Add. 414; 2 Hagg. E. R., 457, 662. Adopted, on point as to prohibition, in Macnochie v. Penzance (Lord), 1881, 6 A. C. 445. See Church Discipline Act, 1840 (3 and 4 Vict. c. 86, s. 21); also Clergy Discipline Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 32).]

The Stat. 27 Geo. 3, c. 44, intitled, an act to prevent frivolous and vexatious suits in Ecclesiastical Courts, and reciting in the preamble, that it is expedient to limit the time for the commencement of certain suits in the Ecclesiastical Courts, enacts, (among other things), that no suit shall be commenced in any Ecclesiastical Court for fornication or incontinence, after the expiration of eight calendar months from the time when such offence shall have been committed.

Upon a libel in the Ecclesiastical Court against a clergyman, containing various articles charging fornication, etc.; and in the concluding article willing that the offender be duly and canonically punished and corrected according to the exigency of the law, etc., an objection taken to the jurisdiction on the ground of the Statute 27 Geo. 3, c. 44, was overruled in the Ecclesiastical Court: whereupon a writ of prohibition was obtained in the Court of King's Bench, and upon declaration in prohibition, demurrer, and argument, it was held that the statute applied only to proceedings against fornicators, etc., whether Laymen or Clergymen, pro salute animarum; but that a proceeding in the Ecclesiastical Court on the ground of fornication, against a clergyman, for the purpose of deprivation, is not prohibited by the statute, and this judgment was affirmed on appeal.

Held also that the judgment of the Court of King's Bench being for a prohibition, against proceeding on the ground of fornication pro salute animarum, but granting a consultation so far as the case related to the proceeding for deprivation, the statute 8 and 9 W. 3, c. 11, which gives costs to the party who obtains the judgment in prohibition, did not apply, inasmuch as it was a qualified judgment, which in substance was for the Defendant in the prohibition, and that if it was to be considered as a casus omissus, there was no authority in the Court to give costs.

[66] This was a Writ of Error brought to reverse a judgment † of the Court of King's Bench in an action of Prohibition. The Plaintiff in Error was Rector of the Rectory of the parish of Sutton, in the county of Bedford. The Defendant in Error was one of the Parishioners.

In October, 1824, the Defendant in Error exhibited articles in the Arches Court of Canterbury against the Plaintiff in Error, charging acts of fornication and incontinence, committed by him, with several of his female servants, in the years 1810, 1812, 1814, 1815, 1817, and 1822, and also that on several occasions during the above, and in the intervening years, he had been guilty of various other acts of gross immorality and neglect of his clerical duties.

The Libel consisted of thirty-one articles, containing the charges above-mentioned, and other Ecclesiastical offences.

The first article stated, that by the Ecclesiastical laws, all ministers in holy orders were required to be decent in their behaviour, to abstain from fornication, etc. under pain of deprivation, suspension, or such other ecclesiastical punishment or censures, as the case may require, and the law authorize, etc. The second article alleged, that Dr. Free was Rector of Sutton. The last article willed, that Dr. Free should be canonically punished according to law, and also be condemned in the costs of the suit, but did not specially point to deprivation.

With respect to the 5th, 7th, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th articles, which alleged various acts of fornication, the Plaintiff in Error disputed the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court.

The Ecclesiastical Court determined (2 Addams's Rep. p. 414) that it had [67] jurisdiction, and gave judgment against the Plaintiff in Error, whereupon he obtained a writ and declared in prohibition. The declaration set forth the libel and the proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court, and prayed a prohibition. To this declaration a Plea and Demurrer were put in: upon which the Plaintiff joined issue.

The case was argued in Easter term 1826, and on the 6th of May, 1826, judgment was given, which in substance was, that as to so much of the charge as related to the proceeding against the Plaintiff in Error for fornication or incontinence, for the purpose only of his soul's health, and the reformation of his manners, the Defendant in Error should be prohibited from proceeding in the Spiritual Court; but that as to so much of the charge as related to those offences, for the purpose of suspension or deprivation, or other punishment merely clerical, and also as to the other matters charged against him, that the Defendant in Error should not be prohibited from proceeding in the Spiritual Court, but that a consultation should be and it was accordingly awarded in respect thereof: and after argument, the Court of King's Bench was also of opinion that the Plaintiff in Error, was not entitled to costs of suit.

Against this judgment the Plaintiff in Error brought a Writ of Error in Parliament.

For the Plaintiff in Error, Dr. Addams and Mr. Denman.*

[68] The charges against the Plaintiff extend from 1810 to 1822, inclusive. The citation is dated in 1824—eighteen months after any act alleged, contrary to 27 Geo. 3. c. 41.

The suit was instituted for his soul's health, and reformation of manners only—that was the sole motive. Deprivation is only one mode of punishment, and that is, for the soul's health, and reformation of manners. The clergy as well as laity, are within the meaning of the act. The refined distinction between clergy and laymen is not warranted by the words or spirit of the act. The act is general, intended to protect the clergy as well as the laity. Indeed the clergy, from their situation, are deserving of greater protection. The suit, though said to be for deprivation or suspension, is essentially pro salute animae, there is no distinction in practice between suits pro salute animae and for deprivation; all suits for deprivation are suits pro salute animae.—For forty years the act has, in practice, been supposed to apply to the clergy as well as the laity.

The judgment of the King's Bench holds, that it does apply to the clergy as well as the laity, to a certain extent. In the Court of Arches it was held not to apply to the clergy at all.—there it was held, that the act passed alio intuitu (2 Add. Rep. p. 414). The judgments of the Arches and King's Bench proceed on essentially different grounds.

* It was proposed with a view to shew the object of the suit to read the citation in the Ecclesiastical Court, to which Campbell objected that the citation formed no part of the record. Dr. Addams answered that the libel must follow the citation. The Lord Chancellor said it did not matter, as the libel described him as Rector of Sutton.

There is no such thing in the Ecclesiastical Courts as criminal informations. They proceed solely pro salute animarum.

The Court of Arches took no distinction between suits for correction, and suits for punishment. The King's Bench did.—This distinction is unwarranted [69] by principle or practice.—In practice, there is no proceeding for punishment, quâ punishment: it is merely pro salute animarum.—The punishment is a mean, not the end: the salus animarum, and reformatio morum, is the end (Gibbs. Cod. Corbet's case, 5 Rep.): deprivation is a mere mean of correction (Raymond, 1510. Cit. Townsend v. Thorpe): deprivation, is divesting a man of his freehold: the usual consequence of suits of this nature is suspension only. The judgment of the King's Bench leaves the Court no option, it must proceed to deprivation.

The title and preamble of the act, is to stay frivolous and vexatious suits, and limits a time: whether the time is too short or too long, is no matter.—The act is express, and this particularly is a frivolous and vexatious suit. There is no charge within eighteen months after the last offence alleged. Surely there should be some limit to proceedings of this nature. The charges here begin eighteen or twenty years ago: there is no possibility of rebutting such charges, resting upon evidence possibly suborned and got up for purposes of malice or revenge, etc. There is no conviction of the alleged offences, as it rests in mere allegation. For the purpose of the argument it may be assumed that the plaintiff is innocent of every charge, and he is in fact prepared to deny the facts alleged.

There is an obvious impolicy in allowing such charges to be made without limitation of time. This is the very mischief the act intended to remedy. In fair construction the act applies to clergy as well as laity; there is no exception of the clergy, which of course there would have been, if intended. A general act applies without exception: why not in this case?

[70] As to costs,* the Appellant, by the provisions of the act (8 and 9 W. 3. c. 11) is intitled to them, having obtained a prohibition as to the proceeding for fornication.

For the Defendant in Error, Mr. Campbell and Dr. Lushington.

Mr. Campbell: The judgments of the Court of Arches and the King's Bench are the same. For the sake of the church the Plaintiff should be deprived of his living. The citation is not here, but the libel is, which shews the nature of the proceeding. In the first article, there is no notice of reformation of manners: the object in view of the libel is, that he may be deprived of his benefice. The second article states the induction of the Plaintiff: these articles would be immaterial, unless it were a proceeding against him, as Rector of Sutton. There is no penance required or stated for his soul's health. It is a suit for deprivation founded upon these articles. It is stated, that no proceedings for deprivation ever take place in the Ecclesiastical Court; that is not so:—there is a proceeding for punishment by deprivation (2 Burn's Eccl. Law, tit. Deprivation). The direct purpose is to purge the church, which is properly determinable by the Ecclesiastical laws of the realm. Many of the causes of deprivation have nothing to do with salus animarum or reformatio morum; as for instance: by common law or statute, want of orders, [71] simony, plurality, conviction by temporal courts, omission to subscribe the oaths of supremacy, incontinence,† etc. The causes of deprivation by the Canon law, are wearing arms, non-residence, concubinage,‡ etc.

* It was objected that the appeal could not be heard on the subject of costs: because it did not form part of the record. The Court of King's Bench had given leave to amend the record below, for that purpose: but this had not been done. It was thereupon intimated by the House, upon the suggestion of Mr. Courtenay, that the practice of the House would permit the record still to be amended, and the counsel for the Respondent then waived the objection.

† In the reign of Eliz., Fox and Burton were deprived for adultery: 6 Rep. 13. 6 Hob. 291. Cro. Eliz. 11.

‡ This canonical crime appears to have been punished by degradation. By

This libel is framed to give in evidence the matter of the allegations with the view to deprivation. The 16 Car. 1. c. 11. operated * merely to destroy the power of the High Commission Court. The 27 Geo. 3. is the only impediment, does this take away the jurisdiction? if it does not, the common law must have force. Such a result could not have been contemplated by the legislature.

Suppose the case of a bastard child: suppose the fact not discovered till after nine months: this statute of limitation would have run, and the proceeding for deprivation would be barred. It is impossible to contemplate this to have been the intention of the legislature.

The title is part of the act—what is the title, but for restraining frivolous and vexatious suits in the Ecclesiastical Court? the proceedings pro salute animae are a mere mockery,—originally they were not so: in modern times they are. In Scotland the practice of penance still prevails to a certain extent. The suit pro salute animae now, is to make a person pay costs; it may very well have been the object of the legislature to put a stop to such suits. But could it have been the intention to prevent all suits against the [72] clergy, for deprivation? The words of the act are general: but they have reference to the title and preamble.

In construing acts of parliament, the court looks to the mischief intended to be remedied (Com. Dig. Parliament); if not within the mischief, it cannot be brought within the words. Suits against the clergy for deprivation rarely happen: the cases enumerated in the act frequently: the rare instances are not within the mischief: the offences enumerated, are defamatory words, brawling in the church, incontinence, etc. But this is a suit for deprivation (Sherwin v. Cartwright, Hutton, p. 111). Suits for deprivation are of rare occurrence—suits pro salute animae were in the contemplation of the legislature. If a clergyman marry his prostitute, it would be a cause for deprivation: though a suit for the soul's health could not be maintained. So if a clergyman marry a common prostitute, might he not be sued in respect of his incontinence and scandal anterior to the marriage? There is a distinction between a clergyman and a layman, as to the jurisdiction in prohibition: as to civil punishment, the prohibition would go, but as to the proceeding for deprivation for such an offence, it would not go.

In the Bishop of Clogher's case the party might have been indicted: but he absconded. No proceedings took place in the Temporal Courts; yet there was a suit for deprivation.

The deprivation is the object of the suit in the case of a clergyman:—with respect to a layman it is different, because there can be no deprivation, but merely correction, pro salute animae. You cannot proceed pro salute animae, even against a clergyman, for an offence cognizable in the Temporal Courts. [73] Therefore, unless a clergyman happen to be convicted, in the Courts of Common Law, there could be no suit in the Ecclesiastical Courts: suppose the clerk, after the offence, absconds, and therefore cannot be convicted, the scandal would remain without remedy.

As to costs, the Plaintiff is not entitled to them. The case is clearly not within the Statute of Gloucester. No costs, therefore, can be given, unless the case is within the 7 and 8 W. and M. The question is, whether the Plaintiff has obtained judgment.

The judgment grants a consultation, as to all the matters. The Plaintiff has no judgment. The Defendant may proceed on the whole, but no judgment can be given on that part, which is pro salute anima. It does not stay the proceedings, but the judgment.

Dr. Lushington: Over the laity the Ecclesiastical Courts have jurisdiction only in certain cases, by virtue of certain canons which have become part of the law of the land, but these proceedings are pro salute animae only. Over the clergy the jurisdiction is similar as to suits pro salute anima; but they have a further jurisdiction in respect of the clerical character. The Court itself was primarily established 31 H. 8. c. 14. s. 10. a priest keeping a concubine forfeited his goods, chattels, and promotions, and was liable to imprisonment at the king's will.—See the note in Burn's Eccl. Law, tit. q. s.

* See the 4th sect., but it is repealed by 13 Car. 2. s. 1. c. 12.

for taking care that the clergy performed the clerical duties, a jurisdiction totally distinct from that over the laity. If the conduct of a clergyman be wrong, it is the duty of the Court to interfere for the purpose of preserving the Ecclesiastical discipline and morality of the church. The judgment in Middleton v. Croft (2 Atk. 607), is an admirable dissertation upon the subject of this jurisdiction.

The canons are held to bind the clergy, though not the laity; and the courts have exercised such jurisdiction in all instances. If the clergy are to be ex-[74]-empt from such a jurisdiction, it would have the most injurious effect on the discipline of the church. The proceedings have been generally with a double aspect, namely, that ordinary one, pro salute animæ, and the extraordinary one of deprivation for offences committed against the discipline of the church. If you destroy the jurisdiction in the former, you cannot, we contend, do it in the latter. The very commencement of the articles shews that these criminal proceedings were instituted for the purposes of securing the discipline of the church. The Ecclesiastical Court has exercised this jurisdiction from time immemorial. The whole tenor of the proceedings shews that they are not for punishment pro salute animæ, but merely for another purpose, essentially within the province of the Ecclesiastical Court. In the proceedings in the King's Bench, on the prohibition, it was for the first time contended, that the 27 Geo. 3. destroyed the jurisdiction altogether.

The correction of clerks is frequently excepted out of the patents of charters of dioceses. In Exeter such an exception has prevailed for these two centuries. The bishop has the paramount authority, and from him the jurisdiction is derived. The statute of Hen. 7. gives the bishop an additional power—a power of imprisonment. If this act was repealed by 12 Car., it is still in force, for the 13 Car. 2. s. 1. c. 12. repealed the 16 Car. 1. c. 11. This statute is not noticed in the 27 Geo. 3.

As to the construction of the statute 27 Geo. 3., it is a remedial statute to remove a mischief and advance the remedy: was this a mischief entitled to be remedied by the act? The clergy are not within the mischief of the act. However that be, there is a clear distinction between proceeding for deprivation and pro sal. an.: [75] comparatively speaking, the offence of fornication in a layman is much more venial. In a clergyman the consequences from the evil example in a parish, are very pernicious. A suit for deprivation necessarily involves the motives and inducements for suspension and deprivation.

The clergy are not mentioned by name in the 27 Geo. 3. This is observable, for it leaves the statute of Hen. 7. in force to punish by imprisonment, and is supposed to take away the power of proceeding for deprivation and suspension; this is a reductio ad absurdum.

Visitations are held once a year when presentments are or ought to be made by the churchwardens. It may happen then, that the representation on which proceedings are to be instituted, is not known till after the twelve months. Was it meant that the clerk should, in such case, laugh at the discipline of the church? Suppose a man commits adultery, which is not known, but he is afterwards convicted; may not the bishop found any proceedings against the delinquent, on the ground that under the statute the limitation has run out?

The clergy, it is said, require protection. There is no foundation for this argument; for proceedings are scarcely ever instituted against the clergy. There are only fifteen on record in London.

As to costs, if the party succeeds in the major part of his demand, he is entitled to costs, not if he succeeds in the minor only.

The Lord Chancellor (in the course of the Argument): The suit in the bishop of Clogher's case, was pro salute animæ, and also for deprivation. There is no doubt of the jurisdiction to inquire into the offence for the purpose of deprivation. [76] The question raised by Dr. Addams, is whether you can serve the two proceedings. No authority has been cited, and in the absence of authority, are we to assume that they cannot be served?

Is deprivation only an incident?—the original libel was in effect pro salute animæ, and also for deprivation, the judgment was to prohibit one of the proceedings—if it had not been for that judgment the Ecclesiastical Court might have proceeded to punish, not only by deprivation, but pro salute animæ. The Plaintiff has, therefore, obtained a judgment restraining the Ecclesiastical Court. He had a just cause to come for a prohibition, and so the Court adjudged. The costs, therefore, should, according to the act, have been awarded.

I am inclined to think, unless better authority than Baker v. Roger (Cro. Eliz. 789) can be cited, that proceedings for deprivation may be instituted against a clerk, without any suit pro salute animæ.

It is not necessary to proceed for judgment, pro salute animæ, and deprivation also, they may be severed, and judgment may be given to deprive, though no judgment may be given pro salute animæ. What is there to shew that deprivation may not be the substantive object of the suit!

The Lord Chancellor (at the end of the Argument): The Noble Lord and Reverend Prelate, who have attended the whole of this discussion, are of opinion with me that this act of Parliament does not apply to a suit, the object of which is deprivation; and also that the proceedings may be severed. The judgment below must be so far affirmed: with respect to the costs some difficulty occurs.

The Lord Chancellor (26th June, 1828): This case arises out of a [77] prosecution in prohibition. The Court of King's Bench gave judgment in prohibition in a particular form, and upon that Doctor Free brought a writ of Error. Certain charges had been preferred against Doctor Free, who was Rector of Sutton, in the county of Bedford: charges of fornication and incontinence of a very precise description, commencing in the year 1810, and continuing down to the year 1822. Those charges were made the foundation of a suit in the Spiritual Court, which suit was instituted in the year 1824, two years, or nearly two years, after the date of the act, which was the subject of the last charge preferred against Doctor Free. Articles were exhibited against him in the Spiritual Court, containing those charges, and it is quite clear in looking at those articles as they are framed, that it would have been competent to the Spiritual Court to have proceeded against Doctor Free to punish him in the ordinary mode for incontinence and fornication, pro salute animæ et pro reformatione morum, and also to proceed against him for deprivation either for the one or the other, or both. It is in such a form that the articles are framed, and a corresponding judgment or judgments might have been founded upon those articles.

It was contended in the Spiritual Court by Doctor Free, that the Court could not proceed in that suit, by reason of the 27 Geo. 3. c. 44. By that Act suits for fornication and incontinence must be commenced within eight months from the period when the offence is committed. The Judge in the Court below overruled the objection: in consequence of which a writ of prohibition was issued, and the matter came before the Court of King's Bench. In that Court Doctor Free declared in prohibition, and the main question then raised for consideration, was whether the statute applied to a case of this description. It was admit-[78]-ted that there was no doubt that the statute applied to an ordinary case of incontinence, or fornication, with a view to the ordinary punishment pro salute animæ et reformatione morum. The Court of King's Bench were of opinion, (and I am disposed to concur in that opinion,) that a suit of this description instituted against a Clergyman, as well as against a Layman, must be instituted within the period limited by the statute.

But, another and a much more important question arose as to whether or not that Act of Parliament applied to a suit for deprivation, and I think it is impossible to look at the title of that Act of Parliament, at the preamble of it, at the particular provisions and enactments of it, and to suppose for a moment that they could have been intended to apply to a suit instituted for the purpose of deprivation. It is unnecessary to repeat observations upon these particular parts of the Act of Parliament, because it was considered very much in detail in the argument. I will only say generally that I concur in the view taken by the Judge in the Spiritual Court, that the Act does not apply to a suit for deprivation. I concur in the judgment pronounced in the Court of King's Bench with respect to the distinction that the Act of Parliament does not apply to a suit instituted for the purpose of deprivation.

If that be so, let us consider the question of form according to the state of proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court. I have already stated, that according to my opinion the Court might have proceeded to punish the individual in the ordinary way, pro salute animæ et pro reformatione morum, and it might also have proceeded to deprive him, or it might have proceeded for the one or the other, or both. The Court [79] of King's Bench were of opinion that with reference to the mode of proceeding with a view only to the reformation of the manners, with a view only to punishment pro salute animæ, the statute was a bar. They pronounced that judgment distinctly, drawing the attention of those persons who heard the judgment to that distinction; and they, in their judgment, therefore, allowed the party to proceed below, for the purpose of deprivation, and for the purpose of deprivation only. They said there are two objects for which this suit is instituted, or the judgment may be directed to two purposes, those purposes which I stated. As to one, the Court cannot proceed, because it is out of time. With respect to the other, we are of opinion that the statute does not apply, and therefore the Court below may proceed for that particular object.

The Court of King's Bench was warranted in so severing that judgment, not merely upon principle, but on reference to the cases which were quoted. It appears to me that in principle the case of Slater v. Smallbrooke,* was directly in point, that was a proceeding against a party who had obtained forged orders, and was instituted to a benefice. A prohibition was obtained, and the case came before the Court of King's Bench, and the Court of King's Bench held that the Spiritual Court had no jurisdiction to enquire into the forgery of orders, with a view of punishing for such forgery, that is to say, as a temporal offence, but that they might enquire into that offence for the purpose of deprivation, and of deprivation only. The Court below, therefore, was allowed to proceed [80] and to enquire into the particular offence of forgery, not with a view to punish for that forgery in the ordinary way, in which the Ecclesiastical Court punishes for that offence, but for the purpose of deprivation; and according to the report of the case for deprivation only. That case applies strictly to the present. By the operation of the statute 27 Geo. 3. the Court below, the Spiritual Court, cannot proceed to enquire into the incontinence and fornication of Doctor Free, with a view to punish him in the ordinary mode, pro salute animæ et reformatione morum, but they may, according to the construction which the Court of King's Bench has put upon the Act, proceed to enquire into the incontinence and fornication, for the purpose of deprivation, and deprivation only. I conceive, therefore, that the case of Slater v. Smallbrooke is precisely in principle the same as this case.

In the case of Townsend v. Thorpe (2 Lord Raym. 507, 2 Stra. 776, sed vide 912), the Judgment pronounced after much consideration by the Court of King's Bench, is precisely to the same effect. That was a suit instituted against a parish clerk for the purpose of deprivation. He was charged with various offences of an indecent nature, which it is not necessary to particularize. A writ of prohibition was issued out, and the party declared in prohibition. The Court held that a Spiritual Court has no jurisdiction whatever, to enquire into those offences for the purpose of punishing those offences civilly; but that the Court may enquire into those offences for the purpose of deprivation; and that was the judgment pronounced by the Court, severing the two parts of the charge and allowing an enquiry for the purpose of deprivation; and the judgment of the Court passed accord[81] ingly. Now that also is a case precisely similar to the present, and it is not only similar in principle, but it confirms the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, because the judgment is substantially that, with a view to deprivation only, (whatever forms it may be necessary for the Ecclesiastical Court to adopt,) with that view only the Court below may proceed. If the object of the Court below is to proceed, for the purpose of punishing for incontinence, pro salute animæ et reformatione morum, in that case the statute applies: but the Court of King's Bench says we will allow the parties to proceed in the Court below, for the purpose of deprivation only, with all those forms and those ceremonies, and that manner of proceeding, which is necessary for the purpose of carrying on a suit for deprivation. If, therefore, you are satisfied that the construction put upon this Act of Parliament by the Court of King's Bench, is the correct construction, about which you will probably entertain no doubt, the judgment up to this point should be affirmed.

The only question which remains for consideration is the question of costs, and I confess I at first entertained considerable doubts upon that point. The party who succeeds on Demurrer in prohibition, was not entitled to his costs, previously to the Act of 8th and 9th William 3. Unless therefore it is clear from the Act of 8th and 9th William 3. that he is entitled to his costs, they cannot be given. Now that Act says that if the Plaintiff on Demurrer obtains judgment, he shall be entitled to his costs. What is the case in the present instance? A prohibition is applied for, to restrain the Spiritual Court from proceeding upon certain articles. The judgment of the Court of King's Bench was, that upon those articles the [82] party should proceed, but with this species of exception that they should proceed in a qualified way, and for a particular object. That is a judgment at least as much for the Defendant as for the Plaintiff. How can that be said to be a judgment for the Plaintiff in prohibition, more than it is a judgment for the Defendant? If that be so it cannot be said that the Plaintiff has obtained judgment upon his Demurrer,—it is a judgment for the Defendant in Demurrer, qualified in the manner I have stated. The Court of King's Bench, considering this as a case not within the statute, a casus omisus, held that the Defendant was not entitled to his costs in that Court. If it is a casus omisus—if that is the right construction of the Act of Parliament—it must follow that it was not the intention of the legislature under such circumstances, that the Plaintiff in Demurrer should be entitled to his costs. I should, therefore, recommend to your Lordships, that the judgment of the Court of King's Bench should be affirmed; and I think, under all the circumstances of this case, that the judgment should be affirmed with costs.

Judgment affirmed, with £100 costs.

(COURT OF EXCHEQUER.)

THOMAS LEWIS and ROBERT ANDREW STEVENS,—Appellants;
HENRY ALLNUTT,—Respondent.

[In view of the fact that tithe has by the Tithe Acts been commuted into a rent charge, cases such as this are not now of much importance.]

A., the owner of the tithes of a district in a parish, and B., his lessee, in July, 1824, file a Bill in Chancery against C., the occupier of lands within the district, praying an account for six years back of the tithes of clover, vetches, meadow and rye grass, and other grasses, cut green, and partly left in the swathe, and partly cocked: C. by his answer, admits the title of A. and B. to the tithes of the district, and his own occupation, and the taking of the tithes; but contends that the clover, etc., are small tithes, and belong to, and are claimed by the vicar, and that he pays to the vicar a composition for all the small tithes, and that the clover, etc. had been used as green meat for his husbandry horses; and upon these grounds he denies the title of the Plaintiffs to the tithes in question.

It appeared in evidence, that in the year 1822, C. had written a letter to B. stating, that on the day of writing the letter, he should cut vetches, and set out the title, and that he had no objection to compound; and in the year 1824 a letter having been written by the Solicitor of A., threatening to file a bill for the tithes in question: C., by his answer to that letter, says, that he has never refused to pay the lessee the tithes of green clover, vetches, and grass.

Upon these admissions, notwithstanding the objections raised by the answer, held (reversing the decree of the Court below,) that the Plaintiffs were intitled to a decree for an account.

Whether the natural or artificial grasses, cut green and lying in the swathe, or set up in cocks, are great or small tithes, and whether if given to husbandry horses, there being other food grown on the farm sufficient for these horses, they are exempt from tithe. Quære.

[84] In this Cause a Bill in Chancery was filed by the Appellants as owner and lessee, of the tithes of a district or portion of land within the parish of Cookham, in Berkshire; called by the name of the Lower Division, stating their respective titles, and that the Respondent had, in the years 1819, 1820, 1821, 1822, 1823, and 1824, occupied a certain farm or portion of arable, meadow, and pasture land, lying within the parish of Cookham, or the titheable places thereof; and that the Respondent had, in each of the years 1819, 1820, 1821, 1822, 1823, and 1824, cut and taken from off his said lands, situate within the boundaries aforesaid, large quantities of clover and vetches, meadow and rye grass, and other grasses which he had from time to time carried off whilst green, and without making the same into hay, part thereof in the swathe, the other part thereof in heaps or cocks; and the Appellant submitted that the tithes of all such clover, vetches, grasses, and tares, so cut and taken away by the Respondent, ought to have been set out by the Respondent to the Appellant R. A. Stevens as lessee, or a full compensation for the same ought to have been paid to the Appellant; but that the Respondent had taken the tithes of all the titheable matters and things aforesaid, and converted the same to his own use, without setting out the same to the Appellant R. A. Stevens as lessee, and without making to the Appellant any allowance or satisfaction for the same.

By the amended bill the Appellants charged that if, as the Respondent pretended he had given any part of such clover, vetches, grasses, and tares to husbandry horses, he had at the time upon his farm and lands sufficient provender or food, or in case he had not sold or disposed of the same, he might [85] have had upon his farm sufficient provender or food fit for the sustenance of such husbandry horses, without having recourse to such clover, vetches, tares, and grasses, so carried away green. The Appellants further charged that the tithes of such clover, vetches, grasses, and tares, in fact belonged to and ought to have been set out by the Respondent to the Appellant R. A. Stevens: and, after suggesting that the Respondent at times pretended, though contrary to the fact, that he had accounted for such tithes to the vicar of the parish, the Appellants charged that the Respondent had admitted the Appellant's title to the tithes of green clover, vetches, and grass grown upon the lands in the Respondent's holding during the several years respectively before mentioned: and particularly that the Respondent in the years 1822 and 1824 admitted that the Appellant R. A. Stevens was entitled to the tithes of the green clover, vetches, and grass grown upon the lands in his the Respondent's holding. The amended bill prayed, that the Respondent might be compelled by the decree of the Court to come to a fair and just account with the Appellant R. A. Stevens for the single value of the tithes of all the clover, vetches, tares, and grasses which he in manner aforesaid had and took upon and from off his farm and lands in each and every of the years 1819, 1820, 1821, 1822, 1823, and 1824, and that the Respondent might be decreed to pay the Appellant R. A. Stevens what should appear to be coming to the Appellant on the taking of the account, and for general relief.

The Respondent, by his answer to the original bill, stated, that he believed it to be true that the Appellant Lewis was, in and prior to the time in the bill mentioned, and had ever since continued to be seized [86] of or well entitled to the tithes of corn, grain, hay, and all other of the great tithes, yearly arising, renewing, and increasing, within such district or portion of land as in the bill mentioned; and that such district or portion of land was known by the name of the Lower Division of the parish of Cookham, and that such indenture of demise was made by and between such parties, and to such purport and effect as set forth in the bill: and that, under such indenture of demise, the Appellant R. A. Stevens became entitled to the tithe of corn, grain, and all other the great tithes, yearly arising, growing, renewing, and increasing upon all the lands situate within such part of the parish of Cookham, or the titheable parts thereof, as was or were comprised within the limits, bounds, and precincts described in the bill.

He thereby also admitted the occupation of lands within the district, and the perception of the clover, etc., from the lands, for the several years and in the manner stated in the bill. But he denied that the tithe of all such clover, vetches, grass, and tares, so cut and taken away by him in a green state, ought to have been set out to the Appellant R. A. Stevens; or that any compensation in respect of the same ought to have been paid to the said Appellant in respect thereof; and he submitted that all such clover, vetches, grass, and tares, whilst in a green state, if titheable at all, was titheable as a vicarial or small tithe, and of right belonging to the vicar for the time being of the parish of Cookham; and that the Appellant R. A. Stevens, as lessee under the Appellant Thomas Lewis, who was the lay impropriator of the rectorial or great tithe, was not entitled to the same.

The Respondent admitted, that he had, by reason of such clover, vetches, tares, and grass, being (if liable [87] to any tithe,) titheable to the vicar for the time being, to whom the Respondent paid the annual sum of £18 as a composition in lieu of his vicarial or small tithe, cut and carried away divers quantities of such clover, vetches, tares, and grass, whilst in a green state, without setting out the same to the Appellant R. A. Stevens, as such lessee, except as thereafter excepted, and had converted the same to his own use, and without making to the Appellant any allowance or satisfaction in respect thereof.

The Respondent denied that the Appellants, or either of them, ever made such applications and requests to him as mentioned in the bill, or that he had refused to comply therewith; but he said that in or about the spring of the year 1823, having been informed that the Appellant R. A. Stevens intended to claim the aforesaid tithe of green meat, he the Respondent, in order to avoid litigation, set out the same, and having apprized the Appellant R. A. Stevens thereof, requested him to take the same away; and that thereupon the Appellant R. A. Stevens replied in the words, or to the effect following, that is to say, "You had better take it up, I don't want any thing more than my right, it will be determined now whether I have any right to it or not, as Sir Samuel Young's Cause* will soon be settled;" and that the Respondent by such answer understood that the Appellant R. A. Stevens agreed that his claim [88] in respect of the tithe of clover, vetches, grass, and tares, should be determined by the decision of the Court of Exchequer in the suit then pending between the Appellants and the said Sir S. Young, Bart. And that the Respondent had, in consequence of such understanding, cut and carried away, and had since continued to cut and carry away divers quantities of the clover, vetches, grass, and tares, whilst in a green state, without setting out any tithe in respect thereof to the Appellant R. A. Stevens.

The Respondent admitted that he had given to his husbandry horses divers quantities of such clover, vetches, grass, and tares, whilst in a green state; and that so much of the residue thereof which was not converted into hay was consumed by his cows. And he said that if the Court should be of opinion that he ought to set forth an account in respect thereof he, for the reasons thereafter-mentioned, was unable so to do, except that in the year 1824 the principal part of the Respondent's hay having, owing to the rains, been spoilt and so badly got up as to be fit only for litter and feed for cows, the clover, vetches, grass, and tares, were in consequence wholly consumed by his husbandry horses; and that in respect of the years 1819, 1820, 1821, 1822, and 1823, in which he had succeeded in getting in his hay in good condition, after allowing the usual proportion of green meat for his husbandry horses, the quantity of clover, vetches, grass, and tares consumed on his farm and lands in a green state had not been more than sufficient for their sustenance; and that the residue thereof had been converted into hay, the tithe whereof had been duly set out to the Appellant R. A. Stevens, or a full compensation paid to him in lieu thereof.

He said, that for the reasons in his answer men-[89]-tioned he was unable to set forth what was the value of the clover, vetches, grass, and tares, or the state thereof

* This was a suit for tithes in the Exchequer, raising the same question—in substance as in this appeal. The decree in the Exchequer was against the tithe-owner, and for the occupier. From which decree an appeal was pending, and would have been heard at the same time with this appeal; but just before the time appointed for hearing, the Respondent died. The cause still remains abated. The report of the case in the Court below, is to be found in 13 Price's Rep. 394. Lewis v. Young, Bart.

respectively when the same were so cut and carried away as aforesaid, or how much thereof respectively was taken whilst the same was in heaps or cocks: nor could he set forth a full, true, and particular account of all the said clover, vetches, grass, and tares so cut and carried from off his said farm and lands in each or any of the years 1819, 1820, 1821, 1822, 1823, and 1824, save as aforesaid, or of the value thereof in each or any of the said years, or of the value of the tithe thereof.

By his answer to the amended bill the Respondent denied that he ever admitted the Appellant's title to the tithes of green clover, vetches, and grass upon the lands in the Respondent's holding, during the several years mentioned in the amended bill, or particularly in the years 1822 and 1824; but he said that in the year 1824, for the reasons set forth in his former answer, he set out the tithes of the green clover, vetches, and grass, and invited the Appellant R. A. Stevens to take the same away; but the Respondent, at the time of his so setting out the said tithes, expressly protested against the Appellant's title thereto: and that thereupon the Appellant R. A. Stevens declined to take possession thereof.

The Appellants replied to the answers, and the Respondent rejoined: whereupon the cause being at issue, evidence was entered into by the Appellants, but no evidence was given by the Respondent either to prove the title of the vicar to the tithes in question, or to support any other of the allegations contained in his answers.

The cause was heard before the Vice Chancellor, on the 10th of February, 1827, when, on the [90] part of the Appellant, were read the passages of the Respondent's answer to the original bill, containing the admissions of the title of the Appellants: of his own occupation of lands within the district: of the taking of clover, etc. from those lands during the years and in the manner set forth in the bill: of his denial that the tithes of those articles belonged to the Appellant as lessee of the impropiator, and his submission to the judgment of the Court whether they did not belong to the vicar.

There was also read a deposition by the Appellant's Solicitor, proving a letter written by him to the Respondent, stating that a bill for an account of the tithes in question would forthwith be filed against him; to which letter the following answer, (proved as an exhibit) was returned,—“Sir, Never having refused to pay Mr. Stevens for the tithes of green clover, vetches, and grass grown upon the lands, in my holding within Mr. Lewis's tithing, it is unnecessary for me to do more than acknowledge the receipt of your letter. (Signed) Henry Allnutt, June 23, 1824.” The following letter from the Respondent to the Appellant Stevens, was also proved as an exhibit: “Sir, I shall cut up vetches upon the acre next your clover in Sutton to day. As I have not found you at home when I have called, I shall set out the tithe at present, but have no objection to compound for it, as I think it best for both parties to do so. (Signed) Henry Allnutt, June 8, 1822.”

The Vice Chancellor decreed that the Appellant's bill should be dismissed with costs.

The appeal was against this decree.

For the Appellants: Mr. Fonblanque and Mr. Spence.

The tithes of clover, vetches, meadow, rye, and other grasses, when severed from the ground by [91] the scythe, or in any way but by the mouths of cattle, are great tithe, and the property of the rector, lay impropiator, or other party entitled to the title of hay from the moment of severance, whatever may be the purpose to which the same may be applied, except in the event of their being applied for the sustenance of husbandry cattle, the farmer having no other sufficient provender for such cattle, which in this case was not attempted to be made out. The Appellants are entitled to a decree for an account of the tithes of the titheable matters, as prayed by the bill, more especially as no evidence was entered into by the Respondent to prove the alleged title of the vicar to such tithes; and it was proved by the Appellants that the Respondent had admitted the Appellant R. A. Stevens's title to such tithes.

But in case the Appellants should not be considered as entitled to the tithes of all the titheable matters enumerated, they are at least entitled to the tithes of such parts thereof as were put into cocks, inasmuch as when the grass is put into cocks, it is then in a state in which the farmer is bound by law to set out and distinguish the nine parts from the tenth or tithe: and the carrying away such part of the grass by the Respondent, without setting out the title, was clearly contrary to law. (No counsel appeared for the Respondent.)

The Lord Chancellor (24th June, 1828): On considering this case and referring to the admissions in the answer, it appears to me that this decree was evidently made in mistake. The letter of the Respondent, dated the 8th of June, 1822, contains a clear admission of his being subject to the payment of tithe.—In my opinion the judgment must be overruled.—I think the Plain-[92]-tiff must then apply to the court from which the case came, for a decree for an account.

We only give judgment, under the special circumstances which appear upon the evidence in the cause, and particularly on the admission of the Defendant himself. As to the particular form, in which the judgment should be drawn up, we will consider further before we pronounce it.—This decides nothing with respect to the general question, as between the Rector and other parties, in this Parish; but on the particular evidence, and the admissions in the cause, the Appellants are entitled to a decree.

We decide this, upon the evidence—I do not find any thing to explain that letter, to which I have adverted.

I see there is another letter written on the 23d of June, 1824, in consequence of an application from Messrs. Freame and Best, in which he says, "Never having refused to pay Mr. Stevens for the title of green clover, vetches, and grass, grown upon the lands, upon my holding within Mr. Lewis's tithing, it is unnecessary for me to do more than acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 21st instant." He does not any where deny the right of the rector, and he admits the right in that other letter. He never thinks of denying the right till he comes to his answer.

It is said that the tithe belongs to the vicar, but there is no evidence to establish the right of the vicar. It is possible that the right may be in the vicar; but then it must be established by proof. It is to be taken, nothing being shewn to the contrary, to be in the rector, and in this case there is no evidence to disprove the right in him.

[93] 24th June, 1828. Ordered and adjudged, that, upon considering the particular evidence and admissions in this cause, the decree be reversed, and it is hereby declared, that the Appellants are entitled to have and receive, from the Respondent, the single value of the titles of all the clover, vetches, tares, and grasses had and taken by him from off his farm and lands, in each and every or any of the years 1819, 1820, etc. or demanded by the Appellant's bill, in the cause, and that the Respondent ought to pay to the Appellant R. A. Stevens, what should be found due upon such account, together with the costs of the cause; and it is also declared, that the Appellants are entitled to be repaid such costs as they have paid to the Respondent in pursuance of the decree of dismissal.—And it is further ordered, that it be referred to the Court of, etc., to give directions to carry the judgment into execution.

ENGLAND.

(COURT OF EXCHEQUER.)

The Reverend HENEAGE ELSLEY, Clerk, and HENRY BARTON,—Appellants; the Reverend WATSON STOTE DONNISON, Clerk,—Respondent.

[S.C. in Ex. sub nom. Donnison v. Elsley and Barton, 1824, McCle. and Y. 1
(Mews' Dig. vi. 995).]

Upon a bill for tithes by a vicar against the occupiers of an estate which had belonged to the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem; and, after the dissolution of the monasteries, being vested in King Henry the Eighth, had been granted by him to the Archbishop of York and his successors, under whom the Defendants occupied; the Defendants pleaded that the lands were held by the Hospital exempt from tithes—that they were so held and granted by the king; and they proved that no tithes had within memory been paid for the lands. On the part of the vicar was produced an insperimus of an inquisition made under the authority of the Archbishop of York in 1314; by which it was found, after specifying certain tithes, "that the vicar ought to receive all other tithes to the said church belonging. (except corn and hay,) which the master and brethren of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem received as rectors: but that all the vicars had, ever since the time of the ordination of the vicarage, received all other tithes, and peaceably, and did so at that time, but they were bound to give their tithe of corn and hay."

Held, upon the evidence of this document, that the vicar was entitled to the tithes claimed by his bill.

The Respondent, in Hilary term 1819, exhibited his bill of complaint in the Court of Exchequer, against the Appellants, stating, among other things, that he [95] was, in 1784, presented, instituted, and inducted into the vicarage and parish church of Feliskirk in the county of York: and as such vicar, by some ancient endowment, or by prescription or immemorial usage, had ever since been, and then was entitled to receive all the tithes yearly arising in the parish, or the titheable places thereof, except the tithes of corn, hay, and wood; and further stating that the Appellant Heneage Elsley was the owner of a mansion house and hereditaments situate within the parish thereof, called Mount St. John, which in and since the year 1792, the Appellant Heneage Elsley had demised to the persons therein named, (and amongst others the Appellant Henry Barton,) or the same had been occupied by the Appellant Heneage Elsley himself; and further stating that in and since 1792, such successive occupiers thereof had had divers titheable matters and things (besides corn, hay, and wood,) upon the premises called Mount St. John, the tithes of which ought to have been set out for the Respondent as vicar, but that the same had been subtracted from him; and praying that an account might be taken under the decree of the Court, of the tithes of the several titheable matters and things had and taken by the persons therein named, and by the Appellants, Heneage Elsley and Henry Barton, respectively, in and from the year 1792; and that the Appellants might be decreed to answer and satisfy what should be coming due to him from them respectively, upon the taking of such account.

The Appellants appeared and put in their answer to the bill, and thereby stated, amongst other things, that they did not believe that the Respondent was entitled, by the means in the bill mentioned or other-[96]-wise, to any tithes yearly arising upon the estate or district of land in question; they thereby farther stated that there was a certain estate or district of land situate within the parish of Feliskirk, called or known by the name of Mount St. John, or the Mount Ring, which consisted of a mansion house, and the several parcels of land particularly specified in the Appellants' answer, and of which the mansion house and hereditaments mentioned in the Respondent's bill were parcel; that the said estate or district of land was formerly parcel of the possessions of the late hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, in England, which was dissolved, and the possessions whereof were given to the crown by stat. 32 H. 8. c. 24. intituled "An Act concerning the possessions of St. John of Jerusalem, in England and Ireland."

They contended that the said estate or district of land was by composition, prescription, or some other lawful ways and means, held and enjoyed by the prior and brethren of the hospital at the time of the dissolution thereof, discharged, as well in the hands of themselves as of their lessees or tenants, from the payment of all tithes, as well great as small; that the said estate or district of land came to the crown discharged from the payment of tithes by virtue of the stat. 32 H. 8. c. 24. and of another statute passed in the 31 H. 8. c. 13. intituled "An Act for dissolution of monasteries and abbeys," or one of them; that after the said estate or district of land came to the crown, the same was granted by King Henry the Eighth, in the thirty-fourth year of his reign, to Edward, then Archbishop of York, and his successors; and that the same had ever since belonged to the Archbishops of York for the time being, and had, by virtue of the said statutes, or one of them, [97] been holden and enjoyed by the said Archbishops, their lessees and tenants, discharged from the payment of all tithes, as well great as small; that no tithes arising upon the said estate or district of land, nor any satisfaction in lieu of such tithes, had ever been paid to or received by any person or persons whomsoever, since the dissolution of the hospital, except the tithes recovered by the Respondent in the late suit * mentioned in the Appellants' answer, and the tithes of parts of the estate or district of land, which since the decree in such suit, which was made in the year 1815, had been rendered to the Respondent, but to which the Appellants believed and insisted the Respondent was not of right entitled.

They further stated by their answer that the Appellant Heneage Elsley had, ever since the year 1792, holden, and then held the estate or district of land as lessee under the Archbishop of York; and contended that the Respondent was not entitled to the tithes claimed by his bill, and they insisted that such tithes ought not to have been set out for him.

The Appellants afterwards put in a further answer relating to certain allotments under an inclosure act, and claiming the same exemption as to the lands allotted.

The Respondent having replied, and the cause being at issue, the Appellants proved the grant by Henry the Eighth, of the lands composing the district of Mount St. John, their identity, and the non-payment of tithe.

[98] On the part of the Respondent as evidence of the endowment of the vicarage of Feliskirk, it was proved by the inspeximus of an inquisition registered among the records in the Archbishop of York's registry, and produced by the deputy registrar of the Archbishop of York, that in the year 1314, the then Archbishop of York issued his mandate, directed to Andrew de Grymstone, then sequestrator in the Archdeaconry of Cleveland, commanding him upon the receipt thereof, without loss of time, to go to the church of St. Felix, and there by trusty men of that parish, with scrupulous diligence to inquire in what portions or profits the vicarage of the said church did then consist, and in possession of what profits William de Grymstone the last vicar thereof, was whilst he lived; and in the possession of what profits the other vicars, his predecessors, were since the time of the ordination of the said vicarage, and how much the profits to the said vicarage appertaining, were worth one year with another, according to the true value of the same, with directions to certify thereupon distinctly and openly before the octaves of St. Martin; that the sequestrator, by virtue of his mandate, went personally to the church of St. Felix, and by trusty and wise men of that parish, made due and diligent inquisition upon the premises; by which he found, amongst other things, that the vicar of the church of St. Felix ought to receive the tithe of wool and lambs of the whole parish, and that it was worth, one year with another, 100s.; the lent tithes, and the three oblations in the year were worth, one year with another, five marks; the white tithe was worth, per annum, 16s.; the tithe of hens, ducks, and pigs, was worth, per annum, 20s.; the tithe of hemp, flax, and gardens was worth, per annum, 20s.; the tithe of calves, pullets, and bees, was worth, per an-[99]-num, 6s.; and that it was to be known that the vicar ought to receive all other tithes to the said church in any wise belonging, excepting only the tithe of corn, and the tithe of hay, which the master and brethren of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem received as rectors; but that all the vicars had, ever since the time of the ordination of the vicarage, received all other tithes peaceably, and did so at that time, but they were bound to give their tithe of corn and hay.

It was also proved on the part of the Respondent, by the production of the minister's account, in the 32d year of the reign of Henry 8. that, at that time the master and brethren of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem were only entitled to the tithes of corn and hay of the parish of Feliskirk; and by the production of the grant of the 36th year of the reign of Henry 8. it was proved, that the tithes of corn and hay of the parish of Feliskirk only were granted to the then Archbishop of York and his successors; and by an indenture of lease, dated the 31st day of October, 1758, being a lease of Mount St. John, and other lands, from the Archbishop of York

* There had been a suit in the Exchequer by the vicar against other occupiers of Mount St. John; the Defendants in that case set up a title to the tithes. In 1816, Thompson, C. B., pronounced a decree for the Plaintiffs, being of opinion that no title to the tithes had been made out, but observing that the ground of exemption not having been taken, it was unnecessary to consider the validity of such a ground of defence.

to the ancestors of the Appellants, it was shewn that the small tithes of the district of Mount St. John were not granted to them.

The cause was heard before the Lord Chief Baron, on the 1st and 18th days of May, 1824.

On the 11th of November, 1824, the Chief Baron delivered the judgment of the Court, by which it was referred to one of the masters of the Court to take an account of the tithes of the several matters and things (except corn and hay) had and taken by the Appellants respectively, from and upon the lands and grounds called Mount St. John, or the Mount Ring, in the parish of Feliskirk, in their respective occupations, six years prior to the filing of the Respondent's bill: and it was further ordered and decreed by the Court, that what should be so found due from the Appellants respectively, upon the taking of such account, should be answered and paid by them respectively to the Respondent: and it was further ordered by the Court, that it should be, and it was thereby referred to the master to tax the Respondent his costs of the suit, so far as regarded the said Respondent's demand of the tithes, of which an account was thereinbefore decreed as aforesaid from the said Appellants; and that such costs, when taxed, should be paid by the Appellants to the Respondent, or his solicitor or clerk in Court: and it was also ordered and decreed by the Court, that the Respondent's bill, so far as it sought any account or demand of tithes, other than and beyond the tithes of which an account was thereinbefore decreed, should be, and the same was thereby dismissed out of Court, with costs to be taxed for the Appellants by the master, to whom it was thereby referred to tax the same: and it was further ordered, that such last-mentioned costs, when taxed, should be paid by the Respondent to the Appellant Heneage Elsley, or to his solicitor or clerk in Court.

The Appellants, considering themselves aggrieved, appealed against so much of this decree as ordered, adjudged, and decreed that it should be referred to the master to take an account of the tithes of the several matters and things (except corn and hay) had and taken by the Appellants respectively, from and upon the lands and grounds called Mount St. John, or the Mount Ring, in the parish of Feliskirk, in their respective occupations, six years prior to the filing of the Respondent's bill: and by which it was ordered and decreed that what should be so found due from [101] the Appellants respectively, upon the taking of such account, should be answered and paid by them respectively to the Respondent; and by which it was ordered, that it should be, and it was referred to the master to tax the Respondent his costs of this suit, so far as regarded the Respondent's demand of the tithes, of which an account was thereinbefore decreed as aforesaid from the Appellants; and that such costs, when taxed, should be paid by the Appellants to the Respondent, or to his solicitor or clerk in Court.

For the Appellants: Mr. Boteler and Mr. Bickersteth.

There was no evidence in the cause on the part of the Respondent, that he, as vicar of the parish of Feliskirk, was entitled to take any tithes whatsoever, arising upon the estate or district of land called Mount St. John (Arg. 23d and 26th March, 1827).

The defence is, that the lands of Mount St. John were held by the hospital tithe-free.

The absolute exemption or discharge from the payment of all tithes, as well great as small, arising upon that estate or district of land, insisted upon by the Appellants in their answers to the Respondent's bill, was fully proved by the evidence adduced in the cause.

The inquisition produced by the Respondent at the hearing of the cause, for the purpose of proving his right as vicar of the parish of Feliskirk, to all the tithes, except the tithes of corn, hay, and wood, of the district of Mount St. John, and of disproving the exemption or discharge from the payment of tithes for that district, insisted upon by the Appellants, could have no such effect: first, because the same was taken in the absence of the prior and brethren of the [102] hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, and of their lessees or tenants: and secondly, because the general terms in which this instrument speaks of the right of the vicar of the said parish to tithes, do not prove his right to the tithes of any particular estate or district of land in the parish from which the vicar has never received any tithes; nor are they in any way inconsistent with the fact of any particular estate or district of land in the parish being exempt or discharged from the payment of tithes (Carr v. Henton, 1 Aust. 313. n. 7 B. P. C. 100).

For the Respondents: Mr. Pepys and Mr. Koe.

The defence in the former suit was, a title to the tithes by grant. In this suit they claim by prescriptive exemption. The two defences are inconsistent. It might be a question whether these lands are capable, under the 31st Hen. 8. c. 13. of being discharged from tithes. A hospital was not privileged as a monastery. The exemption was supposed formerly, not to be attached to the lands, but to be personal to the ecclesiastical bodies. The exemption stands on the 21st sect. of 31 Hen. 8. c. 13. But the order of St. John of Jerusalem was dissolved by 32 Hen. 8. c. 24. In this act there is no such provision as in the 21st sect. of 31 Hen. 8. c. 13. It has been held, in similar cases, that such bodies were not exempt. Cornwallis v. Spurling (Cro. Jac. p. 57. Archb. of Cant. case, 2 Co. 46. Urrey v. Bowyer, 1 Gwill. 250. Whitton v. Weston, Latch. 89. Wi. Ent. 342. Godb. 392. W. Jo. 182. N. Bendl. 168, 185). Later cases have taken a different view.

According to the modern rule of prescription, there must be immemorial possession to the time of the dissolution, by a body capable of discharge, and subsequent non-payment. In this case the possession is short of the time of legal memory. Proof of payment [103] of tithes, or acquisition of the lands since the time of Ric. 1. destroys the ground of prescription.

The defence is still in substance, not exemption, but a claim by title, arising from the circumstance of the rectory and the lands being in the same hands. The hearsay of persons lately living is not to be put in competition with the evidence of such a document as the inquisition.

To send the question to an issue would be useless; because it arises upon the construction of an instrument, which it is the province of the Court to construe.

The Earl of Eldon (8th July, 1828): The question which your Lordships have to determine is, whether the owners of a certain part of the parish of Feliskirk, in the county of York, have a right to insist that they are exempted from the payment of small tithes to the vicar.

It appears that there was a former suit in the Court of Exchequer, on a bill filed in the year 1807.—That was a suit relating to these small tithes, in which the owners and occupiers of part of the parish of Feliskirk insisted that they were themselves entitled, as claiming under a sort of Collegiate Institution, called the Hospital of Saint John of Jerusalem, to the small tithes of this district. An instrument was produced from the archives of the Archbishop of York, which, it was insisted, proved that the vicar was entitled to receive many of the small tithes of that parish; and no doubt he was entitled to receive all the small tithes of this parish, unless it could be shewn that they were in somebody else. The suit to which I have first referred, was decided by a learned Judge of very great experience.—I mean the late Lord Chief Baron Thompson, and no man can name him, without stating [104] that few persons who have ever presided in that Court, possessed more ability and research, or were more fitted for the decision of such a question.—Upon the production of the instrument, from the archives of the Archbishop of York, he was decidedly of opinion, and in that the Court agreed with him, that that instrument proved that the vicar was entitled to the small tithes of this district of the parish, as well as those of the rest of the parish; but that at any rate it proved, that the title to enjoy the tithes by the owners of that district, themselves claiming under a grant to the hospital of Saint John of Jerusalem, was negatived by that instrument; and, therefore, that if they had any defence against the vicar, it must be a defence set up on another ground.—That produced the present suit.

In the present suit, the Appellants contend, that they have a right to prescribe non decimando, as claiming under a dissolved monastery. Whether that monastery was dissolved by the statute of the 31st Henry 8, or the 32d Henry 8, does not appear from the papers; but your Lordships will recollect, a considerable doubt has been raised, as to one of those statutes, whether it operates beneficially to those who claim the lands belonging to the monastery, or whether the claim is valid on behalf of laymen.

The right of the vicar depends entirely upon the same instrument, and that instrument, it has been contended at the bar, proves that there can be no such thing as a prescription non decimando; because it proves that the vicar himself was entitled to those tithes, though it may appear, that in modern times he has not taken these tithes. The Court of Exchequer has judicially asserted that the instrument proved that there was no positive title to the tithes in those who represented the monastery; that the vicar is entitled to the tithe, [105] and not the person who possessed that instrument; and it is impossible, in my opinion, to decide that that judgment is wrong. It is a mere question upon the construction of that instrument. It is, therefore, a question which necessarily is not sent to a jury; because the construction of an instrument belongs more to the Court than to the jury, who may certainly infer what they think proper from the payment or non-payment of tithe; but if that instrument proves that which Lord Chief Baron Thompson thought it did prove, it is impossible that the case of the Appellants can be supported by it.

When this cause came under the consideration of the Court of Exchequer, in the second instance, they were of opinion that the construction put on that instrument, by Lord Chief Baron Thompson, was the proper construction, and that the vicar was entitled to these tithes.—It is very difficult, perhaps, for any one to say that any instrument of this kind will not bear a good deal of criticism, which may give rise to some degree of doubt: but looking to the opinion of the several learned Judges well versed in the construction of instruments of this nature, who have concurred in their opinion with respect to the legal bearing of this instrument, I certainly cannot advise your Lordships to consider both those judgments as erroneous.—If the first was not wrong, (and from that decree there was no appeal,) the second was not wrong; I am of opinion that they were both right, and that you ought to affirm this decree. I therefore move that this decree be affirmed—I would not propose to give any costs.

Judgment affirmed, without costs.

IRELAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

MICHAEL COLLINS,—Appellant: The Reverend CHARLES HARE,—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. vii. 218, S. C. 1 Dow and Cl. 139.]

A., an army agent in Dublin, having effected a policy of insurance on his own life for £3000, in 1819, by an informal instrument, attested by two witnesses, assigned the policy to C., who had been for many years his confidential clerk. From the time of the assignment A. paid two-thirds, and C. one-third of the premium. In 1821, by a more formal instrument, drawn up by a professional person, he executed a further assignment of the policy. In the first instrument, the consideration expressed for the assignment is, "regard and affection;" in the second, "friendship and affection." The last assignment was drawn up by the Attorney of C., and both the instruments were drawn up and executed, without the knowledge of A.'s family.

By a codicil to his will, A. gave to C. a legacy of £100, as a further mark of his regard and affection. Upon the death of A., a letter addressed to his son was found enclosed in his will, stating that the assignment had been extorted from him by C., by threats and undue influence.

Upon a bill filed by H., as executor of A., to set aside the assignment on the ground of fraud, and undue influence, C. by his answer claimed the interest under the assignment, as a compensation given to him by A., in the place of an increase of salary. Upon the depositions it appeared in evidence that C. had given different accounts of the object of the policy, viz. that it was effected as a provision for the wife of A., and that it had been given to him, for making up the accounts of A., in a way to deceive government.

It appeared also in proof of the charge of influence, that C. had declared when the codicil was in contemplation, that none should be executed unless he chose: and when the letter was found in the will, that he said he could ruin the credit of the house and the character of the testator. Upon this, and other [107] evidence, an issue was directed at the instance of the Defendant, to try whether the assignments as to two thirds of the sum insured, were the free and voluntary acts of the testator, or extorted from him by threats or undue influence, or obtained by fraud: the Defendant, upon the trial of this issue was to produce the deeds of assignment, and the attesting witnesses.

Upon the trial of the issue, the letter found enclosed in the will was tendered in evidence by the Plaintiff: but rejected. The deeds of assignment and the attesting witnesses were produced by the Defendant: but the Plaintiff declined proving them, and the witnesses were not examined, and the deeds not proved by either party, but other evidence was given nearly similar to that which appears upon the depositions in equity on the part of the Plaintiff. The Defendant produced no witnesses: whereupon the jury found that, in the event of any assignment having been made, as to two-thirds thereof, it was obtained by undue influence.

A motion to set aside this verdict, and grant a new trial, was refused, and upon a re-hearing, a decree was made in favour of the Plaintiff.

This decree was affirmed on appeal.

The Respondent in 1824 exhibited his original bill in Chancery, in Ireland, against the Appellant, and also against the corporation of the Royal Exchange Assurance of London, stating that John Atkinson, in April, 1819, being desirous, in the event of his death, to secure a competency for his wife, effected a policy of insurance on his life, with the Royal Exchange Assurance of London, for the sum of £3000, and thereupon paid the annual premium for the first year: that John Atkinson had been for many years an army agent, and that the Appellant was his chief and confidential clerk, and in such capacity obtained his implicit confidence, and exercised an almost unbounded influence over him: that John Atkinson continued to the time of his death, to pay the premium on the po-[108]-licy, and that the sum insured formed a principal part of the assets of John Atkinson: that the Appellant had the care of the books of J. Atkinson, and access to all his papers, and had obtained the possession of the policy, and of other papers, books, and vouchers, of the testator, and had taken copies thereof, which he refused to give up to the Respondent: that the Appellant, during the last years of J. A.'s life, had complete dominion over his office, and all the papers and documents therein, J. A. having been, from extreme ill health and infirmity of body, unable to attend to business, or even to take care of his private affairs, and having during such the period of his illness and debility, confided all his affairs, books, and papers to the Appellant: that in such his disability for business, John Atkinson was in the habit of signing and subscribing any such papers as Appellant required him, without reading or being particularly apprized of the contents thereof: and that, feeling himself in his then situation to be much in the power of Appellant, he did not, nor could refuse, to do any act required of him by the Appellant.

The bill further stated that John Atkinson died on the 30th of October, 1823, having made and published his will, bearing date the 29th of August, 1823, and appointed the Respondent sole executor: and that he had since proved the will, in the Court of Prerogative in Ireland, and taken upon himself the execution thereof: that shortly after the death of John Atkinson, a letter from him, dated the 15th of October, 1823, was found enclosed in his will, directed to his son, John Atkinson the younger, in the following words, videlicet:—

“My dearest John, as you have told me that you know I have insured my life, through one of the [109] office-keepers, who called for payment for £131, for the policy of insurance, and have asked me in my dying bed, what has become of it, I cannot refuse but tell you the truth, that it was extorted from me by Mr. Michael Collins, by threats and undue influence: the policy for which I pay, is for £2000. (Signed.) John Atkinson.”

The bill then proceeded to state that the policy being in the hands of the Appellant, at the time of the death of the testator, and the testator having kept the state of his affairs secret from the members of his family, the Respondent was entirely ignorant of the existence of the policy, or its amount; but that in consequence of the letter, the Respondent applied to the agent of the corporation in the city of Dublin, when he discovered that it was effected for the sum of £3000; that on the 3d of November, 1823, the Respondent caused a notice to be served on the Appellant, requiring him to surrender the policy of assurance for £3000, which the testator effected upon his life; and on the 24th of the same month, he served the Royal Exchange Assurance Company with notice not to pay the £3000, or any part thereof to the Appellant: that the Appellant refused to deliver up the policy, alleging that he was entitled to the whole of the proceeds.

The Respondent by his bill charged, that the policy had not been at all assigned to the Appellant, or if an assignment was made, that it was obtained by means of fraud, misrepresentation, and undue influence, and without any consideration; that the Appellant had himself confessed that he was only entitled to one-third part of the policy, the remaining two-thirds being a trust for the testator, and the Respondent, as his executor: as evidence whereof, the Respondent charged, that subsequently to the alleged [110] assignment, and down to the time of his death, the testator continued to pay two-thirds of the premium on the policy, and it was admitted and declared, by the Appellant, that the testator paid the premium on two-thirds, and was the owner of two-third parts thereof, he only claiming to be entitled to one-third.

The bill prayed, that the Royal Exchange Assurance Company might be restrained, by the injunction of the Court, from paying over to the Appellant the amount of the policy, and that they might also bring into Court the sum of £3000, to abide the decree of the Court; and that it might be decreed to be part of the assets of the testator; and that the assignment (if any) might be set aside, and decreed to be null and void, or a trust for Respondent, or might stand as a security only for the sum due thereon (if any) to the Appellant; and that the Appellant might be restrained from proceeding at law on the foot of the policy against the Assurance Company.

The Respondent by his bill also prayed an account on the foot of the transactions between the Appellant and the testator, which account was waived, on the hearing of the cause.

The Appellant, in February, 1821, answered the bill; he admitted that the testator effected the policy on the 20th of April, 1819, and claimed to be entitled to the entire benefit of the policy, under two assignments made to him by the testator: the first bearing date the 23rd of April, 1819, and the second bearing date the 21st of April, 1821. He admitted that he had paid one-third only of the premium on the policy after the first assignment, and that John Atkinson had paid the remaining two-thirds yearly; he alleged that the assignments were respectively made to him, by the testator, in order to make a provision for him, and in consideration of the valuable services [111] rendered by him as clerk to the testator. The Appellant also by his answer admitted that he had taken in the testator's lifetime, and had in his possession abstracts from the books of account of the testator, which did not relate to the Defendant's private account, and that he had at all times access to, and the chief management and control of the testator's books of military accounts.

He relied on these allegations of his answer, and on a codicil made by the testator in his last illness, the day before the date of the letter to his son, whereby a legacy of £100 was left to the Defendant to be paid on the settlement and discharge of the accounts of the house.

On the 1th of March, 1821, an application was made to the Court on behalf of the Respondent for an injunction to restrain the Appellant from receiving, and the then Defendants, the Royal Exchange Assurance Company of London, from paying over to the Appellant the sum of £3000, the amount of the policy, which was ordered accordingly.

By a consent order, dated the 23d of June, 1821, one-third of the amount of the policy was paid over to the Appellant by the Royal Exchange Insurance Company, and the remaining two thirds were vested in stock in the name of the Accountant-General to the credit of the cause; the Defendants, the Royal Exchange Assurance Company, were struck out of the bill, and the bill was amended under the consent order accordingly.

The first assignment, dated the 19th of April, 1819, was by an instrument signed, sealed, and attested by two witnesses, expressed thus: "I do hereby assign all my right, title, and interest in the policy of assurance, etc. (describing it) to Mr. Michael Collins, [112] of, etc., as a mark of my affection and regard for him; and I do hereby authorize and empower the directors of the Royal Exchange, Insurance Company, etc. to pay to the said Michael Collins, or his assigns, the sum of £3000, payable by them, etc. In witness, etc. (signed) John Atkinson."

The second instrument, dated the 21st of April, 1821, was a regular indenture of further assignment of the same policy:—J. A. granting it to M. C., for divers good causes and considerations, from the friendship and regard which he bore to M. C., and also in consideration of five shillings.

By the depositions in the cause, it was proved that the testator had for some years before his death been in a weak and infirm state of health, and incapable of attending to his affairs as closely as he used to do; that the Appellant had been the confidential clerk and book-keeper of the testator; that he had a considerable influence over him; that he made the entries, wrote the letters, and took and kept abstracts from the accounts of the house; that the testator signed letters and other documents which were presented to him by the Appellant, without reading them; that the Appellant boasted of the power he had over the testator, and the services he had rendered to the testator in the manner in which he made up his accounts with the government, and that by means of these accounts and his knowledge of them, he had Mr. Atkinson in his power, and that he could ruin the house and the private character of the testator; that the Appellant declared that the assignments of the policy were granted to him for making up the general accounts in a way to deceive government; that the Appellant had, up to the year 1818, a salary of £200; that in the year of 1818, the salary was increased to £300 a [113] year, and continued at that sum to the testator's death; that the average profit of the office of the testator was in 1818, about £748, in 1819, about £567, in 1822, did not exceed £100, and that in the year 1823 it was not sufficient to pay the Appellant's salary.

It was also proved that the testator left his family in very narrow circumstances, at the time of his death; that the Appellant had offered, after the testator's death, to give up the policy, and said that he had a deed prepared for that purpose; that the Appellant boasted that the testator could not make a codicil to his will, without his consenting to it. Proof was also admitted, that the letter dated the 15th of October, 1823, was of testator's hand-writing, and found with his will and codicil, and that after the testator's death, it was read in the presence and hearing of the Appellant; it also appeared in proof, that the assignments of the policy were executed by the testator, without the knowledge of his professional adviser, who was usually employed and consulted by him in all law affairs, and without the knowledge of any of the members of his family; and that the Appellant had said, when asked about the insurance in the lifetime of the testator, that it was an insurance for the benefit of the testator's wife.*

The cause was heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland; and on the 28th of April, 1825, his Lordship pronounced an order, that the Respondent should forthwith commence a feigned action in the Court of King's Bench, in Ireland, against the Appellant, to [114] which the Appellant was forthwith to appear and plead the general issue, and admit all matters of form, and that the question to be tried, should be the issue following, to wit, "whether the assignments of the 23d of April, 1819, and the 21st of April, 1821, were, as to two-thirds of the sum insured, the free and voluntary acts of the testator, or whether the same were extorted from him by threats and undue influence, or obtained from him under any circumstances of fraud; and it was further ordered, that the Defendant Michael Collins, should be under the terms of producing on such trial the assignments, and the witnesses thereto, and also the person who drew the assignment of the 21st of April, 1821; and the Judge before whom such trial should be so had, was thereby desired to certify to the Court the verdict that should be given; and further directions were reserved until the return of the Judge's certificate.

The feigned action was tried before the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's

* The substance only of the evidence is shortly stated. It appears more fully in the argument, and the Lord Chancellor's speech on moving Judgment.

Bench, in Ireland, when the jury found a verdict for the Respondent, and the Chief Justice certified that the issue was tried before him and a special jury of the county of the City of Dublin, on the 1th day of July, 1825, when the jury by their verdict found, "that in the event of any assignments having been made by the deceased, they were (as to two-thirds of the sum insured by the policy of insurance, therein mentioned,) obtained by undue influence."

Upon the trial the Appellant produced the deeds of assignment, the attesting witnesses, and the attorney who prepared the second deed. But the counsel for the Respondent declined proving the deeds, or examining the witnesses. The assignments were not proved by either party: and the Appellant [115] conceiving, that for want of such proof, the Respondent had failed to establish his case, did not call witnesses, which, as he alleged, he had in attendance.

Under these circumstances a motion was made before the Lord Chancellor, on behalf of the Appellant, that the verdict should be set aside, and a new trial directed, on the grounds that the verdict was against evidence, and against the charge of the Judge, and without a sufficient investigation of the facts bearing upon the issues directed to be tried, and because the verdict under the circumstances in which it was delivered could not give satisfaction to the Court.

By an order of the 3d of December, the motion was refused, with costs.

The cause was heard on the Judge's certificate, on the 16th of February, 1826, when, on the application of counsel on behalf of the Appellant, it was ordered that the Defendant should be at liberty to petition forthwith for a re-hearing, and the cause having been accordingly reheard on the 2d of March, 1826, it was decreed, that the assignments of the policy of insurance, dated respectively the 23d of April, 1819, and 21st of April, 1821, so far as they related to two-thirds of the policy, were fraudulent and void, and that the sum of £1818 6s. 10d., 3½ per cent. stock, and the sum of £95 9s. 3d. cash then remaining in the Bank, to the credit of the cause, being the produce of two-thirds of the said policy of insurance, were part of the assets of the testator, John Atkinson, deceased, and that the Respondent was entitled to his costs of the suit, both at law and in equity, and the Respondent, waiving the accounts, prayed by his bill, that the Accountant General should transfer to the Respondent, or his attorney thereto lawfully authorized, the sum of £1818 6s. 10d., 3½ [116] per cent. stock, and should also draw in favour of Respondent, or his attorney thereto lawfully authorized, for the sum of £95 9s. 3d. so remaining in the Bank to the credit of the cause.

From the decretal order of the 28th of April, 1825, the order of the 3d of December, 1825, and the decree of the 2d of March, 1826, the Defendant in the Court below appealed to the Lords in Parliament.

For the Appellant: Mr. Horne and Mr. Bethell.

Ascendancy of a servant over his master ought not to be presumed to result from the relation between them; the nature of the transaction, and its circumstances in the manner and order of their occurrence are such as not only do not afford any internal evidence or ground for suspicion of fraud, but give the strongest confirmation to the sworn statements of the Appellant in his answer, and lead to a contrary conclusion: and therefore the Court ought not to have acted except on direct testimony of actual fraud. No evidence was adduced by the Respondent on the hearing of the cause in equity, which proved a case of fraud against the Appellant, in obtaining the assignments in question from the testator.

The Respondent's case, as made by the bill, rests upon the allegations of an undue advantage taken of the mental weakness of the deceased, which had been occasioned by bodily infirmity. But his witnesses, on the contrary, agreed, that the deceased was in the enjoyment of good health at the time of this transaction; and laboured under no weakness of mind from that or any other cause:—it appears, that his soundness of understanding and attention to and control over his business continued unimpaired till within a [117] few months previous to his decease. If, however, a solemn instrument be impeached on the ground of the grantor's incapacity, or of fraud, the fact should be proved by evidence directly relating to the transaction. The rest of the Respondent's evidence consists of the letter of the testator, of the 15th of October, 1823, and the testimony of his witnesses, as to the language of the Appellant, at the meeting of Mr. Atkinson's relations on the day of his decease.

The letter was not admissible in evidence; and, if admissible, ought not, under the circumstances of this case to have been received in a Court of Equity. The false and contradictory account it gives of the transaction, and its inconsistency with the feelings of kindness and bounty towards the Appellant, which are manifested by the testator, in his codicil of the same date, render it impossible to believe that it was the deliberate and voluntary act of the deceased. With respect to the language imputed to the Appellant by the Respondent's witnesses, a Court of Equity ought not to have used it as a ground of judicial inference: because a decision ought not to be founded upon facts which are not put in issue in the cause, especially in a Court of Equity, where the injustice of so doing will become more evident from advertg to the nature of the proceedings, and the mode of examination of witnesses established in such courts. But, independently of this general principle of justice, any inconsiderate expressions, such as are imputed to him by the evidence in this cause, regard being had to the occasion when they are stated to have been used, and there being in answer to the threats and imputations cast upon him, cannot be judicially taken against him as an admission of a fact, which, on all other grounds, it is impossible to believe. [118] Such evidence, therefore, ought not to have influenced the Court in directing the issue; nor ought a verdict, which was founded on such evidence alone, to have been satisfactory to it.

Admitting this to be a case where the Court ought not to have refused an issue, it was incumbent on the Court to have provided with certainty, that both the form and language of the issue, and the manner and circumstances of the trial, should be such as to bring the true points in the cause before the jury, which cannot be gathered either from this issue or the trial. But, in fact, regard being had to the nature of the case, and the evidence properly admissible in the cause, no issue ought to have been directed, but the bill ought to have been dismissed with costs, against the Appellant.

The letter of the testator was not admissible to destroy the effect of his own deed. It was rejected at law, and ought not to have been admitted in equity. The letter is contradicted by the codicil, dated almost at the same moment, and giving a legacy to the Defendant, as a farther mark of regard and esteem. The deed of assignment contained no covenant binding the testator to continue the payment of the premiums, yet he continued them to his death. The son knew of the assignment before the death of the father, and might have interposed; at all events there should have been a new trial. As the matter stands, there is no proof of any assignment, and the principal witnesses to the transaction have not been examined.

For the Respondent: Mr. Sugden and Mr. Spence.

The decree of the 28th of April, 1825, is well warranted by the principles and practice of Courts [119] of Equity, and the particular nature of the case itself. There was proof sufficient made by the Plaintiff in the equity cause, to sustain a decree for setting aside the assignments relied upon by the Appellant as to two-third parts of the policy of insurance, and the issue directed was for the purpose of satisfying the conscience of the Lord Chancellor as to the proofs so made. The direction of issues in such a case is conformable to the principles and practice of Courts of Equity. The Appellant did not object to the issue as directed, but asked for it in preference to a decree against him which would have been pronounced had he declined the issue. The order of the 3d of December, 1825, was right, inasmuch as the verdict was conformable to law and to justice, was founded upon cogent evidence, and not contradicted by any evidence on the Appellant's part. The decree of the 2d of March, 1826, is warranted by the verdict, as well as by the proofs and pleadings in the cause.

It would be against public policy, and the principles of equity to affirm instruments obtained clandestinely by a clerk from his employer without consideration, and in both instances kept concealed from the confidential attorney and friend, and also the relatives of the grantor.

The expression in the codicil of regard and affection follows the name of another legatee, which is coupled with that of the Defendant, and the codicil itself is impeached. It was the business of the Defendant on the trial to prove the assignment. He refrained, from fear of cross-examination. The attesting witnesses probably knew of nothing but the execution.

The Lord Chancellor: This appeal is principally, if not entirely, on a question of fact. The counsel for [120] the Defendant not being satisfied with the opinion of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, an issue was directed.

The case came on for trial before the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench. The jury gave a verdict corresponding with the opinion of the Lord Chancellor. An application was then made for a new trial, and after hearing counsel for several days, the new trial was refused. Under these circumstances it would require a satisfactory case to rescind the decision.

The question arises upon the assignment of a policy of assurance. (Here the Lord Chancellor stated briefly some of the facts of the case.) The assignment was executed in private, and attested by two witnesses; but they probably knew nothing of the transaction. (Here the Lord Chancellor read the assignment of 1819.) This was done in 1819. In 1821 another assignment was executed in a more formal manner, by deed regularly drawn and prepared obviously by a professional person. Why a second assignment was executed does not appear.

In 1823 Collins was taken into the partnership. On that occasion letters commendatory of Collins were sent to their correspondents. But it appears that Collins, who had great control and influence over Atkinson, was in the habit of writing letters and accounts which were signed by Atkinson without investigation. It appears also that a few days before Atkinson's death a codicil was drawn up under the influence of Collins, by which £100 was given to him, as in the codicil it was expressed, as a further mark of esteem. On the death of Atkinson, a letter addressed to his son, alleging that the assignment was extorted, was found inclosed in his will. (Here the Lord Chancellor read the letter.) The policy was [121] for £3000; the premium for £2000, was paid by Atkinson, for £1000 by Collins.

These are the facts of the case up to the death of Atkinson, and they furnish many circumstances of strong suspicion: in the first place the motive for the assignment of the policy was put by Collins, on the ground of inadequacy of salary, and further remuneration; but it turned out that in 1818 the salary was £200: from that time it was £300 per annum: and during the same period the profits of the business varied from £800 per annum downwards, and in one year it was a losing concern. Under these circumstances it is extraordinary to say that the concern was sufficient to afford a larger salary than £300, or that the policy could have been assigned for that reason. In the next place it is singular that a second assignment of the policy, prepared by a professional man, should have been executed, nobody being called in on the part of Atkinson. The gentleman who had always been consulted by the testator, proved that he was not consulted on this occasion: the whole transaction was kept secret. But a fellow clerk had heard that this insurance had been effected, and questioned Collins on the subject, who said that it was a little provision for the testator's wife: and while the codicil was under preparation, a few days before the death of the testator, Captain Atkinson, his son, having complained of delay, the Defendant turned round to the clerk and said, no codicil should be executed unless he chose. This is a material fact, and there is other evidence that the testator acted under the control of Collins, the clerk. When the letter was discovered, after the death of Atkinson, a conversation took place in which Collins said that he could destroy the credit of the house by producing the public ac-[122]counts. It appears that the Appellant had Atkinson under his influence, by the manner of keeping these public accounts; which was the cause of executing the assignment, and also the codicil giving £100 to Collins as a further mark of approbation.

Upon the urgency of counsel an issue was directed. The case was heard before the Lord Chief Justice: witnesses for the Plaintiff were examined: Collins's counsel called no witnesses. The jury, under the direction of the Lord Chief Justice, found for the Plaintiff. The Lord Chief Justice directed the jury, "that as neither party had proved the instruments, or examined the attesting witnesses, or the person who drew the last assignment, they could know nothing of the contents or the facts attending the executions or the consideration, except what might be collected from the conversations in the presence of both parties, which had been given in evidence: and that the question which arose upon that evidence was, whether Atkinson executed the assignment under an apprehension communicated or suggested to him by the Defendant: that the Defendant had it in his power to destroy his character, and ruin the credit of his house, by exposing frauds in the public accounts of the house with government, kept by the Defendant for the deceased: and that he would do so unless those policies were assigned to him, etc. Upon this direction the jury found that in the event of any assignment having been made by Atkinson, etc., it was obtained by undue influence." The evidence before the jury consisted of admissions by Collins, which might have been the foundation of the verdict. It was suggested that the Lord Chief Justice was not satisfied with the verdict. [123] But from the conversation which he had with Lord Manners, it appears that he was satisfied.

In point of form there is some objection. The assignment was not produced in evidence; but it was competent to the Defendant to prove it. The real question was in substance tried on that occasion, and it is not sufficient to reverse such a decision that there is some defect in point of form. An issue is to inform the conscience of the Judge who directs it, and if he has all the evidence before him, an omission to prove an instrument upon the trial of the issue, is not a ground to direct a new trial, especially as the Lord Chief Justice was satisfied.

Taking all the evidence together, I should have concurred with the jury. The matter was originally heard at great length in equity, upon a question of fact, which has been duly investigated, and the verdict of a jury corresponded with the opinion of the Judge in equity. The case coming back again, was thoroughly sifted and examined upon a re-hearing.

Under these circumstances it would require a very strong case to reverse such a decision. My opinion is, upon the facts in evidence, that the judgment is right, and, unless some doubt were expressed on the question, I should move that the judgment be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed, with £100 costs.

ENGLAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

W. R. P. TYLNEY LONG WELLESLEY and others, infants, by their next friend,— Appellants; The Hon W. POLE TYLNEY LONG WELLESLEY.—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. vii. 1487; S. C. 1 Dow and Cl. 152; in Court of Chancery, sub nom. Wellesley v. Duke of Beaufort, 1827, 2 Russ. 1. Commented in In re Goldsworthy, 1876, 2 Q. B. D. 82; and see In re Agar-Ellis, 1883, 24 Ch. D. 323; Guardianship of Infancy Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 27); Custody of Children Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 3); In re Newton (Infants), (1896), 1 Ch. 740; In re A. and B. (Infants), (1897), 1 Ch. 786; In re X., (1899), 1 Ch. 526.]

The Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to appoint a guardian for infants, being Wards of the Court, excluding the father; and upon evidence that the father was living in a state of adultery, and had encouraged his children in swearing, keeping low company, etc.; it was held a fit case to exercise the power to exclude him from the guardianship.

The question upon this appeal was, whether the Appellant, jure paterno, was intitled to the custody of his children, or whether the Court of Chancery had jurisdiction to deprive him of that custody, and to appoint another guardian for the children; and whether that jurisdiction, if it existed, was properly exercised under the following state of circumstances.

The Appellant, in 1812, married Catherine Pole Tylney Long. By the settlement made upon the marriage, £13,000 a year was settled upon her as pin-money, and, subject to that annuity, her lands in fee-simple were settled upon the Appellant for life. The lands to which she was intitled in fee-tail, under the will of Sir James Long, were settled upon the Appellant during the joint lives of himself and his wife. Out of these lands, portions for the younger children were to be raised, under an appointment made [125] by Mrs Wellesley, according to a power vested in her by the will. Subject to these portions the lands vested in the eldest son, as tenant in tail upon the death of Mrs. Wellesley.

In 1821 the Appellant, accompanied by his wife and family, went abroad, to avoid his creditors, and there he formed an adulterous connexion with Mrs. Helena Bligh, which caused a separation between him and his wife. He continued to reside and cohabit with Mrs. Bligh at Paris. Mrs. Wellesley, in 1824, proceeded to England, taking with her, by his permission, a daughter and two sons, the issue of the marriage. In 1825 proceedings for a divorce were commenced by Mrs. Wellesley in the Ecclesiastical Court; and a bill in Chancery was also filed by her direction, to make her infant children wards of the Court, with a view to prevent their abduction by force or stratagem, on the part of the Appellant.

In September, 1825, Mrs. Wellesley died, having committed her children to the care of her sisters, the Misses Long, with a death-bed request that they would not permit the Appellant to get possession of them. On the 30th of September a bill was filed in the name of the infants by their next friend, against the persons having the legal estate in property which they held in trust for the infants, praying the usual accounts; that the portions of the younger children might be raised; and that a proper person might be appointed to have the care of the persons of the three infants, during their minorities, with an allowance for their maintenance.

After the death of Mrs. Wellesley, the Appellant applied to the Misses Long, and requested them to deliver the children to his custody, which they refused. In October, 1825, he procured a writ of habeas corpora from the Court of King's Bench, [126] which was served on the solicitor of the Misses Long. On the 3d of November, and before the return of the writ, a petition was presented to the Lord Chancellor in the names of the infants, to restrain him from prosecuting the writ; and in consequence of an opinion expressed by the Lord Chancellor, that he could not have the custody of the infants while he was abroad, he desisted from prosecuting the writ.

In November, 1825, the Appellant, being still abroad, presented a petition praying a reference to one of the Masters of the Court, to approve of a plan for the education of the infants, and a suitable establishment for their residence.

On the 9th of November, the Lord Chancellor made an order of reference as to a plan of education, and an establishment for residence; and that the Master should approve of a proper person to act as guardian to the infants, and "state to the Court what relations, other than their father, the infants had, etc. etc.; and that the Appellant should be restrained from interfering with the infants, etc."

On the 14th of December, the Appellant presented a petition, stating his intention to reside in England where he then was, and claiming, as the father and natural guardian, the custody of the infants, and the management of their education. The petition prayed, "that the order of the 9th of November, 1825, might be rescinded, and that the Misses Long might on a day to be named deliver over the infants to their father."

In support of this petition, and in opposition to it, various affidavits were filed, which, as to many of the allegations, were directly contradictory. After argument, additional affidavits on both sides were filed upon the suggestion of the Lord Chancellor.

In the meantime the adulterous intercourse between [127] the Appellant and Mrs. Bligh continued, and damages had been recovered in an action for crim. con. by the husband against the Appellant.

In January, 1827, one petition again came on for hearing. The evidence consisted of affidavits to the number of forty; letters from the Appellant to his children and his wife; and from her to him, and others.

The case made against the Appellant upon this evidence was general ill treatment of his wife, an adulterous connexion continuing to the time of making the order and the encouragement of the children in habits of swearing, and keeping low company. Letters were produced, written by the Appellant to his sons, in one of which, in the midst of much good moral advice, he says, "If the fellow be a sportsman who told you, etc., damn his infernal soul to hell;" In another, "study hard, but as soon as you have completed your tasks, go out, in all weathers, and play hell and Tommy, etc., chase cats, dogs, and women, old and young, but spare my game." In another letter, written to the tutor of his sons, complaining of the interference of Mrs. Wellesley and her sisters, whom he suspected of being fanatical, or over-religious, he says, "there are certain things which ought to be let alone, a man and his children ought to be allowed to go to the devil their own way, if he pleases."

On the 1st of February, the Lord Chancellor made an order, by which, reciting that the affidavits, filed in the matter of the petition, to the number of forty, had been read, he ordered that it should be referred to the Master, to enquire and report to what person or persons (other than the Appellant,) the custody of the infants, and the care of their maintenance and education should be committed, etc., and that the Appellant, and all other persons should be restrained from removing, or attempting to remove the infants, [128] or any of them, from the care and custody of the Misses Long, etc.

Against this order the appeal was presented.

For the Appellant: Mr. Horne, Mr. Brougham, (and Mr. Beames).

For the Respondents: The Attorney General and Mr. Pepys.*

Lord Redesdale (4th July, 1828): I have given to this case all the attention which it is possible for me to give; and I have not the slightest hesitation in saying, that I think the order which has been pronounced in the Court below, ought to be affirmed, supposing that Court had authority to make the order. I am also of opinion that the Court is authorized to make such an order, according to all the principles that have been acted upon, from the earliest period down to the present time.

What is the ground on which the opposition is made to this order? The opposition is founded on the right of the father to have the care and custody of his children. That right is not disputed by the order; but the question is, whether the father having that right, is to be at liberty to abuse that right. That is the real question. Why is the parent entrusted with the care of his children? Because it is generally supposed he will best execute the trust reposed in him: for that it is a trust, of all trusts the most sacred, none of your Lordships can doubt.

If a guardian is appointed under the statute, which enables the father to appoint a guardian, the counsel at the bar have not disputed that that is a trust: it is a [129] delegated trust: a trust, which the law has enabled the father, when he ceases to live, to give to others for the benefit of his children: but if the father abuses that trust, if he appoints improper persons to be the guardians of his children, is it doubted, that a court of justice can interfere, and can prevent that misapplication of the power, which is given to the father? If, on the contrary, the father meant well to execute the trust, but has been deceived, and has appointed for the purpose a person improper to be entrusted with the care of the children, is it questioned, or has it been questioned at the bar, that some Court, or that the Court which has made this order, has a right to interfere, to control the conduct of the person so delegated by the will of the father?

I apprehend, it is impossible to say that the father has that absolute right, which is contended for at the bar. What are the grounds on which the custody of the children is given to the father? First, protection, then care and education. Is it not clear, that if the father does not give that protection, does not maintain the child, that the law interferes, for the purpose of compelling the maintenance of that child? Is it not clear, that if the father cruelly treats the child in any manner, that a court of criminal jurisdiction will interfere, for the purpose of preventing that treatment? Is it to be said then, there is no jurisdiction whatsoever in this country, that can control the conduct of the father in the education of his children? If a stranger was to enter into this house, and hear what was argued on that subject, would it not strike him with astonishment that the law of this country should not have provided for such a case?

We find that now, for a hundred and fifty years, the Court of Chancery has assumed an authority with [130] respect to the care of infants: and it has assumed that authority, to the extent in which it was assumed, for this reason: as long as the feudal tenures remained, generally speaking, infants who had lost their parents, were under the protection of the law which then existed, with respect to the treatment and the care of the children. When that was at an end, it was thought fit, by a particular statute, to enable the father to make an appointment of a guardian for his children, giving to him the power which that statute gave, to select proper persons for that purpose. As I observed before, if he makes an improper selection, if the person whom he has so selected, misconduct himself, it is perfectly clear, that a power has been assumed to control that conduct.

Now, upon what does Lord Somers, upon what does Lord Nottingham, upon what does Lord Hardwicke, upon what ground does every Chancellor who has been sitting on the bench, in the Court of Chancery since that time, place the jurisdiction? They all say, that it is a right which devolves to the Crown, as pater patriæ, and that it is the duty of the Crown to see that the child is properly taken care of.

We all know that many jurisdictions are given to the Crown, many powers are given to the Crown; but those powers are all to be exercised by responsible ministers. It is not the king who takes on himself to determine who is to be a proper guardian of the children; but he is to delegate to different ministers, the different kinds of powers which belong to him, that there may be, according to the language of our law, persons responsible to the king and the people, for their good conduct, in the administration of their trust. I, therefore, have no doubt in the world, that it must be taken, to be a jurisdiction rightly assumed; for a hundred and fifty years past, [131] unquestionably assumed by the Chancellors sitting in the Court of Chancery.

Lord Somers resembled the jurisdiction over infants, to the care which the Court takes with respect to lunatics, and supposed that the jurisdiction devolved on the Crown, in the same way. There is no particular law upon the subject: the law merely declares that the king has the care of the persons who are of insane mind, and that he is to take care of their property. If they are absolute idiots, the property devolves to him during their lives, and he is to provide only for their maintenance. If they are not idiots, but persons who have lucid intervals, then the king is to take care of their property, to take care of their persons, to take care of their maintenance; and whatever property may be accumulated in the mean time, he is a trustee of it for the benefit of those who may be entitled at their death, or to them, if they should ever recover. With respect to the case of infants, can there be a stronger proof that it was conceived to be reserved to the Crown than this: that the City of London claim, as an immemorial right, and a right which must have been derived to them from the Crown, the care of orphans, and that they have most extraordinary powers for that purpose, extending to enable the Court of Orphans to commit to Newgate a person who disobeys their order! That has been allowed in a Court of Common Law, and it is founded upon usage, which must have been founded originally upon a grant from the Crown, of such powers to the Corporation of London.

I think there can be no doubt, therefore, that the law of this country has reserved to the king the prerogative for the protection of infants, to be executed [132] in such a manner as the constitution requires him to execute all his prerogatives. If we look to this case with respect to the father, why is the conduct of the father not to be considered as a trust, as well as the conduct of a person appointed as guardian? It is true that the law has not authorised the compelling a father to furnish means of maintenance beyond actual maintenance. You cannot say that the father, whatever his property may be, shall allow to the child so much or so much for the maintenance and education of the child, the law compels him to maintain that child. If he refuses, he may be compelled to maintain him; but the law can do no more than compel bare maintenance. But, if the child has property of his own, then there is a right to apply that property, which belongs to the child, most beneficially for the purposes of the child's support and education.

In this case, the children who are the objects of your Lordships' attention, have property, and, through the medium of that property, a maintenance may be applied for them. The children were, at the time of the death of their mother, under her care. If they had had no property whatsoever, it would have been extremely difficult, unquestionably, for the Court of Chancery to have found the means of maintaining them according to their rank and situation; because, they have no power to compel Mr. Wellesley to do more than to afford them bare maintenance, and that in another mode of proceeding. But, as they have property, it was thought fit, on the death of their mother, and upon Mr. Wellesley proposing to take the children under his immediate care, to file a bill in the Court of Chancery against the persons who were in possession of that property, to compel [133] those persons to apply the income of that property for the benefit of those children. Those persons had no right to make that application of the property, no unquestionable right, without the intervention of the Court, because, having a father, and he being bound to maintain them, it would not have been allowed to those trustees to expend money in their maintenance without the authority of the Court for that purpose.

Upon what ground is the Court required to maintain these children out of their own property, and not at the expense of the father? It is because that father is an improper person to have the care of these children; and, as it is proposed that their maintenance and education should be put out of his control, it is, therefore, as he may refuse to afford them more than will supply them with their bare maintenance, which the law of the country would require from every person who had the means to maintain his children: it is for that reason that the Court is to take upon itself, out of the property that those children have, instead of accumulating the income of their property for their benefit, till they should be capable of taking possession of it themselves, to apply a part of it for their maintenance and education. This bill being filed, an application is made to the Court to appoint a proper person to act, for the purpose of taking care of those children, and applying this fund for their maintenance. That the Court has jurisdiction with respect to the maintenance is unquestionable; it is a jurisdiction with respect to the income of the property, to take care of it for the benefit of the children, to apply it for the benefit of the children, as far as it may be beneficial for them that it should be so applied, and to accumulate any sur-[134]-plus, if any surplus there should be. The right, therefore, to act, upon this subject, is unquestionably independent of any other part of the case.

If Mr. Wellesley had not been of the description which is attributed to him by these proceedings: had he been a person not objectionable in himself, but in extreme poverty, and unable, therefore, to maintain his children, which has been the case in some instances which have come under the consideration of the Court, the Court, as in those instances, might have thought fit to allow, out of the income belonging to the infants, a sum of money for the purpose of the maintenance and education of those children; but, in all those cases, the Court has always thought fit to take on itself, and it was bound to take on itself the mode in which that allowance should be applied for their benefit, and therefore has put it under some control. Whether it has entrusted the father with the application, or whether it has thought fit to appoint other persons to see to the application, it has always been put under some sort of control.

It is said, that there is nothing from which this jurisdiction can be inferred as belonging to the Court, except the dicta that may be found in books, and the actual exercise of it for one hundred and fifty years by persons who have sat in the Court of Chancery. If we look back to the constitution of the government of this country, there are many things which we cannot ascertain. Will any of your Lordships tell me how there comes to be a House of Commons and a House of Lords? I cannot tell. I have taken much pains to investigate that subject, and I believe it is impossible to say whence it originated—whence it came, that that which, to all appearance, from early records and early history was a General [135] Council of Barons, came to be divided into two Houses of Parliament, a House of Lords and a House of Commons, the House of Commons elected and not summoned on any other ground. We know that it arose at a certain period, but how it then took place we do not know.

It is so with respect to many other jurisdictions. As to much of the jurisdiction of the Court of King's Bench, of the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer, your Lordships would be extremely puzzled to say how it originated. With respect to this jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, I have had some experience on the subject in the character of one of the Justices of Wales, and at one time Chancellor of the bishopric of Durham. With respect to Wales, all the jurisdiction originated by an act of Henry VIII. That act gives jurisdiction to the Chancellor, and, as incident to their Courts of Chancery, all the Justices of Wales have constantly exercised this jurisdiction, with respect to wards in their court. I really cannot tell whence the Chancery of Durham originated; but, as Chancellor of Durham, I have exercised this jurisdiction, and nobody doubted the right to the jurisdiction.

These instances prove distinctly, that it is considered in the constitution of the government of this country, that all powers in the administration of justice, which are necessary in themselves, are vested in the Crown, vested in the Crown to be exercised by those ministers of the Crown to whom the jurisdiction has usually been delegated; and this jurisdiction must be taken to be delegated to the Court of Chancery, whenever there is a suit respecting property in that Court; and if there was a suit respecting property in the Court of Exchequer, as a Court of [136] Equity, to take care of the property belonging to an infant, the Court of Exchequer would exercise that jurisdiction, as incident; that is, it would take care that the property which was to be administered under its direction, should be properly so administered.

It would be a very extraordinary decision to hold, as it has been argued, that, until this House, as a Court of superior jurisdiction, had positively decided on the jurisdiction, that that jurisdiction should be considered as not existing. It must previously exist from the supposition of the general administration of justice before this Court could entertain any judgment on the subject. It may be said, if the Court of Chancery exercised the jurisdiction where it has none, this Court may pronounce that it has no jurisdiction, but this Court cannot pronounce that it has jurisdiction, but because it has previously the jurisdiction. If it were necessary to go back into times long past, to examine the grounds on which every law is administered in this country, before it could be considered as legally administered, we should be involved in very great difficulties. But what has been the practice for a great number of years, has been held, not in this country alone, but in all countries, to be a ground for supposing that it was rightly done, on this supposition, that if it had been wrongfully done, it would not have been permitted to be continued.

Having said thus much on the question of jurisdiction, I will say very little on the rest of the case. The jurisdiction, I conceive, extends to the case of the person as far as is necessary for protection and education. The care of the person to protect from violence belongs to the Court of King's Bench, but [137] the care of the person with respect to education does not belong to the Court of King's Bench, and the Court of King's Bench disclaim any such right: therefore, as to the care and protection for the purpose of education, it belongs to this Court, which has exercised the jurisdiction. The Chancellor perhaps might have exercised it independent of the cause which has been instituted; but as incident to the cause that has been instituted, I apprehend there can be no doubt of the right to exercise the jurisdiction. If the jurisdiction exists upon the grounds on which the Court has thought fit to interfere with the care of the father in the management of his children, I would only refer to one passage in a letter, which Mr. Wellesley himself wrote to Mr. Pitman, the tutor of these children; and I would ask then whether any one of your Lordships can doubt as to the necessity of some control over the management of Mr. Wellesley with respect to his children. It is in a letter to Mr. Pitman, dated the 16th of November, 1824, in which he says, "there are certain things which ought to be let alone, a man and his children ought to be allowed to go to the devil their own way, if he pleases." Now, my Lords, a man who can so write to a person of the description of Mr. Pitman (for it is not a loosely written letter, to a loose person, to whom he might have expressed himself carelessly, but it is a letter written to Mr. Pitman, the tutor of his children) has, independent of any other consideration, declared himself to be an improper person to have the sole control and education of his children.

The order that has been made does not absolutely exclude him, because if Mr. Wellesley found that improper persons were proposed to have the care of his [138] children he might, with great propriety, interpose, and the Court would attend to any objection he might make on that subject.

The Lord Chancellor: He has proposed his own tutor, and that tutor has been appointed.

Lord Redesdale: I was not aware of that. With respect to the immediate care he has proposed a proper person, and that person has been appointed, and he may control the conduct of any person who may be appointed to have the care of the children, and he has a right to apply to the Court if there should be any misconduct on their part, and I can have no doubt the Court would pay every attention, and ought to pay every attention, to any such representation.

Mr. Wellesley complains that there stands on the records of this Court, in the affidavits, much which he asserts is a libel upon his character. It is unfortunate that, when any question of this kind comes to be contested in family transactions, many things disagreeable to the feelings of the parties will be brought forward, and it would have been infinitely more prudent, in my humble opinion, if Mr. Wellesley had not carried the matter to this length, but contented himself with that which he would have been permitted to use, the interference with respect to the persons who might be appointed to the care of the children, and the interference with respect to the mode in which that care should be exercised. Mr. Wellesley has brought upon himself all that has passed on this occasion; it is very much, in my humble opinion, owing to himself.

Much has been said with respect to that part of the evidence which relates to the transactions in Italy. The learned Judge who pronounced this order appears, by the report of what he said, not to have [139] relied upon that evidence: but to have relied upon the evidence of that which subsequently happened as the foundation of his order. It seems to me that, in the argument of the counsel at the bar, they have thought that this case was to be used more for the purpose of throwing obloquy on the conduct of a Dr. Bulkeley, and of a Mr. Meara, and of another person, (I forget his name,) than for any other purpose. With respect to Dr. Bulkeley, it is not for me to say anything. Judging from the whole that appears in these affidavits, the question of truth or falsehood lies certainly between him and Mr. Wellesley; but I must take leave to observe that the subsequent unquestionable facts strongly confirm Dr. Bulkeley, and as strongly tend to invalidate what has fallen from Mr. Wellesley.

With respect to Mrs. Bligh being a person in the situation in which she stands, I cannot think that great reliance can be placed on what she has asserted in her affidavit; and, taking the whole evidence together, I think there can be no doubt that the order which has been made, if there was authority to make it, is justified by that evidence. Can any of your Lordships who has read the evidence, and read it with the utmost candour towards Mr. Wellesley and Mrs. Bligh, doubt that there ought to be some restraint? It has been asserted at the bar, that Mrs. Bligh has been carefully kept separate from these children? Can you doubt whether the separation has not been owing to the very circumstance of his apprehensions from these proceedings? Can you doubt, from the influence which it appears from these affidavits, Mrs. Bligh has over Mr. Wellesley, that if there was no control exercised by the Court upon this subject, Mrs. Bligh would be the person to have the [140] care of these children, or at least to influence the manner in which they would be disposed of.

I feel for Mr. Wellesley, because I see that he is in chains—I see that Mr. Wellesley has unfortunately made a connexion which he is unable to dissolve, and which I believe, from many passages in the affidavits, at one time he would have been very happy to have been enabled to dissolve; but as it is, he has put himself in a situation in which, in my humble opinion, he cannot be considered as a freeman.

Under these impressions, I approve of the order which has been made, having no doubt whatever of the authority to make that order, and conceiving that if your Lordships were to hold that there was not authority, you would do the greatest possible mischief to the country—a mischief which must instantly be remedied by the legislature, for it never could be endured that the country should be in such a situation, that children, such as these are, particularly, should be in the power of the father to treat as he might think proper with respect to their education, the eldest child in this case being likely to be a peer of the realm.

Only consider to what extent this might go. It might happen that a person might form an improvident marriage. A lady who had high expectations, might marry a person of the lowest, and most profligate description, and her son might, after her death, be entitled to great property, and might also be a peer, the father being a person of the most abandoned description, of the worst education, the most improper person to have any care or direction of the management of that son; and is the doctrine to be endured that there does not exist in this country a jurisdiction to control the power of the father in such circumstances. I deny that the law ever considered that [141] he has such a power, it has always considered it as a trust. Look at all the elementary writings on the subject; they say that a father is entrusted with the care of the children; that he is entrusted with it for this reason, because, it is to be supposed, his natural affection would make him the most proper person to discharge that trust. Under this impression I humbly move your Lordships to affirm the Judgment of the Court below.

Lord Manners: The argument of the noble and learned Lord who has discussed this case (concurring entirely, as I do, with all which he has stated) has rendered it unnecessary for me to enter into much discussion on any of the points that occur in this case.

This is an appeal against an order of the late Lord Chancellor, Lord Eldon, by which he declined to comply with the petition of the Appellant, Mr. Wellesley, which required, among other things, to have the children in his custody, instead of which, the noble and learned Lord directed a reference to the Master to report as to a proper person, with the exception of the Appellant, to have the care and the superintendence of the education of his children. This order of the noble and learned Lord is objected to by Mr. Wellesley, the Appellant, upon two grounds: first, that the Chancellor has not a jurisdiction in the Court of Chancery to separate the children, the wards of the Court, from their parent, while he is residing in this country: secondly, if there be such a jurisdiction, that, in the present instance, it has been improperly exercised.

With respect to the first question, I acknowledge I have not attempted to explore the origin, or to ascertain the commencement of the jurisdiction. If I had so done, I should have been anticipated in every [142] thing which might have been said usefully upon the subject, by my noble and learned friend; for it seems to me, indeed, abundantly sufficient for the purpose of this case, that this jurisdiction has been uniformly asserted and repeatedly exercised by successive chancellors for a period of more than a century. I have looked into the cases referred to on the subject, to discover if any chancellor hesitated, or has entertained a doubt as to this jurisdiction. I do not find, from the time of Lord Nottingham to the present day, that any doubt has been stated by the Court with respect to the existence of such a jurisdiction. It has, then, become the established jurisdiction of the Court; it has become the practice of the Court, and as such, a part of the law of the land. Indeed, it is a strong confirmation of this jurisdiction, that, on a writ of habeas corpus being applied for by the father, to have the children restored to him, in the Court of King's Bench, that Court enquires whether they are wards of the Court of Chancery, and whether there are any proceedings in that Court respecting them. If the Court of King's Bench finds there are such proceedings, it declines to grant the writ. This would be a dereliction of their duty if no such jurisdiction exists; this seems to be a strong judicial recognition of the existence of this jurisdiction, to be exercised by the Chancellor in the Court of Chancery. Upon that ground, therefore, I can entertain no doubt. There was an observation of Mr. Brougham on the subject, that the jurisdiction could not exist, because you could not ascertain the limits of it. That objection applies to every case where there is a discretion in the judge; where the result of the facts is not a question of law, but a question of discretion. It is therefore impossible to say what are the limits of that jurisdiction; every [143] case must depend upon its own circumstances. With respect to the jurisdiction, I should agree with Lord Thurlow, that it is too well established, to be open to question.

Then it is contended that in the present instance, this jurisdiction has been improperly exercised. Now I admit, (for I have taken pains to read through all the affidavits, voluminous as they are,) that upon some facts it is utterly impossible to reconcile the affidavits. I do not, however, think on those facts, on which there are these contradictory statements in the affidavits, that those facts are material to the decision of this case. There is abundantly sufficient, in my opinion, independent of the disputed facts, to warrant the order that was pronounced by the noble Lord below. It is perfectly clear, for instance, that Mr. Wellesley was, at the time of the death of his wife, living in a state of adultery with Mrs. Bligh—that is perfectly clear; and from all that appears in the cause, that intercourse still continues. If so, to restore this little girl and her brothers to the care and custody of the parent, would be, in fact, to deliver them over to this abandoned woman. It is also perfectly clear, to my mind, that Mrs. Wellesley had intended to institute proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court, to dissolve the marriage. That she intended to prosecute that, or some other suit, is manifest from her own letters, which I think have been properly read in the course of the discussion of this subject.

Now I state this, not for the purpose of insisting (for the case does not require such an opinion,) that the mere act of adultery, or the living in a state of adultery, on the part of the father, is sufficient to warrant the separation of the children from their [144] parent: I do not state such to be the case. If that case should arise, then it will be time enough to give an opinion upon it. This is only one circumstance in the case, and I rely upon it principally for this purpose, to shew the reprobate character, and vicious habits of the Appellant. His unfeeling and cruel behaviour towards his wife, are also circumstances which tend strongly to disqualify him from being the guardian of his children. But I principally rely upon those facts which corroborate the other charges in the case, and which are much more pointed, and much more particularly applicable to the question now in dispute; namely, whether these children ought, or ought not to be restored to the father. The charge is, that he instructed, or encouraged them in the habit of profane swearing, perhaps the only vicious habit, which at the time when the order was pronounced, these children were capable of contracting; a most vicious habit, which he chooses at all times to represent as venial, and if the boy is in a passion, such as is perfectly allowable. Now this charge does not depend on the testimony of Dr. Bulkeley. With respect to Dr. Bulkeley, I will say a few words presently, but it does not depend on his testimony; it is distinctly proved by Mr. Pitman, whose veracity is not called in question; and that testimony of Mr. Pitman is corroborated in the strongest manner by the letters of Mr. Wellesley to his son, and to Mr. Pitman himself. Those facts stand perfectly clear in themselves, and are so established in point of proof, that it is impossible to entertain a doubt about them.

Then with respect to Dr. Bulkeley's evidence, I certainly do disapprove of some part of the evidence of Dr. Bulkeley; I think he has unnecessarily [145] come forward to disclose confidential and professional communications that have been made to him; but with respect to his veracity, with respect to the truth of what he has sworn to; I profess, in looking over the affidavits, I think those in support of his credit, far preponderate over those which impeach that testimony, and I think he stands entitled to credit in a court of justice. He corroborates the charge of its being the habit of the Appellant, in this case, Mr. Wellesley, to instruct or encourage his children in profane swearing. That is an extremely vicious, and most dangerous habit to impress on children, especially with the authority of a father.

Now, supposing Mr. Wellesley not to have the parental right, and that we are to look to the Court of Chancery for the appointment of the guardian, I do not believe there is to be found in the community, a person less qualified for the office and the duties of it, than the Appellant; it would be utterly impossible he could be appointed as a guardian by the Court. Suppose Mr. Wellesley had been a testamentary guardian, and led this vicious life, set this bad example, inculcated this bad habit of profane swearing upon the boys entrusted to his care, as testamentary guardian; undoubtedly the Court would consider him as abusing his trust, as unfit to have the care and protection of the children, and would rescue them from the mischief and danger of so bad an example, and such vicious propensities.

I do not understand, in looking at the office of guardian, how to distinguish between the testamentary guardian, and the parent. The testamentary guardian deriving his title from the right of the parent, under the act of parliament, it is a continuation of the same trust, and whether it is exercised by the parent, or by the person delegated by him, is under the same [146] control, and liable to the same jurisdiction. The Court certainly would regard the feelings of the parent; the Court would be anxious that the affection of the children should not be estranged from their parent; it is a most important duty imposed on the person who may have the care of the children, to impress that on their minds; but inasmuch as the Court cannot correct the vices of the parent, the Court is bound to protect the children against them. On that ground the noble Lord acted, and, I think, properly acted. If there be a jurisdiction, of which I entertain no doubt, I cannot suggest to myself a case which more imperiously calls on the Chancellor to interfere, and exercise that jurisdiction, than the present; to take the children away from the person who has a total disregard to their moral and religious principles, and who is setting such a dangerous and mischievous example to these young children.

The Lord Chancellor: It is not necessary for me to say more, after what has been said by the two noble and learned Lords, than that I perfectly concur in their opinion on both the points, and in the conclusions which they have drawn.

We are of opinion it is not a case for costs.

Judgment affirmed, without costs.

(ENGLAND.)

[Mews' Dig. xii. 666, S. C. 1 Dow and Cl. 178; 5 Bing. 163; in K. B. 3 B. and C. 91; 4 Dowl. and R. 790. Adopted in In re Hall and Selby Ry. 1839, 5 M. and W. 332; and see Foster v. Wright, 1878, 4 C. P. D. 446; Hindson v. Ashby (1896), 2 Ch. 1, 27, 28.]

Upon a commission under the Great Seal, and an inquisition returned into and filed in the Petty Bag Office of the Court of Chancery, lands were seized into the king's hands as derelict by the sea. The lord of the adjoining manor, upon petition to the Lord Chancellor, having obtained leave to traverse the inquisition, filed his traverse in the Petty Bag, denying that the lands were derelict, and pleading that they were formed by alluvion, or gradual deposit of soil. The Attorney General, in his replication to this traverse, took issue upon the alleged fact of alluvion, and the Defendant joined issue. Upon the trial, a verdict was found for the Defendant, and afterwards, upon application of the Attorney General for a new trial, the Court ordered the facts proved to be stated in a special case; which being argued, a verdict for the Defendant was entered by the direction of the Court.

A writ of error from this judgment, directly to the House of Lords, being brought by the Attorney General, on behalf of the crown; Held, that the House of Lords has jurisdiction to hear such writ of error; that it is not necessary to carry a writ of error first to the Exchequer Chamber, and that lands formed by alluvion, that is by gradual and imperceptible deposit, on the shore of the sea, belonged to the lord of the adjoining manor, and not to the king, Jure coronae.

A custom regulating the rights of the owners of all lands bordering on the sea, is so general, that it need not be pleaded.

In the 59 Geo. 3. a commission was issued under the great seal, appointing certain commissioners [148] therein named, and directing them to inquire whether there were any and what lands, and how many acres of land, in or adjoining or near to the several towns, parishes, or lordships therein mentioned, or any or either of them in the county of Lincoln, being land in time past covered with the water of the sea, and then by the sea left, and not covered with water, which to His Majesty in right of his crown, or in any other right, did belong and appertain, and which were concealed, subtracted, and unjustly withheld from him, and if so, by whom and how long, and who hath received and taken the issues and profits thereof from the time of such dereliction, or not covering, and to what amount, and in whose possession or tenure the said lands then were or remained, and how much they were worth by the year, according to the true value thereof; and all and singular the lands, which by the inquisition to be taken in that behalf, should be found to be concealed, subtracted, and unjustly withheld and detained from His Majesty, to enter upon and take and seize into the hands of his said Majesty.

In pursuance of this commission, an inquisition was taken, bearing date the 12th of November, in the same year, under the seals of three of the commissioners, named in the commission, and of twelve jurors, whereby they found (amongst other things) that there was a certain piece of land, being salt marsh, lying near or adjoining to the parish or lordship of North Cotes, in the county of Lincoln; and which piece of land was bounded towards the south and south-west by the sea-wall or sea-bank, of the lordship of North Cotes, and towards the north-west, by a part of the sea-wall or sea-bank, of certain lands, in the lordship [149] of Tetney, and on all other parts by the sea, and containing by estimation, four hundred and fifty-three acres, or thereabouts, and was of the value of four shillings for each acre, by the year, of lawful money of the United Kingdom, according to the true value thereof; and was in times past, covered with the water of the sea, but was then, and had been for several years past, by the sea left, and was not covered with water except at high tides, when the sea flowed to the sea-walls, or sea-banks: which said last mentioned piece of land, from the time of such dereliction, thitherto had been, and still was unoccupied; but the herbage thereof had been, from time to time, eaten and consumed by the cattle and sheep, belonging to divers tenants or occupiers of lands, situate within the parish or lordship of North Cotes: which said piece of land, (together with other pieces of land similarly described,) the commissioners had therefore taken, and caused to be seized into the hands of his Majesty.

* See the report of this case, in the Court below, 3 B. and A. 91.

On the 12th of December, in the same year, the commission and inquisition were returned into the Petty Bag Office of the Court of Chancery, and filed there.

In consequence of this inquisition, the Defendant in error presented a petition to the Lord Chancellor, stating the commission and inquisition, and his title to the manor of North Cotes, and praying for leave to traverse so much of the inquisition, and return thereof, as related to that part of the unembanked salt marsh land, which was situate within, or near adjoining to the parish, lordship, or manor, of North Cotes.

This petition was heard before the Vice Chancellor, and after argument an order was made, by which [150] permission was granted to the Defendant to traverse so much of the inquisition, as related to the land in or adjoining to the manor of North Cotes; and similar permission was granted to the several lords of the manors, and owners of lands, in or adjoining to which the other pieces of land, mentioned in the inquisition, were situated.

In pursuance of this order, the Defendant in error in Easter Term, in the first year of His present Majesty's reign, filed his traverse in the Petty Bag Office, in the Court of Chancery, which, setting forth the commission and inquisition, and admitting that there was a piece of land, being salt marsh, bounded as in the inquisition is mentioned, and admitting the quantities and value thereof, as therein also mentioned, and that the said piece of land was then and there, and had been for several years, not covered with water, except at high tides, when the sea flowed to the sea-walls or sea-banks, and admitting that the herbage thereof had been, from time to time, eaten and consumed by the cattle and sheep, belonging to divers tenants or occupiers of land, situate within the parish or lordship of North Cotes, states, that from time, whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, there hath been, and still is, a certain ancient manor, called or known by the name of the manor of North Thoresby cum North Cotes, situate within the parish of North Cotes aforesaid, in the county of Lincoln; and that the Defendant, long before the respective days of issuing the commission, and finding the inquisition, to wit, on the first day of July, 1758, was seized in his demesne as of fee, of and in the manor of North Thoresby cum North Cotes, and the demesne lands thereof; and that the same piece of land heretofore, to wit, on the first day [151] of January, 1300, and on divers other days and times between that day and the day of the finding of the inquisition, by the slow, gradual, and imperceptible projection, alluvion, subsidence, and accretion of ooze, soil, sand, and matter, being slowly, gradually, and by imperceptible increase, in long time cast up, deposited, and settled, by and from the flux and reflux of the tide and waves of the sea, in, upon, and against the outside and extremity of the demesne lands of the same manor, hath been formed, and hath settled, grown, and accrued upon and against, and unto the said demesne lands, of the same manor, and the same part and every portion thereof, when and as the same hath so there been formed, settled, grown, and accrued, hath thereupon and thereby, at those times respectively, in that behalf above mentioned, forthwith become and been, and from the same several times respectively, have and hath continued to be, and still are, and is part and parcel of the demesne lands of the manor; and the several owners and occupiers of the same manor, for the time being, during all the time aforesaid, until the time of the seizin of the Defendant as aforesaid, and the Defendant, during the time he hath been so as aforesaid seized of and in the said manor, from the time of the formation and accretion of the same piece of land, and every part thereof respectively, continually, until the time of the finding of the inquisition, respectively were and was seized in their and his demesne, as of fee, of and in the same piece of land, and every part thereof, when and as the same hath so been formed and accrued as aforesaid, as and for part and parcel of the demesne lands of the same manor. The Defendant's traverse concluded thus:—"Without this, that the said piece of land, or any part or parcel [152] thereof, was by the sea left in manner and form as in the inquisition is above supposed and found."

The Attorney-General, in his replication, traversed part of the inducement to the Defendant's traverse as follows:—"Without this that the said piece of land at the times in the said plea mentioned, by the slow, gradual, and imperceptible projection, alluvion, subsidence, and accretion of ooze, soil, sand, and other matter, being slowly, gradually, and by imperceptible increase, in long time east up, deposited, and settled by and from the flux and reflux of the tide and waves of the sea, in, upon, and against the outside and extremity of the demesne lands of the same manor, hath been formed and hath settled, grown, and accrued upon and against and unto the said demesne lands of the same manor, in manner and form as the said Defendant hath above in his said plea alleged.

The Defendant in his rejoinder took issue upon that fact.

The replication of the Attorney-General then took issue on the Defendant's traverse, that the said piece of land was and still is by the sea left in manner and form as in the inquisition is above supposed and found; and thereupon, also, the Defendant joined issue.

The case came on to be tried at the Spring Assizes, 1823, for the County of Derby, (the venue having been changed from Lincolnshire to Derbyshire, by order of the Vice-Chancellor on the application of the crown,) by a special jury of the county, some of the special jurymen having previously had a view of the land in question, when a verdict was found for the Defendant.

The Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, having applied to the Court of King's Bench for a new trial, the Court directed the facts proved to be [153] stated in a special case for the opinion of the Court, which was accordingly done, and the case came on to be argued in Trinity Term, 1824: when, after argument, the Court were unanimously of opinion that the verdict was right, and that judgment should be, and it was accordingly entered for the Defendant thereon.

A writ of error in Parliament was thereupon brought by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown, and the following was the error assigned:—"That it appears by the said record, that the land therein described was and is land gained from the sea by alluvion, and that in no part of the traverse filed by the said Defendant to the inquisition in the said record stated, nor in any other part of the said record doth the said Defendant state or allege any custom or prescription, or other sufficient matter, whereby the right and title of our said Lord the King to land so gained, can by the law of the land be barred or defeated; and that the said traverse so filed by the said Defendant, and the matters therein contained, are not sufficient in law to bar or defeat the said right and title of our said Lord the King to the land so gained by alluvion as aforesaid."

The common error was also added.

For the Plaintiff in Error: The Attorney General and The Solicitor General.

For the Defendant in Error: Mr. Denman and Mr. Coleridge.*

* The argument was, in substance, the same as in the Court below. There was a preliminary objection taken in the printed papers, and touched, but not prosecuted in the argument, on the behalf of the Defendant in Error, viz.: that the proceeding having been originally ex parte, and the judgment on the case stated not having been given in a cause, could not, according to the practice of the House, be the subject of a writ of error. Upon this question see, as to proceedings in lunacy, Rochford v. the Earl of Ely, 6 B. P. C. 329, in mandamus, Pinder v. Hearle, 3 B. P. C. 505: in the case of an order made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, in a matter

[154] In the course of the argument the Lord Chancellor made the following observations:—

The Lord Chancellor: Lord Hale most obviously interprets the expression "secundum patriae consuetudinem," to mean the custom of the district. With respect to actions against carriers, and so on, the common form of the declaration is, "according to the custom of the realm:" that is very analogous to the expression "secundum consuetudinem patriae."

Patria comprehends the whole country.

In the case of the Abbot of Ramsey (Dyer, 326), the following passage occurs in the judgment.

"Quod secundum consuetudinem patriae domini maneriorum prope mare adjacentium habebunt marettum et sabulonem per fluxus et refluxus maris."

Nothing can be more general than that.

The case of the Abbot of Ramsey is not the case of a gradual increase, nothing is said about gradual increase; it is alternate, up and down. That is a case which could not, according to the doctrine laid down [155] by Lord Hale, have been supported by prescription or custom, because it is not a case of gradual increase. It appears to be a case of occasional loss. It depends on a different principle.

In the judgment of the Court, in the case of The King v. The Bishop of Winchester (Staun. Prer. tit. Traverse, c. 20. 63), the authority of Staunford is cited.

No man shall traverse the office, unless he makes himself a title; and if he cannot prove his title to be true after he has set it out upon the record, although he may be able to prove his traverse to be true, yet his traverse will not serve him.—He cannot traverse without a title, and if he has no title, his traverse falls to the ground.

In the case of the King v. the Bishop of Winchester, the king's title had not been found by matter of record. That is a distinction: here the king's title is found by matter of record.—The subject on suggestion, of his having a title, is allowed to come in and traverse the inquisition. If he has no title at all, the king's original title stands. There are cases of that description. A party may be entitled to appear and contend against the king's title, by having a title of his own arising from some cause: that is a matter of investigation. If it turns out that he has no title, he is reduced to his original state.

The right of the Plaintiff in error is pleaded to be in consequence of slow and gradual accretion of the land: and they have traversed that plea.

It is traversed in substance, and in effect.

The king has, by his prerogative, the soil between high and low water-mark; it is an incident to his prerogative.

Lord Hale, in the case of the Abbot of Peter-[156]-borough, observes, that there a custom was laid, and he relies not barely upon the case without it.

There is an allegation in the case of Sutton Marsh,* precisely in the same terms as this. There is no declaration of the district, to which the custom applies. It appears to be laid down generally, as the custom of all manors bordering on the sea. Reasoning from what appears on the Sutton case, the conclusion is, that it was meant to be laid as the custom of all manors bordering on the sea, without defining to what manor it particularly applied. There appears to be no room for a misapprehension as to that record, to which I am now referring.

I propose to put this question to the learned judges. "A. is seized in his demesne as of fee of the manor of N., and of the demesne lands thereof, which said demesne lands were formerly bounded on one side by the sea. A certain piece of land consisting of arising out of proceedings upon a writ of extent, Wall v. the Attorney-General, MSS. D. P. 1822; Howe v. Attorney-General, MSS. D. P. 1824: in the case of an order made by the Court of Exchequer, in Ireland, upon one of its officers, O'Neill v. Fitzgerald, MSS. D. P. 1826. See also the stat. 14 Ed. 3. stat. 1. c. 5: 27 Eliz. c. 8: 31 Eliz. c. 1.

The House has no jurisdiction by way of error, or appeal against any order in bankruptcy, or generally upon any proceeding, unless it arises in a cause, the only exception is, in the case of a proceeding under a commission of charitable uses, which is warranted by ancient precedent.

* The King v. Oldsworth; Hale de Jure Maris, pp. 30, 31. 12th Car. 1. p. 14.

about four hundred and fifty acres, by the slow, gradual, and imperceptible projection, alluvion, subsidence, and accretion of ooze, soil, sand, and matter slowly, gradually, and by imperceptible increase, in long time cast up, deposited, and settled by and from the flux and reflux of the tide, and waves of the sea, in, upon, and against the outside and extremity of the said demesne lands, hath been formed, and hath settled, grown, and accrued upon, and against, and unto the said demesne lands. Does such piece of land so formed, settled, and accrued as aforesaid, belong to the crown, or to A., the owner of the said demesne lands. There is no local custom on the subject."

[157] The question was handed to Lord Chief Justice Best, and the further consideration was postponed.

Lord Chief Justice Best (After stating the question proposed for the opinion of the Judges, proceeded as follows): The judges have desired me to state their opinion, that land gradually and imperceptibly added to the demesne lands of a manor, as stated in the introduction to your question does not belong to the Crown, but to the owner of the demesne land. All the writers on the law of England agree in this, that as the king is lord of the sea, that flows around our coasts, and also owner of all the land to which no individual has acquired a right by occupation and improvement, the soil that was once covered by the sea belongs to him.

But this right of the sovereign might, in particular places, or under circumstances in all places near the sea, be transferred to certain of his subjects by law. A law giving such rights, may be presumed from either a local or general custom, such custom being reasonable, and proved to have existed from time immemorial. Such as claim under the former, must plead it, and establish their pleas by proof of the existence of such a custom from time immemorial. General customs were, in ancient times, stated in the pleadings of those who claimed under them; as the custom of merchants, the customs of the realm, with reference to inn-keepers and carriers, and others of the same description. But it has not been usual for a long time to allude to such customs in the pleadings, because no proof is required of their existence they are considered as adopted into the common law, and as such are recognised by the Judges without any evidence. These are called customs because they only apply to particular descriptions of persons, and do not affect all the [158] subjects of the realm; but if they govern all persons belonging to the classes to which they relate, they are to be considered as public laws: as an act of parliament, applicable to all merchants, or to the whole body of the clergy, is to be regarded by the Judges as a public act.

If there is a custom regulating the rights of the owners of all lands bordering on the sea, it is so general a custom as need not be set out in the pleadings, or proved by evidence, but will be taken notice of by the Judges, as part of the common law. We think there is a custom by which lands from which the sea is gradually and imperceptibly removed by the alluvion of soil becomes the property of the person to whose land it is attached, although it has been the fundus maris, and as such the property of the king. Such a custom is reasonable as regards the rights of the king, and the subjects claiming under it, beneficial to the public, and its existence is established by satisfactory legal evidence.

There is a great difference between land formed by alluvion and derelict land. Land formed by alluvion must become useful soil by degrees, too slow to be perceived. What is deposited by one tide will not be so transient as to be removed by the next. An embankment of a sufficient consistency and height to keep out the sea must be formed imperceptibly. The sea frequently retires suddenly, and leaves a large space of land uncovered. When the authorities relative to these subjects are considered, this difference will be found to make a material difference in the law which applies to derelict lands, and to such as are formed by alluvion. Unless trodden by cattle, many years must pass away before lands formed by alluvion would be hard enough or sufficiently wide to be used beneficially by any one but the owner of the lands adjoining. As soon as alluvial lands rise above the [159] water, the cattle from the adjoining lands will give them consistency by treading on them, and prepare them for grass or agriculture by the manure which they will drop on them. When they are but a yard wide, the owner of the adjoining lands may render them productive. Thus lands, which are of no use to the king, will be useful to the owner of the adjoining lands; and he will acquire a title to them on the same principle that all titles to lands have been acquired by individuals, viz., by occupation and improvement.

Locke, in a passage in his Treatise on Government, in which he describes the grounds of the exclusive right of property, says, "God and man's reason commanded him to subdue the earth, that is, to improve it for the benefit of life, and thereon lay out something upon it that was his own, his labour. He that, in obedience to that command, subdued, tilled, and sowed any part of it, thereby annexed to it something that was his property, which another had no title to, nor could without injury take from him." This passage proves the reasonableness of the custom that assigns lands gained by alluvion to the owner of the lands adjoining. The reasonableness is further proved by this; that the land so gained is a compensation for the expense of an embankment, and for losses which frequently happen from inundation to the owners of lands near the sea.

This custom is beneficial to the public. Much land, which would remain for years, perhaps for ever, barren, is, in consequence of this custom rendered productive as soon as it is formed. The sea being gradually and imperceptibly forced back, the land formed by alluvion, will become of a size proper for cultivation and use, and in the mean time the owner of the [160] adjoining lands will have acquired a title to it by improving it. The original deposit constitutes not a tenth part of its value, the other nine-tenths are created by the labour of the person who has occupied it, and, in the words of Locke, the fruits of his labour cannot, without injury, be taken from him. The existence of this custom is established by legal evidence. In Bracton (Book 2, cap. 2) there is this passage: "Item quod per alluvionem agro tuo flumen adjecit jure gentium tibi acquiritur: est autem alluvio latens incrementum et per alluvionem adjici dicitur quod ita paulatim adjicitur quod intelligere non possis quo momento temporis adjiciatur. Si autem non sit latens incrementum, ino apparens contrarium erit."

In a treatise, which is published as the work of Lord Hale, treating of this passage, it is said that "Bracton follows in this the civil law writers, and yet, even according to this, the common law doth regularly hold between parties; but it is doubtful in case of an arm of the sea." It is true that Bracton follows the civil law, for the passage above quoted is to be found in the same words in the Institute (Lib. 2, tit. 1, s. 18); but Bracton, by inserting this passage in his book on the laws and customs of England, presents it to us as part of those laws and customs. Lord Hale admits, that it is the law of England in cases between subject and subject; and it would be difficult to find a reason why the same question between the crown and a subject, should not be decided by the same rule. Bracton wrote on the law of England, and the situation that he filled, namely, that of Chief Justice, in the reign of Henry 3, gives great authority to his writings. Lord Hale, in his history of the common law (Cap. 7), says that it was much [161] improved in the time of Bracton. This improvement was made, by incorporating much of the civil law into the common law.

We know that many of the maxims of the common law, borrowed from the civil law, are still quoted in the language of the civil law. Notwithstanding the clamour raised by our ancestors for the restoration of the laws of Edward the Confessor, I believe that these, and all the other Saxon and Norman customs, would not have been adequate to form a system of law sufficient for the state of society in the times of Henry III. Both courts of justice and law writers were obliged to adopt such of the rules of the digest, as were not inconsistent with our principles of jurisprudence. Wherever Bracton got his law from, Lord Chief Baron Parker (Fortescue, 408), says, "as to the authority of Bracton, to be sure many things are now altered, but there is no colour to say that it was not law at that time. There are many things that have never been altered, and are now law. The laws must change with the state of things to which they relate; but according to Chief Baron Parker, the rules to be found in Bracton, are good now in all cases to which those rules are applicable." But the authority of Bracton has been confirmed by modern writers, and by all the decided cases that are to be found in the books. The same doctrine that Bracton lays down, is to be found in Rolle's Abridgement (Tit. Prerogative, En le Mere, p. 168 and seq. pl. 3, 9, 12), in Comyn's Digest (Title Prerogative, D. 62), in Calles (Broderip's edition, p. 62), and in Blackstone's Commentaries (Vol. ii. p. 262).

In the case of the Abbot of Peterborough (Hale de Jure Maris, in Harg. Law Tracts, p. 29), it was [162] holden, "quod secundum consuetudinem patria domini interiorum prope mare adjacentium habebant marettum, et sabulonem per fluxus et refluxus maris per temporis incrementum ad terras suas costera maris adjacentes projecta." In the treatise of Lord Hale, it is said, "here is custom laid, and he relies not barely on the case without it." But it is a general, and not a local, custom, applicable to all lands near the sea, and not to lands within any particular district. The pleadings do not state the lands to be within any district; and such statements would have been necessary if the custom pleaded were local. The consuetudo patria means the custom of all parts of the country to which it can be applied; that is, in the present case, all such parts as adjoin the sea.

The case of the King v. Oldsworth (the case of Sutton Marsh, cited in Hale de Jure Maris, pp. 30, 31, in Harg. Law Tracts) confirms that of the Abbot of Peterborough, as to the right of the owner of the adjoining lands to such lands as were "secundum majus et minus prope terras et tementa sua projecta." That case was decided against the owner, because he claimed derelict lands against the Crown. Here it will be observed that there is a distinction made between lands derelict and lands formed by alluvion, which distinction, I think, is founded on the principle which I have ventured to lay down; namely, that alluvion must be gradual and imperceptible, but the dereliction of land by the sea is frequently sudden, leaving at once large tracts of its bottom uncovered, dry, and fit for the ordinary purposes for which land is used. But still, what was decided in this case is directly applicable to the question proposed to us. The Judges are, therefore, war-[163]-ranted by justice, by public policy, by the opinion of learned writers, and the authority of decided cases, in giving to your question the answer which they have directed me to give.

The answer to your Lordship's question is the unanimous opinion of all the Judges who heard the arguments at your Lordships' bar. For the reasons given in support of that opinion I am alone responsible: most of my learned brothers were obliged to leave town for their respective circuits before I could write what I have now read to your Lordships. I should have spared your Lordships some trouble if I had had time to compress my thoughts; but I am now in the midst of a very heavy nisi prius sittings, and am obliged to take, from the hours necessary for repose, the time which I have employed in preparing this opinion. If it wants that clearness of expression which is proper for an opinion to be delivered by a Judge to this House, I hope that your Lordships will consider what I have stated as a sufficient apology for this defect.

The Lord Chancellor: I beg to express my thanks to the learned Chief Justice, and to the Judges, for the attention they have paid to this subject; and I have only to add, that I entirely concur in the conclusion at which they have arrived: I would recommend to your Lordships, as a necessary consequence of the opinion which has been expressed, that the judgment of the Court of King's Bench upon this matter should be affirmed.

The Earl of Eldon: I heard only part of the argument, and, therefore, I have some difficulty in stating my opinion in this case; but, having had my attention called to subjects of the same nature, on [164] former occasions, it appears to me, after reading the finding of the Jury, that the opinion of the Judges is correct. I, therefore, concur in the opinion which the Lord Chief Justice has expressed.

Judgment affirmed.

ENGLAND.

(COURT OF EXCHEQUER.)

The Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of MERCERS of the City of London.

—Appellants: HIS MAJESTY'S ATTORNEY GENERAL,—Respondent.[Mews' Dig. iii. 286. . Commented on in A.-G. v. War Chandlers Co., 1870, L.R. 5 Ch. 509.]

A., by a deed executed in 1616, for a nominal consideration, conveyed to certain persons therein named, certain premises which were then let upon lease for forty-one years, at a rent of £150. By another deed of the same date, reciting, among other purposes, a desire to relieve the poor of the Mystery of Mercers, of which the grantor was free, and the better to manifest his love and affection towards his brethren, the freemen of the said company, it was declared that the grant of the premises comprised in the former deed, and of the rent of £150 reserved upon the lease, was made upon trust as to the premises, and the rent reserved, and all future rents and profits; that the grantees should receive and pay the monies arising therefrom to the Wardens of the Mystery of Mercers of the city of London, and their successors, and that the said Wardens and Commonalty should dispose of the monies to the uses therein mentioned. The schedule annexed to the deed then [166] enumerated various charitable objects to which the money was to be applied, among which was a donation to poor brethren of the Mercers' Company. These donations amounted altogether to £149 11s., leaving a sum of 9s. of the reserved rent of £150 unapplied in the hands of the Mercers' Company. By improvements of and additions to the estate in consequence of an act of inclosure, the rent increased to a sum of £1000 a year, at which rent the premises were let in 1817: of this increased rent the Mercers applied £521 2s. in various payments according to the trusts: the residue of the rents of the estate they had for many years carried to the general account of the company, and applied them to their own use.

Upon an information filed to regulate the charity, held in the Court below, and on appeal, that the Mercers' Company were trustees of the rents and augmented rents, and that the surplus, after answering the payments directed by the deed, were applicable to such and the same purposes as directed by the deed, without prejudice to the question how far the Mercers' Company were intitled to share in the increased rents, with reference to their share of the original rent of £150.

By indenture of bargain and sale, dated the 17th January, 1616, and made between Sir Thomas Bennett, knight, citizen and alderman of the city of London, of the one part; and Thomas Bennett, the younger, citizen, and alderman Rowland Backhouse, and eighteen others, citizens and mercers, of the other part; the said Sir Thomas Bennett, in consideration of twelve pence, and other good considerations, granted, bargained, and sold to the said parties of the second part, the rectory and church of Kirton, in the county of Lincoln, and the advowson and right of patronage of the vicarage of Kirton, late being parcel of the possessions of the monastery of Buckland, in the county of Somerset; and all the messuages, lands, tithes, and ecclesiastical dues and payments thereto belonging, which premises were by letters patent dated the 8th April, 6 James I., granted to Francis [167] Phillips and Richard Moore, and the yearly rent of £150 reserved upon a lease of the said premises, dated on or about the 12th July, 14 James I., made by the said Sir Thomas Bennett to George Skelton, for the term of forty-one years, to hold to the said parties of the second part, and their heirs, yielding and paying to the King and his successors the rent of £29 yearly reserved by the said letters patent.

By another indenture of the same date, and made between the said Sir Thomas Bennett, described as being the third son of Thomas Bennett, late of Clapcott, near Wallingford, in the county of Berks, deceased, of the first part; the said Thomas Bennett, the younger, Rowland Backhouse, and eighteen others, of the second part:

the wardens and commonalty of the Mystery of Mercers, of the third part: and the mayor, burgesses and commonalty of the borough of Wallingford, of the fourth part; after reciting the before-mentioned deed, and also reciting that the said Sir Thomas Bennett, being incited to works of charity, was desirous to leave some memorial of his thankfulness to God, to be continued for ever, towards the relieving and maintenance of the poor of the said borough of Wallingford, being near the place where he was born, and of the poor within the city of London, where he then dwelt: and of the poor of the Mystery of Mercers, of which he was free; and the better to manifest his love and affection towards his brethren, the free-men of the said company, it was testified and declared, by the parties thereto, that the grant of the said rectory and advowson, and of the messuages, lands, tithes, and ecclesiastical dues thereto belonging, and of the said rent of £150, was made by the said Sir Thomas Bennett to the parties of the second part, upon the trusts and limitations, [168] and for the intents and purposes expressed and declared by a schedule thereto annexed: and the several parties covenanted with each other well and truly to perform the said trusts on their parts to be performed. The schedule annexed to the deed, after stating that it contained the several trusts and limitations which were from time to time thereafter to be performed, touching the rectory and church of Kirton, and the advowson and other the premises and things specified in the last stated indenture, and touching the yearly rent of £150 reserved upon a lease theretofore made of the same, by Sir Thomas Bennett, unto George Skelton, for the term of forty-one years, from Lady-day then next coming, and touching all other rents, issues, and profits of the same premises, directs (amongst other things) that the parties of the second part should permit the said Sir Thomas Bennett to receive the rents until Lady-day then next, and should from thenceforth receive the said yearly rent of £150, and all other rents and issues thereof, and yearly pay and deliver the monies arising thereupon to the wardens of the Mystery of Mercers of the city of London, and their successors, or such one of them as the said company should appoint and be answerable for; and that the said wardens and commonalty should, from the said Lady-day, dispose of all the said monies so from time to time to be paid and delivered as aforesaid, to the uses following:—viz. to the king for the fee-farm rent reserved, by the letters patent before-mentioned, the sum of £29 yearly; and to the receiver for two half-yearly acquittances, 1s.; to the mayor and burgesses and commonalty of Wallingford, to be paid half-yearly, and to be distributed by them among fifteen of the most poor and aged sort of men and women of the said borough town, in the manner [169] therein mentioned, the sum of £20; to four poor brethren of the company of Mercers, such as should have their freedom by service or patrimony, being then decayed in their estate, £5 a-piece yearly, as long as they should live and be of good behaviour; the vacancies to be supplied by the said company upon their quarter days, amounting together to the sum of £20; for redeeming twelve or more prisoners, yearly, lying for debt in the two Compters and Ludgate, such as might be redeemed for 10s. or under, and for half or less if they could of the debt due, so far as the sum of £24 in every year would extend; for clothing with hose, shoes, shirts, and such like, poor and naked men, women, and children, wandering in the streets of London, and that have no dwelling, to be bestowed at the discretion of the said wardens, or such one of them as the said company should appoint, the sum of £44; for the relief of poor children in Christ's Hospital, in London, to be paid to the masters and governors, the sum of £20; for the charge of a dinner for the wardens, assistants, and livery of the said company, at their hall on St Andrew's day, the sum of £20; to the wardens appointed, for their pains in disposing of the said monies, the sum of £1; to the clerk of the company for his attendance, and for providing and keeping a book, yearly, of the said distributions, and making of acquittances, the sum of £1; and to the headle of the company for his attendance in the distributions, the sum of 10s. The schedule then contained directions, that when the said trustees should be reduced to eight, the survivors should convey the premises to twenty others, being freemen of the Mystery of Mercers, and their heirs, upon the trusts aforesaid. The schedule also contained a further provision, that if it should happen [170] that the rectory of Kirton, and other the premises, should at any time be lawfully exicted, or that by the alteration of times, the rents and profits thereof should so much decay and fall, that the good uses above mentioned should not be maintained therewith, in such case the wardens and commonalty should not be charged with any further payments than the said rectory and other the premises should in true and just value amount to; and it should be lawful for the company to make a proportionable abatement of the monies before limited to the said several uses, answerable to such decay or fall of the rents thereof, as should so happen.

The payments by the schedule provided, to be made out of the rent of £150, being the income of the premises at the time of the grant, amounted to the sum of £149 11s.

New trustees were from time to time chosen of the said rectory, and other property and conveyances thereof from time to time made to such new trustees, who from time to time paid over the rents and profits of the rectory to the wardens and commonalty of the Mystery of Mercers, in order that they might distribute the same according to the trusts of the deed before-mentioned and the schedule thereto.

In the year 1772 an act of parliament was passed, intituled "an act for dividing and inclosing the Common Fen and certain other commonable places and open fields within the parish of Kirton, in the parts of Holland, in the county of Lincoln." The commissioners under that act by their award, dated on or about the 10th of May, 1773, allotted to the company of Mercers in lieu of all the tithes, both great and small, and all ecclesiastical dues and payments arising and belonging to the company upon and out of all or any [171] of the lands in the parish of Kirton, and upon the Common Fen and other places directed to be inclosed, three parcels of land lying in the High or Great Fen, in the inclosure called Kirton Inclosure, in the said parish of Kirton, containing respectively 317a. 1r. 29p., 226a. 3r. 23p., and 48a. 1r. 12p., and one parcel of land lying in the inclosure called Sutterton Inclosure, in the parish of Sutterton, containing 3r. 3p., making the whole quantity of land allotted 593a. 1r. 27p.

By a lease dated on the 22d of June, 1773, after reciting the particular allotments from the commissioners' award as before stated, and also reciting that the company were also possessed of a messuage or cottage and 2a. and 1r. by estimation, of pasture land thereto belonging, and also of 3r. and 13p. by measurement, then inclosed, in the parish of Kirton, and of 2a. by estimation of pasture formerly inclosed in the parish of Sutterton, and that all such lands and allotments contained together by measure and estimation 598a. 2r.; and also reciting that an estimate had been made of the expense of building a substantial messuage, barns, stables, and brew-house, and other proper houses and buildings in some part of the premises, amounting to the sum of £1215 17s. 1d., and a like estimate of the expense of fencing and dividing the allotments, amounting to the sum of £1149 6s. 5d., and that one William Watson had agreed with the company for a lease of the premises, and to expend the said sums of money for the purposes aforesaid; the company demised all the said premises to William Watson for sixty-one years, from Lady-day then last, at the yearly rent of £315, and the lessee covenanted to expend the before mentioned sums respectively in [172] erecting the buildings, and in fencing the allotments within the three first years of the term.

The covenant had been duly performed by William Watson, at an expense exceeding the stipulated sums by £700, and continued in the possession of the premises till the time of his death, upon which event his son, William Watson the younger, became intitled to the lease, and finding himself unable to carry on the farm, agreed with the company to surrender the lease to them upon having an annuity of £400 secured to him for the remainder of the term of sixty-one years, and the agreement was carried into effect by a deed of surrender, dated on the 1st of March, 1816.

A new lease, dated the 7th of October, 1817, was afterwards granted to Samuel Everard, the present tenant, for twenty-one years and a half, from Lady-day 1816, at the rent of a pepper-corn for the first half-year, and of £1000 per annum for the remaining twenty-one years, and these terms were fixed in consideration of the tenant agreeing to lay out £700 in repairing and improving the premises.

The payments specified in the schedule annexed to the indenture before stated, were not increased by the company, but such payments were from time to time regularly made, except as to the sum allotted to Christ's Hospital, which was purchased by the Appellants, and also to the sum allotted to the Appellants for a dinner on St. Andrew's day, which had for some years been discontinued, by reason of the surplus produce of the charity estate having been carried to the company's general funds. The sum allotted for the discharge of poor debtors had been frequently unapplied, in consequence of the restriction as to the amount, but the unapplied arrears had been duly [173] brought to account, and from time to time invested in the funds; and in the month of August, 1808, a sum of £102 17s. 2d. three per cent. consolidated Bank Annuities was purchased with £273 8s. 10d. arising from such arrears; and in the month of February, 1818, a further sum of £397 2s. 10d. three per cent. consolidated Bank Annuities was purchased with £320 3s. 11d. out of such arrears, making in the whole the sum of £800 three per cent. consolidated Bank Annuities, and the dividends thereof, amounting to £24 per annum, were carried to the account of the prisoners; and at an audit of the accounts of the charity on the 11th of October, 1820, there was a balance in the hands of the company of £149 11s. 11d.

In the year 1818, upon a report made by a committee to the court of assistants, that the small sums directed to be appropriated to the release of debtors, under the indenture secondly stated, and the schedule thereunto, were not sufficient, from the great change in the value of money, to attain the object of the donor in the release of deserving debtors,—It was resolved by the court that the masters and wardens of the Company should be authorized in future to apply the charity annually as they should see best, so as to release the greatest practicable number of deserving debtors, and that in consequence of this resolution the sums appropriated to each case had been extended where necessary, to £3.

The annuity of £20 a year given to Christ's Hospital by Sir Thomas Bennett, was purchased by the Company of Mercers in the year 1811, under the authority of the act made and passed for the redemption of the land tax.

The sums actually paid by the Company from the [174] rent of the estate and premises were as follows: the annuity of £100 to William Watson. The rent of £20 reserved by the aforesaid letters patent and now paid to a purchaser from the Crown, and £20 to the corporation of Wallingford; £5 each to four poor brethren of the company appointed for life at a general court, amounting together to £20. The prisoners in the two Compters and Ludgate, £24. To the Renter Warden, to be applied by him, at his discretion, in clothing or otherwise relieving poor and distressed objects in the city of London, £14. To the Renter Warden, £1. To the clerk, £1. To the beadle, 10s. For the annual insurance of the premises from fire, £11 12s.; which amounted in the whole to the sum of £521 2s. The residue of the rents of the estate had been for many years carried to the general account of the company, and had been applied by them to their own use and benefit.

These facts coming to the knowledge of the Commissioners, appointed under the statute 59 Geo. 3. c. 91, in the course of their inquiry, and it appearing to them that the Appellants were not entitled to retain such surplus for their own use, but that the whole of the rents ought to be applied to the purposes specified by the donor, they certified the particulars to the Attorney General, who thereupon filed an information in the Court of Exchequer against the Appellants and their trustees, stating the above circumstances, and praying that it might be declared that the Appellants were mere trustees for the distribution of the rents and profits of the estate, and ought to apply the whole of such rents and profits, as well as the dividends of the stock which had been purchased with a part of that fund, to the purposes prescribed by the donor, or some similar thereto, or to such other cha-[175]ritable purposes as His Majesty or the court should direct; and that they might be decreed to account for all the surplus rents which they had received, so long back as the court should think proper; and to pay what upon such account should appear to be due from them; and that it might be referred to a Master to approve of a scheme for the due application of such arrears, as well as of the future rents of the estate and dividends arising from the stock.

To this information the Appellants and trustees put in their answer, admitting the above facts; and the answer having been replied to, the cause came on to be heard before the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, on the 27th of April, 1826, when the deeds by which the charity was founded having been produced and read in evidence, the cause stood for judgment, and on the 30th of May following, the Lord Chief Baron pronounced his decree, whereby it was declared that the Appellants were trustees of the rents, and of the augmented rents of the estates in the pleadings mentioned, and that the surplus rents, after answering the several payments directed to be made by the said deed of the 17th of January, 1616, are applicable to such and the same purposes as Sir Thomas Bennett has pointed out and directed the rents of such estate to be applied to, by the aforesaid deed of the 17th of January, 1616, without prejudice nevertheless to the question, how far the Appellants were entitled to partake of or share in the said increased or augmented rents, with reference to their share or benefit in the said original rent of £150, given to the Appellants by the deed of the 17th of January, 1616, and the decree directed accounts of the rents to be taken accordingly.

From this decree the appeal was presented.

[176] For the Appellants: Mr. Bickersteth and Mr. Monro.

For the Respondent: The Attorney General and Mr. Pemberton.

For the Appellants it was argued: That the donor had given the estate absolutely in use to the Appellants, and by the declaration of trust he had imposed on them the obligation of making certain specific annual payments out of the rents, which at the time of the gift did not amount to the annual produce of the estates: that there was an excess, and the amount of the excess was not material (Mocatta v. Lonsdale), therefore, instead of there being any ground of implication that the donor intended to dedicate the whole usufruct of the land to charitable purposes, on the contrary, the direct conclusion of the law is, that there was no such intention, and that a Court of Equity cannot imply a further intention, because the subject relates to public charity: that the Appellants were the express objects of the donor's regard: and as one of the purposes he had in view in making the gift, is declared to be to manifest his love and affection to his brethren, the Freemen of the Mercers' Company, it might be reasonably concluded that he intended to effect this purpose, by giving to the Appellants the surplus rents which should remain after the purposes particularly specified were answered: that in conferring the trust, the donor made the Appellants liable to responsibilities in respect of the rent reserved to the Crown and otherwise, and must therefore be understood to have intended the Appellants to receive any benefit which might remain after they had fully performed the [177] trusts particularly declared (Att. Gen. v. Corp. of Bristol, 2 Jac. and W. 294); and that length of time, although it was not an absolute limitation in the case of a charity, was nevertheless a circumstance to be considered (per Lord Holt in The Att. Gen. v. Coventry, cit. 3 Mad. 353).

For the Respondents it was argued: That upon the whole frame of the deeds by which the property in question was vested in trustees, and the trusts thereof declared, it was manifest that the Appellants were intended to receive the whole of the rents as trustees for the purpose of distribution amongst the objects of the charity, and were not intended to take the estate as beneficial owners, subject to certain specific charges in favour of the charity.

(16th July.) The Lord Chancellor (after stating the substance of the deed and schedule):

This property, which was at the period in question of the annual value of about £150, is at present of a value greatly exceeding that amount, and the question is, to whom the surplus rent belongs. The Mercers' Company contend that, according to the terms of this trust, they are entitled to the surplus rent, and on the other side it is contended, on the part of the Attorney General, who has filed this information, that the surplus rents, the increased rents, are to be applied to charitable purposes, similar to those designated in this schedule. In looking at the terms of this trust, your Lordships will find that the donor adverts, not merely to the standing rent of £150 a year, but he looks forward to a possible alteration in the rent. The trustees are directed to pay over to the Mercers' Company all the rents which shall from time to time accrue: [178] and then it is directed that they shall receive the said yearly rent of £150, and "all other the rents, issues, and profits thereof, from thenceforth to grow due and payable, and that the monies thereof arising, shall yearly be delivered to the Mercers' Company, so that the £150 a year during the continuation of that lease is to be paid over by the trustees to the Mercers' Company: the future rents, however large they may be, are from time to time to be paid over to the Mercers' Company, and the direction is that the Mercers'

Company, yearly and for ever pay and dispose of all the said monies, so from time to time to be paid and delivered as aforesaid." So that they are to receive the rents, whatever may be the amount of those rents, from time to time, and they are to pay over those rents, whatever their amount may be, to the purposes specially pointed out in this schedule. Therefore, upon the fair and obvious construction of that instrument, up to the point to which I have directed your attention, it appears that all the rents, however large, were to be applied to the purposes of those trusts.

But an argument has been raised out of the circumstance, that in the application of the first £150, £149 11s. only is appropriated, that there is a surplus of 9s., and that that surplus belongs to the trustees, being unappropriated, which is therefore evidence to shew that it was the intention of the donor that whatever surplus rents at any future period might arise, it was not intended that those surplus rents should be applied to the purposes designated in the deed the special and particular purposes, but that they should become the absolute property of the Mercers' Company.

The case of the Attorney General v. The Mayor and Corporation of Bristol (2 J. and W. 294), was referred to for the [179] purpose of establishing this position: now the only principle established, or rather confirmed by that case, was, that where there is a surplus under circumstances similar to the present, that is, where there is an annual sum granted, and a part of that annual sum only is appropriated to special objects, and there is a residue which the trustees hold, that is evidence of the intention of the donor, that the surplus rent should belong to the persons to whom this property is in the first instance conveyed, but it is only evidence of the intention: it is liable to be repelled by any other evidence arising out of the instrument upon which that fact appears. It is quite obvious that if it is made use of merely as evidence of the intention of the donor, something must depend upon the amount of the sum; and surely no very strong evidence of intention can arise out of an instrument of this kind where it appears that the whole sum at that period amounted to £150 a year, which is applied to a great number of special objects, and that the only balance remaining unappropriated is the fractional sum of 9s. No very strong evidence of intention can arise from a circumstance of that description, that it was the intention of the donor that any surplus funds at any future time, however large, should become the property of the Mercers' Company. Whatever slight inference of intention may arise from the omission to appropriate that small fractional sum, is repelled by the very strong terms in the former part of the deed, in which it is expressed, not only that the existing rent of £150 a year, but all the rents should be received by the trustees and handed over to the Mercers' Company; and the Mercers' Company are directed to apply not the present rents only, but all the rents to the purposes of the will. That direction is so specific [180] as to overrule any inference arising from the small extra fractional sum not being appropriated.

It was stated by the counsel at the bar, in arguing this case, that one object of the grant was, the love and affection Sir William Bennett bore to the Mercers' Company; and that it did not sufficiently appear by looking at this instrument, that the donor had, by the special purposes pointed out in the schedule, indicated any intention of providing beneficially for the Mercers' Company; that, therefore, it was fair to assume that he meant them to profit in some way from the increase of the rent. But you will find, by referring to the objects pointed out in this instrument, that they are all specially provided for in the particular appropriations mentioned in the schedule. The objects are these: "For the relieving and maintenance of the poor of the borough or town of Wallingford, being near unto the place where the donor was born; and of the poor within the city of London, where he hath been brought up, and doth now inhabit and dwell; and of the poor of the Mystery of the Mercers of the same city of London, of which company he is free; and the better to manifest his love and affection towards his brethren, the freemen of the same company." Now on looking into the schedule, you will find all those objects provided for: first there is "to the mayor, burgesses, and commonalty of the said borough or town of Wallingford, to be disposed of in manner therein mentioned, £20 a year." So that the first object is provided for; namely, his regard to the inhabitants of Wallingford. "To four poor brethren of the Company of Mercers, the yearly sum of £20, that is to say, £5 a-piece;" Another object intended specially to be provided for: "For redeeming twelve [181] persons lying for debt in the prisons of London, called the two Compters and Ludgate, £24, to be distributed in manner therein mentioned; and for clothing with hose, shoes, shirts, and such like, of poor and naked men, women, and children, wandering in the streets of the city of London, and that have no dwelling to be bestowed as therein mentioned, £14 a year." That is another object specially provided for; then "For the charges of a dinner to be provided for the wardens, assistants, and livery of the Mercers' Company, £20 a year." That is to shew his regard to the company of which he was a member. There are other sums, to which it is unnecessary for me to direct your attention; but you will find that he provides specially in this schedule for the different objects which, in the recital of the deed of trust, he declares it his intention to provide. Therefore, no argument of that description can, in my apprehension, arise out of this recital of the deed.

An argument was attempted to be raised out of the concluding clause, "That if it shall happen that the said rectory of Kirton and other the premises shall at any time hereafter be lawfully evicted, or that by the alteration of times, the rents and profits thereof shall so much decay and fall that the good uses above mentioned cannot be supported and maintained therewith, in such case the said wardens and commonalty shall not be charged with any further payment than the said rectory and other the premises shall in true and just value amount to: and from thenceforth it shall be lawful for the said wardens and commonalty and their successors, to make proportionable abatement of the monies hereinbefore limited to the said several uses, answerable to such decay or fall of the rents thereof, as shall so happen." No [182] provision is here made for any increase of rent; the provision is made only with a view to the possible decrease of rent; but it is easy to understand why the provision was framed in that way: it was to prevent all disputes in case there should happen to be decrease of rents; in that case, instead of any particular object being entirely defeated, the Mercers' Company were directed to reduce each of them in proportion. It was with that view, and that view only, as it appears to me, that the clause was introduced.

I have gone further into detail than I should otherwise have done, because it has been contended at the bar that, to confirm this decision of the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, would be to overrule the decision in the case of the Attorney General v. the Corporation of Bristol. The principle of that decision is that which I have stated: that if there is a part of the sum unappropriated, it is a circumstance which courts of justice (and particularly in that case,) have considered as an evidence of the intention of the donor, as to what should take place with respect to any future increase of that sum; but it is only evidence of the intention; and I apprehend the circumstances to which I have adverted, are in this case sufficient to rebut any inference of such an intention, arising from the non-application of the small fractional sum to which I have adverted. I was extremely desirous of knowing what was the opinion of the noble and learned lord by whom that case of the Corporation of Bristol had been decided. The noble and learned lord has looked into the decision in this case, and he does not consider it at all inconsistent with the decision of that case. On the contrary, he agrees with me in opinion, that the decision of the court below [183] is perfectly correct. Under these circumstances, I should propose to your Lordships that this judgment be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

(COURT OF EXCHEQUER.)

The Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of MERCERS of the City of London,— Appellants; HIS MAJESTY'S ATTORNEY GENERAL,—Respondent.

[Sec 2 Bli. N.S. 165.]

By a deed granting lands, etc. to a Corporation of the City of London, to be applied to charitable uses, it was provided, that if the premises should be evicted, the company should be discharged from any further payment or continuance of the uses; and if the premises, by alteration of times, should so much decay in rent that the uses could not be supported therewith, the company should only be chargeable with the payments appointed to Christ's Hospital and to the Company of Barber Surgeons, being £6 yearly; and from thenceforth it should be lawful for the said company to make such abatement of the sums before limited, except the £6 to Christ's Hospital and the Barber Surgeons, as should be answerable to the fall of the rents which should so happen.

Held, that this was conditional, and not a positive charge upon the grantees to be paid by them, at all events so as to furnish an inference, that, being subject to such charge, they must be entitled to a surplus of the rents arising by an increase in the value of the property.

By indenture, dated the 12th of May, 1619, John Bancks, citizen and mercer of London, granted, bargained, and sold to Sir Baptist Hicks, and others therein mentioned, and their heirs and assigns, a messuage or tenement, with all buildings, gardens, and other appurtenances thereto belonging, situate in Holloway, in the parish of Islington, in the county [185] of Middlesex; and also three crofts, or closes of pasture-ground, with the appurtenances, containing by estimation six acres, to the said messuage adjoining.

By a further indenture, also dated the 12th of May, 1619, and made and executed by and between the said John Bancks, of the first part; the said Sir Baptist Hicks, and the other trustees of the second part; and the wardens and commonalty of the Mystery of Mercers of the city of London, of the third part; and by a schedule thereunto annexed, it was declared that the conveyance thereinbefore mentioned, was made upon trust, that the said Sir Baptist Hicks, and the other trustees, should permit the said John Bancks to receive the rents and profits during his life; and that, after his death, they should receive the yearly rent of £17, for which the said premises were then demised, under a lease granted by the said John Bancks, and all other rents and profits thereof to grow due and payable, and the monies thereof arising, should yearly and for ever, well and truly pay and deliver to the renter-warden of the Company of Mercers for the time being; and that the wardens and commonalty of the Mercers, and their successors, should, from and after the decease of the said John Bancks, yearly, for ever, pay and dispose all the said monies, so from time to time to be paid and delivered to them as aforesaid, to the purposes following: viz. to the governors of Christ's Hospital in London, yearly, the sum of £5, to be distributed as follows: for a sermon on the day of election of the governors, £1 2s.; for a dinner for the governors, £1 6s. 8d.; for the two clerks, 2s. each; for cakes and wine, £1 6s. 8d.; for the stewards, 2s. 6d., the matron, 2s. 6d., the beadles, 4s., making together 9s.; for the poor of Christ Church parish, if the sermon should be preached there, 6s. 8d. [186] for the minister of Christ Church, 2s.; for the two clerks and sexton, 3s.; and also the sum of £7 11s. for seven sermons, to be preached by learned divines in the Mercers' Church, yearly, upon Midsummer-day, Michaelmas-day, the day of the confirmation of new wardens of the company, and the four general court days of the said company, every sermon 22s.; and also to the renter-warden of the said company, the sum of £1; and also to the said company's chaplain, 6s. 8d.; and also to the clerk of the said company, 10s.; to the beadle, 3s. 1d.; to the sexton and keeper of the chapel, 6s. 8d.; and also for a dinner, every third or fifth year, for the wardens and some of the feoffees, with three workmen to view the reparations, £3; and to each of the three workmen, 2s. each; and also to the Company of Barber Surgeons, London, 20s. yearly, to be distributed on the 11th day of May, yearly, to twelve poor householders or widows of the said company, in beef, bread, and two pence a piece in money, and each of them one wooden platter; and to the clerk of the same company, 2s.

New trustees had been from time to time chosen out of the Mercers' Company, to whom the estate had been from time to time conveyed.

The trust estate consisting of a dwelling-house, and about six acres of land, were let from the year 1631, when the rents became first receivable by the trustees, to 1733, for the annual sum of £17; and from the year 1733 to 1776, for the annual sum of £14. About the year 1749, the rent of £14 being insufficient to defray the expenses of the several purposes specified in the indenture hereinbefore mentioned, the seven annual sermons above mentioned were reduced, by a resolution of a general court of the Company [187] of Mercers, to the number of four, which last mentioned number continued to be preached till the year 1820, when at a general court of the company, held on the 30th of March, the former resolution was rescinded, and the seven sermons had since been preached in the manner directed in the deed.

The premises were let from the year 1776 to 1797 at the rent of £21 per annum; and from the year 1797 to 1816, at a rent of £30 per annum. In the year 1816 the premises were let for the term of seven years, at the annual rent of £84, which was the rent at the date of the appeal.

All the other payments specified in the indentures, had been satisfied by the company, excepting that as no periodical visit to view the repairs of the tenement took place, no specific dinner was provided, nor were any workmen paid as directed on such visitations, and except that the annuity of £5 to Christ's Hospital, in the year 1811, was purchased by the Company of Mercers from the hospital, under the authority of certain acts of parliament, made and passed for the redemption of the land-tax.

The payments directed to be made under the indenture, amounted to about the sum of £17, being the then annual value and proceeds of the premises; and the sum of £67 per annum, the excess of the improved rent of the premises, had been, ever since the year 1816, carried to the general account of the Company of Mercers, and applied, with their other funds, for their general purposes, and not to any charitable purpose.

John Bancks, by his will, dated the 20th of May, 1630, among other things, gave and bequeathed to the Company of Mercers the sum of £200, and he thereby directed and empowered the company to [188] lend out from time to time for ever, the said sum to two young men of the said company for the term of five years successively, at the rate and interest of three per cent. per annum; the yearly benefit thereof to be put to the account of his lands at Holloway. This sum was received by the company, but at the time of hearing the cause, the money had not been lent out in the manner directed by the will, no application having been made for the loan.

These facts coming to the knowledge of the commissioners, appointed under the statute 59 Geo. 3. c. 91, in the course of their inquiries, it appeared to them that the Appellants were not entitled to retain such surplus for their own use, but that the whole of the rents ought to be applied to the purposes specified by the donor. They accordingly certified the particulars to the Attorney General, who thereupon filed an information in the Court of Exchequer against the Appellants and their trustees, stating the above circumstances, and praying that it might be declared that the Appellants were mere trustees for the distribution of the whole income of the Charity Estate, and ought to apply the increased rents to the purposes mentioned in the original deed of foundation, or such other charitable purposes as the court should direct; and that they might be decreed to account for all the surplus rents received by them since 1816, as well as for the interest of the sum of £200 bequeathed by the donor's will, and to pay what might appear to be due from them into court, and that it might be referred to one of the Masters of the court to approve of a scheme for the due application of such arrears, and of all the future income.

To this information the Appellants and trustees put in their answer, which admitted the facts alleged.

[189] The answer having been replied to, the cause came on to be heard on the 27th of April, 1826, before the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, when the deeds of foundation having been read, the cause stood for judgment, and on the 30th of May following the Lord Chief Baron pronounced his decree, whereby it was declared, that the Appellants were trustees of the rents, and of the augmented rents of the estates, and of the interest of the sum of £200 in the pleadings mentioned; and that the surplus rents and the said interest, after answering the several payments directed to be made by the said deed of the 12th of May, 1619, were applicable to such and the same purposes as the testator, John Bancks, directed the rents of such estate to be applied to, by the aforesaid deed of the 12th day of May, 1619, without prejudice nevertheless to the question how far the Appellants were intitled to partake of or share the said increased or augmented rents, with reference to their share or benefit in the said original rent given to the Appellants by the said deed of the 12th of May, 1619, and directed accounts of the said rents to be taken accordingly.

From this decree the appeal was presented.

For the Appellants: Mr. Bickersteth and Mr. Monro.

For the Respondents: The Attorney General and Mr. Pemberton.

The Lord Chancellor: There is another case of a similar description to that which your Lordships have just decided, a case in which the Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of Mercers of the City of London, are Appellants, and His Majesty's Attorney [190] General, is Respondent. That was a case arising out of a Charity, founded by a person of the name of Baucks. The provisions of the deed are extremely similar, and it does not appear to me that there is any material distinction between the two cases. The only distinction adverted to, was, that it was supposed that to the extent of £6 the Corporation would at all events be chargeable; and therefore if they were liable in case of diminution of rents, to the extent of £6, it was contended that they would be entitled to the surplus: I think this arises entirely from a misapprehension of the nature of the clause. It concludes with a proviso in these terms: "That if it should happen that the messuage and premises should at any time thereafter be lawfully evicted, then and immediately from thenceforth the said company should be discharged from any further payment or continuance of the uses aforesaid, or if the said messuage and other premises should by alteration of times so much decay in rent, that the uses above mentioned could not be supported therewith, in such case the said company should only be chargeable with the payments appointed to Christ's Hospital, and to the Company of Barber Surgeons, being £6 yearly; and from thenceforth it should be lawful for the said Mercers' Company to make such a defalcation and abatement of all the sums of money therein before limited, except the said £6 to Christ's Hospital and the Company of Barber Surgeons, as should be answerable to the fall of rents which should so happen, and as the said Mercers' Company should think fit." I do not think, taking this clause altogether, that it was the intention to make the company at all events chargeable for the payment of £6 to Christ's Hospital and the Company of Barber Surgeons, but that the obvious import of the clause was this: If the [191] parties are evicted, if the Mercers' Company are entirely evicted from the property, they are to be relieved from all liability; and if there shall be a reduction of the rents, then in the first instance the £6 is at all events to be paid to the Barbers' Company and Christ's Hospital, and the surplus above £6 to be divided among the other objects of the charity, rateably. But on a supposition which it was not very easy to make, that the rents should be reduced below the £6: it was never intended, as I conceive, on the fair construction of this instrument, that the Mercers' Company would be bound to pay the £6 to the Barbers' Company and Christ's Hospital, but only so much as they should receive. I apprehend that the argument built upon the interpretation of this clause, putting that interpretation upon it, which it was supposed at the bar to bear, cannot be supported, and therefore that this case falls precisely within the principle of the former decision, and therefore I recommend to your Lordships that this Judgment also should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

HANNAH RUSCOMBE, Appellant: RICHARD HARE, MARY RUSCOMBE, WILLIAM LONG, and RICHARD MEADE, Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. vii, 1181, ix, 1169. S. C. 6 Dow P. C. 1 (1817-1818). See Jackson v. Innes, 1819, 1 Bl. 401; Clark v. Burgh, 1815, 2 Coll. 221.]

N. being intitled to certain lands as issue in tail, conveys them in 1719 by lease and release to a mortgagee in fee to secure £800 borrowed, and levies a fine of the lands pursuant to covenant for the purpose of perfecting the security. In 1762 N. borrows £450, and charges it upon the same lands by deed-poll. N. died in 1764, leaving the charge upon the lands of the aggregate sum of £1250, with an arrear of interest, and he by his will devised all his lands to M. his wife. In 1766, M. having married A. B., they by lease and release reciting the mortgage, and that A. B. had paid the interest, grant and confirm the mortgaged lands to the mortgagee, reserving the equity of redemption to A. B., his heirs, etc. By a deed in 1789, £300, an arrear of interest, is added to the principal, and the aggregate sum of £1550 is charged on the lands, subject to redemption as by the former deed. M. died in 1794, leaving R. H., a son by the first husband, her heir at law. In 1797 A. B. sold part of the mortgaged lands, and in consideration of £2000 principal and interest, paid to the mortgagee, and £600 paid to A. B., he and the mortgagee conveyed such part of the lands to R. H., the purchaser. The rest of the lands was conveyed by the mortgagee to A. B. who died in 1799. Under these circumstances the heir at law of M. filed a bill in the Exchequer to redeem the lands, and the court decreed that he was intitled to redeem on payment of the principal money due upon the mortgage, and interest calculated from the death of A. B. Upon appeal to the House of Lords from this decree, it was declared that R. H., as heir at law of M., was intitled, notwithstanding the proviso for redemption reserved to A. B. by the deed made between him and the mortgagee, to redeem the lands "on payment of the principal money and interest, due at the death of M. on the aggregate sum of £1250. Such in-[193]terest to be computed according to the proviso in the indenture of release and mortgage." A. B., being intitled in equity to have the interest due at the death of his wife added to the principal, and considered as an aggregate sum with the principal, A. B. and M. his wife not being bound to keep down the interest during her life for the benefit of her heir at law, etc. and that an account should be taken of what was due for principal and interest on the mortgage at the death of M. The decree of the Exchequer being varied according to this order, it was referred to the Master to take the accounts so directed, and it appeared in evidence before him that A. B. and M. his wife, during her life, paid to the mortgagee, on account of interest, £1500; that the Master in his report did not include this sum, but reported that there was due upon this account for principal £1250, and for interest at the death of M. £286 9s. 2d. On this ground exceptions were taken to the report, which being in this respect confirmed, and a decree made upon further directions accordingly, a farther appeal was presented to the House of Lords.

But the decree was affirmed, the House being of opinion that the representative of the husband was not intitled, as against the heir of the wife, to an allowance of interest actually paid by the husband during the life of his wife, and that the former order of the House, directing the account of interest due on the mortgage at the death of M. meant interest actually due.

By a will, made in the year 1724, Nicholas Hare devised the lands in question in this cause to his son Nicholas Hare for 99 years, if he should so long live; and after the determination of that estate, unto the issue of the body of that son, lawfully begotten, with remainders over.

Nicholas Hare, the son, entered upon the lands, and continued in possession till he died intestate, whereupon his son, Nicholas Hare, who was the grandson of the first named Nicholas Hare, became possessed of, and intitled to the lands. By indentures of lease and release dated the 1st and 2d days of March, 1749, the release being made between Nicholas Hare the grandson, on the one part, and William House of the [194] other part, Nicholas Hare, in consideration of £800 paid to him by William House, conveyed unto the said William House, his heirs and assigns, all and singular the estates devised by the said will, as also other estates, of which Nicholas Hare the grandson was seised in fee, to hold the same unto and to the use of William House, his heirs and assigns, with a proviso for redeeming the same on payment of the sum of £800, with interest at the rate of £4 5s. per cent. per annum, which William House agreed to accept in lieu of £5 per cent. per annum, in case of punctual payment; and Nicholas Hare covenanted with William House to levy a fine of the estates, which was afterwards duly levied accordingly.

In a few years afterwards Nicholas Hare borrowed a further sum of £450 from William House, on the security of the same estates, and in order to perfect the security, Nicholas Hare executed a deed-poll, dated the 1st day of June, 1762, whereby he charged all the lands with the payment of the sum of £150, and interest at the rate of £1 5s. per cent. per annum.

Nicholas Hare, the mortgagor, never redeemed the lands, but died in the year 1764, having by his will, dated the 21st of June, 1757, devised all his freehold estates and lands of inheritance whatsoever, to his wife Mary Hare, her heirs and assigns, and he appointed her sole executrix of his will, and she duly proved the same.

In the year 1765, Mary Hare intermarried with Alexander Bruford the elder, and Alexander Bruford the elder, and his wife, were in the possession of the mortgaged estates from the death of Nicholas Hare, the mortgagor, until the death of Mary Bruford.

In the year 1766 Alexander Bruford the elder, and Mary his wife, executed certain indentures of lease and release, bearing date the 2d and 3d of February, [195] 1766, which were made between Alexander Bruford and Mary his wife, of the one part, and William House of the other part, whereby, after reciting the indentures of lease and release of the 1st and 2d of March, 1749, and the deed-poll of the 1st of June, 1762, and that the sums of £800 and £450 thereby secured, were not paid; and after also reciting the death of Nicholas Hare, and his will, and the marriage of Mary Hare with Alexander Bruford, and that the sums of £800 and £450 were still due, but that all the interest had been paid up to that time by Alexander Bruford; it was witnessed, that for the better securing the two several sums of £800 and £450 unto William House, his executors, administrators, and assigns, together with interest for the same, as therein mentioned, Alexander Bruford and Mary his wife granted, etc. to William House, his heirs and assigns, all the estates, to hold the estates unto and to the use of William House, his heirs and assigns, discharged of the former proviso for redemption, but subject to the proviso therein contained, viz. that in case Alexander Bruford, his executors, administrators, or assigns should pay the two several sums of £800 and £450, and all interest due thereon, at the time therein mentioned, to William House, his executors, administrators, or assigns, clear of all incumbrances, the said William House, his heirs or assigns, would at any time or times thereafter, at the request, and at the costs and charges in the law of Alexander Bruford, his heirs or assigns, release and convey the messuages or tenements, lands, and premises thereby released, to the said Alexander Bruford, his heirs and assigns for ever, or as he or they should in that behalf direct or appoint; and it was thereby declared and agreed, by and between the parties thereto, and Alexander Bruford and [196] Mary his wife did jointly and separately declare and agree, that all fines and recoveries, conveyances, and assurances theretofore, made, levied, or suffered of the said premises, and particularly a fine then agreed to be levied, and which Alexander Bruford covenanted for himself and Mary his wife, to levy to William House, his heirs and assigns, should be and enure to and for the proper use of William House, his heirs and assigns, subject to the condition of redemption, above mentioned.

The fine was afterwards levied according to the covenant, and Alexander Bruford executed a bond to William House, as a collateral security for the due payment of the said mortgage money.

The interest on the mortgage was not duly paid, and in the year 1789 there was due to William House, the sum of £300 for interest on the £1250; whereupon Alexander Bruford the elder and William House agreed that the interest should be added to the principal sum, and that a further mortgage should be made to secure the same, and that accordingly an indenture, dated the 3d of February, 1789, was made between Alexander Bruford of the one part, and William House of the other part, whereby it was witnessed, that in order to secure the two sums of £1250 and £300, making together £1550, the said Alexander Bruford did grant, release, and confirm to William House, his heirs and assigns, all the aforesaid estates, to hold the same in fee, subject to redemption, on payment by Alexander Bruford, his heirs or assigns, of the principal sum of £1550 with interest.

William House, the mortgagee, died on the 21st of May, 1791, leaving his son William House his heir-at-law, and having by his will appointed his son his sole executor: William House, the son, proved [197] his father's will, and thereby became his legal personal representative.

Mary Bruford, the wife of Alexander Bruford the elder, died in the year 1794, leaving Richard Hare, her only child by her first husband, Nicholas Hare, her heir-at-law, Alexander Bruford the elder, her second husband, and Alexander Bruford, her eldest son by her second marriage.

In the year 1797 Alexander Bruford the elder agreed with Richard Ruscombe for the sale to him of part of the mortgaged estates, and thereupon indentures of lease and release, bearing date respectively the 20th and 21st of June, 1797, were made between William House, the son of the mortgagee, of the first part, Alexander Bruford of the second part, Richard Ruscombe of the third part, and William Long of the fourth part: whereby after reciting, amongst other things, that upon an account that day made up and fairly stated by and between Alexander Bruford the elder and William House, there appeared to be due and owing to William House, for principal and interest, on and by virtue of the several therein recited securities, the full sum of £2000: it was witnessed, that in consideration of the sum of £2000 to the said William House, paid by Richard Ruscombe, and of the further sum of £600 paid by Richard Ruscombe to Alexander Bruford the elder, William House released and conveyed, and Alexander Bruford the elder granted, ratified, and confirmed unto Richard Ruscombe and William Long, the estates and premises therein particularly described, which were part of the mortgaged estates, to hold to Richard Ruscombe and William Long, to the use of such person, and for such purpose, as Richard Ruscombe by deed or will should appoint: and in default thereof, to the [198] use of William Long, his heirs and assigns, during the life of Richard Ruscombe, but in trust for Richard Ruscombe: and after the determination of that estate, to the use of the right heirs of Richard Ruscombe.

Upon the execution of the conveyance, Richard Ruscombe paid his purchase money, and was let into possession of that part of the estate which was so purchased by him, and he continued in possession thereof to the time of his death.

The mortgage to William House was, by means of the £2000 paid to him, fully paid off and satisfied, and William House reconveyed the remainder of the estates to Alexander Bruford the elder, and the same was held and enjoyed by Alexander Bruford the elder during the remainder of his life.

Alexander Bruford the elder died in the month of May, 1799, having by his will appointed his sons, namely, Alexander Bruford, who was his heir-at-law, and Francis Bruford, his executors: and he also devised to them, in fee, all his real estates.

Alexander Bruford and Francis Bruford proved the will of their father, and on his death entered upon and took possession of the remainder of the mortgaged estates so reconveyed to their father by William House as aforesaid, and they continued in possession thereof at the time when the present suit was instituted by Richard Hare, the heir-at-law of Mary Bruford.

The suit was instituted in the Court of Exchequer in Trinity Term, 1800, by Richard Hare, against William House, Richard Ruscombe, Alexander Bruford, Francis Bruford, and William Long; and William House having died, the suit was revived against Mary Woodland, his heiress-at-law and executrix, and Francis Bruford having become bankrupt, a supplemental bill was filed against William Gray and [199] John Slade, his assignees, and the original bill was amended: and by the bill it was stated to the effect aforesaid, and that Richard Hare was entitled to the possession of the estates, subject to the mortgages which affected the same, and therefore prayed that the usual accounts might be taken, and that upon payment by the said Richard Hare of what should be found due to the said William House upon taking the accounts, Richard Hare might be at liberty to redeem the premises: and that William House, and all necessary parties might be decreed to convey the premises to Richard Hare, and to deliver to him the possession thereof, and of all deeds, papers, and writings relating thereto.

Alexander Bruford and Francis Bruford, by their answer, submitted, that under the several assurances and transactions therein stated, the mortgaged estates absolutely vested in their father, Alexander Bruford the elder, in fee, subject only to the payment of what was due on the mortgage to William House, and they respectively claimed to be entitled to the absolute fee simple and inheritance, as tenants in common, of all such part of the estates and premises contained in the indentures of the 1st and 2d March, 1749, as had not been purchased by and conveyed to Richard Ruscombe.

Richard Ruscombe, by his answer, set forth his purchase deed, and claimed to be entitled in fee to the estate and premises therein conveyed, as a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of Richard Hare's alleged title or claim.

William Long, by his answer, stated that he was seised of the estate sold to the Appellant Richard Ruscombe, as his trustee only; and that he had not any beneficial interest therein.

[200] William Gray and John Slade having also answered the bill, the answers were replied to, and the cause was heard on the 17th of December, 1813; and by the decree which bore date the 2d of July, 1814, (being then passed and entered,) it was declared that Richard Hare was entitled to redeem the estates, and such accounts as therein mentioned were directed to be taken. In the directions for taking such accounts no interest was directed to be allowed to Richard Ruscombe upon the mortgage, prior to the death of Alexander Bruford the elder.

From this decree Richard Ruscombe and Alexander Bruford appealed to the House of Lords, praying that the decree might be reversed, and submitted that if the same ought not to be wholly reversed, yet that the same should be varied, because, at the death of Alexander Bruford the elder, no interest had been paid upon the mortgage for many years, which amounted in the year 1797, together with the principal money, to the sum of £2000, as appeared by the deeds of the 20th and 21st of June, 1797; whereas by the decree no interest was allowed to Richard Ruscombe upon the mortgage, prior to the death of Alexander Bruford.

Pending the appeal Richard Ruscombe died, having made his will, whereby he devised all his estates to William Long and Richard Meade, in trust for Hannah Ruscombe his widow, and Mary Ruscombe his daughter; and he appointed Hannah Ruscombe his sole executrix and residuary legatee, who proved the will; and upon the petition of Alexander Bruford, William Long, Richard Meade, Hannah Ruscombe, and Mary Ruscombe, the appeal being revived, it was heard on the 23d of June, 1817, and the 6th of February, 1818; and by an order of the House of [201] Lords, dated the 9th of June, 1818, it was ordered and adjudged that the decree of the Court of Exchequer should be varied as therein mentioned; and that it should be referred back to the court, to review the decree, and to vary the same accordingly, and to make such further order as should be consistent therewith, and as the nature and circumstances of the case, and the deaths of parties might require.

In pursuance of the order of the House of Lords, and by an order of the Court of Exchequer, dated the 27th of February, 1819, it was ordered, that the said order of the House of Lords should be incorporated in the decree, and the decree varied accordingly. By the decree so varied, it was declared that the Plaintiff Richard Hare, as the heir-at-law of Mary, his late mother, by Nicholas Hare, her first husband, became entitled in equity, upon the death of his mother, to retain the estates in question, subject to the interest for life therein, of Alexander Bruford the elder, deceased, her second husband, notwithstanding the words of the proviso for redemption, contained in the indenture of release and mortgage of the 3d of February, 1766, in the pleadings mentioned, made between Alexander Bruford the elder, deceased, and Mary, then his wife, of the one part, and William House, deceased, of the other part, upon payment of the principal money and interest, due at the death of the said Mary, on the principal sums of £800 and £150, making together the sum of £1250 in the indenture of release and mortgage mentioned, such interest to be computed according to the proviso in the indenture of release and mortgage, Alexander Bruford the elder being entitled in equity to have the interest due at the death of his wife, added to the principal, the said Alexander Bruford and Mary his wife not being [202] bound to keep down the interest during her life for the benefit of her heir-at-law: And it was further declared that Alexander Bruford the elder, as tenant by the courtesy, was bound to keep down the interest of such aggregated sum out of the rents and profits of the estates, which afterwards accrued during his life; and that the Defendant Richard Ruscombe having purchased part of the estates, and out of the purchase money paid the principal and interest on the mortgage, was entitled to stand as mortgagee of the part of the estates conveyed to him for the aggregate sum of principal and interest, due at the death of Mary, as an aggregate principal sum, which Alexander Bruford the elder had a right to have charged on the mortgaged estates: but that the Defendant Richard Ruscombe, standing as a purchaser in the place of Alexander Bruford, who was entitled to the whole of the estates for his life, as tenant by the courtesy, was bound to keep down the interest of such aggregate sum, during the life of Alexander Bruford the elder, so far as the rents and profits of the estates conveyed to him, and accrued during that time, would extend: And it was by the decree referred to the Deputy Remembrancer of the Court, to take an account of what was due to the Defendant Richard Ruscombe for principal and interest, on the indenture of release and mortgage of the 3d of February, 1766, in the pleadings mentioned, at the death of Mary Bruford: and it was ordered that the sum so due to the Defendant Richard Ruscombe, for principal and interest, at the death of Mary Bruford, should form an aggregate sum chargeable on the estates, by virtue of the last-mentioned indenture of mortgage. It was also referred to the Deputy Remembrancer to take an account of what was then due for interest on such aggregate [203] sum, computing such interest from the death of Mary Bruford, according to the rate of interest provided by the last-mentioned indenture of mortgage: And the Deputy Remembrancer was also to take an account of what (if any thing) had been paid, laid out, or expended by the Defendant Richard Ruscombe, in his lifetime, or by Hannah Ruscombe since his decease, for necessary repairs and lasting improvements in and upon the mortgaged premises, and to tax the Defendant Hannah Ruscombe, and her late husband Richard Ruscombe, their costs of this suit, except such parts of the costs as related to, or had been occasioned by, the Defendant Richard Ruscombe, insisting upon being a purchaser of the estates for a valuable consideration: And the Deputy Remembrancer was also to take an account of the rents and profits of part of the estates conveyed to Richard Ruscombe, and received by him in his life time, or by Hannah Ruscombe since his decease, or which, without their wilful default, might have been received after the death of Mary Bruford: and if it should appear that such part of the rents and profits, as accrued due during the lifetime of Alexander Bruford the elder, and received by Richard Ruscombe, after allowances for repairs and improvements, exceeded the interest of the aggregate sum computed from the death of Mary Bruford to the death of Alexander Bruford the elder, it was declared that Richard Ruscombe was entitled to retain such excess, as standing in the place of Alexander Bruford the elder: but if such last-mentioned rents and profits, after such allowance as aforesaid, should appear not to have been sufficient to keep down the interest which accrued during the same time on such aggregate sum, then the court declared that Richard Ruscombe was entitled to stand as a creditor on the part [204] of the estates so conveyed to him for the difference, such difference to be paid out of the future rents and profits of such part of the estates which were received by him: And for that purpose it was further ordered, that it should also be referred to the Deputy Remembrancer to take distinct accounts, as against Richard Ruscombe, on the interest of the aggregate amount of principal and interest due at the death of Mary Bruford, from the time of her death to the death of Alexander Bruford the elder: and also of the rents and profits which accrued due in the lifetime of Alexander Bruford, after the death of Mary Bruford, received by Richard Ruscombe: and if such rents and profits, after the allowances aforesaid, should appear not to have been sufficient to keep down the interest of such aggregate sum during the life of Alexander Bruford the elder, then the Deputy Remembrancer was to carry the deficiency to the account of the rents and profits received by Richard Ruscombe after the death of Alexander Bruford the elder, and to add the same to the interest which accrued due on the aggregate sums after his death: and it was further ordered that the rents and profits, which accrued after the death of Alexander Bruford the elder, should be applied, by the said Deputy Remembrancer, first, in payment of the deficiency (if any) of the rents and profits accrued in the lifetime of Alexander Bruford the elder, to pay the interest accrued in his lifetime as aforesaid: and after such application, or in case there should be no such deficiency, then in the discharge of the interest of the aggregate sum accrued after the death of the said Alexander Bruford the elder; and that the Deputy Remembrancer should ascertain the balance due to or from Richard Ruscombe accordingly; and that the rents and profits [205] from time to time accrued after the death of Alexander Bruford the elder, should be applied by the Deputy Remembrancer, first, to keep down the interest, and then to diminish the principal of such aggregate sum; and in taking the said accounts, the Deputy Remembrancer was to make such annual rests as he should think fit; and he was to appoint a time and place for payment by the said Plaintiff to the said Defendant Hannah Ruscombe, of what he should find to be due to the said Hannah Ruscombe, upon taking the aforesaid accounts; and it was further ordered by the court, that in default of payment by the Plaintiff, of what the Deputy-Remembrancer should find to be due to the Defendant Hannah Ruscombe as aforesaid, the Plaintiff's bills should be, and they were thereby dismissed out of the said court, so far as they regarded the Defendant Hannah, and the late Defendant Richard Ruscombe, with costs, to be taxed by the Deputy Remembrancer, to whom it was thereby referred to tax the same accordingly; and it was further ordered and decreed by the court, that upon payment of what (if any thing) should appear to be due to Hannah Ruscombe on the account so to be taken, together with her and Richard Ruscombe's costs as before directed; or if it should appear that Hannah Ruscombe had been over paid, according to the manner of taking the accounts before directed, then that Hannah Ruscombe, and all proper parties, should convey the mortgaged premises, so conveyed to Richard Ruscombe as therein mentioned, to Richard Hare, and his heirs, or as he should appoint, freed from any charges or incumbrances, made, done, or suffered by Richard Ruscombe, or any person or persons claiming by, from, or under him, such conveyance to be settled by the Deputy Remembrancer, [206] in case the parties differed about the same; and that Hannah Ruscombe should pay to Richard Hare, the balance (if any) of the rents and profits which should be found to be due to her, according to the accounts before directed to be taken; and the Defendants were to deliver up to the Plaintiff Richard Hare, or as he should direct, upon oath, all deeds, evidences, and writings in their, or any or either of their custody or power, relating to the mortgaged premises, so to be conveyed to them; and the decree contained such further directions as therein mentioned, in relation to the part of the said estates which was not sold to the said Richard Ruscombe.

By the evidence produced before the Master, to whom the reference mentioned in the decree was transferred, it appeared that Mary Bruford died on the 3d of September, 1791; and that, at the time of her death, the principal sum of £1250 remained due on the mortgage; and the sum of £286 9s. 2d. for interest thereon, was due and unpaid to the mortgagee; but that all interest thereon, except the sum of £286 9s. 2d., had been paid; and that Alexander Bruford the elder had paid interest to the amount of £1500; and thereupon it was claimed, on the part of Hannah Ruscombe, as representing Richard Ruscombe, the purchaser, that the mortgage money, or sum of £1250, together with the sum of £1500 interest thereon, paid by Alexander Bruford the elder, and the further sum of £286 9s. 2d. interest, due at the death of Mary Bruford, ought to form the aggregate sum, on the payment of which, with interest from the death of Mary Bruford, the plaintiff was declared to be entitled to redeem the premises. But the Master did not admit such claim; but, by his report, dated the 2d of March, 1825, found that, at [207] the death of Mary Bruford, there was due on the mortgage, for principal money, the sum of £1250, and for interest, the sum of £286 9s. 2d., making an aggregate sum of £1536 9s. 2d., on which he calculated interest as in his report mentioned; and upon such computation, and making such several allowances as in his report mentioned, he found that, on the 2d of September, 1825, the principal money and interest due on the mortgage would be reduced to the sum of £214 10s. 4d., which, being added to £175 6s. 5d. allowed for costs, made the sum of £389 16s. 9d., which he appointed to be paid by the plaintiff to Hannah Ruscombe.

The Defendant, Hannah Ruscombe, took six exceptions to the report; the first exception was to the following effect, viz.: For that the Master had, by his report, stated, that at the death of Mary Bruford, there was due, for principal money on the indentures of lease and release, and mortgage of the 3d of February, 1766, the sum of £1250, and for interest thereon to that time, the sum of £286 9s. 2d.; whereas it was declared by the decree in the causes bearing date the 17th of December, 1813, as varied by an order of the court, bearing date the 27th of February, 1819, that Alexander Bruford the elder, and Mary his wife, were not bound to keep down the interest of the mortgage during her life for the benefit of her heir-at-law: And it was in evidence before the Master that Alexander Bruford, and Mary his wife, did, during her life, make divers payments to the mortgagee, on account of the interest of the said mortgage, to the amount in the whole of the sum of £1500; in respect whereof, and as against the heir of the mortgagor, Alexander Bruford the elder was entitled to stand in the place of the mortgagee: and the Master ought therefore to have found, and stated in his report, [208] that at the death of Mary Bruford there was due to Alexander Bruford, for interest on the mortgage, not only the sum of £286 9s. 2d., but also the further sum of £1500: and that the principal money and interest, due on the mortgage at the death of Mary Bruford, made an aggregate sum of £3036 9s. 2d.

By the second exception, objection was taken to the Master's report in respect of the computations he had made, upon the footing that no more than £286 9s. 2d. was due for interest on the mortgage at the death of Mary Bruford.

The fifth exception was as follows: For that the Master hath, by his report, stated that he hath proceeded to calculate interest on the aggregate sum of £1536 9s. 2d. accrued subsequent to the death of Alexander Bruford the elder, down to the date of his report: and that by making such application as therein mentioned of the rents and profits of the estate, and making such rests as therein mentioned, he found that the principal money due on the mortgage, after satisfaction of all interest accrued in respect thereof, would, on the 2d of September, 1825, six months from the date of his report, have been reduced to the sum of £214 10s. 4d.; whereas the Master ought to have calculated interest on the aggregate sum of £3036 9s. 2d., and to have found that after applying the rents and profits of the estate as directed by the decree, there would, on the 2d of September, 1825, be due for principal money and interest on the mortgage the sum of £5264 8s. 7d.

The exceptions were heard before the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer on the 13th of July, 1825; and his Lordship was thereupon pleased to order that the first, second, and sixth of the exceptions should be, and the same were accordingly overruled: and that it should be referred back to the said [209] Master to review his report, so far as the third and fifth of the said exceptions had relation thereto; and that the fourth exception should be allowed.

The Master made his further report on the 24th of April, 1826; and therein again found, that on the death of Mary Bruford there was due on the mortgage, for principal money, the sum of £1250, and for interest the sum of £286 9s. 2d., making an aggregate sum of £1536 9s. 2d.: on which he proceeded to compute interest, without allowing any thing for the interest of the mortgage debt, which had been voluntarily paid by Alexander Bruford the elder, in the lifetime of his wife; and by making such allowance as in the report mentioned, he found, that on the 24th of October, 1826, the principal money due on the mortgage would be reduced to the sum of £602 10s. 2d., which being added to the sum of £175 6s. 5d. allowed for costs, amounted to the sum of £777 16s. 7d., which he appointed to be paid by the Plaintiff to Hannah Ruscombe on the 24th of October.

On the 1st of June, 1826, the cause came on to be further heard, on the coming in of the reports, before the Lord Chief Baron, who thereupon ordered that the report dated the 2d of March, 1825, except so far as the third, fourth, and fifth of the exceptions taken to the same had relation thereto, and that the report of the 24th of April should be confirmed: And it was further ordered and decreed by the court, that it should be, and it was thereby referred to the Master, to tax the Defendant Hannah Ruscombe her costs of the suit, incurred subsequent to the last taxation; and also to tax the Defendant William Long his costs of that day's appearance: And it was thereby also referred to the Master to appoint a time and place for the payment of such taxed costs as thereafter directed, and for the other purposes thereafter mentioned: And it [210] was thereby also referred to the Master, to carry on the account of interest on the indenture of release and mortgage of the 3d of February, 1766, in the pleadings mentioned: and of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises in the pleadings mentioned, conveyed to the late Defendant Richard Ruscombe, up to the time to be appointed by him: And it was further ordered by the court, that the Plaintiff Richard Hare should, at such time and place as the Master should appoint, pay to the Defendant Hannah Ruscombe, as the personal representative of the late Defendant Richard Ruscombe what the Master should find to be due in respect of principal and interest on the mortgage at the time so to be appointed by him, together with the sum of £175 6s. 5d. taxed and allowed by the Master, by his report of the 2d of March, 1825, for the costs of this suit, of the Defendant Hannah Ruscombe, together with the sum of £25 17s. 4d. taxed and allowed by the Master, by his report of the 24th of April, 1826, for the subsequent costs of Hannah Ruscombe, together also with the amount which the Master should allow to the last-named Defendant for her costs incurred subsequent to the last taxation, and directed to be taxed as aforesaid; and that the Plaintiff Richard Ruscombe, should pay the amount which the Master should allow for the taxed costs of the Defendant William Long of appearing upon the hearing, to the Defendant William Long, or to Mr. Bryan Holme, his solicitor: And it was further ordered and decreed by the court, that the Defendant Hannah Ruscombe and the several other parties to these suits, who appeared to have any interest in the mortgaged premises conveyed to the late Defendant Richard Ruscombe, as in the pleadings of these causes mentioned, at the time and place so to [211] be appointed by the Master, as thereinbefore directed, should convey the mortgaged premises to the Plaintiff Richard Hare, and his heirs, or as he should appoint, free and clear of and from any charges or incumbrances made, done, or suffered by Richard Ruscombe, or by any person or persons claiming by, from, or under him: And it was thereby referred to the Master to settle such conveyance, in case the parties differed in settling the same: And it was further ordered and decreed by the court, that the Defendants, at the time and place so to be appointed by the Master as aforesaid, should deliver up to Richard Hare, or as he should direct, upon oath, all deeds, evidences, and writings in their, or any or either of their custody or power, relating to the said mortgaged estate and premises, or any part thereof: And it was further ordered, to the effect in the decree mentioned, in relation to such part of the estate as was not sold to Richard Ruscombe.

The Master, in pursuance of the last mentioned decree, found and certified that on the 22d day of February, 1827, the sum of £806 2s. 6d. would be due to the Appellant from Richard Hare, and he appointed the same to be then paid.

The appeal was against so much of the order of the 13th of July, 1825, as overruled the first and second of the exceptions, and so much of the order of the 1st of June, 1826, as confirmed the report of the 2d of March, 1825, except so far as the third, fourth, and fifth of the exceptions had relation thereto, and as confirmed the report of the 24th of April, 1826, and as directed the Appellant to convey the mortgaged premises on payment of the money therein mentioned, without making any allowance for the interest which was paid on the mortgage by [212] Alexander Bruford the elder, in the lifetime of his wife.

For the Appellant: Mr. Bickersteth and Mr. Jacob.

For the Respondents: Mr. Agar and Mr. Pepys.

For the Appellant it was argued, that the order of the House of Lords did not conclude the question as to the claim for interest; that Alexander Bruford the elder, and Mary his wife, being under no obligation to pay the interest of the mortgage for the benefit of her heir, ought to be considered to have advanced the money which they paid to the mortgagee on security of the estate: that Alexander Bruford was therefore entitled to add the same to the money which was due to the mortgagee on the death of his wife, so as to form the aggregate sum then chargeable on the estate: and that Richard Ruscombe, as purchaser from Alexander Bruford and the mortgagee, was entitled to the full benefit of such charge.

It was further argued, that where parties had a qualified interest in an estate tail, or paid off an incumbrance under a misapprehension as to their interest, the charge is held, in a Court of Equity, to be still subsisting, although no assignment of the security and debt has been taken to keep it alive. The Countess of Shrewsbury v. The Earl of Shrewsbury, 3 B. C. C. 120, 1 Ves. J. 227. Kirkham v. Smith, 1 Ves. 258. The Earl of Bucks v. Hobart, 3 Swa. 186 (see also Ware v. Polhill, 11 Ves. 257, 271; Redington v. Redington, 1 Ba. and B. 131).

For the Respondents it was contended, that the decision of the court below was according to the true [213] construction of the order of the House of Lords on the former appeal.

As to the principal question, if not concluded, they contended that the case of Amesbury v. Brown (1 Ves. 477) was conclusive.

At the conclusion of the argument the Lord Chancellor said he entertained no doubt whatever on the subject that the word "due" must mean the interest actually due; but as Lord Eldon had expressed a desire to be present on the question for judgment he should defer proposing it.*

The Lord Chancellor (18 July, 1828): There is a case of Ruscombe v. Hare, which was heard at the bar of this House on Wednesday last. At the close of the hearing of the cause I expressed to you what my opinion was upon the general law as applicable to the subject, and with reference to the construction of a particular order which was the subject of discussion. I declined recommending to you to pronounce a final judgment upon the question, until I had had an opportunity of having some communication with the noble and learned Lord, by whom it was supposed that order was framed. I have since had an opportunity of conversing with that noble and learned Lord, and he has informed me that the order was not framed by him, but was framed by another noble and learned Lord, a member of this House. Both those noble Lords are of opinion, with respect to the general law, that what I took the liberty of stating to you was [214] correct; and they are also of opinion that I put the proper interpretation upon the order which was so framed. I should, therefore, recommend to you that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

ENGLAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

GEORGE BURNAND and MARY, his Wife, and WILLIAM BROUGHTON FLEXNEY,—Appellants; JAMES NEROT,—Respondent.

Mews' Dig. x. 396, S.C., in Court of Chancery, 6 L.J. (O.S.) Ch. 81: 4 Russ. 247. See Payne v. Hornby, 1858, 25 Beav. 280; ex parte Morley, 1873, L.R. 8, Ch. 1026; also Partnership Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. c. 39) s. 2 (3) (c).]

A., by his will declaring a purpose to assign the lease of the Hotel, in which he carried on business, with the effects in the Hotel, and the business of it, to a trustee in trust for the benefit of his son and daughter, in consideration of an annuity to be paid to him for his life, bequeathed the residue of his personal estate and effects to his son and daughter in equal shares. The testator died without having carried into effect the purpose declared in his will. His daughter being executrix carried on the business from the death of the testator to the year 1819 in the house where the testator had carried it on. In that year she purchased, chiefly by means of the assets, the freehold of another house to which she removed the business, and carried it on there alone until 1819, when she married. Upon the marriage, the freehold house and effects were conveyed and assigned to a trustee for the daughter and her husband, and the children of the marriage in the ordinary course of settlement. In 1820 the son filed a bill against the daughter and her husband, praying that the deed of settlement might be set aside; that the freehold house might be declared to be part of the assets, and sold with the effects, etc.; that an account might be taken of the profits of the business, from the death of the testator to 1819, the date of the marriage; and that half the assets and half the profits of the business might be paid to him as residuary legatee and partner.

The case of the Plaintiff as to the partnership was supported by the evidence of the will, and of acts and admissions on the part of his sister at various times before the marriage, of her liability to account as partner. The Defendants insisted upon an agreement between the Plaintiff and his sister, shortly after the [216] death of the father, that the lease of the Hotel and the effects should be valued, and the produce divided between them; that they were accordingly valued, and that the half of the amount of the valuation had been paid to the Plaintiff by his sister; but this alleged agreement did not include any consideration for the good will of the business. The Defendants also produced in evidence a letter written from Paris by the Plaintiff, in which he spoke of the business as not belonging to him; but this letter he sought to explain, by stating that he could not with safety, being in France, acknowledge that he had any property or concerns in England. Upon these pleadings and evidence at the hearing, issues were directed to try: 1, whether there was any agreement for the sale of the lease, effects, and goodwill of the business; and if so, 2, whether such agreement had been abandoned. Upon the trial of these issues verdicts were given for the Respondent on both issues. Upon further directions the court (Vice Chancellor) declared that a partnership in moieties subsisted between the son and daughter, from the death of the father to the marriage of the daughter, when the partnership was dissolved, and that the freehold house was part of the assets, and an account was directed accordingly.

Against this decree the Defendants appealed to the Chancellor, and the decree being affirmed with a slight variation, the Defendants further appealed to Parliament, and insisted that an issue should be directed to try the question of fact whether a partnership subsisted; but the decree was affirmed, the House being of opinion that it was too late in that stage of the cause to ask for such issue.

John Nerot for many years preceding, and at the time of his death, carried on business as an Hotel-keeper, in a house known by the name of Nerot's Hotel. On the 30th of January, 1798, he made his will, whereby, after directing that all his debts, funeral and testamentary charges and expenses, should be paid by his executors; and after declaring it to be his intention to assign to John Dax the Hotel wherein he, the testator, then resided in King-street, for the [217] remainder of the term therein, under the lease, whereby he held the same, and also all his effects whatsoever which then were in the said Hotel, and the business thereof, in trust for the benefit of his son and daughter, the Appellant, Mary Burnand, then Mary Nerot, and the Respondent, as had been proposed and agreed to by him, subject to their paying to him an annuity to be agreed upon between them for his life, he thereby disposed of the residue of his personal estate and effects in manner following: that is to say, he thereby directed that all such sums of money as had been, or should be, advanced or paid by him to his son and daughter, or for their use or benefit, should be retained and kept by each of them respectively, and should not be accounted for or paid by either of them as a debt due to him or his estate at the time of his decease, or for making an equality between them, or otherwise; but in order to put his daughter upon an equal footing with his son, as near as might be in regard to such advancements, he thereby bequeathed to his daughter the sum of £260 to be paid to, or received and taken by her, out of the monies arising from his personal estate and effects, as and when she should think fit after his decease; and he thereby also bequeathed to his son and daughter, £10, and the like sum of £10 to John Dax, for mourning and a ring; as to all the residue and remainder of his personal estate and effects, of what nature or kind soever, which he should be possessed of, interested in, or entitled to, at the time of his death, except the Hotel, and the plate, furniture, and effects in the same, and which he intended to assign and make over in trust for the benefit of his daughter and son, upon the terms therein mentioned, he thereby bequeathed the same, and every part thereof, unto his daughter and [218] son, the Appellant, Mary Burnand, (then Mary Nerot) and the Respondent, in equal parts or shares for their respective use and benefit; and he directed that the annual income and produce of such part of his estate, as his son would be entitled to, should, during his minority, be applied for his maintenance and support; and he thereby appointed his daughter, the Appellant, Mary Burnand, and John Dax, executrix and executor of his will.

The testator died in 1801, without having revoked or altered his will, leaving the Respondent, his only son, and the Appellant, Mary Burnand, his only daughter, and they were the only next of kin of the testator at his death.

The Appellant, Mary Burnand, alone proved the will, the other executor, John Dax, having declined to act in the executorship.

The testator at the time of his death was possessed of a very considerable personal estate, consisting among other things, of the lease of his Hotel, and the household goods and furniture, plate, linen, wine, liquors, and effects, in the same.

He did not before his death make any such trust assignment as in his will was mentioned, and upon his death, the Respondent and the Appellant, Mary Burnand, became entitled in equal shares by virtue of the will, to the clear residue of the testator's personal estate, after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses, and his debts and the legacies.

At the date of the will the Respondent was a minor. His sister, the Appellant, Mary Burnand, who was several years older, upon the testator's death, as his executrix, possessed herself of the Hotel and all the property and effects in the same belonging to him at the time of his decease, and also possessed [219] herself of all other the personal estate and effects of the testator at the time of his death, and thereout paid all the debts owing from him at the time of his death, and his funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies.

The Appellant, Mary Burnand, for several years after the testator's death, with the acquiescence of the Respondent, continued to reside in the Hotel, and to carry on the business therein with the property and effects of the testator; but no settlement of accounts ever took place between the Appellant, Mary Burnand, and the Respondent, touching the business of such Hotel, and the gains and profits derived therefrom, or touching the personal estate and effects of the testator.

The Appellant, Mary Burnand, continued to carry on the business of the Hotel in King-street until the latter end of the year 1809, or the beginning of the year 1810, when the lease of the Hotel expired, and a renewal could not be obtained upon advantageous terms. She therefore, while the Respondent was in France, entered into a contract without his participation or concurrence, with Lady Downe and her son Mr. Dawney, for the purchase of the freehold and inheritance of a house in Clifford-street, for the purpose of carrying on the business of the Hotel. The Appellant, Mary Burnand, accordingly completed the purchase of the house in Clifford-street, and caused the same to be conveyed to herself in fee simple, and the purchase money was paid by her chiefly out of money arising from the gains and profits of the business of the Hotel in King-street, or out of money arising from the personal estate of the testator, or out of money which had been produced from the [220] business of the Hotel carried on upon the premises in Clifford-street.

The Appellant, Mary Burnand, caused certain rooms to be built and added to the house in Clifford-street, and to be converted into and fitted up for baths, and also caused all the goods, furniture, property, wines, liquors, and effects, in the Hotel in King-street, to be removed into the Hotel in Clifford-street; and caused it to be completely furnished and fitted up in all respects for business as an Hotel, with accommodation for bathing. The purchase of the house in Clifford-street, and fitting up the same for business as an Hotel and for baths, amounted in the whole to several thousand pounds.

The Appellant, Mary Burnand, continued to carry on the business of the Hotel and baths, from 1809 until September 1819, at the house in Clifford-street, and during that time occasionally advised with the Respondent as to such business, and he occasionally interfered therein, and conferred with her respecting the same, and she during that time received from the Respondent or his agents, considerable sums of money to be employed by her in the business, and the Respondent occasionally supplied wine for the business of the Hotel.

The business of the Hotel and baths in Clifford-street, during all the time before mentioned, was very profitable. But no account was at any time, prior to September, 1819, settled between the Respondent and the Appellant, Mary Nerot, relating to the business of the Hotels and baths, carried on in Clifford-street and King-street, or either of them, or relating to the personal estate of the testator; but the Respondent, at different times, received from the [221] Appellant, Mary Nerot, various sums of money on account of the business, and the profits arising from it.

In 1819 the Appellant, Mary Nerot, intermarried with the Appellant, George Burnand, and he, as her husband, took possession of the Hotel and all the goods, furniture, wines, liquors, property, and effects in the Hotel, and the business was afterwards conducted by him and his wife.

In 1820 the Respondent filed his Bill in Chancery against the Appellants, which Bill was afterwards twice amended, and the Appellant, William Broughton Flexney, made a party defendant, the Appellant, Mary Burnand, having, antecedently to her marriage with George Burnand, conveyed the Hotel and premises to the Appellant, William Broughton Flexney, upon the trusts therein stated. The Bill, when amended, after stating the facts above mentioned, prayed that the deeds or instruments in writing, executed by George Burnand, and Mary his wife, as therein mentioned, so far as regarded one moiety of the freehold house and premises in Clifford-street, and half the property in the same, might be declared void as against the Respondent, and might be set aside; and that the co-partnership between the Appellant, Mary Burnand, and the Respondent, might be declared to have ceased on the marriage; that the same might be decreed to be dissolved; and that the dwelling-house and Hotel in Clifford-street, and the goodwill of the same, and all the goods, furniture, wines, liquors, property, and effects, in such house and Hotel, might be decreed to be sold and disposed of in such manner as the Court should direct; and that one moiety of the money arising therefrom might be declared to belong to the Respondent, and might be decreed to be paid [222] to him accordingly; and that the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, might be decreed to come to a settlement of accounts with the Respondent, touching the several matters therein mentioned; and that the necessary accounts might be decreed to be taken accordingly; and that all accounts between the Respondent and the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, touching the matters therein mentioned, might be settled in or under the direction of the Court; and that what should appear on such settlement to be due or coming to the Respondent, might be decreed to be paid to him by the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, or might be decreed to be paid out of their moiety of the money to arise from the said sale; and that the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, might be restrained by the order and injunction of the Court, from letting, or selling, or disposing of the said house and Hotel in Clifford-street, and from letting or disposing of the goodwill thereof, or any of the goods, furniture, wines, liquors, property, or effects in and about the same, or from removing or taking away any of such effects, and from receiving any monies on account of such Hotel or the business thereof; and that some proper person might be appointed by the Court to manage and carry on the business of such Hotel, and to keep possession of such Hotel and all the effects therein, until the said sale; and to receive all debts or sums of money due to the Appellant, Mary Burnand, and the Respondent, or either of them, or to the Appellant, George Burnand, in respect of such Hotel and the business. But if the Court should be of opinion that a partnership did not take place between the Appellant, Mary Burnand, and the Respondent in the Hotel business, then that [223] an account might be decreed to be taken of all the personal estate and effects of the Testator, and of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and legacies; and also an account of the sums of money which the Respondent, James Nerot, since the death of the testator advanced to the Appellant, Mary Burnand, for the purposes of the trade or business, or otherwise, together with interest, and of the value of the wine supplied by the Respondent, as therein mentioned, to and for the purposes of the trade or business; and that under the circumstances therein mentioned, it might be declared that the Respondent was entitled to a moiety of the freehold house and premises in Clifford-street, and to half the property, effects, and things then in the same, and to half the gains and profits which had been derived and made by the Appellant, Mary Burnand, from carrying on the said trade or business in King-street and Clifford-street, since the death of the testator; and that it might be declared that the Respondent had a lien upon the freehold house and premises, and the property, effects, and things in the same, for what should be found due to him in respect of the moiety or share of the clear residue of the testator's personal estate and effects, after payment of his funeral and testamentary expenses and debts; and that the Appellants might be decreed to pay to the Respondent what, upon taking the said accounts, should be found due to him.

The Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, by their answer, admitted the will of the Testator, as stated in the Bill; that she and Respondent were his only next of kin; that she proved the will, and possessed the effects, including the Hotel, in which she continued to live and carry on the business until [224] the expiration of the lease in 1809, and one year longer; that the business was carried on with the property of the testator left therein, and the monies of the Appellant, Mary Burnand; but she denied that it was so carried on for the joint benefit of her and the Respondent as co-partners, and contended that it was carried on for her sole, separate, and exclusive benefit.

The Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, by their answer further stated that the Appellant, Mary Burnand, and the Respondent, soon after the death of the testator, caused an inventory of the testator's property and effects to be made, and that they had several meetings together to consider and determine upon the mode of disposing of the same; and that it was agreed that the household furniture, plate, linen, and china, in or about the dwelling-house in King-street, and the lease for the unexpired term thereof, and the good-will of the trade, should be valued, and that the Appellant, Mary Burnand, should become the purchaser of the Respondent's moiety therein at such valuation; and that such valuation was accordingly made, and amounted to the sum of £2366; that the Respondent appointed Mr. Harry Phillips, of Bond-street, to value, on his part; and that the Appellant, Mary Burnand, appointed Mr. Winstanley, of Paternoster-row, to value the same, on her part; and that in the month of June, 1801, the valuers proceeded to make, and did make, their valuation; and that she, the Appellant, in pursuance and execution of the agreement, paid or caused to be paid to the Respondent, or for his use, at various times, monies to the amount of £1193, being the Respondent's full moiety of such valuation; and that she had at different times paid to the Respondent other sums of money, [225] and to an amount exceeding his proportion of the testator's residuary estate; that in the month of April, 1809, the freehold and inheritance of the hereditaments and premises in Clifford-street, where the business of the Hotel was then carried on, was conveyed to the Appellant, Mary Burnand; and that the money to pay for the same was raised by mortgage, which has since been paid off, and with the gains and profits of the business, which she had carried on for many years before in King-street, and afterwards in Clifford-street; and that the goods, furniture, property, and effects, which were in the hotel in King-street were removed to the hotel in Clifford-street. In a Schedule to their answer to the amended Bill the Appellants set forth an account of the sums of money alleged by the Appellant, Mary Burnand, to have been paid by her to the Respondent.

The Appellant, William Broughton Flexney, by his answer, stated that by an indenture of settlement, dated the 21st of August, 1809, and made antecedently to the marriage of the Appellants, George Burnand and Mary his wife, the Appellant, Mary Burnand, conveyed and assigned the freehold Hotel and premises in Clifford-street, and the furniture, goods, and effects in or about the same, to him, the Appellant, William Broughton Flexney, upon trust, with the consent of the Appellants, George Burnand and Mary his wife, to sell such premises, furniture, and effects, and to invest the money to arise from such sale in the public funds, or upon real securities, and to pay the annual produce thereof to the Appellant, Mary Burnand, for her separate use, for her life; and after her death to the Appellant, George Burnand, for his life; and after the death of the survivor of the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, to [226] pay the principal of such money to the child or children of the marriage of the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, or their issue in manner therein mentioned, with a power to raise the sum of £1200 for the separate use of the Appellant, Mary Burnand.

There was no issue of the marriage of the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife.

Witnesses were examined on the part of the Respondent, and documentary or written evidence produced to shew that the Respondent and the Appellant, Mary Burnand, were, from the testator's death down to the marriage of the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, jointly interested and partners in the business of the Hotel carried on in King-street and Clifford-street; and that the purchase of the house in Clifford-street was effected partly out of the partnership funds.

On the part of the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, evidence was produced to shew an agreement on the part of the Respondent to sell his interest in the Hotel, furniture, and effects, to the Appellant, Mary Burnand, or to prove circumstances from which such agreement was to be inferred; and they gave in evidence a letter from the Respondent to the Appellant, Mary Burnand, dated at Paris, the 16th of August, 1810, wherein the Respondent appeared to treat the Hotel and the business as if he had no interest therein.

It was in evidence on the part of the Respondents, that at the time of writing such letter, the Respondent was in France, under his Majesty's license, for the purpose of recovering and shipping British property for England; and it was suggested that any declaration or intimation on the part of the Respondent, that [227] he was in any manner connected with England, or had any property there, would have been attended with personal danger to the Respondent; and that all the Respondent's property in England was conveyed to other persons, and appeared to belong to such persons; and that all letters written by the Respondent while he was abroad were worded in a manner to prevent the French Government from knowing that the Respondent had any concerns, or interest, or property in England, which was then at war with France.

On the 5th of March, 1824, the cause came on to be heard before the Vice-Chancellor, and by the decree then made it was ordered that the parties should proceed to a trial at law in the Court of Common Pleas, on the issue, whether there was in the year 1804 an agreement for sale by the Respondent to the Appellant, Mary Burnand, of his share and interest in the goodwill, lease, stock in trade, and other property and effects, in the pleadings mentioned; and in case the jury should find that there was an agreement for such sale, then it was ordered that the parties should proceed to trial on the issue, whether the agreement was abandoned; and in the first of the issues the Appellants, George Burnand, and Mary his wife, were to be plaintiffs at law, and the Respondent to be defendant at law; and it was ordered that the Respondent and the Appellant, Mary Burnand, should be examined as witnesses upon the trial of the issues respectively; and the court reserved the consideration of all further directions, and of the costs until after the trial of the issues or issue.

The first issue was tried in the Court of Common Pleas by a special jury on the 6th of December, 1824, when a verdict was given for the Respondent.

[228] On the 23d of April, 1825, the cause came on to be heard before the then Vice-Chancellor of England, upon further directions, when it was ordered "that the Appellant, George Burnand, should pay unto the Respondent all costs attendant upon the said issue and the trial thereof; and the Court declared, that the Hotel business carried on in King-street, Saint James's, and Clifford-street, Bond-street, under the name or designation of Nerot's Hotel, from the death of John Nerot, the Testator in the pleadings mentioned, until the 16th day of September, 1819, on which day the Appellants, George Burnand and Mary his wife intermarried together, was carried on by the Appellant, Mary Burnand, formerly Mary Nerot, spinster, in co-partnership with the Respondent, James Nerot, in equal shares and proportions, and that such partnership, on the 16th day of September, 1819, was dissolved; and that the freehold messuages and hereditaments in Clifford-street, and all and singular the household goods and furniture, plate, linen, china, and wine, stock-in-trade, implements, and all other property, effects, and things, being in or about the said messuage or premises, formed a part of the co-partnership property." The decree then proceeded to give the usual directions for sale and accounts.

The Appellants appealed to the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain, from this decree or decretal order of the Vice-Chancellor, pronounced on the hearing of the cause, for further directions.

The Appeal came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor on the 22d of December, 1827, when his Lordship ordered, that the decretal order bearing date the 23d day of April, 1825, should be varied, by omitting the words following, viz.:

"And doth declare, that the freehold messuage and hereditaments [229] in Clifford-street aforesaid, and all and singular the household goods and furniture, plate, linen, china, and wine, stock in trade, implements, and all other property, effects, and things, being in or about the said messuages or premises, form a part of the co-partnership property;" and inserting instead thereof, the words following, viz.

"And doth declare, that the freehold messuage and hereditaments in Clifford-street aforesaid, and all and singular the household goods and furniture, plate, linen, china, and wine, stock in trade, implements, and all other property and effects, which were in, upon, about, or belonging to the said messuages and premises, and used or employed in the trade or business of the Hotel and baths there carried on, upon the 16th day of September, 1819, the time of the dissolution of the said partnership, formed part of the co-partnership property;" and also by omitting the following words, viz.:—" And it is ordered, that the household goods, furniture, plate, linen, china, stock in trade, wines, and other effects, in and about the said premises, be also sold in such manner as the Master shall direct, by a proper person to be appointed by him;" and by inserting instead thereof, the words following, viz.:—" Let the Master take an account of the household goods, furniture, plate, linen, china, stock in trade, wines, and other effects, remaining in and about and belonging to the said house and premises in Clifford-street, and used or employed in the trade or business of the Hotel and baths there carried on upon the 16th day of September, 1819, the time of the dissolution of the partnership, and let him state the particulars of what the same consisted, and the value thereof, at that time, and what part [230] thereof now remains in specie;" and the Master was to be at liberty to make a separate report thereof. And with such variations the said Order was affirmed.

From the Decree or Decretal Order of the 23d of April, 1825, pronounced by the then Vice-Chancellor; and from the Decree or Decretal Order of the 22d of December, 1827, pronounced by the then Lord Chancellor, the Appeal was presented.

For the Appellants: Mr. Sugden and Mr. Barber.

For the Respondents: Mr. Horne and Mr. Roupell.

The Lord Chancellor (18th July): I have heard this case to the end because I thought it my duty to do so, in consequence of its being an appeal from my own judgment. The question came first before the Vice-Chancellor: it was a question as to whether or not Mr. Nerot was a partner in the concern known by the name of Nerot's Hotel; the circumstances are of this description. It appears that this business was carried on by Mr. Nerot's father for a considerable number of years, and during the latter period of his life, it was conducted principally for Mr. Nerot by his daughter; it appears that about five or six years before the death of Mr. Nerot, he being desirous, I suppose, of retiring entirely from the business, made his will, and excepted this property from the dispositions contained in that will. The reasons why he excepted this property from the dispositions contained in the will, were these:—upon the face of the will he stated that it was his intention to assign the property for the joint benefit of his son and daughter, to a gentleman of the name of Dax, in consequence of an arrangement he had made with them, that during the remainder of his life [231] they should pay him a certain annuity. It appears, however, that he did not act immediately upon this agreement—he did not act upon it during his lifetime, and the result was that he made no alteration whatever in the dispositions contained in his will, and we are to infer therefore, I think, from the will itself, that it was his intention that his son and daughter should take a joint interest in this property. Now what took place immediately upon the death of Mr. Nerot? the daughter had conducted the business for her father in the name of Nerot's Hotel—she was several years older than her brother, and he appears to have had no disposition to implicate himself personally in the concern: the business therefore was carried on after the father's death, precisely as it was carried on during his lifetime by Miss Nerot, ostensibly in her name as Nerot's Hotel. It was a valuable property, and if, as it is contended, at the death of Mr. Nerot it became her property in consequence of her character as co-executrix, Mr. Nerot would of course be entitled to call for an account of it: and it is a most singular circumstance that it does not appear that during the long period of years which elapsed, any such account ever was taken; nor does it appear that she accounted for the profits of this concern to him at any period.

It appears that the defendant in this suit was very much pressed by the consideration of the circumstance of her never having settled her father's affairs, as far as relates to this concern, with Mr. Nerot, her brother; and upon the face of her answer, being called upon to account in consequence of the bill that was filed on her marriage with Mr. Burnand, she says, that shortly after her father's death, (and she states this upon her oath) an agreement was entered into, and that the agreement was of this description:—that the property was to be [232] valued and appraised; she was to pay one half, she being jointly interested in it with her brother, and take the other half to herself. This is the defence she sets up upon the Record. Then in her answer she says, this business was not carried on between us as partners—it was carried on for my sole exclusive benefit. An arrangement was made between us soon after my father's death, by which it was stipulated that I should purchase this property. A valuation was made in pursuance of that agreement—I did purchase the property and paid you the valuation for your share. This is the answer she gave to this suit.

The case coming before the Vice-Chancellor in this shape, he directed issues on the application of the parties, and he allowed Mrs. Burnand in those issues every possible advantage, for he allowed her to be examined. She was on one side examined, and Mr. Nerot on the other: this being a family transaction, and many circumstances probably having occurred to which they alone were parties, it was of importance for the purpose of investigating the truth, that both of them should be examined before the jury. The issues were tried by a Special Jury in the Court of Common Pleas, before the Lord Chief Justice. The investigation was carried on with the utmost minuteness for a long period of time, and the result was, after hearing and judging of the examination of Mrs. Burnand on the one side, and Mr. Nerot on the other, that the Jury decided that no such agreement as that on which she insisted had been ever entered into between these parties. That was the main ground of defence which she set up to the suit of Mr. Nerot.

Now then, look at the probabilities of the case, for we are to look at the case on the footing of probability. They were jointly interested in this valuable [233] concern—no agreement was made by Mr. Nerot to part with that interest. The business was carried on in the same form and manner in which it had been carried on during the father's lifetime; and no settlement of accounts having been, as it is said, ever called for by Mr. Nerot, it is supposed that Mr. Nerot had abandoned all interest in this concern, except, as it stood on the footing in which it was placed at the period of the father's death, namely, according to the valuation then taken. The story is in itself most improbable; it is not likely that Mr. Nerot should have abandoned his interest in this concern, without some valuable consideration; and there is no evidence whatever for the purpose of shewing that he did do it. An attempt was made to prove an agreement of that description, and that attempt entirely failed. But the question does not rest upon presumption; a witness has been examined in the cause, to whose deposition I will refer, and that witness was examined at the trial, which is a most material circumstance, because it obviates all objection to his credit. He was examined and cross-examined upon the trial, and the verdict must have proceeded principally on the reliance the jury placed on his testimony. Indeed, I may say, that if it is impossible they could have found the verdict they ultimately pronounced unless they believed the testimony of Mr. Cary, and if the testimony of Mr. Cary is to be believed, there is absolutely an end to the case. In the first place I say, it is highly improbable, that Mr. Nerot should have abandoned his interest in this concern unless some arrangement of that kind had been entered into between the parties, and he had received an equivalent for it; and not only is there no evidence of such an agreement being entered [234] into, but being insisted on, it is negatived by the Jury.

The probabilities are, therefore, all against the presumption of Mr. Nerot's having entered into such an agreement. But what is the result of the positive evidence? Mr. Cary says, "I was employed by Mr. Nerot as his agent, from time to time, to inspect the accounts. I was well acquainted with both parties. I had interviews with Mrs. Burnand from time to time, and she over and over again declared that the business was carried on for the joint benefit of herself and her brother." If Mr. Cary is to be believed in the statement he thus makes, (and the jury believed his statement upon the occasion to which I am referring), is it not obvious that there is at once an end to this cause? If the business was carried on for the joint benefit of these parties, it is perfectly clear they were partners in the business so carried on. The business, under these circumstances, could not have been carried on for their joint benefit unless they were partners in the concern. He does not state that on one occasion alone, but he repeats this over and over again at different periods of his evidence, and his evidence is irreconcilable with any other supposition. He says, "I was directed to investigate the accounts from time to time;" and as he acted upon these directions he waited on Mrs. Burnand. The accounts were produced to him, he was dissatisfied with the manner in which they were kept—he remonstrated with her. In the first instance she stated that she could not make that particular account more perfect, but she said, "my brother has nothing to complain of, for I have made no purse for myself." If that account be true, it is quite obvious that at that particular time she consi-[235]-dered that he had an equal interest in the concern with herself. At subsequent times, he says, she repeatedly declared to him when he was examining and investigating the accounts, that the business was carried on for their joint interest and joint benefit. This goes down to a late period. It is supposed some settlement of account had taken place between these parties; that money had been paid, and that Mr. Nerot had no claim whatever on Mrs. Burnand. It appears that the last time these accounts were investigated, was in the year 1816, six years after the period when the business was transferred to the house in Clifford Street. I do really think, therefore, it is impossible, if you are disposed to place reliance on the testimony of Mr. Cary—if you believe him to be a witness of truth, that you can come to any other conclusion than that they were partners in the transaction.

I again advert to a circumstance which I think most material: that Mr. Cary is not here merely giving evidence in the shape of depositions, but with respect to the substance of the evidence he has given in the shape of depositions, he has been examined vide voce in the presence of a Jury, and the Jury have pronounced on the degree of credit to which he is entitled. Now how is this evidence met? I admit that it is met in the first instance by the evidence of Mr. Tetsall. Mr. Tetsall says, "I conducted this business, or managed this business on the part of Mrs. Burnand." He was the head waiter, I believe, in the concern; he kept the accounts and superintended the business, but there is nothing in the evidence of Tetsall inconsistent with the evidence of Mr. Cary. It does not appear that Mr. Nerot ever intended publicly to declare himself a partner in this [236] business. The business was always carried on under the name of Nerot's Hotel. Mr. Nerot's particular pursuits were of a different description; he never interfered in the management of the Hotel, and there was, therefore, no reason why Tetsall, who was a waiter, should know that Mr. Nerot was a partner. The evidence of Mr. Cary, therefore, is perfectly reconcileable with that of Mr. Tetsall.

But I do admit that the case is considerably, in point of evidence and effect, assailed by the letter to which so much reference has been made in the progress of this cause. In the early stages of it I read and considered that letter over and over again, and considered the explanations which were given to it, and I confess it was a long time before I could satisfy my mind, taking the whole case together, that this evidence was such as to outweigh the inferences to be drawn from that letter. But I considered this circumstance which I think material, and which has been hinted at at the bar—the letter was most material evidence in the case before the Jury. The question before the Jury was this: was there an agreement entered into and executed, by which Mr. Nerot parted with his interest in the concern? That was the question at issue before the Jury:—to impeach that it was most material to produce this letter, in which he called this property her's. And those arguments which have been raised in this instance, were raised before the Jury, and were considered by the Jury. They were investigated, sifted, and examined by the Judge, and the result of the whole was, that notwithstanding that letter, the Jury found a verdict negating the fact of such an agreement. I conceive, that under the circumstances the letter has with reference to the substantial question which you are now considering [237] been weighed, sifted, and examined by the Jury; and I think, taking the case altogether, whatever suspicions that letter may raise in my mind, and whether or not I am perfectly satisfied with the explanation given in respect to it,—taking the whole case together, I think the balance of evidence is so strong in favour of the Respondent, that I am bound to consider that a partnership has existed between the parties.

I admit there is evidence on both sides, and in the earlier stage of this inquiry, perhaps before the Vice-Chancellor, if I had been sitting in that court, and I had been asked to direct an issue, for the purpose of trying the question concerning partnership, I should, without hesitation, have acceded to that proposition, and directed it; but the parties never requested an issue to try the question of partnership, which it was competent for them to ask for. When the case afterwards came before Lord Eldon, and was there examined, sifted, and discussed, they never requested an issue for the purpose of trying that question. The question afterwards came before me, and was again examined and discussed at a considerable length, but the parties never, during any of those discussions, requested such issue.* Thinking, and indeed being satisfied, as I am, that the balance of evidence is strong in favour of a partnership, I cannot recommend to you in this last stage of the cause, to direct an issue for the purpose of commencing again, as it were, the investigation and trial of a case which has already lasted so many years.

Having paid great attention to the evidence, (and it is a question of fact), I recommend to you, under these [238] circumstances, to find that a partnership has been sufficiently established. If a partnership has been sufficiently established, the next question is as to the house in Clifford Street. It appears to me that it must follow the fate of the other question; because, looking to the evidence of Mr. Cary as to sums of money advanced, looking to the answer and the manner in which that answer is sworn as to the fund out of which the purchase money was paid, it is quite impossible not to come to the conclusion that it was out of the proceeds of that concern this house was purchased;—it was purchased out of the proceeds of the concern for the purpose of the concern, in order to carry on the business of the partnership; and if this lady has herself paid more than her share of the purchase money, she will have the benefit of that in taking the account; but being purchased for the purpose of carrying on the concern, in consequence of the expiration of the former lease, the establishment having been removed into that house, the furniture and stock having been all taken there, that house having been employed for the purpose of the trade, Mr. Nerot, having, during the progress of the negotiation advanced money for the purpose of completing the purchase; and the purchase having been paid for principally out of the proceeds of the concern; if the concern is to be treated as a partnership concern, this house also must be considered partnership property. Under these circumstances, I should humbly recommend to you that the Decree in the Court below be affirmed; and I think it ought to be affirmed with £100 costs.

Judgment Affirmed, with £100 costs.

IRELAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

The Right Honourable HENRY AUGUSTUS, LORD VISCOUNT DILLOX, and CHARLES BUTLER, Esq.,—Appellants; WILLIAM PLASKETT and JAMES BRETT,—Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. vi. 1163, 1161. S.C. 1 Dow and Cl. 320. Commented on in Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies, 1878, 9 Ch. D. 284; and see In re Potts, ex parte Taylor (1893), 1 Q.B. 651.]

D. having an estate for life in lands, situate in England and Ireland, assigned them, together with his furniture, etc., by several indentures, to Trustees for a term of 99 years, if he should so long live, in trust, out of the rents and profits, after satisfaction of a jointure, prior to the life estate and the interest of a mortgage, and certain annuities created by the Appellant, to pay to the Appellant an annuity of £5000, and to his creditors by bond, judgment, and simple contract, (parties to the deed of assignment), interest at the rate of £5 per cent. upon their respective debts; and to apply the surplus from time to time in the gradual extinction of the capital of the debts.

The creditors generally executed the deed of trust and assignment, by which they covenanted not to sue the Appellant. But P. and B., creditors of D., by simple contract, having obtained judgment for their debts, first in England and afterwards in Ireland, sued out a writ of fieri facias, directed to the Sheriff of the county of R. in Ireland, who seized the goods of D., but refused to sell them, in consequence of a claim made by the Trustees to whom they had been assigned by D. Whereupon P. and B., in 1820, filed a Bill in Chancery in Ireland, on behalf of themselves and other creditors of D., which stated these facts; and, setting forth, in part, the deed of trust and assignment as it appeared in the registry; but, alleging that they were ignorant of the trusts, prayed that the Defendants might set forth the deed, and that the creditors might have power to elect to take the benefit of the deed; or otherwise, that it might be declared fraudulent and void as to them, and that in the meantime a receiver of the rents might be appointed, and that they might be applied in [240] payment of the debts. After the bill was filed two of the trustees died, and two new trustees were appointed. D. and the surviving trustee put in their answers.

In 1824 P. and B. filed a supplemental bill against D., and the surviving trustee, stating the deed of assignment and trust; that under it D. was entitled to a rent charge issuing out of the lands held in trust by the surviving trustee, and that they had sued out an elegit against D. for the sum of £1027, directed to the Sheriff of R., who returned that D. or his trustee was seised of a freehold rent issuing out of lands in the county of R.; one moiety of which he had delivered to P. and B. to hold, etc., till they had levied the damages marked on the writ. They claimed by the bill to be entitled either to a moiety of the lands or of the rent charge, or to have satisfaction of their judgment out of the annuity payable to D. under the trusts of the deed. Upon these grounds they prayed by their bill a receiver either of a moiety of the lands comprised in the Sheriff's return to the writ, to the extent of one moiety of the £5000 per annum, or of the lands comprised in the deeds of assignment and trust; and after satisfaction of the charges having priority according to the trusts of the deed, that a moiety or a competent part of the £5000 per annum might be applied in payment of their demand, and that the trustee might be restrained from paying the annuity to D. till the demand was satisfied.

After the filing of the bill two orders were made, one for the appointment of a receiver, the other restraining the trustee from paying the annuity to D., to the amount of £1260. The trustee, by his answer, suggested that his co-trustees and the creditors of D. were necessary parties to the suit. D., by his answer, insisted upon the validity of the deed and priority of the trusts, (including his own annuity), over the judgment of P. and B. As soon as the answers were filed, applications were made to the Master of the Rolls on the part of D., to discharge the receiver and rescind the injunction; and on the part of P. and B. to continue the receiver and injunction till the hearing, which was granted, and the motion of D. was refused; and this decision was affirmed on appeal to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

Held affirming the judgments of the courts below, that under the circumstances above stated, the orders appointing a receiver, and restraining the surviving trustee from paying the annuity to D., were properly made; that it was not necessary [241] for this purpose that the prior incumbrancers, nor the creditors, parties to the deed of trust, nor the substituted trustees, should be parties to the suit. Held, also, that the defects in the Sheriff's return to the elegit were immaterial, as no return is necessary, and the suing out an elegit is sufficient to ground the equity. Held, further, that one elegit is sufficient, although the rent was payable out of the lands in three counties.

By an Indenture bearing date the 4th of July, 1815, and made between the Appellant the Viscount Dillon, of the first part; the several persons whose names and additions were written in the first schedule to the indenture, creditors of Viscount Dillon, by jointure, rent-charge, or annuity, of the second part; the several persons, whose names and additions were written in the second schedule to the indenture, creditors of Viscount Dillon, by bond and judgment, or by one of such securities, of the third part; the several persons whose names and additions were set forth in the third schedule to the indenture, creditors of Viscount Dillon by simple contract, of the fourth part; and the Appellant Charles Butler, and Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, deceased, on the fifth part: After reciting, that by virtue of indentures of lease and release, bearing date respectively the 13th and 14th of July, 1803; and in consequence of the subsequent decease of Charles Viscount Dillon, the Appellant Viscount Dillon, was seised or entitled, during the term of his life, without impeachment of waste, and with several remainders over in strict settlement, and with various special powers and authorities, of or to several manors, capital and other messuages, lands, tenements, and other hereditaments, situate in the county of Oxford; and of or to several castles, manors, messuages, lands, tenements, [242] and other hereditaments, situate in the counties of Mayo, Roscommon, and Westmeath, in Ireland; but that such of the said estates as were situate in Ireland were subject to a rent-charge of £2000 by the said indenture of release and settlement, limited to Mary Viscountess Dowager Dillon, and her assigns, for her life, and to the powers and remedies thereby given, and to a term of 200 years thereby created, for enforcing payment thereof; and further reciting that the Appellant Viscount Dillon had charged or otherwise secured upon the English and Irish estates, or some of them, divers annuities payable during his life, or during terms of years determinable on his decease, and the amount of each of the said annuities, and the name or names of the person or persons to whom the same were payable were set forth in the first schedule thereto annexed; and that the Appellant Viscount Dillon was indebted to different persons by bond or judgment, or both such securities, in considerable sums of money, and the same, or a principle part thereof, were set forth in the second schedule thereunto annexed; and that he was also indebted to several other persons by simple contract in various other sums of money, and that the same, or the principal part thereof, were set forth in the third schedule thereto annexed: And that in order to provide for the discharge of the said several annuities and debts, and for the subsistence of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, and the management of his affairs in the interim, it had been agreed between the several parties thereto, that the Appellant Viscount Dillon should grant and demise the lands in Ireland and England, of which, under the indentures of the 13th and 14th of July, 1803, he was tenant for life, but subject to the several charges and incumbrances affecting the same estates, or any of them, unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, or assigns, for the term of ninety-nine years, if the Appellant Viscount Dillon should so long live, upon the trusts and subject to the powers, provisos, and agreements thereafter expressed: And that he should assign all his household goods and furniture in his mansion house at Ditchley, in the county of Oxford, and at Loughglyn in Ireland, unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon the trusts, and subject to the powers, provisos, agreements, and declarations thereafter contained: And also that the Appellant Viscount Dillon should effect one or more insurance or insurances on his own life for the sum of £15,000, or for several sums of money amounting in the whole to that sum; and that the said policy or policies should be taken in the name of Viscount Dillon, and assigned by him to Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon such trusts as are thereafter expressed: And that in consideration of the provisions so to be made by Viscount Dillon for the payment of debts owing by him to the parties thereto of the third and fourth parts respectively, they should enter into the covenants and agreements thereafter contained, and that in pursuance of the said agreements, Viscount Dillon had effected such insurances: And that by an indenture bearing even date, and made between Viscount Dillon of the one part, and Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier of the other part, Viscount Dillon had granted and demised unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John [244] Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, all and every the freehold castles, baronies, manors, farms, towns, rents, messuages, mills, lands, tenements, tithes and hereditaments, situate, arising, and being in the counties of Mayo, Roscommon, and Westmeath, and in the baronies of Costello and Boyle, in Ireland, and therein particularly mentioned and set forth, with their respective rents and profits, in the schedule written under or annexed to the said indenture; and all other the castles, baronies, manors, messuages, lands and other hereditaments whatsoever, situate and being in the said counties, or any of them, or elsewhere in Ireland, which he the said Viscount Dillon, or any person or persons in trust for him, or for his use, was or were seised of or entitled to for the term of his life, or for any other estate of freehold, or right or interest whatsoever, in possession, reversion, remainder, use, trust, or expectancy, under or by virtue of the said indentures of lease and release, or otherwise, to hold the same, (subject and charged as therein mentioned, and also subject and without prejudice to the powers by the said indentures of release and settlement created and in anywise relating, annexed, or collateral to the life estate or interest thereby limited to Viscount Dillon, in the said hereditaments, and to the uses, trusts, and charges to be created by an exercise of the said powers, or any of them), unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, from thenceforth for the term of ninety-nine years, if Viscount Dillon should so long live, without impeachment of waste, upon such trusts, and subject to such powers, provisoes, declarations, and agreements as should be expressed concerning the same, in an indenture [245] therein mentioned, to be then already prepared and engrossed, and to be intended to bear even date with the same, and to be made between the persons therein named, being the same persons as are parties to the indenture now in recital: And that by the said indenture the Appellant Viscount Dillon, in further pursuance of his said agreement, assigned to Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators and assigns, all and singular the household goods, furniture, plate, linen and china of him the said Henry Augustus Viscount Dillon, then being in or about his capital messuage or mansion house at Loughglyn (being part of the estates thereinbefore demised), to hold the same unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, upon and for such trusts, intents, and purposes, and with, under, and subject to such powers, provisoes, agreements, and declarations, as were or should be expressed or contained of or concerning the same, in and by the said indenture thereinbefore mentioned, to be then already prepared and engrossed, and to bear even date with the same; It is by the indenture now in recital witnessed, that in pursuance of the said recited agreement with respect to the demise agreed to be made of the said Oxfordshire estates thereafter mentioned, and in consideration of the covenant and agreement thereinafter entered into by the parties to the indenture now in recital of the third and fourth parts, and for the nominal consideration therein mentioned, the Appellant Viscount Dillon granted and demised unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, and administrators, all and every the manors, farms, capital and other messuages [246] mills, lands, tenements, tithes, and hereditaments, situate, arising, and being in the county of Oxford, or elsewhere in England, of or to which he, Viscount Dillon, or any persons in trust for him, were seised or entitled for the term of his life, or for any other estate of freehold or right or interest whatsoever, in possession, reversion, remainder, use, trust, or expectancy, under the said recited indentures of lease and re-lease as aforesaid, or otherwise, and which, or the principal parts whereof, were in the same indentures, or one of them, particularly described and set forth, with their appurtenances; to hold the same, subject and charged as thereinbefore is mentioned, and subject and without prejudice to the powers by the said indentures of release and settlement, created, and in any wise annexed or collateral to the life estate and interest thereby limited to Viscount Dillon, and to the uses, trusts, or charges to be created by an exercise of the said powers, or any of them, unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, from the day next before the day of the date thereof, for and during and unto the full end and term of ninety-nine years from thenceforth next ensuing, if Viscount Dillon should so long live, without impeachment of waste; upon the trusts, and subject to the powers, provisoes, agreements, and declarations thereafter expressed: And it is further witnessed that for the considerations aforesaid, and in further pursuance of the said agreement, the Appellant Viscount Dillon bargained and set over unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors and administrators, the household goods, furniture, plate, books, pictures, engravings, drawings, statues, linen and china, and other articles for [247] household use or ornament, then being in or about his mansion house at Ditchley in the county of Oxford: to hold the same unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, from thenceforth as fully and effectually as Viscount Dillon, his executors, administrators, or assigns could or might have otherwise had or been entitled to the same; but upon the trusts, and subject to the powers, provisoes, and agreements thereafter declared; (that is to say) upon trust, that Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, should forthwith enter into the possession and receipt of the rents and profits of the and several mansion houses, manors, farms, messuages, lands, tithes, hereditaments, furniture, and other the premises so severally demised and assigned as aforesaid; and should, during the continuance of the trusts thereafter declared for the payment of the said debts, remain in such possession and receipt, and in the management of the said estates, and every of them, by means of such agents and receivers as thereafter mentioned: And it was thereby agreed and declared, that Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, should from time to time apply the rents, issues, and profits of the mansions, manors, farms, messuages, lands, tithes, and other premises, so thereby and by the said indenture of equal date, therewith respectively demised, when and as the same should become due, and be actually received by them upon the trusts following: (that is to say,) in the first place to discharge thereout all taxes, rates, and assessments imposed and to be imposed upon the premises, and [248] the expenses of putting and keeping in repair the several mansion houses and other buildings thereon, and the wages and board of proper servants for taking care of the said mansions and the furniture therein, and also the reasonable salaries and allowances of the agents and receivers of the Irish and English estates; and likewise all expenses attending the execution of the trusts thereby declared, and for keeping and auditing the accounts, and paying the annual interest and other charges, and in preparing and engrossing deeds relative to the trusts intended to be thereby created; and in the second place, or if it should be so required by Mary, Viscountess Dillon, her executors, administrators, or assigns, prior to such of the foregoing purposes as respect the charges or debts subsequent in legal or equitable precedence to the jointure rent-charge of Mary, Viscountess Dillon, should by and out of the rents, issues, and profits of the estates in Ireland, pay to Mary, Viscountess Dillon, and her assigns, during so many years of the term of ninety-nine years, determinable as aforesaid, as she should happen to live, the said rent-charge of £2000 of lawful British money, provided for her by the indenture of the 11th of July, 1803, as thereby appointed; and, in the third place, should (but as to such of the premises in the county of Oxford as are charged with the thereafter mentioned mortgage debt of £1500 subject to the trusts therein-after expressed of and concerning the said sum of £1500, and the interest thereof,) by and out of the rents, issues, and profits of the manors and other the premises, by the indenture now in recital, and the indenture of equal date, pay to the several persons for the time being entitled to receive the same, as well the several annuities set forth in [249] the first schedule thereto annexed, with such addition to each as might be occasioned by any extra insurance, to be paid by each for extra risk of the Appellant Viscount Dillon at sea, or his residing out of the kingdom, as also any annuity or annuities which might be granted by Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, or assigns, together with the Appellant Viscount Dillon, under the power thereafter for that purpose contained: and likewise should, by such rents, issues, and profits, of the allotments or parcels of land and hereditaments already charged with the said sum of £1500, pay, or cause to be paid, according to the priority of security, to Richard Phillips, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the yearly interest of the sum of £1500, raised by way of mortgage, by Charles Viscount Dillon, the father of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, under the powers of an Act of Parliament passed for dividing and enclosing the open fields and common and waste lands in Spelsbury, in the county of Oxford, and secured on such of the premises thereby demised, as were allotted or otherwise affected by the said Act; and, in the fourth place, should, by and out of the rents, issues, and profits of the said several hereditaments, (but subject as aforesaid,) pay the yearly premiums to become payable upon, and all other expenses which might attend the policies of insurance, effected or to be effected in the name of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, and by him assigned or intended to be assigned to Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, and particularly the annual premium on a separate insurance of £3000, made or to be made on the life of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, for the benefit of the persons therein mentioned; and, in the fifth place, should, out of the [250] rents, issues, and profits of the hereditaments and premises thereby, and by the indenture of equal date therewith demised, (but subject as aforesaid,) pay to the Appellant Viscount Dillon, and his assigns, during the term of ninety-nine years, determinable as aforesaid, an annuity of £5000 of British money, in such manner as therein mentioned; and should, by and out of the said last-mentioned rents, issues, and profits, pay to the several persons, parties thereto, of the third and fourth parts respectively, being creditors of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, by bond and judgment, or by one of such securities, and by simple contract respectively, and their several executors, administrators, and assigns, interest at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum upon their respective debts and demands set forth in the second and third schedules thereto annexed, or upon so much thereof respectively as should from time to time remain due and unpaid, with interest, to be paid as therein mentioned; and, in the sixth place, when the clear residue of the rents, issues, and profits of the manors, farms, messuages, lands, tithes, and other premises demised by the indenture now in recital, and the indenture of equal date therewith, which should remain after answering the several purposes aforesaid, should amount to the sum of 2s. 6d. in the pound of or upon the respective debts and demands of the several persons, parties thereto, of the third and fourth parts respectively, should apply such surplus rents, issues, and profits among the several persons, parties thereto, of the third and fourth parts respectively, or the several executors, administrators, or assigns, in proportion, and according to their several debts and demands set opposite their respective names in the said second and third schedules thereto annexed, in and towards the [251] discharge thereof, regard being had only to the quantity thereof, and not to the priority of time of, or the nature of the securities for the same, or any other circumstance of preference; and afterwards, from time to time, to apply the future residue or surplus of the rents, issues, and profits, when, and as often as the same should amount, after answering the several purposes aforesaid, to the sum of 2s. 6d. in the pound, of or upon the last-mentioned several debts and demands, in and towards the discharge thereof, in like manner until the same should thereby or otherwise be wholly discharged, or the Appellant Viscount Dillon should depart this life; reserving, however, upon the first, or any other distribution, the dividends which might belong to any disputed debts or demands until the same should be ascertained as thereafter directed; and lastly, should stand and be possessed of and interested in the ultimate residue or surplus, if any, of the rents, issues, and profits which should remain, after making the several payments and answering the several purposes thereinbefore directed and declared; and also of and in the said manors, farms, messuages, lands, tithes, and other premises demised, or intended so to be, by the indenture now in recital, and the indenture of equal date therewith, and every part thereof, when and as soon as the several trusts thereinbefore declared, should be fully performed, in trust for the Appellant Viscount Dillon, his executors, administrators, and assigns respectively; And it was thereby agreed and declared, that Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, should stand and be possessed of and interested in the monies to become payable, and be received upon or under the several policies of insu-[252]-rance effected or to be effected in the name, by and at the costs of Viscount Dillon; and also of and in all and every the rent, and arrears of rent, which might be due and owing at the time of his decease, upon the trusts following: (that is to say) in the first place, to pay in equal order and degree, the several debts and demands of the respective persons parties thereto of the third and fourth parts, being creditors of Viscount Dillon, by judgment bond and simple contract, and set opposite their respective names in the second and third schedules thereto annexed, or so much thereof as should remain unpaid at the death of Viscount Dillon; and as such last-mentioned monies, if insufficient to discharge the whole, would extend and be able to satisfy, together with all interest due thereon; and after full payment of such last-mentioned debts and demands and interest, in case there should then remain any residue of the monies to become payable and be received upon the aforesaid policies of insurance, to pay the same to the executors, administrators, or assigns of Viscount Dillon, as part of his personal estate; or else, if all the several debts and other purposes thereby provided for, should be discharged and satisfied in his lifetime, then to assign the policies of insurance, and the monies to become payable thereon, to Viscount Dillon, or his assigns, or as he or they should direct, for his or their own benefit: And as to the goods, furniture, linen, china, and other articles at Ditchley, thereinbefore assigned to Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, it was thereby further agreed and declared, that it should be lawful for Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, and the survivors, etc. by any deed, etc. to demise, or to contract or agree to demise, the said goods, fur-[233]-niture, and other the articles, etc. to any person to whom they or he should let the mansion house at Ditchley, for the term or time for which the mansion at Ditchley should be letten, and to be held and go along with the same, at such rent, under such covenants and agreements, as Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, or the survivors, etc. should deem advisable: And it was thereby further agreed and declared between and by the parties to the indenture now in recital, that the rents to be received by Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, or the survivors, etc. from any lease to be executed by them or him under the power therein contained, should be applied upon such trusts and in such manner as is thereinbefore expressed, for the application of the rents, issues, and profits of the premises thereby demised: And it was thereby agreed and declared, that Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, should stand and be possessed of and interested in the household goods, furniture, and other premises in the mansion house at Loughglyn upon trust, that they, etc. should permit the then present or any future agent or receiver of the Irish estates who should reside in the house at Loughglyn, to have the use of the said household goods, furniture, plate, linen, and other premises, together and along with the mansion house, and its appurtenances, at Loughglyn, in part of the salary of his service: And it was by the said indenture further witnessed, that in consideration of the premises, each of the several persons, parties thereto, of the third and fourth parts, so far only as related to the acts or deeds to be done by himself or herself, and his or her heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, and not further or other-[254]-wise, did thereby for himself and herself respectively, and for his and her respective heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant and agree with the Appellant Viscount Dillon, his heirs, executors, and administrators, in manner following: (that is to say) that they the creditors, parties thereto, and their respective co-partners, executors, or administrators, should not at any time or times thereafter, while the indenture now in recital should remain in full force and effect, and the trusts thereof should be duly performed, commence or institute or prosecute any action or suit, either at law or in equity against Viscount Dillon, in relation to any of the debts or demands respectively set forth in the second and third schedules thereto annexed, or take or sue out execution or sequestration against, or do or cause to be done any act, matter, or thing whatsoever, whereby or by means whereof the goods, chattels, or other personal estate or effects of Viscount Dillon, his heirs, executors, or administrators, in Ireland, England, or elsewhere, or his or their lands or tenements should be seized, detained, or taken in execution, for or in respect of any debt or debts whatsoever, then due or owing unto them, or any of them, from Viscount Dillon: and moreover that they, or their respective executors or administrators, should, when and as the several debts or sums of money payable and owing respectively to them by Viscount Dillon, and set opposite their respective names in the second and third schedules thereto annexed, together with such interest and costs as thereinbefore are mentioned, should be by the means aforesaid, or otherwise, fully paid and satisfied, or should have ceased and be no longer payable, at the request, costs, and charges of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, his heirs, executors, or administrators, make, give, sign, or exe-[255]-cute unto him or them, good and sufficient releases, acquittances, and discharges, for the several debts then payable and owing to them the same several creditors respectively by Viscount Dillon as aforesaid, and of and from all actions, suits, costs, charges, claims, and demands whatsoever in respect thereof; and there is contained in the indenture now in recital the usual provision for the appointment of new trustees by the said Viscount Dillon, with the approbation of the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee in the said indenture mentioned.

By an indenture bearing date the 4th day of July, 1815, (being the indenture referred to in the indenture hereinbefore stated) and made or expressed to be made between the Appellant Viscount Dillon, of the one part: and the Appellant Charles Butler, and the said Edward Jerningham and John Hosier, of the other part: after reciting, that the Appellant Viscount Dillon was entitled for life, without impeachment of waste, to several castles, manors, lands, tenements, and hereditaments in the counties of Mayo, Roscommon, and Westmeath, in Ireland, subject as therein and hereinbefore is mentioned; and that he, for the considerations set forth in the hereinbefore stated indenture, had agreed to demise the said estates to the Appellant Charles Butler, and to the said Edward Jerningham and John Hosier, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for ninety-nine years, if he should so long live, and to assign to them the household goods and furniture at Loughglyn House, upon the trusts thereafter mentioned concerning the same, it was witnessed, that for the considerations therein mentioned Viscount Dillon demised unto Charles Butler, Edward Jerningham, and John Hosier, their executors, adminis-[256]-trators, and assigns, all his estates in the counties of Mayo, Roscommon, and Westmeath, for ninety-nine years, if he should so long live, without impeachment of waste, upon the trusts declared concerning the same and also concerning the Oxfordshire estates in the indenture hereinbefore stated; and Viscount Dillon thereby assigned to the said trustees, their executors, and administrators, all the household goods, furniture, books, pictures, linen, and china in the mansion-house at Loughglyn upon the trusts declared concerning the same, by the same indenture.

The first of the indentures was not executed by any of the persons who had any charge or lien on the estates therein mentioned by way of jointure, mortgage, rent-charge, annuity, or otherwise, except the several creditors by judgment, who signed their names to the second schedule to the indenture.

All the bond, judgment, and simple contract creditors of the Appellant Viscount Dillon not having specific charges on the estates, with the exception of the Respondents, and a few other creditors, accepted of the provisions made by the indentures, and executed the first stated indenture.

The Respondents were simple contract creditors of the Appellant Viscount Dillon.

The estates in the counties of Roscommon, Mayo, and Westmeath, and Oxford, were respectively charged with the mortgages, jointure, rent-charges, and annuities specified in the first schedule to the first stated indenture annexed, the greater part of which had priority over the life estate of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, limited to him by the indenture of the 14th day of July, 1803.

The mortgages, (except the mortgage for £4500) were created in pursuance of powers reserved by the [257] same indenture, and thereby directed to have precedence and priority over the life estate of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, and the excepted mortgage, created by virtue of the Act of Parliament; and all the incumbrances had priority over the indentures of 4th July, 1815, and the annuity of £5000 by the first mentioned indenture of 4th July, 1815, reserved to the Appellant Viscount Dillon.

The legal estate was outstanding, and became vested in Richard Williams and Benjamin Brooks, for a term of one thousand years, for raising the sum of £54,358, and interest, under and by virtue of an indenture bearing date the 21st day of July, 1804, and made, or expressed to be made between Charles Viscount Dillon, of the first part; Robert Skelton, since deceased, of the second part; and Richard Williams and Benjamin Brooks of the third part; and which term of years was created in pursuance of a power for that purpose given by the indenture of the 14th day of July, 1803, to Charles Viscount Dillon.

The rents and profits of the lands, as received by the agents of the trustees of the indentures, so far as the same were sufficient and applicable for that purpose, were from time to time applied towards keeping down the payments provided by the indenture.

The mansion-house at Ditchley, together with the furniture and other articles therein, had been from time to time let, and the rent received in respect thereof, and of the furniture, had been applied in like manner towards keeping down the payments prescribed and directed by the indenture.

On the 13th day of July, 1820, the Respondents filed their original bill of complaint in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, against the Appellants, and also against Edward Jerningham and John Hosier, [258] both since deceased, thereby stating, that the Appellant Viscount Dillon had become indebted to them for goods sold and delivered early in the year 1815, and that the Respondents had sued the Appellant Viscount Dillon for the said demand in the Court of King's Bench in England, and had recovered judgment against him thereon, in or as of Michaelmas Term, 1818, for the sum of £898 10s. and that on the ground of the said judgment, they had also recovered judgment against the Appellant in the Court of King's Bench in Ireland, as of Trinity Term, 1819, for the debt aforesaid, besides costs, amounting in the whole to the sum of £1000 of lawful money of Ireland; that having so recovered the last-mentioned judgment against the Appellant Viscount Dillon, the Respondents, on the 23d of November, 1819, caused a writ of execution, (a fiert facias) against the goods of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, to issue, and that the same was delivered to the sheriff of the county of Roscommon, to levy the amount thereof; and that the sheriff seized the goods and chattels of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, in his mansion house at Loughglyn, and would have sold the same, and thereout levied the debt, but that the law agents of the Appellant caused a claim of property to be lodged with the sheriff, alleging that the goods were not the property of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, but of the Appellant Charles Butler, and of Edward Jerningham and John Hosier; and that the sheriff thereupon refused to execute the writ of execution by a sale of the goods: And further stating, that it appeared from a search made by the Respondents in the public registry office for deeds in the city of Dublin, that by indenture, bearing date the 4th of July, 1815, the Appellant Viscount Dillon granted and demised to [259] the Appellant Charles Butler, and Edward Jerningham and John Hosier, their executors and administrators, the freehold castles, baronies, manors, messuages, mills, lands, tenements, tithes, and hereditaments, situate, arising, and being in the counties of Roscommon, Mayo, and Westmeath, and the barony of Costello and Boyle in Ireland, and all other the hereditaments and premises in the said counties and elsewhere in Ireland, of which the said Viscount Dillon, or any persons in trust for him, was or were seised or possessed, to hold the same, subject and charged, as in the said memorial mentioned, unto the said Appellant Charles Butler, and Edward Jerningham and John Hosier, from the day next before the day of the date thereof, for the term of ninety-nine years, if he the said Viscount Dillon should so long live, without impeachment of waste, upon the trusts, by the said memorial stated, to be mentioned in an indenture of the 1th of July, 1815: And further stating, that it appeared by the said memorial, that the said Appellant Viscount Dillon did, by the same indenture, bargain and sell unto the said Appellant Charles Butler and his said co-trustees, their executors, administrators, and assigns, all the household goods, furniture, and other chattels, of and belonging to the Appellant Viscount Dillon in and about his mansion house at Loughglyn aforesaid, to hold the same to the said trustees, as fully and effectually as the Appellant Viscount Dillon could be entitled to the same, upon the trust in said memorial alleged to be mentioned in the said other indenture, of even date therewith; that the said indentures were not registered until the year 1817, and that the Respondents were ignorant of the trusts thereof; that the Appellant Viscount Dillon was strict tenant for life of the said estates, and [260] that the said indentures were calculated to defeat proceedings at law against the said estates, by the Respondents and the other creditors of the said Appellant Viscount Dillon, who (as stated in the said bill) was indebted to divers other persons by judgments, bonds, and otherwise, to a very considerable amount: The bill prayed that the contents of the said deed of trust of the 4th of July, 1815, might be fully set forth by the said trustees, and that the Respondents and the other creditors of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, who should come in and contribute to the expense of the said suit, might be at liberty to elect whether they would agree to accept of the provisions of the said deed, in liquidation and satisfaction of their respective demands or not; and that in case they should not elect to agree to accept the same, that then the said indenture of the 1th of July, 1815, and the said deed of trust therein mentioned and referred to, might be deemed fraudulent and void, and of no effect against the Respondents and others of such creditors of the Appellant Viscount Dillon as aforesaid; and that the temporary bars raised thereby might be removed, if necessary, to give effect to the Respondent's said judgment at law; and that, in the mean time, and until the hearing of the cause, a receiver should be appointed to receive the rents and profits of the said towns, lands, and premises, and that the same should be brought in and lodged in the Bank of Ireland to the credit of the said cause, and applied in the payment of the said judgment debts and incumbrances of the said Appellant Viscount Dillon, according to their respective priorities; and that the Respondents and the other creditors as aforesaid, might be paid thereout their several and respective demands, according to their respective priorities, and that all neces-[261]-sary accounts might be directed to be taken at the hearing of the cause.

Before any further proceedings were had in the cause, Edward Jerningham and John Hosier died; and the Appellant Charles Butler, the surviving trustee, afterwards put in his answer to the bill: the Appellant Viscount Dillon likewise put in his answer thereto.

In pursuance of the power for that purpose contained in the indenture of the 4th of February, 1815, the Honorable Douglas Kinnaird and Dominick Browne, were appointed trustees of the estates, in the place of Edward Jerningham and John Hosier.

On the 20th day of April, 1824, the Respondents filed a supplemental bill (called in the pleadings an amended bill) against the Appellants, stating, amongst other things, that since the filing of their original bill, they had seen the indentures of the 4th of July, 1815, and setting forth the trusts thereof: and further stating, that the Respondents, being unable, by reason of the deed of trust, to obtain any fruits from the writ of fieri facias, issued at the suit of the Respondents against the goods of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, and that having discovered that he was entitled by the trust deed of the 4th of July, 1815, to an annual sum of £5000 out of the rents and profits of the estates vested in trust in the Appellant Charles Butler, as surviving trustee, they had caused a writ of elegit, grounded on the judgment obtained in the Court of King's Bench in Ireland against the Appellant Viscount Dillon, to issue, marked for the sum of £1027 11s. 4d. and directed to the sheriff of the county of Roscommon, who returned, that the Appellant Viscount Dillon, or the Appellant Charles Butler, in trust for him, was seised as of freehold of a clear, [262] yearly rent of £5000, issuing out of the lands and hereditaments in the county of Roscommon in the return and bill particularly mentioned and set forth; and that the sheriff had returned upon the writ, that he, on the day of taking the inquisition, by virtue of the writ had delivered one moiety of the rent of £5000 to the Respondents, to hold to the Respondents and their assigns as their freehold, according to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, until they should have fully levied the damages in the writ of elegit specified: and also stating, that they were entitled to have the moiety of the lands and premises comprised in the return, or of the rent of £5000 per annum, or that if they should not be deemed entitled to a moiety of the rent of £5000 by virtue of the elegit, that they were entitled to have satisfaction of the judgment out of the rent of £5000, or of such part thereof as in the order and course of priority, directed by the deed of trust of the 4th of July, 1815, should be payable to Viscount Dillon in pursuance of the trust: And thereby praying, that a receiver might be appointed to receive the rents, issues, and profits of one moiety of the lands and premises comprised in the sheriff's return on the writ of elegit, to the extent of one moiety of the yearly sum of £5000; and that the Respondents might be paid the same, or a competent part thereof, in discharge of their demand, or that a receiver or receivers might be appointed to receive the rents, issues, and profits of the several lands and premises comprised in the deeds of the 4th day of July, 1815; and that the rents of the Oxfordshire estates, and of a competent part of the trust estates, if necessary, might be applied in payment of the annual sums, charges, and expenses by the trusts of the deed directed to be paid [263] in priority to the £5000 a year, thereby made payable to the Appellant Viscount Dillon: and that after such satisfaction and discharge of the annual payments having such priority, one moiety of the sum of £5000 a year, or a competent part thereof, might be applied towards payment of the Respondent's demand; and that the Appellant Charles Butler might be restrained from paying over the yearly sum of £5000, or any part thereof, to the Appellant Viscount Dillon, or to any person for his use, until the demand should be thereout paid and satisfied.

By an order bearing date the 7th day of December, 1824, the Master of the Rolls referred it to the Master to approve of a proper person to be appointed receiver, upon process obtained against the Appellants, to receive such competent part of a moiety of the rent-charge of £5000 per year, as would be sufficient for the purpose of the Respondents' rights in the cause; and that the Master should report what part would be a competent part of the moiety of the rent-charge of £5000 for that purpose.

In pursuance of the order, the Master approved of Charles Denroche to be receiver, and reported £1250 a year as a competent part of the moiety of the annuity for the Respondents' rights, which report was confirmed by an order of the court, bearing date the 16th of December, 1824.

By an order dated the 1st of Feb. 1825, the Master of the Rolls ordered that the Appellant C. Butler should be restrained until his answer to the last-mentioned bill and further order, from paying over to the Appellant, or for his use, the sum of £1250 per annum, and from making any payments out of the annuity, to the Appellant Viscount Dillon, or for his use, out of any funds which might come to his hands applicable [264] thereto, without first retaining sufficient to pay the sum of £1250 per annum.

The Appellant Charles Butler, on the 7th day of June, 1825, answered the supplemental bill; and after stating and submitting to the court, to the effect herein-after mentioned to be stated in the answer of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, he stated by his answer, that he claimed no interest in the matters in question in the suit, save as trustee, and that he was ready and willing to act as the court should direct; but he thereby submitted, that Douglas Kinnaird and Dominick Browne, who had, since the death of Edward Jerningham and John Bosier, been appointed trustees of the indenture with him, and the several persons named in the schedules to his answer annexed, marked Nos. 1 and 2, and which he prayed might be taken as part of his answer, having charges upon the estates by mortgage, jointure, and rent-charge and annuity, and also the several other persons in the same schedules named and described, and who, being creditors of the Appellant Viscount Dillon by bond, judgment, and simple contract, had executed the indenture hereinbefore first mentioned, were necessary parties to the suit.

By an order of the 27th day of July, 1825, it was ordered by the Master of the Rolls, that the Appellant Charles Butler should be restrained, as ordered by the order of the 1st of February, 1825, from paying the sum of £1250 a year to the Appellant Viscount Dillon, until he should answer the supplemental bill, and until further order.

The Appellant Viscount Dillon put in his answer to the supplemental bill on the 14th day of December 1825, whereby, after noticing that the relief prayed by the original bill, was essentially different from the [265] relief prayed by the supplemental bill, he stated, that the indentures of the 4th of July, 1815, were made for the benefit of and for the purpose of paying his creditors, at the date of the indentures, as well by specialty as simple contract, their several debts; and that as the judgment in the Respondents' bills stated was obtained after the execution and registry of the deeds of trust, the deeds were good and valid against the Respondents; and that he had not since the date and execution of the indenture, been in the receipt of the rents and profits of the estates in the indenture mentioned, or in possession of the personal effects therein also mentioned, or any part thereof; and that his trustees and the trustees thereafter named, had not been in such receipt since the date and execution of the indentures, except so far as the receipt of the rents and profits of the lands by Henry North and Matthew Wyatt, might be considered as the receipt of such rents and profits by the trustees, and except so far as letting the mansion-house of Ditchley, with the household furniture and effects in the same, and permitting Matthew Wyatt and Jarrard Edward Strickland respectively, who had been appointed agent in Ireland, in the place of Matthew Wyatt, to reside in the mansion-house at Loughglyn, and to use the furniture and effects therein, might be considered possession thereof by the trustees; and that Matthew Wyatt, Henry North, and Jarrard Edward Strickland, were appointed agents by the indentures of the 4th July, 1815, or in pursuance of a power for that purpose therein contained; and that so far as the rents and profits of the estates received by such agents as aforesaid, were sufficient and applicable for that purpose, they had been applied towards keeping down such and so many of the annual payments, as were [266] provided by the indentures to be paid to the persons who were made parties to the indentures in the supplemental bill first mentioned of the second part; and that the present annual income derived from the estates in England and Ireland, might be calculated to amount to the sum of £18,850 British; but that some time back, in consequence of the great agricultural distress, the same did not exceed the gross annual sum of £15,000, out of which charges and expenses to a large amount were to be deducted; and that in consequence of such defalcation of the rents, the trustees recommended to the Appellant Viscount Dillon, to reduce the annuity of £5000 reserved to him, to an annual sum of £3000, the better to enable the trustees to pay the annual charges on the estates, and that he readily assented thereto; but that the receipt of the rents, after all necessary payments being deducted therefrom, did not allow the trustees to pay him the reduced annuity of £3000, and that there were then arrears due to him in respect of the same; that the total amount of the annual payments, charges, and incumbrances charged on the estates, and having priority to the yearly sum of £5000, amounted to £12,000 a year and upwards; and he submitted to the judgment of the court, whether the Respondents were unable, by reason of the said deeds of trust, to obtain any fruits from the writ of pieri facias in the original bill mentioned to have been issued at the suit of the Respondents against his goods and chattels; and that he was unable, as to his belief or otherwise, save as appeared by the supplemental bill, to state whether the Respondents caused a writ of elegit, grounded on the judgment obtained in His Majesty's Court of King's Bench in Ireland, to issue, marked for the sum of £1000 and [267] £27 lls. 4d. directed to the sheriff of the county of Roscommon or otherwise; or whether the sheriff returned upon the writ so to him directed, that the Appellant Viscount Dillon, or the Appellant Charles Butler, in trust for him, was seised as of freehold, in one clear yearly rent of £5000 sterling, issuing and payable out of the lands and other hereditaments in the supplemental bill mentioned; but that if the return of the sheriff was to the effect in the supplemental bill mentioned, he submitted that the return of the sheriff in the supplemental bill stated, was erroneous in setting forth that he, or some person in trust for him, was seised as of freehold in the yearly sum of £5000, inasmuch as the same was raiseable by virtue of the trusts of equitable terms of years subsisting in the estates respectively, comprised and demised by the indentures of the 4th of July, 1815, being the English and Irish estates of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, and also out of the gains and profits made by means of the furniture at Ditchley house, which is let with the same; that the return could not be acted upon in consequence of its great uncertainty, and that the rent of £5000 was not issuing out of the lands mentioned in the return alone, but also out of the other estates of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, in England and Ireland, and by means of the personal estate and effects; and that the return was further erroneous in returning that the sheriff of the county of Roscommon had delivered to the Respondents one moiety of the rent of £5000, such rent being payable out of all the Irish estates of the Appellant Viscount Dillon, which estates are situate in the counties of Mayo, Westmeath, and Roscommon, and out of the English estates, in the county of Oxford, and out of the personal estate and effects; and that the return, [268] if any such existed, had never been filed in the proper office, and is not on the records of the court whereout the elegit issued, or of any other court; and that the estates in Ireland, subject to the rent of £5000 as stated in the supplemental bill, were held by trustees under prior conveyances, whose interests therein were paramount to his, and that therefore they could not be properly taken under the elegit therein stated; and he thereby admitted that he continued seised of and entitled for his life, to the estates in the counties of Roscommon, Mayo, Westmeath, and Oxford, subject to the mortgage, jointure, rent-charges, and annuities, and the terms of ninety-nine years respectively created by the indentures; and that he was entitled to the absolute freehold thereof, subject to the several mortgages and incumbrances, and upon the trusts of the terms being satisfied; and he, by his answer, further stated, that part of the lands and hereditaments mentioned in the sheriff's alleged return, had long before been sold by virtue of a power for that purpose contained in the indenture of release and settlement, of the 14th day of July 1803, under which he is tenant for life of the Irish estates, and which power over-rides his life estate, and which life estate was displaced by the exercise of the power; and under the circumstances thereinbefore mentioned, he submitted, whether the Respondents were entitled to be let into possession of one moiety of the lands and premises mentioned in the sheriff's alleged return.

After the answers were put in to the supplemental bill, on the 6th of December, 1825, applications were made to the Master of the Rolls, on the behalf of the Appellants, that the receiver appointed in the cause might be removed, and that Charles Butler, together [269] with his co-trustees, might be at liberty to pay over to the Appellant the sum of £1250 per annum, part of his annuity, in the order of the 27th of July then last mentioned, and all arrears thereof then due, and that the Appellant Viscount Dillon might be at liberty to call for and receive the same.

At the same time an application was made by the Respondents, to continue the receiver, and that the Appellant Charles Butler might be restrained from paying over the £1250 per annum to the Appellant Viscount Dillon but should be compelled, in case the court continued the receiver, to pay over the same to the receiver, or that the receiver should be at liberty to receive it from the tenants of the lands; and that the payment thereof should be computed from the gale day on which the annuity was payable to the Appellant Viscount Dillon, preceding the Master's report, which allocated the sum of £1250 to the Respondents, in payment and satisfaction of their demand.

By order bearing date the 14th day of December, 1825, the Master of the Rolls, making no rule on the application of the Appellants, ordered, on the application of the Respondents, that the restraining order of the 27th of July, 1825, should be continued until hearing and further order; and that the Appellant Charles Butler might be restrained as ordered by the last-mentioned order from paying over in any manner to the Appellant Viscount Dillon, the sum of £1250 per annum therein mentioned, or from making any payments out of the annuity in the order and report mentioned to the Appellant Viscount Dillon, or for his use, out of the funds that might come to his hands, applicable thereto, without first retaining sufficient to pay the £1250 per annum, until the hearing and further order; and that the Appellant Viscount [270] Dillon, be restrained, until hearing and further order, from receiving the £1250 per annum from the Appellant Charles Butler, and from receiving any payments out of the annuity, without first leaving sufficient to pay the said £1250 per annum.

The Appellants appealed to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland from the order of the Master of the Rolls of the 14th of December, 1825; and also from the order of the 27th of July, 1825, the order of the 7th of December, 1824, the Master's report thereunder, the order of the 16th of December, 1821, confirming the same, and the several proceedings thereon, so far as the same in any way related to the order of the 14th of December, 1825; and the Appellants by their counsel moved that the receiver might be removed, and that the Appellant Charles Butler, in conjunction with his co-trustees, might be at liberty, in execution of the trusts in the trust deed in the pleadings mentioned, to pay over to the Appellant Viscount Dillon, and that the Appellant Viscount Dillon might be at liberty to call for and receive the sum of £1250 per annum, part of the annuity, and all the arrears thereof; which motion, by way of appeal, came on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, on the 4th of February, 1827, whereupon his Lordship affirmed the order of the Master of the Rolls, with costs.

The appeal to the House of Lords was from the orders of the 7th of December, 1824, of the 16th of December, 1824, of the 27th of July, 1825, and the 14th of December, 1825, and of the 1th of February, 1827.

For the Appellants: Mr. Sugden and Mr. Lynch.

The question in the appeal depends upon the trust to pay out of the rents and profits an annuity of £5000 a year to Lord Dillon. The appeal is against the order of [271] the Master of the Rolls, restraining the trustee from paying the annuity, and the order of the Lord Chancellor confirming it. The previous orders being only until answer or further order, could not be the subject of appeal. The covenant on the part of the creditors, not to sue Lord Dillon, or take the property in execution, is a sufficient consideration for the conveyance. The deed itself is not impeachable in equity for fraud.

The supplemental bill praying relief, different from that which is prayed in the original bill, is irregular, and being so, no order could be made upon it; the original bill should have been dismissed, and a new one filed (see Davidson v. Foley, 2 B. C. C. 203). There is also a defect of parties, the original trustees being dead and new trustees appointed: the appointment was in 1823, and the supplemental bill was filed in 1824. The Respondent, by the original bill, prays to have the deed rescinded: by the supplemental bill, he prays relief under the deed: these are opposite and inconsistent prayers.

The sheriff, as appears by his return, seized a moiety of the rent, which, as it is stated, he has delivered to the party. This is not a case, therefore, where the aid of equity is asked to obtain execution; there is no such case where equity has ever interfered: the interference of equity is only to remove impediments to the execution. The next question is whether the party is intitled to have the legal bars removed. Equity can only supply defects of the law. The case made in this suit is that the property was seized and delivered to the party. The first objection to the seizure is that the sheriff has no authority by law to seize a rent-seck; he must execute the writ by seizing the land, Walsall v. Heath (Cro. Eliz. 656); in which case, [272] the return being of a seizure of a rent, was held bad upon demurrer, because a rent-seck cannot be delivered as liberum tenementum.

Another difficulty is, that according to the finding and the facts, Lord Dillon had a life estate subject to prior charges: the sheriff should have seized a moiety of that life estate. The return is void on the face of it, and being void at law, it is unavailable in equity; no relief can be given upon it. If Lord Dillon had a legal estate for life, there could have been no proceeding upon such a return, and equity can only remove a legal bar where the proceeding is regular at law.

Supposing the rent to be subject to execution, the inquisition is void upon another ground, for the rent issues out of lands in England and Ireland, and also from goods, not from one subject or each severally, but from all jointly: the sheriff of Roscommon could not seize a moiety of that intire rent.

The order is defective also for want of parties; two of the trustees are not before the court: the relief is against all the estates: a receiver cannot be appointed unless all parties are before the court. The rule of equity, as to parties, is to prevent circuity of action and multiplicity of suits: a plaintiff is bound, therefore, to proceed against all estates and interests at once, not piecemeal; such an order cannot be made in the absence of trustees. If the defect of parties could be excused in a common case, not so in this, because the relief sought by the supplemental bill differs from that which was prayed by the original bill.

It may be said that by statute (29 Car. 2, 3) it is enacted that a seizure in execution against the trustee shall be good against the cestui que trust, but the sheriff had no [273] right to seize at all: the property was not subject to execution. In Lyster v. Dollond (3 B. C. C. 602, 1 Ves. J. 431), it was held that an equity of redemption is not subject to execution. So in Scott v. Scholey (8 East, 467), Metcalfe v. Scholey (2 B. and P. N. R. 461).

It is not a sufficient execution within the statute of frauds, and the statute does not apply to cases of complicated trust, but only to naked and simple trusts; it was an improvident attempt of the legislature to make trusts subject to execution: it is so confined in practice, that no instance has occurred in which execution ever issued against a trust estate of a term; the result is, that it is found in practice not to be a fit subject for execution: the creditor must proceed at law and come to equity to remove a legal bar: there should have been a fiery facias and a return, Balsh v. Wastall (1 P. W. 445), Shirley v. Watts (3 Atk. 200). All the authorities prove that to entitle himself to relief in equity, a party must proceed as far as he can at law. In Davidson v. Foley, Lord Thurlow said that "all he could gather from the cases was, that where the court could see there was a good judgment, it would not stop without aiding that title by what is called an equitable elegit, but he could not carry it higher than that: that the equitas sequens legem must be such as to assure the court that the case was such as could be followed by a legal execution: but that where it appeared that the judgment could not be followed by a legal elegit, the court could not follow it by an equitable elegit." In this case it is apparent on the face of the return, that the creditor could not have proceeded at law: Lord Dillon had the land, and the execution should have been against the land: there should have been a [274] return of nulla bona: whereas, on the face of the proceedings there is a legal seisin.

The sheriff states that he has delivered the property in satisfaction. Where then is the necessity for relief in equity? According to the return, it must be supposed that the creditor is in possession.

The Lord Chancellor: Suppose this had been a case merely at law, would not this have been the form of the return? It is not satisfaction. The sheriff does not deliver possession; but the party proceeds by ejectment: the usual return of the sheriff is, that he has delivered, although in fact he does not deliver.

Mr. Sugden: Where there is no adverse possession, he does actually deliver: the objection is, that there is no necessity for the interposition of equity.

Another objection fatal to the orders in the court below is, that they were made in the absence of parties who are interested in the administration of the funds. Where property is subject to incumbrances, relief in equity has always been granted in the shape of a power to redeem prior incumbrances. The annuity, in this case, can only be reached by considering it as part of the old reversion.

It is no answer to an execution against A. that the legal estate is in B. for A. The only case where he is stopped at law is, where there are trusts to be executed prior to his charge, and then he is entitled to redeem and remove the temporary bars. A court of equity never allows subsequent incumbrances to come in against prior ones, without offering to redeem. The only relief is an application to redeem the prior incumbrances. If a court of equity will enable a judgment creditor to proceed against a debtor's interest, he must bring before the court all the parties who have any interest to contest in the subject. The point [275] stands thus:—According to the trusts of the deeds, the fifth and sixth trusts are to pay Lord Dillon's £5000 per annum, and interest to the creditors. This £5000 per annum is not to precede the interest to the creditors.

The Lord Chancellor: They are all classed together, on the assumption that there was enough for all.

Mr. Sugden: There is no priority between the creditors' and Lord Dillon's allowance. The fund must be distributed pari passu between them. The objection to the orders is, that they have ordered £1250 per annum to be taken in the absence of the creditors, who have an equal right with him, and in the absence of Lady Dillon and a mortgagee. This objection is of a more limited nature than the general one before advanced. Suppose £1250 be ordered to be paid, and, from defalcation of rents, the jointress, mortgagee, and other prior creditors were not paid; would they not have a right to say that the court had taken away a fund which ought to have been applied to prior incumbrances? The consequence would be that all the prior creditors might file bills to have their rights declared. What is the common subject? The estate out of which the rent is to be paid. Lord Dillon is not entitled to the £5000 per annum, unless the prior charges are paid, and the interest to the creditors. A receiver ought not to be appointed to take £1250 per annum out of a common fund to which prior incumbrancers are entitled. The £1250 may be applicable to the payment of the former incumbrances. A court of equity had no right to touch it, unless they had all the parties to the trust deed before the court. The £5000 per annum is not a distinct subject. You cannot argue the question of priority unless you have all the parties before the court. A [276] court of equity does not grant a receiver on motion, unless they see on the face of the proceedings that they would give relief at the hearing. It is not stated in the bill that the return was filed, though they state it in the case; but the return was never filed. The only evidence was an affidavit of debt. The want of evidence is a sufficient objection to the order. In all the cases (Bulch v. Wastall) the sheriff made his return of nulla bona, etc.; but in this case he has made no such return, but has declared that he has delivered the property to the plaintiffs. How then are they obstructed? and until they are obstructed they have no right to relief in equity. The right was an entry on the land. Have they been obstructed in entering upon the rent? No. The return is fraudulent, illegal, and void. The sheriff had no right to deliver the rent seek; he ought, if any thing, to have delivered the lands by metes and bounds (Faung v. Durant, 4 B. and A. 10). The return is fraudulent for this reason: It is stated that the trustees were seised for Lord Dillon of the rent charge out of the lands in the county of Roscommon. The jurors must have had the deed before them; and having it, they must have known that it was issuing out of lands in other counties:

yet it is alleged to be issuing out of lands in the county of Roscommon alone. So the sheriff says there are no goods; yet on the face of the deed it appears there were goods in Roscommon. This is a rent-sock, and held in trust for Lord Dillon; it cannot, therefore, be taken in execution. If the cause were brought to a hearing, the Respondents would not be entitled to relief, because of the absence of parties and the irregularity of the return. The interlocutory orders ought [277] not therefore to have been made. A court of equity does not grant ancillary relief unless the right be clear. That Lord Dillon is abroad, and tenant for life, are new equities. It is not true that these parties are without remedy. The Respondents have the same remedy after as they had before the execution of the deed.

For the Respondents: Mr. Horne and Mr. B. Parry.

The question is not whether the annuity of £5000 a year is extendible, but whether under the circumstances a part should be impounded to abide the decision of the cause: although the £5000 a year is not extendible at law, it does not follow that it cannot be reached in equity; an equity of redemption of a leasehold for years is not extendible at law, but may be made available in equity (Shirley v. Watts, 3 Atk. 200. Burdon v. Kennedy, ib. 739. Lyster v. Dolland, 1 Ves. jun. 435). The court interferes, not to enforce the judgment of a court of ordinary jurisdiction, but because the party has no remedy at law, the property sought being of an equitable nature. In Burdon v. Kennedy, Lord Hardwicke said that the execution had no effect at law, and consequently that by the common equity of the court the creditor had a right to relief. In the present case there is no remedy at law. The property in question is the creature of and only exists in equity. The case of Bank stock and of debts is different: in those the debtor has the legal right, and they must be reached, it at all, in a court of law. As to Bank stock, it is the creature of the legislature, which forgot to provide a remedy for the creditor. But the property in this [278] case is the creation of the debtor, the creature of equity, over which the court has control, and will apply a remedy according to its doctrines. The cases where a judgment creditor is allowed to stand in the situation of a puisne mortgagee have no analogy to the present. In those cases the court gives relief, on the principle that the creditor who had his demand is entitled to stand in the place of the debtor, and therefore the creditor is allowed to redeem as the debtor might do. In those cases, the debtor having pledged his estate for a particular debt, he has the right to redeem; but in this case the debtor's estate is not pledged, but actually conveyed on trust. The principle of giving to a judgment creditor relief against an equity of redemption, applies in this case: it is to enable the creditor by the medium of equity to obtain the debtor's right in equity. Whether it is an equity of redemption upon a lease for years, or a trust for the debtor upon an annuity of £5000, it ought to be equally available for the creditor. The case of the Respondent does not rest upon the eliget: the annuity is a chattel interest; and to proceed in equity it is only required that the creditor should have taken out execution, which has been done; it is not necessary that the return should have been procured (Red. Pl. pa. 102).

The title of the Respondent is good under the feri facias (Vandercom v. Miller, 21 Jan. 1818, in Cha.): as to the objection that the eliget is directed only to the Sheriff of Roscommon, it is trifling: the annuity issues per mie et per tout: if the lands lie in twenty counties it cannot be necessary that there should be an eliget in each. The debt and the execution being admitted, and that the Respondent is not privy to the deed of trust, the title of the Respondent [279] is sufficiently clear for a receiver. Lord Eldon, in a similar case, has granted an order for a receiver. The plaintiffs were creditors who had obtained judgment, and delivered an eliget to the sheriff, but could not make the writ available without the aid of equity: the debtor being seized in fee subject to an annuity charged upon the estate, the lands being demised for a term to secure the payment. The counsel for the defendant relied on the objections that an equity of redemption of a term is not extendible, but that there was no inquisition. Lord Eldon held in such a case that there was a resulting trust for the defendant, and granted the order. But the Respondents rely upon the order for an injunction, and waive the right to a receiver, which was superseded by the order for the injunction. The orders appealed from do not declare the right. They only impound the fund to await the event of the cause. Lord Dillon being resident abroad, having no estate liable, and having neglected to put in his answer, the order for the injunction is well founded. The creditors and incumbrancers are not necessary parties. Their rights are not disturbed. The relief sought is only against the £5000 a year, which is in equity the property of Lord Dillon. Whether he or the Respondents receive that sum, or any part of it, is immaterial to the creditors. The injunction only restrains the trustee from paying to Lord Dillon, and him from receiving the annuity, until enough is reserved for the Respondents. The new trustees having come in, pendente lite, are not necessary parties (Metcalf v. Pulvertoft, 2 V. and B. 205). In fact, the new trustees are now brought before the court below, and the Appellants might have called them as parties. But Mr. Butler is a sufficient representative of his co-trustees.

[280] The case is reduced to this question of equity: Can a man, by his own contract with some creditors, give himself an interest which shall not be subject to his other creditors? He could not do it at law, why can he in equity? If Lord Dillon could reserve to himself £5000 a year, he might reserve £19,000. Will equity enable a man to defraud his creditors? Will equity carry trusts into execution contrary to justice? Will equity, by means of trusts, its own peculiar creatures, take property out of the reach of creditors and give it to a debtor? This £5000 a year existing only in equity, is to be dealt with according to equity. This deed conveys EVERY thing to trustees. The Respondents have no possible means of payment except by application of the £5000 a year. Lord Dillon resides abroad, has only a life-interest, and unless the money is impounded as ordered, the Respondents may lose all any moment.

The Lord Chancellor (21st July, 1828): This is a case of appeal from certain orders made by the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal in Ireland, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. It appears that the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal in Ireland, and the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, have all concurred in their judgment in respect to the points to which I am to call your attention, but the parties were not satisfied without appealing to this House.

This case arises out of a debt due to the Respondents, Plaskett and Brett, who are wine merchants in this city. They had supplied Lord Viscount Dillon with wine to the amount of seven or eight hundred pounds. He did not pay the bill: in consequence of which they brought an action against him in 1817, in [281] the Court of King's Bench in this country, and recovered judgment. They were not, however, able to obtain any fruit of that judgment, in consequence of which it became necessary for them to proceed in Ireland. They brought an action there in 1819, and recovered judgment in that action to the amount of £1000, and £27 costs of their debt. A fiery facias was sued out upon that judgment, to take possession of the effects, for the purpose of obtaining the fruits of the judgment: but the moment the sheriff had taken possession, he received notice on behalf of Mr. Charles Butler, and other individuals whose names are mentioned in this paper, who describe themselves as trustees under a deed executed in the year 1815, by which they claimed the whole of this property. The consequence was, that the Sheriff was obliged to relinquish possession. Under these circumstances it became necessary for the Respondents to take other proceedings for the purpose of recovering their debt, and accordingly they filed a bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland against Viscount Dillon, and against his trustees: answers were put in to that bill; and the result was, that it was discovered by the Respondents that a deed had been executed in the year 1815, of which they had not before been apprised: but when they became acquainted with all the particulars of that deed, it turned out that by that deed Lord Viscount Dillon, possessing estates in the counties of Roscommon, Mayo, and Westmeath, in Ireland, and in Oxfordshire in this country, which had been previously charged with certain incumbrances, and which were subject to those incumbrances, conveyed them to trustees for the purpose of securing to Lord Dillon £5000 a year for his life: and with respect to the surplus rents for the purpose of discharging the debts [282] due to certain persons who had executed that deed. It is quite obvious, therefore, that as there was £5000 a year not subject to the prior incumbrances, but reserved to Lord Dillon, Messrs. Plaskett and Brett had a right to look to that sum for the purpose of discharging the debt which he owed to them, to do which it was necessary to proceed in a court of equity. The Respondents sued out an elegit, directed to the sheriff of the county of Roscommon: after that elegit had been sued out, and returned, they filed a supplemental bill: and to that supplemental bill answers were put in by Lord Dillon, and by Mr. Charles Butler, the trustee.

Before the answer to the supplemental bill was put in by Mr. Charles Butler, an application was made on the part of the Respondents to the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, to appoint a receiver; but before a receiver was appointed, one of the Masters of the Court was directed to ascertain what proportion of the £5000 a year it would be necessary to set apart to pay the debt of the Respondents. The Master having reported that £1250 of this sum would be necessary, a receiver was appointed, for the purpose of taking possession of the £5000 a year to the extent of £1250; and afterwards another order was made, by which Mr. Butler was restrained from paying over the whole of the £5000 a year, the sum of £1250 being made applicable to the purpose of discharging this debt. After the answer was put in by Mr. Butler, an application was made to discharge these orders; but the Master of the Rolls refused to discharge them: I think an application was also made to the Lords Commissioners, and they also refused. After the answer of Lord Dillon came in, a second application was made to discharge these orders; but the Master of the Rolls [283] refused to discharge them, and directed that the order by which Mr. Butler was restrained from paying over the £1250 should be continued till the hearing of the cause, and until further order.

It is against this last order, and the other orders which are the foundations of it, that the present Appellants have appealed. With respect to the merits, there can be no question: every possible delay has been interposed for the purpose of preventing the Respondents reaping the fruit of their judgment: but various objections have been made in point of form, which have been argued with great ability at the Bar, and to which I am to call your attention.

In the first place, it was said that there were not the proper parties to the suit; that the prior incumbrancers ought to have been made parties to the suit: but the prior incumbrancers had nothing to do with this order, for this order operates only on the £5000 a year that came into the possession of Mr. Butler; and the only question is, whether Mr. Butler has a right to take possession of it; therefore it is quite clear, that the prior incumbrancers need not have been called before the court. But then it is said, that the creditors who were parties to the deed of 1815 ought to be parties to this order. The same answer applies to them; they have no interest in this question, for they have no right to any of the rents and profits till the £5000 has been paid.

It is then said, there are two particular individuals who are now trustees, and ought to have been made parties to this suit. After the original bill was filed, and a short time before the supplemental bill was filed, two of the original trustees having died, two new trustees were appointed, but no communication was made, previously to the filing of the supplemental bill, of those additional trustees having been appointed, nor was it known till a late period of the cause that they had, in point of fact, been appointed: they stood in precisely the same situation and the same interest with Mr. Butler, and it does not appear that when this case came before the Lord Chancellor any objection was made that these trustees were not parties. If any objection had been made, it would have been obviated in an instant: they were merely formal parties, and their names might have been added. It appears to me, therefore, that even if there were originally an objection in point of strict law, it ought not to prevail at this period of the cause, with respect to an order of this description, a mere interlocutory order, the object of which is to secure a fund for these claimants, in the event of their claim being ultimately allowed.

Having disposed of these objections in point of form, the next difficulty raised was with respect to the elegit. It was said that the return of the elegit was defective in point of form, and various ingenious arguments were raised upon that point. The short answer to all those arguments is, that it was not necessary that any return whatever should be made: that the mere suing out the elegit was all that was necessary; therefore, as it appears to me, no injurious consequence follows in this cause from the circumstance of any defect in the return which the sheriff made to the elegit. Then it was contended, that it appears upon this return that satisfaction had been made to the present Respondents, that the property had been seized into the hands of the sheriff, for the purpose of discharging this debt. The answer to that is, that it is quite clear from the whole nature of these proceedings, and the pleadings in this case, that there [285] had been no satisfaction; and it is quite clear from the answer of Lord Dillon himself that that is the case. I apprehend, therefore, that no objection can be raised from the supposition that any satisfaction has been received, that supposition being built on the inaccurate return of the sheriff.

The only remaining objection which I now bear in my mind is that there ought to have been an elegit in each county. The Irish property is situate in the counties of Roscommon, Mayo, and Westmeath; only one elegit is sued out, and that in the county of Roscommon. I think it is perfectly clear that one elegit was sufficient.

Having disposed of these questions of law, I should humbly recommend to you that the judgment of the court be affirmed; and as it appears to me that the proceedings have been conducted entirely for the purpose of delay, I conceive under such circumstances, there being no serious doubt in my mind, the judgment ought to be affirmed, with £150 costs.

Judgment affirmed, with £150 costs.

IRELAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

FRANCIS ARTHUR KNOX GORE,—Appellant; ROBERT EDWARD Viscount LORTON, DANIEL CUDDY, HENRY CAREY, and HARRIET KELLY,—Respondents; and R. E. Viscount LORTON,—Appellant; F. A. KNOX GORE,—Respondent.

[S. C. 1 Dow's Cl. 190.]

A., by marriage articles, bound himself "to pay to H. upon his marriage with E., (the said H. settling all the estates and money he was then entitled to on the issue of the marriage, and a suitable jointure to the fortune E. gave him,) the sum of £5000." H. in the same articles bound himself "to settle all the estate and money which he was then entitled to upon the issue of E., and a jointure of £500 a-year."

Four years after the date of these articles and the marriage, H. acquired an estate which was limited to the issue of the marriage, with a power reserved to H., under which, after a lapse of twenty-six years, he by deed appointed to his wife E. £500 per annum by way of jointure, and £6000 to the younger children of the marriage as portions.

Held in the Court below, and on appeal, that this was a performance of the condition upon which A. contracted to give to H. a marriage portion of £5000; and that so much of that sum as was not paid on the marriage became due on that event, and was a charge on the estate of A., payable with interest from the date of the marriage.

The original articles were not produced in the cause, but it was in proof that H. was the executor of A.; that the house of H. in Ireland had been occupied by a French and rebel army, and his papers ransacked and scattered; that L. was the executor of H., and that the houses of H. and L. had been searched, but [287] that the original articles could not be found. Under these circumstances secondary evidence—viz. a copy of the articles sent with a case laid before counsel; a charge in the solicitor's bill for the copy and case; a recital of the Articles in an Act of Parliament for settling lands on the issue of the marriage; and a deed appointing a jointure according to the articles and portions to children, under a power reserved by the Act, were admitted as proof of the existence and contents of the articles.

This decision was affirmed on appeal.

A. by his will limited his lands to E. his daughter, and H. her husband, for their lives, etc.; remainder to their sons successively in tail; remainder to M. his daughter, and F. her husband, for their lives, etc.: remainder to their sons successively in tail; with divers remainders over, including C. and his sons, and their issue; and he declared and provided by the will, that in case M. or F., or the sons or son of F. and M., or either of them, should become entitled to the estate under the limitations of the will, a sum of £2000 should be charged on the lands in possession, for the use of the younger children of C., in certain specific proportions. E. and H. died without issue. The sons of M. and F. died before the estate became vested in them; and after the death of M. and F., and the expiration of the preceding life-estates, G., a grandson of M. and F., became entitled under the limitations of the will to an estate-tail.

Held in the court below, and on appeal, that the lands having vested in a grandson, and not in a son of M. and F., were nevertheless liable to the charge created by the will in favour of the younger children of C.

In the years 1758 and 1764 H. had paid the sums of £100 and £2000 of the debts of A., and had from time to time, and at the periods of these payments, received various monies belonging to A. from his agents. A bill being filed by the representatives of A. to ascertain and raise certain charges upon A.'s estate; H. in his answer made no claim in respect of the payments of the £200 or the £4000; and in two successive charges sent in by him before the Master, he did not make any such claim; but at last, in the year 1817, he produced a charge, in which those sums were claimed with interest.

Held in the court below, and on appeal, that under these circumstances, the claims were barred by laches and length of time, notwithstanding the pendency of the accounts; and were properly disallowed in the same account in which H. was charged with monies from time to time, and during the period in question advanced to him by the agents of A.

[288] On the 30th of June, 1757, Articles of Agreement were executed by Annesley Gore in the words and figures following: "I do hereby oblige myself to pay unto Henry King, Esq. upon his marriage with my daughter Elinor Gore, (the said Henry King settling all the estates and money he is now entitled to on the issue of said marriage, and a suitable jointure to the fortune I give him,) the sum of £5000 sterling. Witness my hand this 30th day of June, 1757. A. G. If Henry King recovers the Boyle estate left him by the late Lord Kingsborough, I in that case oblige myself to pay the said Henry King at my death, (provided he also settles said Boyle estate on the issue of said marriage, with an additional jointure on said estate of Boyle proportionably,) the sum of £5000. Witness my hand the 30th of June, 1757. A. G.

At the same time Henry King signed the agreement following: "I do hereby oblige myself to settle all the estate and money which I am now entitled to on the issue of Elinor Gore, and a jointure of £500 a-year. And if I recover the Boyle estate, I do oblige myself to settle the same on the issue of the said marriage, with an additional jointure on the said estate of Boyle of £500 a-year."

At the time of the execution of these articles there was a suit depending between Henry King and his eldest brother, Sir Edward King (afterwards Earl of Kingston), respecting one of the family estates called the Boyle estate.

The marriage between Henry King and Elinor Gore took place on the day of the date of the articles.

Henry King did not recover the Boyle estate; but [289] an amicable agreement having taken place between him and Sir Edward King, and a deed pursuant to that agreement, bearing date the 6th of May, 1761, having been executed by them, a private Act of Parliament was passed in Ireland, in the session of 1761, for settling the differences between them; by which it was enacted, according to the agreement, that certain lands, etc. in Ireland, therein mentioned, should be, and they were thereby settled to the use of Henry King for life, with a power to settle a jointure of £500 yearly on his wife, and also with a power to charge the lands, etc. with £6000 for the portions of younger children, with remainder to the issue of Henry King in tail male, with remainders over.

By a deed bearing date the 9th of May, 1787, and made between Henry King of the 1st part, Elinor King of the 2d part, and James Stewart and the Reverend Thomas Stewart of the 3d part, reciting the articles: and the Act of Parliament and powers thereby created, Henry King, in consideration of the marriage, and of the sum of £5000 to which he became intitled as the marriage portion of Elinor King, and in performance of the agreement entered into by him with Annesley Gore, and in execution of the powers to him given by the Act of Parliament, granted and appointed to Elinor King his wife an annuity of £500, charged upon the lands vested in Robert French and Annesley Gore by the Act of Parliament, and also charged the same premises with £6000 for the portions of the younger children of the marriage.

This Deed of Appointment was registered on the 9th of May, 1787.

Annesley Gore died on the 4th of November, 1781. By his will, bearing date the 8th of August, 1780, after bequeathing two small annuities and a legacy of [290] £50, he directed that all his just debts should be paid out of his personal estate; that the deficiency (if any) in his personal estate to answer the purposes aforesaid, should be supplied and be charged upon his real estate.

He devised all his real estates in Ireland to certain trustees for the use of his daughter Elinor King, and his son-in-law Henry King, and their assigns, for the term of their respective natural lives, without impeachment of waste; and after the determination of that estate, to the use of such of the sons of Henry and Elinor King, and their heirs male, as the said Henry should appoint: and for default of such appointment, then to the use of the issue of the marriage in tail male; and in default of such issue, then to the use of the testator's daughter Mary, the wife of Francis Knox, for her life; and after the decease of Mary Knox, to the use of Francis Knox for his life; and after the decease of Francis Knox, to Francis Knox, junior, second son of Francis Knox, for life; and after his decease, to the use of his first and every other son in tail male; and in default of such issue, to the use of James Knox, father of the Appellant, who afterwards took the name of Gore, third son of Francis Knox, senior, for life; and after the decease of James Gore, to his first and every other son in tail male, with remainder to Henry Knox, fourth son of F. Knox, senior, for life; remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male; remainder to Annesley, first son of F. Knox, senior, for life; remainder to his first and other sons in tail male; remainder to the Testator's daughter Anne, the wife of Henry Carey, for life; remainder to her husband for life; remainder to Henry Carey, junior, their second son, for life; remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail [291] male; remainder to Annesley Carey, their first son, for life; with remainder to his sons in tail successively.

The will then contained the following provision: "And my will and intention is, that in case and as soon as my said daughter Mary Knox, or the said Francis her husband, or the sons or son of the said Francis and Mary, or either of them, shall, by virtue of the limitations aforesaid, become entitled to my said estate, the same shall then be and become charged and chargeable with the payment of the sum of £2000 sterling, to and for the use of the younger children of the said Henry Carey and Anne Carey his wife, in manner following (that is to say):—The sum of £500 to Henry Carey, second son of the said Henry Carey, and the remaining £1500 to the five daughters of the said Henry and Anne, and the survivors and survivor of them, share and share alike.

He bequeathed all his leasehold interests for years, charged with his debts, to the same uses as his real estate, as near as the law would admit, with a power to his executors to sell such part of his real and leasehold estates as they should think proper for the discharge of his debts: and he appointed Henry King, Francis Knox, and Henry Carey, executors of his will, which was proved by Henry King; who entered into the possession of his real and personal estate.

In the year 1798 a French army landed at Killala, in the county of Mayo, a corps of which, accompanied by a body of rebels then in arms, occupied the mansion-house of Henry King, in the town of Ballina, as their head-quarters.

At the time when the French and rebel army took possession of the mansion-house, a considerable number of deeds and papers of Henry King were deposited there, and were, during the occupation of the mansion-house as aforesaid, taken from the place where they [292] had been kept, and a great part of them was lost or destroyed, and the remaining part was, after the retreat of the army, found scattered about in a state of confusion.

Search was made among the remains of the deeds and papers of Henry King, and at the house of Lord Lorton, his executor, for the original articles, but they could not be found. The secondary evidence of their contents rested on the following proofs, viz.:—the recital in the Act of Parliament, and in the deed of appointment; a copy of the articles, in the hand-writing of Henry Dixie Lyster, the clerk of William Lyster, who had been the attorney of Annesley Gore and of Henry King; a case which had been laid before Theobald Wolfe, a barrister, about the month of August, 1782, in the hand-writing of Henry Dixie Lyster, and referring to a copy of the articles, and on which case, Theobald Wolfe wrote that he had read the copy; and the bill of costs of Lyster, which appeared to have been paid by Henry King to William Lyster by bills of exchange drawn by Henry King on Messrs. Latouche, bankers, in which Lyster charges the cost of preparing the case and copy of the articles, and laying the same before Theobald Wolfe. It was also proved that the case, the copy of the articles, and the bill of costs, were found among the papers of Henry King, and that both William Lyster and Henry Dixie Lyster were dead.

The object of laying the case before Theobald Wolfe was to obtain his opinion whether the trustees named in the will of Annesley Gore, or Henry King, Francis Knox, and Henry Carey, could, by a sale or mortgage of a competent part of the estates of Annesley Gore, raise a sum for the payment of the marriage portion, and the interest thereof, under the power [293] given them by the will, to sell and dispose of such part of his real freehold and leasehold estates as they should think proper, for the discharge of the debts of Annesley Gore.

Elinor, the wife of Henry King, died in the year 1789, without having had issue.

On the 2d of December, 1814, Annesley Knox, Henry Knox, Arthur Knox, and John Knox, as executors of Francis Knox, exhibited their bill in the High Court of Chancery of Ireland against Henry King, Mary Knox (since deceased), then the widow of Francis Knox, and the then next tenant for life of the testator's estates expectant on the death of Henry King, James Knox Gore, since deceased, the then next tenant for life of the testator's estates expectant on the decease of Henry King and of Mary Knox, (his elder brother, Francis Knox the younger, having previously died without issue male), and also against the appellant, Francis Arthur Knox Gore, then a minor, the eldest son and heir apparent of James Knox Gore and first tenant in tail of the estates under the will, and against several others, in order to recover the amount of certain judgment debts affecting the estates that had so as aforesaid belonged to the said Annesley Gore in his lifetime.

Henry King answered the bill on the 3d of June, 1815, being then eighty-four years of age, and he by his answer admitted the plaintiff's demands, but denied that he was bound to pay them, having paid very large sums out of his own funds in discharge of the debts due by Annesley Gore at his decease, over and above the amount of the personal estate of Annesley Gore, for which sums he prayed by his answer to stand in the place of the creditors whose debts he had so discharged out of his own [294] funds, and to have the same decreed to be charges against the real estates of Annesley Gore.

The cause was heard before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland on the 25th of February, 1817, when it was decreed that the will of Annesley Gore was well proved, and that the trusts thereof should be carried into execution; and accordingly it was referred to one of the masters to take accounts: of the sums due to the plaintiffs on their judgments: of the personal estate of the testator, with the nature and amount of such personal estate: into whose hands same had come, and how the same had been applied and disposed of: also an account of the testator's debts, legacies, and funeral expenses: and in taking such accounts the master was directed to inquire and report whether any and which of the debts of the testator due at his decease had been paid by Henry King: and if he should find that Henry King had paid such debts, he was then to inquire and report out of what funds he had paid such debts, and if he should find that Henry King had paid any of the debts out of his own funds, then it was declared that Henry King should be entitled to stand in the place of the creditors whose debts he should have so paid.

Upon this reference the plaintiff filed a charge on the foot of the judgments, and proved the same; and on the 9th of September, 1817, Henry King filed a charge with two schedules, containing the particulars of such debts of Annesley Gore as had been paid by Henry King. In the second schedule to the charge, the following items were inserted: "To the amount of money remaining due by the said Annesley Gore at the time of his decease to said defendant, and of sums paid by said defendant for said Annesley Gore £—. To principal sums due on foot of other bonds, and on foot of other judgments obtained [295] against said Annesley Gore at the time of his decease, paid by said defendant £—."

An additional charge was afterwards filed on behalf of Henry King, claiming the principal sum of £3000 on the foot of the marriage portion, with the sum of £4382 for the interest thereof, from the date of the marriage articles to the day of the death of Annesley Gore.

Henry King not having been able to discover the original articles of the 30th of June, 1757, the same could not be produced or proved before the master on taking the account, but the secondary evidence before stated was laid before the master.

James Knox Gore, on the 3d day of October, 1817, caused personal interrogatories to be administered to Henry King. He, in his answer, did not claim credit for certain sums afterwards claimed, of £100 and £2000, or the interest thereof. And as before he claimed only the principal sum of £3000 on the foot of the portion, and £4382 interest.

On the 20th of March, 1819, a further charge was filed on behalf of Henry King, on foot of the principal sums of £100 and £2000, and the interest thereof, which was claimed as due for monies paid by Henry King on account of Annesley Gore; it was entitled the further charge of Henry King, containing further particulars of the second item in the second schedule to the original charge of the said Defendant.

The Master, in taking the account, ruled that the portion of £5000 did not bear interest, and deducted from the amount of the principal sum of £5000 the sum of £2697, from time to time paid by Annesley Gore's agents to and for Henry King, and by his report, bearing date the 1st of May, 1824, found that the sum of £2303, and no more, remained due to Henry [296] King, on the foot of the £5000, at the time of the death of Annesley Gore, although the Respondent insisted that after the aforesaid deduction, he was manifestly entitled to interest on the foot of the marriage portion, from the 30th day of June, 1757, the date of the marriage articles, to the 4th day of November, 1781, the day of the death of Annesley Gore, and to have the said £2697 set off against the said two sums of £100 and £2000, and the interest thereof, which was also the desire of the Appellant, as appears by one of the exceptions filed by him to the report, in case the Master allowed the Respondent credit for the two last-mentioned sums.

In respect of the £2000 charged upon the estates, in favour of Henry, the second son of Henry Carey, and the surviving daughters of Henry and Anne Carey, in case Mary Knox, or Francis her husband, or the son or sons of Francis and Mary, should, under the limitations, become intitled to the estate; a charge was filed by the assignee of Henry, the second son of Henry Carey, and two surviving daughters, the Respondents Cuddy, Carey, and Kelly, to whom respectively the Master reported the principal sum of £2000, with interest, to be due, in the proportions specified in the will.

Pending the account, Henry King died, at the age of ninety-one years, having made his will, and appointed the Respondent sole executor; and the Respondent having obtained probate of the will, the cause was revived against him. The report of the Master having been filed, the Appellant took several exceptions thereto. The third exception was, because the Master had applied several sums of money, amounting to the sum of £2697 in liquidation of the sum of £5000, the portion of Elinor King, whereas he ought to have debited the Respondent with such several sums [297] of money, amounting to the sum of £2697, as so much money paid to and received by Henry King, to the use of Annesley Gore; or if the Master was warranted in making any specific application thereof, the same should have been applied, in the first instance, towards the discharge of the sums of £100 and £2000 in the Appellant's first and second exceptions mentioned.

The ninth exception was, because the Master allowed a credit to the Respondent for the sum of £5000, the portion of Elinor King; whereas the Master was not warranted by the evidence or by law, to allow any sum on foot of the portion.

An exception to the report was also filed on behalf of the Respondent; because the Master had only allowed credit to the Respondent for £2203 for the balance due on foot of £5000, the portion of Elinor King; whereas he should have allowed to the Respondent the principal sum of £3000 and £4382 10s., the interest thereof, from the 30th of June, 1757, to the 4th of November, 1781, making together £7382 10s.

As to the £2000, with interest, reported due to the Respondents Cuddy, Carey, and Kelly, the Appellant excepted to the report on the ground that it was not upon the events a charge affecting the estate.

The cause was heard on the report, exceptions, and merits, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th days of July, 1824, when no question was raised respecting the existence or due execution of the marriage articles of the 30th of June, 1757, but only as to the right to interest on foot of the portion.

The exception, as to the £2000, was overruled.

Upon the third and ninth exceptions of the Appellant, and on the exception filed on behalf of Respondent, it was referred back to the Master, to take an [298] account of the sum due on the foot of the portion, the court declaring, that the portion was payable, with interest, from the day of the marriage of Henry King and Elinor Gore, and that the Respondent was not entitled to credit for the sums of £400 and £2000.

Against this decretal order, there was an appeal by the plaintiff in the suit below, and a cross appeal by Lord Lorton, as executor of Henry King.

Upon the direct appeal, it was contended, on behalf of the Appellant, that there was not a sufficient foundation laid in evidence to entitle the Respondent Lord Lorton to read secondary evidence of the alleged articles of the 30th of June, 1757, and that there was not any proof before the court of the said articles: That it did not appear that the sum of £5000 claimed under the articles of 1757, was at any time an existing charge against the Appellant's estate. The alleged articles of 1757 rested on mutual and dependent covenants, and the portion was not to be thereby payable until Henry King should settle on the issue of the marriage the estate and money he was then entitled to, and make a jointure for his wife pursuant to his covenant, which covenant did not appear ever to have been duly performed, and therefore it was argued that no debt existed on the foot of the sum of £5000 claimed by the Respondent Lord Lorton, even supposing the alleged articles to have been executed. If the sum of £5000 was a debt existing from the date of the articles, or at the marriage of Henry King with Miss Gore, it was barred by length of time, before the death of Annesley Gore, which did not take place for more than twenty-four years after the marriage, and the date of the articles, and should be presumed to [299] have been paid by Annesley Gore: and not being a debt due by Annesley Gore, at the time of his death, it could not be a charge on his real estate under his will.

If the execution of the alleged deed of 1757 made the sum of £5000 a debt of the testator, it could only have been a debt due and payable from the execution of the deed of 1787, the sum of £5000 not being sooner payable, if at all. Supposing the sum of £5000 to be a charge on the estates, it did not appear, from the copy of the articles of 1757, that interest was to be payable on the sum of £5000 therein mentioned, and now claimed by the Respondent Lord Lorton, and there is no evidence of a demand made of the principal sum, or any part thereof, from Annesley Gore. If interest was payable, it is, under all the circumstances, to be presumed, that all interest on the sum of £5000 was paid during the lifetime of Annesley Gore, and by the bill, filed by Henry King in 1788, he claims a balance of £3000 only, to be due on the alleged charges; and even if the settlement of 1787 were to be considered as a performance, by Henry King, of his covenant, in the alleged articles of 1757, it would not entitle him, or the Respondent Lord Lorton, to interest from the marriage, by relation back. Supposing the interest to have become in arrear, at the death of Annesley Gore, it is to be presumed, that Henry King, who received the rents and profits of the estates of Annesley Gore, retained the interest thereof; and at all events the decree or decretal order should not have decreed an account to be taken on the foot of the interest of the £5000, without decreeing an account of the rents and profits received by Henry King who was bound to keep down the interest out of the rents, if the real estate was charged with the £5000.

[300] As to the £2000, the estate of Annesley Gore was only to become chargeable with the sum of £2000 in the event of Mary Knox, or Francis Knox, her husband, or the son or sons of Francis or Mary becoming entitled to the estate, which event has not yet taken place, and it does not appear that the testator intended to charge his estate at all events.

For the Respondent it was contended, that if the question of fact were now open, (which the Respondent submitted it was not, not having been made the ground of any distinct exception to the Master's report, nor any question raised thereon, upon the hearing below,) there is sufficient proof of the existence, loss, and contents of the marriage articles of the 30th of June, 1757, whereby Annesley Gore bound himself by deed, to pay to Henry King the sum of £5000, as the portion of Elinor Gore, the daughter of Annesley Gore: that Henry King was entitled to receive interest on the marriage portion, inasmuch as the portion was payable immediately upon the celebration of the marriage, and he had by articles bound himself to settle all his property on the issue of the marriage, and a jointure of £500 a year on Elinor, and by his marriage with Elinor, he subjected himself to her immediate support suitable to her rank in life, and to the support of the issue of his marriage, and if he had died at any time after the celebration of the marriage, Elinor would have been entitled under the articles, to an annuity or jointure of £500 a year, charged on all the property of Henry King, and the issue (if any) of the marriage would have been entitled to all his property, subject to the jointure, though Henry King had not executed any deed of settlement in pursuance of the articles.

Although the right of Henry King to enforce the [301] actual payment of the portion and the interest thereof, might be postponed until he had executed a deed securing to Elinor, and the issue of the marriage, the provisions intended for them by the articles: yet a delay in executing such a deed cannot affect his right to receive the interest of the portion, from the date of the marriage: for the articles having been executed for the valuable consideration of marriage, a court of equity would have compelled the specific execution of the agreement therein contained on his part.

Henry King did by deed of appointment of the 9th of May, 1787, make such provision for Elinor, and the issue of the marriage, as by the marriage articles he was bound to make for them. And he thereby at least entitled himself to be paid the portion with interest from the beginning.

The cross appeal turned upon the following facts:

In the year 1758 Annesley Gore became indebted by bond to one Anne Henry in the sum of £1000. In 1761 Henry King paid £400 in part of the debt owing upon the bond. In 1764 Annesley Gore became indebted to the Bishop of Killala by bond, in the sum of £2000. On the 6th of December, 1764, Henry King paid the money due on the bond. Between the years 1757 and 1775, Annesley Gore paid to Henry King various sums of money, amounting to £2697. In the answer filed in 1815, by Henry King, to the bill for ascertaining and raising the charges upon the real assets of Annesley Gore, as before stated, Henry King made no claim in respect of these payments of £400 and £2000. After the decree in September, 1817, Henry King brought into the master's office, a charge on the foot of debts of Annesley Gore paid by Henry King. These payments were not in-[302]-cluded in that charge. In October, 1817, he was examined upon interrogatories. In his answer he made no claim in respect of these payments. But in March, 1819, a further charge was filed on behalf of Henry King, claiming the sums of £400 and £2000 with interest from the respective times of payment, and the Master having reported in favour of these claims, exceptions were taken to his report, which, on hearing the cause in 1824, were allowed as to the £400, on the ground that the debt had been discharged by the application of bills, to the amount of £396, sent by Annesley Gore to Henry King; and as to the £2000, on the ground that the claim had been barred by the statute of limitations.

Against the decree and order allowing these exceptions, the cross-appeal by Lord Lorton was presented.

For the Appellants in the cross-appeal:

Francis Arthur Knox Gore did not by any exception to the report, claim credit for the sum of £396 mentioned in the decree or order, but had submitted to the Master's decision in respect thereof, the Master having refused to give him credit for that sum, and no exception having been taken to the report on that account. It did not appear by any evidence in the cause that bills to that or any other amount, were sent by Annesley Gore to Henry King; the only evidence relating to the bills being an entry in the account book of Francis Moran, dated the 15th November, 1761, in the following words and figures,—“Bills to Mr. Gore to send to Henry King, Esquire, £396,” which is certainly evidence of nothing more than that those bills were handed to Mr. Gore, but no evidence of what further use they were applied to by him.

Supposing it had been proved that the bills had [303] been sent by Annesley Gore to Henry King, it would have been necessary to have shewn that the £396 was paid on account of the sum specified in the exception.

As to the second exception, an executor is not bound to insist on the statute of limitations, in bar of a fair demand, and is no more bound to insist upon it against his own demand than against any other.

Supposing the statute of limitations might have been set up as a bar to this demand of the Appellant, Francis Arthur Knox Gore did not rely on it, or allege it as a bar before the Master, or in his exceptions to the report, and therefore ought not to have had any benefit from the statute at the hearing on the exceptions.

Francis Arthur Knox Gore had been allowed credit by the Master in the account, on the foot of the marriage portion of £5000 for the several sums of money paid to Henry King, from time to time, in the lifetime of Annesley Gore, in the report specified, amounting altogether to the sum of £2697, the greater part of which had been paid by Annesley Gore to Henry King between the time of the payment of the sum to the bishop of Killala, and the death of Annesley Gore, not one of which sums appears by the Master's report to have been paid on any particular account; and the payments so made to Henry King, subsequent to the payment made by him of the sum of £2000 to the bishop of Killala, ought therefore to be presumed to have been paid to Henry King on account of the sum of £2000 which he had advanced to the bishop of Killala, or the amount thereof, and might have been so applied.

However the sums were to be applied, it appears by the Master's report, that not one of the sums was paid within six years previous to Annesley Gore's [304] decease. And therefore the statute of limitations ought not to have been allowed in bar of Appellant's right to credit for the £2000 so paid to the bishop of Killala, and the interest thereof, without expressly directing that the Appellant should not be charged in any way with the sums amounting to £2697, the statute of limitations operating in bar of the whole of the sums comprised in the said sum of £2697 upon any principle on which it can be held to operate against the Appellant's having credit for the £2000 so paid by Henry King, to the bishop of Killala. The Appellant ought either to have credit for the sum paid by Henry King to the bishop of Killala, or he ought not to be charged with the sum paid by Annesley Gore to Henry King; for if on the principle of there being cross demands and a running account between the parties, the items on one side are taken out of the statute, so also must those on the other side.

For the Respondent:

As to the First Exception: It appears by the receipt of the 18th of December, 1761, upon which the claim of £400 and interest is founded, that the payment was made by Annesley Gore, and that Henry King was only the agent in making it, and must be taken under the circumstances, and particularly at this distance of time, to have procured from Annesley Gore funds to enable him to make such payment.

If such a debt ever existed, this payment must, from the length of time that elapsed between the time of payment and the death of Annesley Gore, nearly twenty years, be presumed to be satisfied, and more especially as Annesley Gore was a man of considerable property, and such presumption is strengthened by the fact of Henry King, who survived Annesley Gore a number of years, not having made any claim on the foot of such payment until the year 1819.

[305] It appears that the said sum of £400 was discharged by the application of bills sent by Annesley Gore to Henry King.

The balance due upon the bond (after payment of £400) was paid by Annesley Gore, and the security taken up by him and cancelled by cutting off the seal, and under such circumstances, and in such state, the bond came into the hands of Henry King as executor of Annesley Gore, with all his other papers, and upon the death of Henry King came into the hands of the Appellant as executor of Henry King, and King's possession of the bond is consistent with the fact of the discharge of the whole amount thereof, by and with the money of Annesley Gore. If such a debt ever existed, it was barred by the statute of limitations in the lifetime of Annesley Gore.

As to the Second Exception: The sum of £2000 in this exception mentioned does not appear to have been a payment made on account of, and for the proper debt of Annesley Gore, who was one only of two obligors in the bond; it might have been a payment for the debt of his co-obligor, or of Henry King himself, who held valuable renewable interests as tenant under the see of Killala.

If the payment was made on account of Annesley Gore, it should, under all the circumstances, at this distance of time, and especially as no claim was made on the foot of such payment until the year 1819, be presumed that Henry King (who acted as agent for Annesley Gore, in making other payments from the funds of Annesley Gore), had made such payment also with Annesley Gore's money, and not from the private funds of Henry King.

The production of that bond by the representative of Henry King is not in itself evidence that the pay-[306]-ment thereof was made with the money of Henry King, inasmuch as Henry King acquired possession of all the papers of Annesley Gore as his executor, and the papers afterwards came into the possession of the Appellant as executor of Henry King.

The Lord Chancellor: This was the case of an appeal from an order of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, on exceptions taken to the Master's report: the exceptions are many in number, and embrace a great variety of complicated facts and considerations. It will not be necessary for me in suggesting the course to be pursued in this case to trouble your Lordships with all the particulars to which I have adverted. I will endeavour to confine the observations I have to make upon this case to those material points which in the course of the argument have been pressed on the consideration of the House.

Upon these exceptions one question related to the interest of certain persons of the name of Carey; two of them were the daughters of the third daughter of Annesley Gore. The question arose upon the construction of the will of Annesley Gore. I think that the interpretation which was put upon that part of the will by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was perfectly correct, and so clear as to afford no reasonable ground whatever for doubt. I should therefore recommend that that part of the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

The material question for consideration arises out of certain articles which were executed as far back as the year 1757, upon the marriage of the daughter of Annesley Gore with Mr. Henry King. One question, which was argued at great length at the bar, was of this nature, as to whether or not there was suf-[307]-ficient evidence of the contents and the execution of those articles. Now, in the first place, adverting to the form of the exception to the Master's report, it does not appear to me that the question is raised with respect to the sufficiency of the evidence as to the existence or contents of those articles. The terms of the exception are not such as very distinctly to raise that question, nor do I believe it was ever intended to raise that question. It is true that the terms, perhaps, are sufficiently large to embrace it. The exception is in these words: "For that the said Master by his said report allows a credit to the said Viscount Lorton for the sum of £2303, being an alleged balance of a sum of £5000, the alleged portion of Elinor Gore, one of the daughters of Annesley Gore, on her marriage with the said Henry King, on foot of the said alleged portion." Whereas the said Master was not warranted by evidence or law to allow any sum on foot of the said portion. There are questions existing in this case quite sufficient to satisfy these terms of the exception that the "Master was not warranted by evidence or law to allow any sum on the foot of the said portion;" and therefore, although the terms of that exception, perhaps, are large enough to embrace a question of this kind, I do not think it was the intention of the parties at the time when that exception was framed to raise this particular question, for I think as an objection was taken in the Master's office to the evidence for the establishment of those articles, if it had been intended before the Court of Chancery to agitate this question, the terms of the exception would have pointed to it more distinctly. It is stated in the Respondent's case (and there is nothing to throw doubt upon it in the case on the other side) that in point of fact this objection was not insisted upon in the Court of Chancery: it is stated that some [308] allusion was made to it, but that so far from its being insisted upon, it was actually abandoned at the bar by the counsel. That was stated at the bar of the house in the course of the argument, and I did not hear it denied on the other side. I have since had some conversation with the noble and learned Lord before whom the case was heard, who, according to the best of his recollection, does not consider that this question was agitated at the bar of the Court of Chancery, but that the main question which was there agitated, was, whether or not Henry King, or the representatives of Henry King, were entitled to a claim of interest made upon the sum contained in those articles; and if in the result it should turn out that the question was not raised in the Court below, or when alluded to was abandoned, the House will not allow such an objection to prevail, coming here per saltum for consideration, and now raised for the first time at the bar of the House, especially a question of this nature.

But I would beg leave to call your attention to the evidence for the purpose of establishing the existence and the execution of this instrument, because I think it is impossible to advert to that evidence and to entertain any doubt whatever that these articles in this form did exist, and that they were executed by Annesley Gore.

Upon this enquiry, as the articles themselves were not produced before the Master, evidence was brought forward for the purpose of giving a satisfactory account of their having been lost or destroyed, and that evidence was of this description. These articles were supposed to have been executed in the year 1757. In the year 1798, in consequence of the rebellion which at that time existed in that part of Ireland, a body of troops, consisting of Irish rebels and French troops, took possession of the house of Mr. Henry [309] King; they established their head-quarters in that house, and held possession of it for a very considerable time; and a witness who gave evidence in the progress of this cause, proved that he was upon the premises at the time, and that all the closets and drawers were ransacked, and all the papers and deeds were scattered about the different rooms of the house. It is natural, therefore, to suppose, that under such circumstances, many of them must have been destroyed. Henry King was the representative and executor of Annesley Gore; if there were two parts, therefore, of this instrument, they would come into the possession of Henry King. Lord Lorton was the executor of Henry King: with a view to this inquiry, and with a view to this cause, the premises at Ballina, which was the house of Henry King, were searched for the purpose of discovering those articles, and the depositories of Lord Lorton, who was the executor of Henry King, containing any papers belonging to Henry King, both in Dublin and the country, were searched and carefully examined, and there was no trace whatever of those original articles. Upon this evidence, it was competent for this purpose, to admit secondary evidence of the existence, execution, and contents of these articles.

Now that evidence was of this description: Annesley Gore died in 1781, the articles having been executed in the year 1757. The very year after his death, Henry King, by means of Mr. Lyster, his attorney, stated a case for the opinion of Mr. Wolfe (at that time Attorney-General for Ireland, and afterwards Lord Kilwarden), with reference to those very articles. The object of the case was to ascertain whether or not a part of the property of Annesley Gore might be sold for the purpose of discharging this debt. In the case [310] itself, the substance of the articles was set out, but the case referred to a copy of the articles by which the case was supposed to be accompanied: there was an opinion upon the case in the hand-writing of Mr. Wolfe, which hand-writing was proved, and Mr. Wolfe, in his own hand-writing, has said with reference to the copy which is stated to have accompanied the case, "I have read it;" there is no doubt, therefore, that the case for the particular purpose to which I have referred was laid before Mr. Wolfe in the year 1782, the year after the death of Mr. Annesley Gore, that case being wholly written by a son of Mr. Lyster, who was the attorney of Mr. King, and had been the attorney of Mr. Annesley Gore.

There is also a bill of costs which was found among the papers of Mr. Henry King, in the hand-writing of Mr. Lyster's son, adverting to this very case, and making a charge for it, which bill of costs is proved afterwards to have been paid.

Under such circumstances, therefore, it can hardly be supposed that the copy which was thus sent to Mr. Wolfe for his opinion with reference to the subject to which I have adverted could have been any other than a genuine copy of the instrument; and the instrument probably existed at that time, for that was in 1782, many years before this supposed destruction of the instrument, by the means to which I have adverted, which was in the year 1798.

In an act of parliament passed in the year 1764, a very few years after the date of the execution of those articles, a power is given to charge those estates which belonged to Mr. Henry King, with a jointure of £500 a-year; and in the year 1783, a settlement is made on Henry King under this power, corresponding exactly with the sum mentioned in the articles.

[311] Now, taking this evidence, and taking all the circumstances of this case together, I think I should do wrong in suggesting to your Lordships any other course than that of confirming that part of the decree which relates to those articles. I am of opinion that I cannot, under these circumstances, recommend to your Lordships to set aside the decree, on the ground that there is no sufficient evidence to satisfy your Lordships that those articles did exist in the form in which they are represented in the copy, and that they were executed by Mr. Annesley Gore; I think if I did I should give your Lordships improper advice in a case of this description, particularly where there is great reason to doubt, whether this question was raised at the hearing in the court below. I think I ought not to recommend to your Lordships to reverse any part of this decree founded on the supposition that there was not sufficient evidence of the existence of those articles.

The only material question that remains to be considered, is the question of interest. That question arises out of the construction of the articles. The articles are in these terms. I have already read them, but I will advert to them again, to shew the precise terms on which the question depends.—“I do hereby,” says Mr. Annesley Gore, “oblige myself to pay unto Henry King, Esquire, upon his marriage with my daughter, Elinor Gore; and the said Henry King settling all the estates and money he is now entitled to on the issue of said marriage, and a suitable jointure to the fortune, I give him the sum of £5000 sterling:” it should seem, that after that part of the articles had been written, some treaty or negotiation must have existed between the parties, because your Lordships will find, that it is upon Mr. Henry King [312] making a suitable jointure to the fortune I give him, which is a sum of £5000 sterling. In a note written at the bottom, and signed by Mr. Henry King, he says, “I do oblige myself to settle all the estate and money which I am now entitled to on the issue of Elinor Gore, and a jointure of £500 a year:” so that it should seem, that between the period when the original memorandum was made by Mr. Annesley Gore, and the period of the memorandum adopting his proposition, signed by Mr. Henry King, who was to make a suitable jointure, according to the memorandum signed by Mr. Annesley Gore, that was settled between them as a jointure of £500 a year; and he says, therefore, in answer, “I do hereby oblige myself to settle all the estate and money which I am now entitled to on the issue of Elinor Gore, and a jointure of £500 a year; and if I recover the Boyle estate, I do oblige myself to settle the same on the issue of said marriage, with an additional jointure on said estate of Boyle, of £500 a year:” with respect to the Boyle estate, it is not necessary to advert to that matter, for it does not appear that he recovered the Boyle estate.

Now what took place upon that? It appears that there was an obligation on the one party to pay £5000: there was an express distinct obligation on the other to settle all the money to which the party was entitled, so as to create a jointure of £500 a year: there were mutual obligations of this description. What took place? It appears that there was at this period a contest between Henry King and his brother, Sir Edward King, with respect to a considerable part of the property in controversy. That was carried on for a considerable period, and at last, in 1762, it was settled by a mutual arrangement between the parties. [313] For the purpose of confirming the arrangement, an act of parliament was passed, and it appears, that by that act of parliament all the property which this gentleman, Mr. Henry King, was entitled to, all the real property he was entitled to, was included in that act of parliament, and became the subject of a settlement under that act. Now the settlement under that act of parliament, so far as it is necessary to state it, is of this description:—Mr. Henry King took an estate for life, with remainder to his issue in tail; there was a power to raise £500, for the purpose of a jointure to Mrs. Elinor King his wife, and a portion, not exceeding a sum of £6000, for his younger children. If this power had been immediately executed, that would have been a fulfilment, as far as the real property was concerned; and it does not appear that he was possessed of any personal property; but in point of fact the power was not immediately executed, owing to some accidental circumstances which are not sufficiently explained in this case. It was not till the year 1787, but still during the lifetime of Mrs. King, that this power was executed; there was then a settlement executed, referring to these marriage articles, an appointment by which she was to have £500 a year, and £6000 was settled for the use of the younger children. In 1787, therefore, these articles were completely fulfilled, as far as the real property was concerned; and it does not appear that there was any personal property, as far as the interests of Mrs. King were concerned. Her interests, therefore, were completely satisfied by the execution of this instrument, which was executed during her lifetime, and she had the full benefit of this stipulation. The £5000 was to have been paid upon the marriage; the stipulation on the part of [314] Mrs. Henry King, which was a binding obligation upon him, was, that he would execute an instrument of a particular description, which settlement was afterwards executed so as to give Mrs. Elinor King, the wife, the full benefit of it. As the money was not paid at the time when it ought to have been, it follows, I think, that interest ought to be charged according to the opinion of the court below (which I think was perfectly correct), from the period of the date of the marriage, when the money ought, in point of fact, to have been paid; I think that is the proper construction of this argument, and under these circumstances, I am clearly of opinion, that this part of the judgment of the court below was perfectly correct.

There is another question relating to sums of £400 and £2000, which were monies supposed to have been paid by Mr. Henry King to the Bishop of Killala and others. With respect to that transaction, considering the time at which it was brought forward, considering the course pursued by Mr. Henry King himself, and considering the late period at which any claim was made on the part of Mr. Henry King, taking all circumstances into consideration, I am of opinion, that the judgment of the court below was just and proper in disallowing these claims.

I have referred to the cross appeal, and the minute considerations arising out of it, and I have read the papers with great attention. I should detain your Lordships too long if I were to go into them. I think it will be sufficient to say I am satisfied that the course pursued by the Court of Chancery in Ireland was correct, and that upon the whole, with reference to all the parts of it, this judgment ought to be affirmed.

With respect to costs in this case, it was a case of [315] great complexity, embracing a great many considerations, and perhaps it will be too much to say that it was not properly brought under the consideration of your Lordships; under such circumstances it may be proper to move that it be affirmed without costs. With respect, however, to the question of costs, I would take a little time to consider as to part of them: the question arising out of the claim of the two Careys and Mr. Cuddy, the representative of one of them. I think that with respect to that part of the case which appears to me too clear to admit of doubt, your Lordships might give an opinion that these parties were entitled to their costs; the rest is altogether so complicated, and involves so many questions of fact, and so many considerations of law, that perhaps it will be better to affirm the decree without costs. The difficulty and complexity of cases in the courts in Ireland, arises out of the extent of the causes in point of time. This originated out of articles executed in 1757, and out of an account, the first item of which was about the year 1760. It is not matter of surprise, therefore, that there should be complexity as to the facts and as to the law arising out of these circumstances.

Judgment affirmed.

IRELAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

ROGER MONTGOMERY HAMILTON M'NEILL, and DANIEL M'NEILL,—Appellants; MICHAEL CAHILL and ROBERT GROVE LESLIE,—Respondents.

The House of Lords having made an order, containing declarations as to the rights of parties, and remitting the case to the court below, with directions; it is not competent to the court below, upon the same state of evidence, to give any judgment inconsistent with the declarations and directions of the House of Lords.

The order which was made by the House of Lords in this cause, as reported ante, vol. ii. (1st ser.) [2 Bli. 229] was, by an order of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, dated on the 6th of November, 1820, adopted, and made an order of that court.

Upon the reference which took place upon that order, the Master made a Report on the 31st of January, 1821, the material parts of which are incorporated in the following (among sixteen) exceptions, which were taken to the Report by the Respondent, Michael Cahill:

First Exception: For that the Master has by his said report found that Roger Hamilton M'Neill, the father of the Plaintiff Roger, had no right to sell the estate of Taynish; whereas the Master, on the evidence laid before him, should have found that the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill had a right to sell the estate [317] of Taynish, and therefore the Defendant Michael Cahill excepts to said report.

Second Exception: For that the said Master has also in and by his said report stated, that the interest of the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, in the purchase-money arising by the sale of the Taynish estate, after paying the heritable debts, amounting to £9000, and the sum of £2000 the fortune of Defendant Cahill's late wife, viz. the sum of £10,000 British, was that of tenant for life, and that the said son of Plaintiff Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, upon his death was entitled to the said sum, and by the law of Scotland had a claim in respect thereof, upon the estate of his said father, in the hands of the Defendant Cahill, as his executor; whereas the Master, upon the evidence laid before him, should have reported that the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill was not mere tenant for life of the said purchase money, but had the absolute interest therein, and that the Plaintiff Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill was not, upon the death of his said father, entitled to the said sum of £10,000 or any part thereof, and had not by the law of Scotland, in respect thereof, a demand against the estate of his said father, in the hands of the Defendant Cahill, as his executor.

Third Exception: For that the said Master has, in and by his said report, found that the Plaintiff Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill did not by his interference with the rents of the Raplock estate, as it appeared in evidence before him, forfeit his right under the settlement of 1743, in said Report mentioned, or his claim to the money arising from the sale of the said Taynish estate; whereas, etc.

Fourth Exception: For that the said Master has, in and by his said Report, found that certain suits were [318] instituted by the Plaintiff Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, in the Scotch courts, respecting the will of his said father, but has not reported, as he ought to have done on the evidence before him, that such suits related also to part of the purchase money of the said Taynish estate, which was claimed by the Defendant Cahill, as executor of the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased. And in which suits the said Plaintiff Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill was an intervenient party, and claimed the same likewise.

Fifth Exception: For that even supposing that the said Roger Hamilton M'Neill had, as reported by the said Master, no right to sell the estate of Taynish, and that his interest in the purchase money arising from the sale thereof, was that merely of tenant for life; and that his son the Plaintiff Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill became entitled to the said sum of £10,000, part of said purchase money, and by the law of Scotland had a claim in respect thereof, upon the estate of his father; yet upon the evidence before the said Master, and particularly by the said proceedings in the said courts of Scotland, and the discharge and disclamation in said report mentioned, he should have found that the said Plaintiff Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill had extinguished all claim against his said father's estate in the hands of the said Defendant Cahill, as his executor; and therefore Defendant Cahill excepts to the said report.

Sixth Exception: For that the said Master has stated in his said report that the said Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, upon the death of his said father, was entitled to the said sum of £10,000, and, by the law of Scotland, had a claim in right thereof against the estate of his said father, in the hands of Defendant as his executor, without sufficient evidence to warrant [319] him to do so: and therefore the Defendant Cahill excepts to the said report.

The cause was heard on the report, exceptions, and merits, in March, 1825, when the Lord Chancellor overruled the first and also the second exception, so far as the same depended on the construction of the deed of the 15th day of June, 1743, in the pleadings mentioned, but subject to the order to be made, on the result of the evidence produced before the Master, in regard to the fifth and sixth exceptions, and he overruled the third exception, subject to the order to be made on the fifth and sixth exceptions, and he allowed the fourth exception generally, and he also allowed the fifth and sixth exceptions, it being, as he declared, very doubtful from the transaction between the parties, the decree, and disclaimer, and all the other evidence in the cause, whether (the Appellant having in the year 1782 ratified the sale of Taynish) he had received any part of the produce thereof, or had in any manner compromised his rights thereto, no claim having been made in respect thereof until the year 1807 or 1808, and it being impossible, after the deaths of Roger Hamilton M'Neill, the father, and Dr. M'Neill, to ascertain (if any thing was due to the Appellant in that respect) the amount thereof; and the Lord Chancellor overruled the seventh, eighth, ninth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth exceptions; and also the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth exceptions, subject to the return of the Master's report, and he referred it to the Master, to take an account of the rents of the purchased lands in the pleadings mentioned, received by the Appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, from 1789 to the year 1816, when the Respondent got into possession, and also to take an account on the foot of [320] the principal and interest of the purchase money in the pleadings mentioned during the same period; and directed that a balance should be struck thereon, and in case any balance should appear to be due to the Appellant, Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, on such account the same, with interest thereupon, down to the time of payment, was to be computed and charged against him; but if any balance on such account should appear to be due to the said Respondent, the same was to be accordingly charged against the Appellant.

Against the order made upon the second, third, fifth, and sixth exceptions, and also the order upon the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth exceptions, and the order whereby it was referred to the Master to take an account of the rents of the purchased lands in the pleadings mentioned, received by the Appellant from the year 1789 to the year 1816, when the Respondent got into possession: and an account on the foot of the principal and interest of the purchase-money in the pleadings mentioned during the same period, and against the direction that in case any balance should appear to be due to Appellants on such account, the same, with interest thereupon down to the time of payment, should be computed and charged against the Respondent, but in case any balance on such account should appear due to Respondent, the same to be accordingly charged against the Appellants, this Appeal was presented.

For the Appellants: As to the order made upon the 2d, 3d, 5th, and 6th exceptions, the House of Lords, by their decree, had determined the Appellant's right to an inquiry, whether he had any claim against the Respondent as [321] executor of Roger Hamilton M'Neill, with respect to the purchase money of the Taynish estate by the law of Scotland, notwithstanding the evidence in this cause which was before the House, upon the hearing of the former appeal in this cause; and although it appeared upon the evidence before the Master, that the Appellant had such claims as reported by the Master, yet the Lord Chancellor professed to make the said order upon the evidence in the cause as barring the Appellant's right to any relief, notwithstanding the decree of the House and the finding of the Master.

Even supposing that, notwithstanding the order of the House, the court below was justified in taking into consideration the several matters stated in the said order, there is no ground for supposing that the Appellant had received any part of the purchase money of the Tainish estate, or compromised his rights thereto, the only evidence in the cause being that, after the discharge of the incumbrances affecting the estate, the purchase money had been paid to Roger Hamilton M'Neill, or to his agents, the Master having by his report so found, which is unexcepted to in this respect; and the Respondent having stated in his case, upon the former appeal in this cause, that a sum of £10,000, or thereabouts, part of £21,000, for which the Tainish estate was sold, was applied in paying off different incumbrances on the estate, including £2000, the portion of the Respondent's wife, as the only younger child of Roger, the father, and Elizabeth his wife; and that the remainder of the £21,000 except about £700, was received by Dr. M'Neill, on the account of Roger the father; and the Respondent, in his answer to the [322] Appellant's original bill in this cause, having relied upon Roger Hamilton M'Neill being seised in fee of the Tainish estate, and entitled to dispose thereof as he thought proper.

The 2d, 3d, 5th, and 6th exceptions are taken upon the ground, that the Master found by his report the several matters to which the said exceptions are taken, contrary to the evidence laid before him, yet the Lord Chancellor did not profess to make his order upon the evidence laid before the Master.

For the Respondent: Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill cannot be considered as having had an estate or interest in the Tainish estate, under the contract, and must be considered as having relinquished all right to the purchase-money (if any such he had), by his having interfered with the Raplock rents, during the life of his father, and demanding a portion of them by his original bill, in this cause, and on account of deliberate acts of election, to abandon all benefit under the contract, and insist upon his rights against his father, and on account of his repeated acknowledgments of the right of Michael Cahill, as executor of his father, to receive the said purchase money, and particularly by the release and disclamation in the Scotch court.

Independently of the circumstances of this case, a court of equity ought not to favour so stale a demand as that made by the Appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, respecting the purchase-money of the Tainish estate, particularly as he did not think proper to make such demand in the lifetime of the parties who were privy to the transaction, and at this distance of time, and referring to the circumstance of [323] Roger the father having paid a large sum of money out of the purchase-money, for and on account of Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, about the time he ratified the sale, and also the circumstance of Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill receiving the Raplock rents, it must be presumed, that an arrangement was entered into between Roger, the father, and the Appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill, whereby the Appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill gave up all title and claim to the purchase money of the Tainish estate.

For the Appellants: Sir C. Wetherell and Mr. Shadwell.

For the Respondents: Mr. Hart and Mr. Lynch.

The Lord Chancellor (23d July, 1828): In this case, upon the former appeal, a very special order was made by the House, in pursuance of which a reference to the Master was made in the court below, on several points which were the subject of the order. The Master having made his Report, sixteen exceptions were taken on the part of the Respondent, many of which were allowed, and the present appeal is against that allowance. The parties are in this situation. One object of the bill filed in the court below was to set aside the sale of the Tainish estate; another object was to obtain an account. As to the estate, the father's interest vested in him under the limitations of a marriage settlement. The Appellant was the only son of that marriage. The estate was sold by the father, and the money received by him. The material question was in the result, whether the purchase money so received should form part of the account to be taken between the Appellant and the Respondent, as [324] executor of his father. It was contended in the former stage of the cause, that for this purpose the matter was not sufficiently put in issue, and the court below adopting this view of the case, dismissed the bill. Upon the appeal against this decree, it was in this point reversed, this House being of opinion that the question was sufficiently put in issue by the pleadings to warrant an inquiry whether any part of the debts of the son were paid by the father, and out of the price of the Taynish estate, so as to form a subject of set-off in the account, to the extent of the debts so paid, but not as to any surplus. The order upon that occasion was framed with great accuracy and minuteness.—(Here the Lord Chancellor read the order, see vol. ii. p. 264, 1st series.) The House drew this distinction, that it was competent to the Appellant to give evidence to rebut the claim made against him by the Respondent as his father's executor, in respect of debts paid for him by his father, but that the matter was not sufficiently in issue to raise any question by evidence as to any thing beyond this pecuniary claim against him.

Upon this order, an inquiry being directed in the court below before the Master, the opinions of Scotch advocates were taken, but the result of the report was, that the purchase money of the estate, upon the death of the father, belonged to the Appellant, and he was to have a credit accordingly. The court below has founded its judgment on the evidence before the House on the former hearing, and as all the evidence referred to in the judgment was before the House at that time, an inquiry would not have been directed as to the law of Scotland, if the House had conceived that the right being established, it would not lead to a sufficient result.

[325] It must then have been supposed, that if it were established, that by the law of Scotland the money belonged to the Appellant, the consequence would follow, not as decided by the court below, but as before contemplated by the House. Moreover, the answer of the Respondent filed in the cause does not insist that he is entitled to the purchase money, as representative of the father, but that the father was entitled to the estate in fee. It must be assumed, in this state of the evidence, that the £10,000 which remained of the purchase money became the property of the son, and that it was not paid over to him. It is not probable it would have been paid, without deducting the counter claims against him. Out of this sum, according to the order in the former appeal, and the subsequent proceedings, he is entitled to have so much allowed on account as may balance the claims against him. So far the exceptions must be overruled, and the order of the court below reversed. In all other respects the decree must be affirmed.

Die Mercurii, 23d July, 1828. After hearing counsel on Monday, the 18th, Thursday, the 21st, and Friday, the 22d days of June, 1827, upon the petition and appeal of Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill and Daniel M'Neill, Esqrs. which appeal was by order of this House, of the 11th of this instant June, revived against the Respondents Michael Cahill and Robert Grove Leslie. And also in the name of the Appellant Daniel M'Neill, complaining of an order of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, of the 8th of March, 1825, and praying that the same might be reversed, and the exceptions overruled, and that the report might be confirmed, [326] and that such further order might be made as should be agreeable thereto. As also upon the answer of Michael Cahill, and the separate answer of Robert Grove Leslie, put in to the said appeal, and due consideration had this day of what was offered on either side in this cause. It is declared by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That upon the evidence and circumstances of this case, the Appellant Roger Montgomery Hamilton M'Neill is entitled, out of the money arising by the sale of the Taynish estate to a credit in this cause, equal to the claim which the Respondent, as executor of Roger Hamilton M'Neill, deceased, has against the Appellant. And with this declaration, It is ordered and adjudged, That the second, third, fifth, and sixth exceptions be overruled, and that the said order of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, complained of in the said appeal, so far as regards the said exceptions, be and the same is hereby reversed; and that the said order, in all other respects be, and the same is hereby affirmed. And it is further ordered, That the cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery in Ireland, to proceed further therein, as shall be just and consistent with this judgment.

W. Courtenay, Dep. Cler. Parliament.

MARY KELLY,—Appellant; JOHN BATEMAN, and MARY his Wife, and JOHN BURKE BATEMAN, a Minor,—Respondents.

[News' Dig. ix. 1500.]

A bill for an account was filed in 1718. A decree was made in 1720. The account was pending in the Master's office until 1734, when it was referred to arbitration. The award was made in 1738, by which a sum of £5369 16s. 1d. was awarded to the Plaintiff, and the award was made a decree of the Court, which was affirmed upon appeal to Parliament in 1739.

In 1741 the Plaintiff, to enforce the payment of the sum awarded and decreed, filed a new bill in the nature of a bill of amendment and revivor, against the representative of the Defendant in the former suit, charging that a certain mortgage held by him was part of the assets, and praying that it might be applied in payment of the demand. The Defendant to the last suit, by his answer, admitted the mortgage. In 1742 the Plaintiff filed an amended bill. In 1747 he filed another amended bill, praying in default of personal estate a foreclosure of the mortgage, and that the principal and [328] interest might be applied in satisfaction of his demand, stating, among other things, that he had obtained a sequestration against the lands of G. B., the Defendant in the first suit, who had died before it could be executed, having by his will charged his lands with the payment of his debts. The object of this bill was to obtain payment of the sum awarded from the assets of G. B., part of which assets, as the bill charged, consisted of a mortgage upon an estate called Tyaquin, and that G. B., and his representative, had been in possession under the mortgage, and had received out of the rents and profits sufficient to satisfy the Plaintiff's demand.

In the years 1748, 1751, and 1754, upon the death of parties, bills of revivor and amended bills were filed. From this time no proceedings were taken until the year 1771, when a bill was filed by the representative of the original Plaintiff against the representative of the original Defendant, stating impediments to the prosecution of the suit, and praying an account of the rents received from the lands mortgaged. In 1772 the Defendant filed an answer refusing the discovery, and in 1773, upon exceptions he filed a further answer, still refusing the discovery, which was reported insufficient.

From this time no further proceedings were taken in the cause until the year 1785, when the representative of the Plaintiff in the last suit and of the original Plaintiff filed a bill of revivor and amended bill against the representative of the Defendant in the last suit, and against J. B. the heir of the alleged Mortgagor, stating impediments to the prosecution of the suit from the litigation in which his testatrix had been involved; and that a deed had been made by collusion between the representative of the mortgagee and J. B., the heir of the mortgagor, by which the former conveyed the lands to the latter in consideration of an annuity; charging that the deed was a fraud upon the Plaintiff, and a devastavit of the assets, and praying an account of the real and personal estate of the first representative of the original mortgagee, who had charged his debts on his real estate, and devised it and bequeathed his personalty to the Defendants, his representatives.

In 1787 the Defendants, the representatives, by their answer admitted that the deed as charged by the bill was fraudulent, and contended that the Plaintiffs should first have recourse against the lands mortgaged. From 1787 to 1795 no step was taken in the cause. Between the years 1795 and 1804, nine [329] bills of revivor and amended bills were filed. By a decree in 1808, accounts were directed to be taken of the personal and real assets of the original Defendant and his first representative. In 1810 the Master reported that £28,657 was due to the Plaintiffs; that the assets of the original Defendant consisted partly of a mortgage of the lands of T. which came into the hands of his representative, who had received of the rents and profits sufficient to answer the demand.

Upon exception to this report, the Master by a decree upon further directions was ordered to inquire under what title the representative of the original Defendant entered into the lands of T. Upon which reference the Master reported that he entered as mortgagee. Exceptions being taken to this report, upon the ground (among others) that notwithstanding the existence of apparent securities, and various accounts between the parties on the foot of an apparent mortgage, there was evidence before the Master that the deeds were in reality only deeds of trust to secure the estate against the claims of adverse creditors; and farther, that there were existing judgments, being charges upon the lands prior to the Plaintiff's claim, and that the representative of the original Defendant entered upon the lands not by virtue of the mortgage, but under the limitations of a marriage settlement; by a farther decree upon farther directions, the exceptions on these points were allowed, and the account was directed to be taken excluding the alleged mortgage, and the bill as against J. B. was dismissed.

Held on appeal that the decree was right.

Whether delays such as appear to have occurred, and under such circumstances as in the case reported, ought to operate as a bar to a demand in a Court of Equity? Quare.

Whether under the circumstances stated in the case, J. B. the heir of the supposed mortgagor, and relessee of the lands in question, was a necessary party to the appeal? Quare.

This suit arose out of a joint purchase of certain wood lands made in the year 1711.

On the 22d of November, 1717, Gerald Burke filed his original bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, against Sir Walter Blake, stating that in the year 1711, he, in partnership with Gerald [330] Burke and Ulick Burke, purchased from the then Earl of Clanricarde certain woods in the County of Galway; and praying as against Sir Walter Blake an account of the profits made of the woods, and payment of any balance which upon taking the account might appear to be due to him. Sir Walter Blake put in his answer claiming a balance to be due to him.

On the 16th of December, 1718, Sir Walter filed a cross bill, charging amongst other things that he had paid down his proportion or third part of the purchase money, and joined Gerald and Ulick Burke in securities for the remaining two third parts thereof which he afterwards paid; and praying that all proper accounts might be taken, and an account of what was due to him by the said Gerald, and that he might be decreed entitled to the benefit of a judgment entered against the said Gerald.

On the 27th of May, 1720, a decree to account was pronounced in both causes, whereby it was referred to one of the Masters of the Court to examine and report whether Sir Walter Blake had paid his part of the purchase of the said woods, and how far he was indemnified on account of his said securities so entered into for the said Gerald, which decree was afterwards affirmed upon re-hearing.

The account before the Master having been protracted until the year 1734, it was upon the argument of certain exceptions taken to the Master's report by both parties, agreed to by both parties to refer the subject matter of the causes to arbitration, and the same were accordingly referred.

[331] In 1738, the arbitrators made their award, and awarded that Sir Walter had paid his share of the purchase money, and had been obliged to pay the remainder thereof under the said securities; and they therefore awarded the sum of £5369 16s. 1d. to be paid by the said Gerald Burke to the said Sir Walter Blake, which award was afterwards made a decree of the said Court.

On the 21st of December, 1738, the Court pronounced an order, confirming the award, and decreeing that pursuant to the submission, award, and order, the sum of £5369 16s. 1d., being the sum awarded to be justly due and owing by Gerald

Burke to Sir Walter Blake, together with interest for the same from the 2nd day of July then last, should within six months from the date of the award, be brought in, and deposited by Gerald Burke with the Usher of the Court, to be paid to Sir Walter Blake, his executors and administrators.

Gerald Burke having appealed from this decree on the 9th of June, 1739, it was affirmed by the House of Lords.

Gerald Burke died after the date of this affirmance.

On the 19th of May, 1741, Sir Walter Blake filed his bill, in the nature of an amended bill, and bill of revivor against Thomas Gerald Burke, the son and heir, and against the executors of Gerald Burke, and against Ulick Burke.

Thomas Gerald Burke filed his answer to the bill on the 18th of December, 1741, and by his answer admitted the existence of the mortgage.

Sir Walter Blake filed an amended bill on the 17th of August, 1742, charging more particularly [332] than in his former bills, the several matters aforesaid, and praying like relief.

On the 3d of June, 1747, Sir Walter filed an amended bill, which charged, among other things, that Mary Burke and Alexander Carroll, the executors of Gerald Burke, had died, and that administration with the will annexed of the said Gerald was granted to Thomas Gerald Burke, who was also administrator of the said Mary; and among other things the bill prayed that in default of sufficient personal estates of Gerald to pay the amount of the demands, the same might be charged on the real and freehold estate of the said Gerald, and that the decree might be carried into execution; and also prayed a foreclosure of the mortgage, and that the principal and interest due thereon should be applied in satisfaction of the said demands.

On the 20th of August, 1748, Dame Agnes Blake filed a bill of revivor, which stated that Sir Walter Blake had died, and by his last will had appointed his wife, the said Dame Agnes Blake, his executrix, who obtained probate thereof, and prayed that the suit might be revived.

On the 17th of November, 1748, Catharine Daly, widow, filed an amended bill and bill of revivor, which charged, that Dame Agnes in the year 1748, and immediately after she had filed a bill of revivor, had died, having made her will, whereby she appointed Catharine Daly her sole executrix, and that she had obtained probate of the said will, and praying that the cause might be revived, and such relief as had been prayed for by Sir Walter Blake.

On the 19th of October, 1751, and the 25th of [333] April, 1751 respectively, Catharine Daly filed further bills of revivor and amendment, which charged the deaths of several of the parties to the suit, and prayed that the cause might stand revived, and such relief as prayed in the original bill of Sir Walter Blake.

On the 27th of April, 1771, Catherine Daly filed an amended bill against Thomas Gerald Burke and several others, charging that in consequence of several abatements and new parties becoming necessary, and of a claim being set up by Sir John Browne, under the pretence that he was the husband of the said Catherine Daly, and which claim she was not able for several years to get rid of, and the delays practised on the part of Thomas Gerald Burke, the cause was greatly retarded; and setting out the particulars of the proceedings so instituted by Sir John Browne, and the various alleged causes of delay which had obstructed the prosecution of the cause: the bill further stated, that in the year 1763 John Burke became entitled to the equity of redemption in the lands subject to the mortgages and securities: that Thomas Gerald Burke, although in his former answer he had denied that he had in his possession the mortgage deeds of the Tyaquin estate and the accounts, yet he had stated those deeds and accounts in a bill filed by him in the Court of Exchequer in the year 1751, against Rickard and Thomas Burke, and had referred to them as being in his possession; and charged that Thomas Gerald Burke had been in possession for many years of the mortgaged premises, and required Thomas Gerald Burke to set out the mortgages, securities, and accounts, [334] and the sums he received, or without wilful default might have received, as mortgagee in possession under the securities; and prayed, amongst other things, that an account might be taken of the rents of the mortgaged premises, and by whom received.

On the 28th of May, 1772, Thomas Gerald Burke answered the bill, and refused to give such discovery as to the mortgage deeds and accounts, or as to the sums received by him out of the mortgaged premises; and exceptions having been taken to the answer, were allowed.

On the 7th of July, 1773, Thomas Gerald Burke filed a further answer to the bill, still refusing to give the discovery sought for, which being also excepted to, and reported insufficient, he never filed any further answer in the cause.

On the 2nd of August, 1785, Edmund Kelly filed a bill of revivor and amended bill against John and Mary Bateman and John Burke, charging, amongst other things, that in the year 1773, Thomas Gerald Burke finding that he was pressed for a discovery of the assets of his father, entered into a conspiracy with John Burke, to whom the lands subject to the mortgage descended, to defeat Catherine Daly in the recovery of her demand, by depriving her of the funds applicable to the payment thereof; and with that view, on the 4th of November, 1773, a deed was made between Thomas Gerald Burke and John Burke, by which Thomas Gerald Burke, in consideration of £500 yearly, thereby secured to him, chargeable on the lands for his life, and several other considerations therein mentioned, released the lands to John Burke, discharged from the mort-[335]-gages and incumbrances; and further charging that £30,000 had been received by Thomas Gerald Burke from the mortgaged premises, as mortgagee in possession: the bill then stated the death of Catherine Daly, and that, after various impediments, on the 10th of March, 1779, Edmund Kelly had obtained probate of her will and administration to Sir Walter Blake; that Edmund Kelly had found himself surrounded with suits and difficulties respecting the effects of Catherine Daly, having been involved in several suits at law and in equity concerning the property of his testatrix, which had prevented him from taking any further step in this cause until after the death of Thomas Gerald Burke, who died in the year 1782, having made his last will, by which he devised all his estates real and personal to his daughter, one of the Plaintiffs, (who afterwards intermarried with John Bateman the other Plaintiff) subject to the payment of his debts; and appointed the Respondent, Mary, his executrix, who proved the will, and also took administration to Gerald Burke; and further charged that the deed of the 4th of November, 1773, was executed in fraud of the Plaintiff, and was a devastavit of the effects of Gerald Burke; the bill prayed among other things that the estates of Thomas Gerald Burke devised by him might be sold for the Plaintiff's benefit, and applied in part discharge of the Plaintiff's demand, and that the Defendants might set out an account of the real and personal estate of Thomas Gerald Burke, and for payment of the Plaintiff's demand.

The Respondents, by their answer in 1787, admitted the fraud charged as to the deed of 1773, [336] and contended that the Plaintiff must first have recourse to the mortgage of the lands of Tyquin. No further proceedings appear to have been taken until 1795. Between that year and 1804, nine bills of revivor and amended bills were filed. The cause came on to be heard on the 19th of May, 1808, when the Court pronounced a decree, whereby it was ordered and decreed that Edmund Kelly was entitled to the benefit of the decree on award of the 15th of July, 1738, and referred it to one of the Masters of the Court to take an account of the sum due for principal, interest and costs on foot of the decree, and accounts of the personal and real assets of Gerald Burke and Thomas Gerald Burke.

In pursuance of the decree the Master reported (among other things) that a sum of £28,657 4s. 9d. was due to Edmund Kelly for principal and interest on the decree of the 15th of July, 1738, and reported that the personal estate of Gerald Burke, which came into the hands of Thomas Gerald Burke, consisted in part of a mortgage charged on the lands of Tyquin, and that there was due on foot thereof, at the time of the death of Gerald Burke in the year 1740, the sum of £7834 4s. 9½d., being more than sufficient to pay the amount of the debt then due on the demand of the Plaintiff; and that shortly after the death of Gerald Burke in the year 1740, Thomas Gerald Burke, his son and heir at law, and who afterwards became his personal representative, entered into possession of the lands as mortgagee in possession, and received the rents of the said mortgaged premises, save four denominations, from the year 1740 to the year 1763, and of the entire profits from the [337] year 1763, until the 4th day of November, 1773, when he by indenture of that date conveyed the said mortgaged premises in trust for the said John Burke, who claimed the equity of redemption and inheritance thereof; and further reported that during the time aforesaid the said

Thomas Gerald Burke applied the rents and profits of said mortgaged premises to his own use, being more than sufficient to pay the demand of the said Edmund Kelly.

On the 20th of November, 1810, the Respondents Bateman and wife filed two exceptions to the report, by one of which they excepted to that part of the report which stated that the mortgage debt charged on the lands of Tyaquin, came into the hands of Thomas Gerald Burke, as part of the personal estate of Gerald Burke; and by the other exception the Respondents excepted to the amount of the interest calculated upon Edmund Kelly's demand.

On the 29th of January, 1811, the cause came on to be heard upon the report, exceptions and merits, when it was ordered that the matter should go back to the Master to enquire and report whether Thomas Gerald Burke at any time, and when, and under what title, entered into the possession of any and what part or parts of the Tyaquin estate, or received the rents and profits thereof for any and what period, and how he applied the same.

On the 12th of December, 1812, the Master made his further report, by which he found that Thomas Gerald Burke entered into certain parts of the Tyaquin estate, under a mortgage made in 1711 to Gerald his father, and as his representative; that he received of the rents and profits from 1740 to 1763, £500 a year, and from 1763 to 1773, £1000 a year.

On the 11th of February, 1811, the Respondents filed fifteen exceptions to the report. The principal question which arose upon these exceptions was whether Thomas Gerald Burke was in possession of the Tyaquin estate as representative of his father as mortgagee, or as the Respondents contended as a purchaser under the marriage settlement of his father and mother, the deeds of supposed mortgage being in fact deeds of trust, executed to secure the lands of Tyaquin, from the claims of adverse creditors.

The exceptions also alleged that there were on record unsatisfied judgments against Gerald Burke, at the time of his death, to the amount of £25,000, all prior to the demand of the Appellants. The most material of these exceptions were allowed.

The evidence was principally as follows:

A deed, bearing date the 1th of October, 1741, entered into between Ulick Burke and Peter Daly, whereby it was referred to Peter Daly to ascertain what was due on foot of the demands due to Gerald Burke or his representatives; an attested copy of an ejectment on the title brought by Rickard Burke and Thomas Rickard Burke his son, as of Easter Term, 1754, for recovery of that part of the Tyaquin estate, in the possession of Thomas Gerald Burke; a bill filed by Thomas Gerald Burke, in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, on the 10th of August, 1754, stating the several mortgages, securities, and accounts, and charging that there was then due on foot thereof [339] a large sum; and praying an injunction against the ejectment, and that he might be decreed to the possession of the remainder of the Tyaquin estate; Rickard Burke and Thomas Rickard Burke's answers to the bill, admitting the possession of Thomas Gerald Burke since the year 1740, under the several securities; an order, bearing date the 8th of July, 1756, whereby the Court of Exchequer granted an injunction until the hearing of the cause, on the equity confessed in the Defendant's answer; an attested copy of a bill filed by Thomas Gerald Burke, in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, on the 24th of August, 1773, against John Burke, the son of Thomas Rickard Burke, stating the deed of mortgage of 1711 from Thomas and Ulick Burke to Gerald Burke, and the deed of 1711, to Peter Daly, and that Gerald Burke, under the mortgage of 1711, was in the possession of the greater part of the lands for several years; and that upon his death, Thomas Gerald Burke, under the mortgages and securities, entered into possession of that part of the lands of which his father had been in possession; that on the 20th of January, 1763, Thomas Gerald Burke entered into possession of all the lands mentioned in the deed of 1711, (except Carrownamoneen), that is, the whole of the Tyaquin estate, under the mortgages and securities, and that he continued in the quiet and peaceable possession of the lands, under and by virtue of same, until the 9th of March, 1773, when John Burke took forcible and illegal possession of part of the premises; and praying an injunction to restore him to the possession thereof; depositions of Peter Haverly, John Allen, and [340] Rickard Burke, who proved that from the year 1710 to the year 1763 Thomas

Gerald Burke continued in possession of part of the Tyaquin estate, under the mortgages, and received thereout £500 a year during that period: and that from the year 1763 Thomas Gerald Burke continued in possession of the whole estate, and during that period received thereout £1000 a year: depositions of Ceseur Trench, William Kelly, and Ulick Burke O'Brien, proving that from the year 1763 to the year 1773 Thomas Gerald Burke was in possession of the whole of the Tyaquin estate, producing £1000 a year: evidence that Thomas Gerald Burke protected his possession of the lands, under and by virtue of the mortgages, against various proceedings and elegits which were adopted against the lands: a settlement, dated 1700, executed on the marriage of Rickard Burke, (by Thomas Burke therein described as tenant for life), the second son of Thomas Burke the settler, by which Thomas Burke conveyed several lands, and among others the lands of Tyaquin, to the use of himself for life, remainder as to a part of the lands to Margery his wife for life, as a jointure, remainder as to the other lands of Tyaquin, being the mortgaged lands and the lands of Tample, to the use of Ulick Burke for life, with remainder to his first and every other son, remainder to Rickard Burke for life with remainders over: but in the deed there is contained a power of revocation, by which the settler was at liberty to revoke all the limitations therein mentioned, except the lands limited in jointure to Margery: a deed bearing date the 10th of December, 1709, and executed [341] by the settler, whereby he revoked the several uses, estates, and limitations aforesaid.

There was also evidence, that after the execution of the deed of 1700, the heir of Rickard Burke altered the words in the power of revocation: "excepting the lands limited in jointure to Margery" were erased, and the words "excepting the uses limited to Rickard and the heirs male of his body" substituted, and the erasures appearing upon the face of the deed were admitted by the answers of Thomas Gerald Burke, and of the Respondents in the said cause, which were given in evidence, in which the Respondents swear that the heir of Rickard Burke having, under the deed of 1700, brought an ejectment for the recovery of the Tample estate, the Respondents took defence thereto, and the cause was tried at Galway in the year 1802, and the Respondents protected themselves by proving the deed of revocation, and that the deed of 1700 was altered, and thereupon Respondents obtained a verdict; settled accounts of the 19th of October, 1733, purporting that Gerald Burke was as mortgagee in possession of part of the premises; sequestration grounded on the decree obtained by Sir Walter Blake against Gerald Burke, under which the tenants of the lands were served with orders to pay their rents to the sequestrators: a memorial of a lease dated the 1st of May, 1745, whereby Thomas Gerald Burke demised to Jeffry Davis the lands of Carintarman, part of the Tyaquin estate, for thirty-one years, at £40 per year.

The cause was heard on report, exceptions, and merits, on the 25th of May, 1813, when it was referred back to the Master to take an account of [342] the personal estate of Gerald Burke, into whose hands the same came, and how applied, except such part thereof as was alleged to consist of the mortgage or charge on the Tyaquin estate, also on account of the debts of Gerald Burke, and the priorities thereof, and whether any and which thereof was paid, and when, and out of what fund: and as to the Defendant John Burke, the bill was dismissed without costs, and the Master was to rectify his report pursuant to the rules so made on the exceptions, and all further directions were reserved until the return of the further report, which last mentioned decree was on the 29th of June, 1815, when the cause came on to be re-heard upon a petition presented by the Plaintiff by the same Court affirmed.

John Burke Bateman having died, the cause had been revived against the Respondent Thomas Burke Bateman, the eldest son of the Respondents John and Mary Bateman.

It was contended on behalf of the Appellants, that the original decree, the rules made on the exceptions to the original and further report, and the decrees made on further hearing and re-hearing, were erroneous, and not warranted by the pleadings and evidence, and ought to be reversed.

For the Appellants: As to the rules made on the exceptions and original report, there were sufficient grounds, without any further enquiry as to the receipt of the rents of the mortgaged premises by Thomas Gerald Burke, to have charged him with the mortgage debts, as assets which he might have received, or upon the ground of his having [343] released the mortgaged premises by the deed of 1773, which deed, though fraudulently contrived by its recitals to colour and conceal the truth, was in this respect contradicted by the other evidence in the cause, and was executed at the time when Catherine Daly claimed those securities as the assets of Gerald Burke, applicable to the payment of the demands, and while Thomas Gerald refused to give the discovery touching the assets required by the bill, and it is admitted by the defendants in their answer, to have been a fraudulent deed, the result of which was to give Thomas Gerald an annuity of £500 per annum for his life, to release all accounts of what he theretofore received out of the mortgaged premises, and to extinguish the mortgagee, to the prejudice of Gerald's creditors.

As to the rules made on the seven exceptions to the last report, and the decree founded thereon, it appeared by the several deeds, securities, mortgages and accounts between Thomas and Ulick Burke, and Gerald Burke, that Gerald Burke was himself, as mortgagee, in his life time in possession of part of the Tyaquin estate, inasmuch as in the accounts he gives credit for certain rents thereof; although it is alleged in the defendant's exceptions to the report, that Gerald Burke did not enter into possession of the estates as mortgagee, no satisfactory evidence has been produced by the defendants to shew in what other right, or by what other title he entered into possession.

Although the defendants in their exceptions to the report relied upon the fact that Thomas Gerald Burke did not hold the possession of the premises [344] as mortgagee, contrary to the admission of Thomas Gerald Burke himself, made by the several proceedings, and by which admissions, as his representatives, the Defendants are concluded—yet even admitting the Defendants not to be so concluded, they have given no satisfactory evidence in answer to the admissions, and the several documents so produced and proved in the cause.

The Defendants, in their exceptions supposed that such possession was not referable to the title of Thomas Gerald Burke as mortgagee, or under the securities, but they gave no satisfactory evidence in support of their exceptions.

The Respondents in the Master's office, impeached for fraud and want of consideration, the several securities and accounts under which Thomas Gerald Burke entered into possession of the Tyaquin estate, and for that purpose referred to a bill filed by Ulick Burke the mortgagor, against Gerald Burke, impeaching these securities, but it was not proved that he obtained any relief upon the bill, nor was any evidence given to impeach the securities.

It was further made clearly to appear that Ulick Burke could not have been tenant for life, inasmuch as Ulick died in the year 1750, and from thence until the year 1773, a period of twenty-three years, it appeared in evidence in the cause, that Thomas Gerald Burke protected his possession against Rickard and Thomas Rickard Burke under the mortgages against the most adverse proceedings, all of which were proved in the cause and before the Master.

The Respondent by the exceptions relied upon the fact that the possession of Thomas Gerald [345] Burke was not as mortgagee of the Tyaquin estate, yet the Plaintiff gave the most decisive evidence to shew that Thomas Gerald Burke was in possession of the lands as mortgagee for his own benefit.

It was contended by the exceptions, that Thomas Gerald Burke had not received from the lands so much as the Master had by his report stated him to have received, yet no satisfactory evidence was given by the Respondents to shew what he did receive from the lands, and there was given by the Plaintiff the most satisfactory evidence that could be expected after a period so remote, to shew the amount of the rents received by Thomas Gerald Burke; but supposing that such evidence was defective, Thomas Gerald Burke, in his first and second answers to the bills of 1771, filed by Catherine Daly, having refused to set out an account of the rents received by him out of the mortgaged premises, and while he thus refused to render such account, having executed the deed of the 4th of November, 1773, thereby releasing to the heir of Rickard the mortgaged premises in consideration of £500 a year, granted to Thomas Gerald Burke for life, and which he executed pending the bill of 1771, must be considered as having admitted that he had received the entire amount of such mortgaged sum, and was liable in his life time, and that the Respondents, as his personal representatives and devisees, are now liable, as if the whole of the mortgage debt had come to the hands of Thomas Gerald Burke.

The Defendants before the Master relied particularly upon the recitals in the deed of 1773, as [346] shewing that Thomas Gerald Burke was in possession of the lands, under the unregistered settlement of the 4th of July, 1711, alleged to have been executed on the marriage of Gerald Burke with Mary Davis, and that by the settlement it was covenanted, that the fortune of Mary Davis, amounting to £2000, should be laid out in the names of trustees therein mentioned in the purchase of land or on securities; and they alleged that part or all of the fortune of Mary Davis was, pursuant to the covenant, laid out in the mortgages of the Tyaquin estate, but no evidence of that fact was given by the Respondents, and it appeared from the settled accounts and evidence given in the cause that no greater sum than £483 of the fortune of Mary Davis was laid out upon any securities charged upon any part of the Tyaquin estates, which consisted of sixteen denominations, and that the same was only chargeable upon three denominations thereof, namely, Tyaxon, Knockbrac, and Knuck-aniskirtane; and it also appeared that the mortgages and securities were taken in the name of Gerald Burke, and not in the name of the trustees of the settlement, and from the nature of the accounts and the dealings between the parties, it appears that the sums were advanced by Gerald Burke himself, to and for the use of Thomas and Ulick Burke, and not by the trustees of such settlement; and by the Master's first report it was reported, and not excepted to, that a sum of £7834 remained due upon the foot of the mortgages and securities at the time of the death of Gerald Burke, so that even if the whole of the fortune of Mary Davis (of which Gerald was entitled to a use for life) was lent out upon [347] the securities, still there was exclusive thereof a sum remaining due thereon, sufficient to pay the then Plaintiff's demand, besides that in the answer of Thomas Gerald Burke, it is sworn by him that a part of the fortune was laid out in the purchase of lands, and it appears in addition that the marriage settlement never was registered, and so could not affect the claims of the Plaintiff under the mortgages and securities, and also that the marriage settlement was fraudulent, because although it appeared in evidence that at the date of the settlement, Gerald was considerably in debt, yet the articles covenanted that all his future acquisitions should be applied to the uses of the settlement.

The Respondents relied upon a supposition that Thomas Gerald Burke was in possession of the Tyaquin estate, as guardian of John Burke, the son of Thomas Rickard Burke, yet no evidence was given of such fact of guardianship, on the contrary such fact was clearly disproved by evidence of various hostile proceedings which had been carried on between Thomas Gerald Burke and the Tyaquin family, and at all events as Thomas Gerald Burke was administrator of his father, whose creditor had a bill depending to make the mortgage assets, it would have been his duty to have retained the amount of the debts out of the rents, as an incumbrance payable thereout.

The Respondents in their answers in the cause, have not relied upon the matter by which they endeavoured to sustain their exceptions, but on the contrary, by their answers to Edmond Kelly's bill, they have insisted that the mortgages and [348] securities were the funds applicable to the payment of Edmond Kelly's demand.

For the Respondents: The Appellant, and those through whom she claims, have neither taken those steps which they ought to have done to enter up satisfaction of certain judgments, mentioned in the award of 1738, nor have they brought those parties before the Court whom they were bound to bring before it, before they can have that benefit of the award of 1738, which is now claimed. The case now attempted to be established by the Appellant and her late husband, Edmond Kelly, is essentially different from that which was made and argued on behalf of the Appellant, and those through whom she claims, when it was first heard and determined by the Court below. Sufficient legal evidence has not been produced, that any part of the personal estate of Gerald Burke, or any part of the personal estate of Thomas Gerald Burke, except what has been admitted by the Respondent Mary Bateman, ever came into the possession of any of the Respondents: or to shew at this distance of time when, or how long, or of what parts of the Tyaquin estate, Gerald Burke or his son Thomas Gerald Burke was possessed, or what was the amount of the rents and profits thereof, then received by either of them: or whether any part thereof was applied by either of them, in discharge of the securities mentioned in the Master's last report, or to their own use; or that any of such rents and profits have come to the hands of any of the Respondents.

[349] All the evidence, oral as well as documentary, which has been produced, goes to prove, that all the rents and profits of the Tyaquin estate which Gerald Burke or his son Thomas Gerald Burke received, were received by them not as mortgagees, but as purchasers under the marriage settlements of Gerald and Mary Burke, and that such rents and profits are not answerable for any part of the Appellant's claim.

The endless delays which have taken place in the prosecution of the suit, by rendering it impossible for the Respondents, from lapse of time, and from the multitude and intricacy of the transactions which have occurred between all the parties connected with the cause, to produce the witnesses, books, papers and accounts, and particularly the account of the sales of wood during the years 1718, 1719, and 1720, which would have enabled them at an earlier period to destroy or reduce the balance which the award of 1738 finds due by Gerald Burke, amount to a degree of laches, which, when taken in conjunction with the Appellant's and Edmond Kelly's acquiescence, from 25th May, 1815, to the 10th of February, 1824, in the Chancellor's decree on the present exceptions and merits of the cause, do in equity and good conscience constitute a valid bar to the present claim.

The Respondents also raised an objection for want of parties, because the bill had been dismissed as against John Burke, who held the estate claimed by the Appellants as part of the assets of Gerald Burke; and it being an appeal against the whole decree, it might in some events [350] become necessary to resort to his estate, that is of a party not present in the appeal, and to direct a sale in his absence.

On this point the counsel for the Appellant contended, that the appeal in substance was confined to the matter of the exceptions; that the present object was mere matter of account against the representative of a party who had received the rents as mortgagee; and as to the consequent liability of any other party in a given event, it was matter of subsequent proceeding; that where the question in a cause relates to a debt received by an executor, it is not necessary that the debtor should be a party: that for the purposes of the present appeal, they would waive the relief against the heir of the mortgagor; that the representative of the mortgagee could not be affected by the presence or absence of the heir, in the question of taking the account; that it was contrary to the course of equity to adjudicate equities between co-defendants; that upon a question of devastavit, it was sufficient to bring before the Court the party charged with the delinquency, and it could not be necessary to bring other parties, as for instance, a debtor to whom the personal representative had released a debt.

Upon this question, in the course of the discussion, the Lord Chancellor made the following observations:

According to the pleadings, the appeal is in fact against the original as well as the subsequent decrees: the Appellants, in case of a deficiency of assets, ask for a sale of the estate now held [351] by John Burke. I do not at present understand upon what ground the bill was dismissed against him. Suppose there should not be assets otherwise, then the mortgaged property may be liable. The Appellants must have made John Burke a party, because they contended that he was not entitled to hold the property under the conveyance to his ancestors by Thomas Gerald Burke. The bill was dismissed as against John Burke. How then can the Appellants have a right to appeal against a decree which includes such a dismissal without calling John Burke before the House, as a party to the appeal? In this view, suppose the appeal was not against the whole, but only a part of the decree, would not John Burke be equally a necessary party? The Appellants certainly in their pleadings in the Court below prayed relief against John Burke. If they consent to abandon that part of the relief, and to confine the appeal to the question of the account against the executor, the case might perhaps proceed, as if the bill had originally prayed only relief against the executor.

On the 28th of July, the Lord Chancellor affirmed the judgment, observing only, that he had looked attentively through the papers, and saw no reason to disturb the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

IRELAND.

(COURT OF CHANCERY.)

DAVID RUTLEDGE, and WILLIAM RUTLEDGE, an Infant,—Appellants; ROBERT RUTLEDGE,—Respondent.

[S.C. 1 Dow and Cl. 331.]

- P. being possessed of lands for a term of lives, with a covenant for perpetual renewal, by articles made upon the marriage of his son in the year 1743, covenanted to convey his estate and interest in the lands to W. and other trustees, to the use of himself for life, remainder to the use of his son T. for life, remainder, subject to a jointure, to the sons of the marriage successively in tail male, reversion to P. the settler.
- In 1749 the reversion of the lands subject to the lease, was granted to W. as trustee for P. to whom it was soon afterwards granted over by W.
- P. by his will, dated in 1766, devised all his real estate, including his leases for lives, in trust for T. his son, for life, remainder to P. (son of T.) his grandson for life, remainder to the sons of P. the grandson successively in tail male, with divers remainders over, reversion to the heirs of P. the devisor. The testator by his will declared, that "If his grandson P. should not settle such interest in that part of the lands which was settled on his father's intermarriage, and which he would become entitled to on the testator's and his father's decease, to the uses to which the testator's estates were thereby limited upon the desire of his father, his son T. at his will and pleasure, and in his discretion, might and was by the will empowered to deprive P. the grandson of the life estate in the lands thereby limited to him, so as such deprivation should not alter the limitations in remainder;" and in a subsequent clause he having provided, "that in case his grandson P. happened to die without issue male, and should settle the interest which was settled on his father's marriage in part of the real estates of the testator, and to the same uses as limited by the will, so that his acquisitions should go together," he gave to P. a power to charge the [353] lands devised with portions for daughters, and in a subsequent part of the will he gave a power to P. to charge a jointure upon the real estate of inheritance thereby limited to him, provided he settles his said interest in part of the real estate to the uses therein mentioned.
- P. the testator died in 1769. T. his son entered upon the lands under the limitations of the will, and remained in possession during his life. In 1776, T. and P. the grandson upon the occasion, and in consideration of his marriage and a portion, conveyed the term for lives with the right of covenant for perpetual renewal, in trust to secure a jointure to the wife, and subject thereto for the use of T. for life, remainder to P. for life, remainder to secure another jointure, and subject thereto to the sons of the marriage, and in default of issue male, to the trustees for a term to raise portions for daughters, and subject thereto for T. in fee.
- Upon a bill filed by a party claiming under this settlement against parties claiming the reversion, to compel a specific performance of the covenant for renewal, held, that according to the limitations, and upon the events above stated, the term of the lands was not merged in the fee; that no case of election arose upon the will of Peter Rutledge, binding those who took under that will to leave the term in question to go according to the limitations of the will.

The Right Honourable Henry Bingham, and John Bingham his eldest son, by indentures of lease and re-lease, bearing date the 2d and 3d of April, 1736, released and demised to Peter Rutledge, and his heirs, towns and lands in the county of Mayo, with the appurtenances, to hold to the said Peter Rutledge, his heirs and assigns, for the lives of the said Peter Rutledge, and of Thomas and William Rutledge, his sons, at and under the yearly rent of £160, with a covenant for the perpetual renewal of the said term of lives, on payment of the sum of £1 3s. as a fine upon the fall of each life.

[354] By articles of agreement, executed previous to and in consideration of the marriage of the said Thomas Rutledge, the son of the said Peter Rutledge, with Mary Reddington, bearing date the 10th of November, 1743, and made between the said Peter Rutledge and Thomas Rutledge, of the first part; Thomas Reddington and the said Mary Reddington, of the second part; and William Rutledge and Nicholas Reddington, of the third part; the said Peter Rutledge, among other things, covenanted thereafter to convey his interest in the said lands, subject to the said rent and renewal fines, unto the said William Rutledge and Nicholas Reddington, and their heirs, to the use of himself the said Peter Rutledge, for life, with remainder to the said Thomas Rutledge, for life; and from and after his death, to secure a certain annual sum, by way of jointure, for the said Mary Reddington, and subject thereto, to the use of the first and other sons of the said Thomas Rutledge and Mary Reddington, in tail male; and in failure of such issue male, to the use of the said Peter Rutledge, his heirs and assigns.

No conveyance was executed in pursuance of the articles.

Henry Bingham died about the year 1717, leaving John Bingham, his eldest son and heir at law, who thereupon became alone seised in fee of the said lands, subject to the lease.

By a private Act of the Parliament of Ireland, passed in the year 1747, all the estate and interest of John Bingham, and the fee and inheritance of the lands subject to the lease, together with other lands, were vested in certain persons [355] therein named, in trust for sale; and the Trustees, in exercise of the powers thereby in them vested, by indenture of lease and release, bearing date respectively the 12th and 13th of May, 1749, in consideration of the sum of £6644 10s. conveyed and released all the lands comprised in the indenture of the 3d of April, 1736, and also several other denominations of land, situate in the counties of Mayo and Galway, to William Rutledge, of the city of Dublin, merchant, to hold to him his heirs and assigns.

The conveyance made to William Rutledge was in trust for Peter Rutledge, and the consideration money was the money of Peter Rutledge; and accordingly William Rutledge, by indentures bearing date respectively the 19th and 20th of June, 1749, and by a fine afterwards levied in Easter term 1751, released and conveyed all the lands, and the fee and inheritance thereof, unto and to the use of Peter Rutledge, his heirs and assigns.

Peter Rutledge, by his will, bearing date the 3d of December, 1766, bequeathed to his only son the said Thomas Rutledge, all his leases for lives and years, and all other his personal estate, subject to certain pecuniary legacies; and he gave and devised all his real estate of inheritance in the counties of Mayo and Galway, to Thomas Lindsey and Francis Lambert, and the survivor of them, and the heirs of such survivor, upon the trusts following (that is to say;) to the use of Thomas Rutledge for life, and from and after his decease, as to the estates of inheritance in the county of Mayo, to the use of Peter Rutledge the younger (the only son of the said Thomas [356] Rutledge, by Mary his wife) for life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male; with remainder to the testator's grandson Richard Rutledge for life; with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male; with remainder to the testator's nephew, William Rutledge, for life; with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male; with remainder to the said testator's nephew the Appellant, David Rutledge for life; with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male; with the reversion to the right heirs of the said testator for ever; and as to the said estates of inheritance in the county of Galway, from and after the decease of the said Thomas Rutledge, the said testator devised the same to the use of Richard Rutledge for life, remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the said Peter Rutledge the younger, for life; remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, with like limitations over, as were before declared respecting the said estates of inheritance in the county of Mayo. The will contained the following declaration: "I also devise, and my will is, that if my grandson, Peter Rutledge, should happen to marry in the lifetime of his said father, the said Thomas Rutledge, without the consent of the said Thomas Rutledge, or that my said grandson should not settle such interest in part of said lands which was settled on his father's intermarriage, and which my said grandson will become entitled to after his said father's and my decease, to the uses which my said estates are hereby limited upon the desire of his said father; in either of such cases, my said son, Thomas Rutledge, at his will and pleasure, and [357] in his discretion, may and is by this my will, empowered to deprive him of the use for life thereby limited to him of my estates, so as such deprivation shall not otherwise alter the other uses hereby limited of my said estate of inheritance, to my said grandson Richard Rutledge, and my said nephews William and David Rutledge, and their respective heirs male; and I further will and devise, that if my said nephew, William Rutledge, shall not limit his estate of inheritance, in case of failure of issue male in himself, to my said son and grandson, and their issue male, so as his estate, under proper charges, shall, upon his decease without issue male, come to be enjoyed by my said son and grandsons, and their issue male, and their respective heirs in strict settlement, then and in such case the limitation herein to him, and his heirs male to cease, and be null and void, any thing in this my will to the contrary notwithstanding; I also devise, and my will is, that if my said grandson, Peter Rutledge, should happen to die, leaving no issue male of his body, lawfully begotten, living at the time of his decease, or who shall attain the age of twenty-one years, so as my real estate of inheritance in the county of Mayo, should come to be enjoyed by the said Richard Rutledge, my grandson, that my said real estate of inheritance in the county of Mayo, shall stand charged with and subject to the payment of £1000 to be for my third grand-daughter, Frances Rutledge, and the sum of £1000 to and for my fourth grand-daughter Mary Rutledge, daughter of my said son Thomas Rutledge, as and for their portions; but in case [358] my said third and fourth grand-daughters, or either of them, marry in my lifetime, my will is, that my said legacy, as to such of them as should so marry, shall cease; and in case my said grandson, Peter Rutledge, should happen to die without issue male as aforesaid, and that he should settle the interest aforesaid in part of my said real estate of inheritance, which was settled as aforesaid on his father's intermarriage, to the same uses of this my will, so as my acquisitions should go together, and my said grandson should leave one or more daughter or daughters lawfully begotten, who shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years, or be married, then I give my said grandson, Peter Rutledge a power of charging my said real estate in the county of Mayo with the sum of £3000 towards the portion or portions, or preferment of such daughter or daughters; and in case my said grandson, Richard Rutledge, should happen to die without issue male, so as my real estate of inheritance aforesaid, under the limitations of my will, should come to be enjoyed by the said William Rutledge or David Rutledge, or their or either of their issue, then I devise and bequeath, and my will is, that my said real estate of inheritance shall stand charged with the sum of £5000 payable and to be paid on that contingency to and amongst my grand-daughters Elizabeth Ormsby, otherwise Rutledge, eldest daughter of my said son Thomas Rutledge, and his third and fourth daughters Frances and Mary, and to my grand-daughters Jane and Elizabeth Rutledge, daughters of my said son William Rutledge, deceased, share [359] and share alike, that is to say, £1000 a-piece to each of my said grand-daughters, upon the contingency aforesaid; I further devise and bequeath, that my said real estate of inheritance in the county of Galway shall, immediately upon or after the decease of my said eldest son Thomas Rutledge, stand charged and be subject to the payment of £400 sterling, to and for my said grand-daughter Jane Rutledge, and the sum of £200 to and for my said grand-daughter Elizabeth Rutledge, towards their portions and preferment in marriage; and I do hereby authorize and empower my said son Thomas Rutledge, and his son, and my said grandson Peter Rutledge, after the death of my son Thomas Rutledge, provided he settles his said interest in part of the said real estate to the uses herein mentioned, to settle a jointure, chargeable and payable out of my said real estate of inheritance, limited to him as aforesaid, or to charge the said real estate of inheritance so limited to him, with any annuity or yearly sum not exceeding the yearly sum of £300 as a provision for any wife he the said Peter shall or may marry.'

The testator, by his said will, empowered his grandson, Richard Rutledge, to settle such jointure as therein mentioned; and also empowered such persons as should respectively become seised of the real estates of inheritance under the will, to make such leases of the estates of inheritance as in the will mentioned; and also gave to Thomas Rutledge a power, "by any deed or writing, to be by him executed and attested by two or more credible witnesses, to charge or [360] encumber his said real estate of inheritance, in the county of Mayo, with any sum or sums of money not exceeding in the whole the sum of £5000 to go to such use and uses, and such purposes as the said Thomas shall think proper and fit to charge the same for; and he thereby further authorized and empowered his son Thomas Rutledge, by any deed or writing, to be by him executed and attested by two or more credible witnesses, to charge or encumber his said real estate of inheritance, in the county of Mayo, with any sum of money not exceeding the sum of £3000, with lawful interest for the same, to be vested in the purchase of lands or permanent interests, which he is to leave or settle on his son Peter, and his heirs, in strict settlement, provided he marries with his said father's consent, as before, or otherwise such purchase to go to the other uses herein limited, if said Thomas should not think fit to limit the same to his said son." And the testator, by his will, appointed his said son his sole executor.

The testator died in the year 1769. Thomas Rutledge proved the will, possessed himself of the personal property, and entered into and became seised of the several lands and estates limited to his use, and continued in the possession thereof, under the limitations in the will, until the time of his death.

By indentures of lease and release, bearing date the 7th and 8th of August, 1776, and made upon the marriage of Peter Rutledge with Catherine Bloomfield, between Thomas Rutledge and Peter Rutledge the younger, of the first part; John Bloomfield and Catherine Bloomfield his daughter, [361]ter, of the second part; Sir Charles Bingham and Robert Lord Viscount Jocelyn, of the third part; and Robert Waller and William Rutledge, of the fourth part; after reciting the indenture of the 3d of April, 1736, Thomas Rutledge and Peter Rutledge, in consideration of the marriage, and of the marriage portion of Catherine Bloomfield, conveyed to Sir Charles Bingham and Lord Viscount Jocelyn, the several lands comprised in the recited lease of 1736, to hold to them during the lives of the cestui que vies, in the recited indenture named, and of such other cestui que vies as should thereafter be added, by virtue of the covenant for perpetual renewal therein contained, in trust for securing an annuity of £100 sterling to Catherine Bloomfield, during the joint lives of her and Peter Rutledge, her intended husband, and subject thereto, to the use of Thomas Rutledge for life, remainder to the use of Peter Rutledge, for life; and from and after his decease, to the use of Sir Charles Bingham and Robert Lord Viscount Jocelyn, in trust, for securing the sum of £100 a year, by way of jointure, to Catherine Bloomfield, and subject thereto, to the use of the first son of Peter Rutledge, by Catherine Bloomfield, until such first son should attain his age of twenty-one years; and then upon trust, that Sir Charles Bingham and Robert Lord Viscount Jocelyn should convey the said lands and premises to such of the sons of Peter Rutledge, by Catherine Bloomfield, as should first attain his age of twenty-one years, his heirs and assigns; and in default of issue male of Peter Rutledge, by Catherine Bloomfield, or in case there should be one or more such sons, [362] or they should all die without issue male, under the age of twenty-one years, then to the use of Robert Waller and William Rutledge, their executors, administrators and assigns, for a term of five hundred years, in trust, for securing the sum of £5000, for the portions of the daughters of the intended marriage; and subject thereto in trust, that Sir Charles Bingham and Robert Lord Viscount Jocelyn should convey the said lands and premises to the said Thomas Rutledge, his heirs and assigns.

The marriage took place with the consent of Thomas Rutledge.

In the year 1787, a marriage took place between the Respondent, the natural son of Thomas Rutledge, and Elizabeth Knox, and upon that occasion Thomas Rutledge, by indenture, dated the 28th of August, 1787, conveyed several leasehold and other interests in lands, and also the ultimate reversion, or quasi reversion, in the lands comprised in the lease of 1736, to Henry King and William Knox, trustees in the said indenture named, to the use of Thomas Rutledge for life, with remainder to the Respondent for life; remainder to the said trustees, for securing a jointure to the said Elizabeth Knox; and subject thereto, to the use of the first and other sons of the Respondent in tail male; remainder to the use of Thomas Rutledge, his heirs and assigns.

In the year 1799, Peter Rutledge the younger died without issue.

By indentures of lease and release, bearing date the 12th and 13th May 1799, made between Thomas Rutledge, of the one part, and the Respondent, of the other part; after reciting the original lease [363] of the 3d of April, 1736, and that William Rutledge and Peter Rutledge, two of the cestui que vies in the said indenture named, were dead; and also reciting, that the interest under the said last-mentioned indenture was then vested in the Respondent, and that the Respondent had paid all rent and renewal fines under the said lease to the said Thomas Rutledge, and had required a renewal thereof, the said Thomas Rutledge demised and released all the said lands comprised in the said indenture of 1736, unto the Respondent and his heirs, for the lives of Thomas Rutledge, Francis Lambert, and the Respondent, and the survivors and survivor of them, at and under the yearly rent aforesaid, with a covenant for the perpetual renewal of the term of lives granted to the Respondent, on payment of the renewal fine of £1 3s. therein recited.

Thomas Rutledge at the same time executed a deed to the Respondent, dated the 10th of June, 1799, whereby he released to the Respondent, his heirs and assigns, the reversion in the lands comprised in the lease of 1736, expectant on the death of the Respondent without issue male.

By deed bearing date the 13th of May, 1799, Thomas Rutledge charged the several lands and estates whereof the testator, Peter Rutledge the elder, was seised as aforesaid, in the county of Mayo, with the sum of £5000 under the power to him given by the will in that behalf, and by the same deed assigned the sum of £5000 to the Respondent.

Thomas Rutledge by his will, dated the 11th of May, 1797, devised to the Respondent all his real property, and also bequeathed to him all his [364] personal property, and appointed him sole executor, and died in the month of March, 1805; whereupon Richard Rutledge, in the will of Peter Rutledge the elder, named, and to whom an estate for life was by that will devised by virtue of the limitations therein contained, became entitled, and entered into possession of the lands and estates by the will limited for the term of his life, with remainder to his first and other sons in tail male.

The Respondent, in the lifetime of Thomas Rutledge, got possession of all the lands comprised in the lease of 1736, and after the death of Thomas Rutledge he was allowed by Richard Rutledge to remain in the possession of the lands, on payment of the same rent as was originally reserved by the lease.

Richard Rutledge died in the month of August 1811, without issue; and thereupon the Appellant, David Rutledge, under the limitations in the will of Peter Rutledge (the testator's nephew William, to whom an estate for life was by the will devised, being then dead without male issue) became seised in possession of the lands so devised for the term of his natural life; and the Appellant, William Rutledge, became entitled to an estate in tail male in all the said lands expectant on the decease of the Appellant, David Rutledge, his father.

In the lifetime of Richard Rutledge, the Respondent filed his bill in the Court of Chancery, against Richard Rutledge, the Appellant David Rutledge, and the heir at law of the surviving trustee named in the will of the testator, Peter Rutledge, thereby praying, that the sum of [365] £5000 might be decreed a valid charge on the lands by the will limited, and that a competent part thereof might be sold for payment of said sum of £5000 and the interest thereon, since the decease of Thomas Rutledge, to which bill the several Defendants thereto put in their answers; and the Respondent, on the 17th of July, 1819, obtained a final decree of the Court of Chancery, whereby it was decreed, that there was then due to the Respondent the sum of £7436 19s. 8½d. for principal and interest, on the foot of the charge of £5000 and the said sum, with interest thereon from that day, was thereby decreed to be a charge on the lands and premises; and it was ordered, that the same sum should be paid off by the Defendants in the suit within six months, to be computed from the date of the decree, and in default thereof that the several lands whereof the testator was so seised in the county of Mayo, or a competent part thereof, should be sold; and that the Respondent, out of the money arising from such sale, should be paid the sum so decreed to him, with interest and costs.

The Appellants, on the 15th of November, 1819, exhibited their bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, against the Respondent and others, thereby, among other things, praying, that the will of Peter Rutledge the elder, might be established and carried into execution, and that the Appellant, David Rutledge, might be decreed entitled to an estate for life, and the Appellant, William Rutledge, to a vested estate tail in all the lands whereof the testator was seised in fee: and that discharged from any grants, conveyances or incumbrances, created or procured by Thomas [366] Rutledge, except under the power and authority by the said will to him given: and that it might be decreed, that the said Thomas Rutledge was bound to elect between the said marriage articles of the 10th of November, 1743, and the said will; and that he had no right to take both under the said articles and will at the same time: and that it might be decreed, that the said Thomas Rutledge did, in his lifetime, elect to take and hold under the said will: and that he thereby relinquished all estate and interest in the said lands, created or provided by the said articles of 1743: and that the Respondent, Robert Rutledge, should be bound by such election, and might be decreed to account with the Appellant, David Rutledge, for the profits of the said lands comprised in the said indenture of 1736, since the death of the said Richard Rutledge, and that the same should be set off against the sum by the said decree of the 17th of July, 1819, decreed to the said Respondent, on foot of the said charge of £5000: and further, that in case the said Court should not be of opinion, that the said Thomas Rutledge did so elect the said Respondent, as being assignee, legatee, devisee, and personal representative of the said Thomas Rutledge, might be decreed to be bound to elect between the said will of the said Peter Rutledge the elder, and any estate or interest which he claimed in any part of the said lands, under any will or conveyance of or from the said Thomas Rutledge: and that it should be decreed, that the said Respondent did elect to claim under the will, and that it was by so electing, he was entitled to the said charge of £5000, under the power by the said will created.

[367] The Respondent filed his answer to the bill: but the Appellants did not prosecute their suit to a hearing.

In the mean time, the Respondent, on the 21th of December, 1819, filed his bill in the Court of Chancery against the Appellants, thereby setting forth the indenture of 1736, the marriage articles of the 10th of November, 1743, the will of Peter Rutledge the elder, and his death: and that Thomas Rutledge thereupon became seised of the demised lands for the term of his life, under the devise thereof to him contained in the will, and was also, under the articles of 1743, entitled to the equitable estate for the term of his life, in the lease of 1736: and that Peter Rutledge the younger was entitled to a quasi estate in tail male in remainder therein: and also setting forth the settlement on the marriage of Peter Rutledge the younger, bearing date the 8th of August, 1776, and his death without issue, the several conveyances hereinbefore mentioned, made by the said Thomas Rutledge to the Respondent, also the will of Thomas Rutledge, the seisin for life, and the decease of Richard Rutledge, in the year 1811: and charging that on the death of the said Richard Rutledge without issue, the Appellant, David Rutledge, under the will of Peter Rutledge the elder, became seised of an estate for life in the said lands, subject to the covenant for perpetual renewal: and also charging that the Respondent had applied for a renewal to the Appellant David Rutledge, of the lease of 1736, and that the Appellant had declined specifically to execute the covenant for perpetual renewal, contained in the indenture of 1736: and praying, among other [368] things, that the Respondent might be decreed entitled to have the said original lease renewed, pursuant to the covenant for perpetual renewal therein contained: and that the said covenant might be specifically executed by the Appellants, and for that purpose that it might be referred to by one of the Masters of the Court, to take an account of the sum due by the Respondent to the Appellant David Rutledge, on foot of the rents and renewal fines under the original lease, and the renewals thereof, and that the Appellants might be compelled to execute a renewal to the Respondent for the lives in the bill in that behalf mentioned, or such lives as the Master should insert.

To this bill the Appellants filed their joint and several answer, on the 31st of January, 1820, thereby insisting that Thomas Rutledge did not become seised of an equitable estate, under the lease of 1736, and that Peter Rutledge the younger, did not become entitled to an estate in quasi tail male, in remainder therein: and that

Thomas Rutledge and Peter Rutledge the younger, had no right to make such disposition as in the settlement of the 7th and 8th of August, 1776, is contained, respecting the lease of 1736; and that for the reasons therein mentioned, the Respondent was not entitled to the specific execution of the said covenant for perpetual renewal, in the lease of 1736 contained.

The cause was brought on for hearing, upon pleadings and proofs, before the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, on the 22nd day of February, 1821, who decreed that the Respondent was entitled to a specific execution of the covenant for perpe[369]-tual renewal in the lease of the 3d of April, 1736, in the pleadings mentioned, according to the true intent and meaning thereof; and accordingly, that on payment to the Appellant, David Rutledge, of the sum due in respect of rent and renewal fines, the Appellants should execute to the Respondent a renewal of the lease for the lives in the Respondent's bill named, or for such other lives as the Master should approve of; and that in case the parties should differ as to the amount due, in respect of such rent, or as to the form of such deed of renewal, that it should be referred to Roderick Connor, one of the Masters of the Court, to take an account of the sum due to the Appellant, David Rutledge, in respect of such rent and renewal fines, and also to approve of a proper deed of renewal, to be executed by the parties pursuant thereto, etc.

Against this decree the appeal was presented.

For the Appellants: Mr. Horne and Mr. Sugden.

By the acquisition of the fee-simple and inheritance of the lands by Peter Rutledge the elder, in the year 1743, his lease for lives thereof became merged, and the rent thereby reserved was extinguished, and the lease is not now subsisting for any purpose whatsoever. Peter Rutledge the elder, having so acquired the fee-simple and inheritance of the lands, he by his will devised the same and several other estates to the use of Thomas for life, and bequeathed all his leases for lives and years, and the residue of his personal estate, to Thomas, and thereby raised a necessity for Thomas to elect between the articles and the [370] will, and Thomas accepted all the benefits accruing under the will, and thereby concluded his election, and the Respondent is bound thereby.

The Respondent, by claiming the sum of £5000 and interest, which Peter the elder, by his will empowered Thomas to charge upon his estates of inheritance in the county of Mayo, and which Thomas accordingly charged in favour of the Respondent, has elected to take under the will, and is thereby precluded from claiming any interest in the lands, by a title which is opposed to or inconsistent with the will.

The lands in which the Respondent claims such title and interest, were part of the estates of inheritance, which the testator, Peter the elder, made chargeable, and Thomas charged with the sum of £5000 and interest, and the Respondent, while he seeks the benefit of such charge on the one hand, ought not at the same time to be permitted to claim under the party who executed the same in his favour, any of the lands themselves which were subject thereto.

The testator, Peter the elder, by his will expressly declared his intention to be, that all his acquisitions should go together, according to the uses thereby limited, and that Peter the younger should settle to those uses such interest as he was entitled to in the lands in question, under the articles of the 10th November, 1743, (that interest being a quasi estate tail, and the use limited to him by the will, being an estate for life), and the testator with that view, authorised Thomas to deprive Peter the younger, his son, of the use for life thereby limited to him in case he should refuse so to settle the interest, but the settlements [371] of 1776, and 1787, and the several subsequent conveyances executed by Thomas are in effect directly opposed to such intention and desire of the testator, inasmuch as thereby his acquisitions are separated, and made to descend in a different manner and to different persons, and such settlements and conveyances are a fraud upon the said will, and ought not to be supported by a Court of Equity.

If the lease for lives was not merged by the acquisition of the fee simple and inheritance by Peter the elder, yet the quasi reversion of the lands expectant on the failure of issue male of Thomas, was by the articles of 1736 reserved to Peter the elder, and such reversion passed by his will, whereby he limited his estates to such uses as aforesaid, in strict settlement, and Thomas being by that will a mere tenant for life, could not make any valid disposition, either at law or in equity, of such reversion as he assumed to do by the settlement of 1787, under which the Respondent claims.

It was further argued at the bar, that the articles of 1743 might operate as a covenant to stand seised.* That a remainder limited to the heirs of the grantor is the old reversion, and the limitation ineffectual.† That when the limitations are complete, it makes no difference whether the [372] estates are legal or equitable (Jervoise v. Duke of Northumberland, 1 J. and W. 571). That the sons of Thomas, if they did not take an estate tail, took a fee, and if so, it vested, and the contingent remainders were gone (Doc v. Perryu, 3 T. R. 484). That the remainders were barred, and the estate complete, by the settlement of 1776, and by the renewals (Blake v. Blake, 3 P. W. 10, n. 1; Wastenev v. Chapple, cited in Norton v. Frecker, 1 Alk. 525).

For the Respondent: Mr. Pepys and Mr. Knight.

Peter Rutledge the elder, by the settlement of 1743, became a trustee of the lease of 1736, for the several persons entitled to equitable estates therein under that settlement, and these equitable estates could neither merge in the legal fee subsequently acquired by him, nor be in any respect prejudiced by such acquisition. The testator, Peter Rutledge, does not by his will make or affect to make any disposition of the lease of 1736, and clearly treats it as a subsisting interest, so that no implied duty of election arises upon the will. The power given by the will of the testator, Peter the elder, to Thomas, to deprive Peter the younger of the life estate, thereby limited to him, in the event of his marrying without his father's consent, or refusing, at the desire of his father, to settle the freehold lease of 1736 to the same uses to which the inheritance was limited, was plainly discretionary in Thomas, and to be exercised or not at his will and pleasure, and as this power never was exercised [373] by Thomas, the case in which Peter would have been expressly bound to elect, never arose.

On the 28th of July, the judgment was affirmed, on the motion of the Lord Chancellor, who said, that he had looked with attention through the papers, and thoroughly considered the case, but could not advise the House to disturb the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

C. by his will, devised his lands in trust for G. his brother, for life, remainder to his sons in strict settlement in tail male, remainder to S. the testator's sister, for life, remainder in like manner to her sons, remainder to K. for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder in strict settlement to his sons in tail male, remainder to S. for life, with like remainder to his sons, remainder to the testator's right heirs. The lands were accordingly conveyed by the trustees named in the will to these uses.

G. died without issue, leaving S. his heir at law, and she married P. and with her husband levied a fine of the reversion which had descended to her on the death of G. to such uses as S. should appoint, and she died, having appointed the reversion to P. during the joint lives of himself and A. until A. should attain twenty-one, or marriage, remainder as to one moiety to P. for life, and as to the other moiety to A. for life, remainder as to the whole estate to the sons, etc. of A. in tail, remainder (subject to a term) to P.

K. entered upon the death of S. and died, devising his real estates, charged with his debts, and bequeathing his personal estate to T. K. against whom a bill was filed, charging that K. during his possession of the lands, had committed equitable waste, by cutting trees planted, etc. for ornament, and praying that an account might be taken of the trees cut, and the value, and that T. K. as representative of K. might pay the amount out of his assets. A decree was made according to the prayer of the bill. But before the Master had proceeded under the decree, the question of value, and all matters in difference between the parties, were by an order of the [375] Court, by consent, referred to an arbitrator, appointed by the Master under the order, and arbitration bonds were executed by the parties. The arbitrator by his award found that a sum of £3871, which included the value of the timber cut, was the balance due to the plaintiff, and directed that sum to be paid. An application being made to enforce the payment of the money according to the award, the defendant presented a petition of re-hearing, which suspended the proceedings upon the award, and the case having been re-heard, the bill was dismissed, but no order was made respecting the award.

Upon appeal against this decree, held that the House could not proceed until there should be a judgment upon the whole of the proceedings before the Court below, and a special order was made, by which the Appellants had leave to withdraw their appeal, for the purpose of obtaining the judgment of the inferior Court upon the question as to the award.

Semb. That such a reference as above stated, submits the law as well as the fact to the arbitrator.

In 1816, Walter late Marquis of Ormonde, and Anna Maria Catherine Marchioness of Ormonde, his wife, filed their bill of complaint, in the High Court of Chancery, against the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynnersley; thereby stating, among other things, the will of Godfrey Bagnall Clarke, bearing date the 4th of December, 1774, whereby he devised all his real estates, after satisfaction of the debts and legacies therein mentioned, upon trust, to convey the said estates to the use of his brother Gilbert Clarke and his assigns, for life, without impeachment of waste; with remainder to trustees, to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to his first and other sons, severally and successively in tail male; with remainder to his said testator's sister, Sarah Price Clarke, [376] for life, without impeachment of waste; with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to her first and other sons severally and successively in tail male; with remainder to Clement Kynnersley for life, without impeachment of waste; with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to his first and other sons severally and successively in tail male; with remainder to Wenman Samuel for life, without impeachment of waste; with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders; with remainder to his first and other sons severally and successively in tail male; with remainder to the testator's own right heirs for ever.

The bill further stated, that the testator died in December 1774, without having revoked or altered his will, leaving his brother, Gilbert Clarke, his heir at law, and that after the testator's decease, the trustees, in execution of the trusts of the will, paid the testator's debts and legacies, and afterwards conveyed the real estates to the several uses by the will declared, or such of them as were then subsisting or capable of taking effect; that the testator's brother, Gilbert Clarke, died without issue, and intestate as to the ultimate reversion in fee in the real estates, and that he left his sister Sarah Price Clarke his heir at law, and that she afterwards intermarried with Job Hart Price, who thereupon assumed the name of Clarke, and entered upon the testator's real estates, under the limitations in his will contained, and continued in the possession thereof until the death of Sarah Price Clarke, which happened in the year 1801; and that Sarah Price [377] Clarke left issue male one son, namely, Godfrey Thomas Robert Price Clarke, and the Plaintiff Anna Maria Catherine Marchioness of Ormonde, then Anna Maria Catherine Clarke, and no other issue; and that upon the death of Sarah Price Clarke, her son Thomas Godfrey Robert Price Clarke, under the limitations of the said will, and the deeds of conveyance executed pursuant thereto, became entitled in possession to the estate; and that he was since dead, without issue, under the age of twenty-one years; and that upon the death of Thomas Godfrey Robert Price Clarke, Clement Kynmersley, as the next tenant for life of the estates under the limitations of the will, entered into possession of the estates, and so continued until his death.

The bill then stated that Clement Kynmersley died in April 1815, without issue: And that Job Hart Price Clarke, and Sarah his wife, duly levied a fine of the reversion in fee of the testator's estates, which were then vested in Sarah Price Clarke as heiress at law, to him, or to her other brother Gilbert Clarke; and that they, by proper assurances duly executed, limited the reversion in fee simple of such estates, expectant upon the determination of the prior uses to which the same were limited by the will of the testator, to such uses, intents and purposes as Sarah Price Clarke, whether covert or sole, by her will in writing should direct or appoint; and that Sarah Price Clarke, by her will, executed conformably to the terms of the power in that behalf vested in her, by the fine and declaration of the uses thereof, devised the reversion expectant on the failure of the estates then subsisting, to trustees, upon [378] trust to convey and settle the same to the uses and intent that her daughter the Plaintiff, the Marchioness of Ormonde, then Anna Maria Catherine Clarke, or her guardian or guardians during her minority, or until she should marry with consent in writing of such guardian or guardians, should receive an annuity of £1000 for maintenance, and subject thereto to the use of the said Job Hart Price Clarke and his assigns, without impeachment of waste, during the joint lives of Job Hart Price Clarke and the Plaintiff the Marchioness of Ormonde, then Anna Maria Catherine Clarke, until she should attain twenty-one years, or be married; then to the use and intent that one moiety of the estates, in case Job Hart Price Clarke should be living, but if dead, then that the whole should be limited to one or more trustees to be nominated by the Plaintiff, the Marchioness of Ormonde, then Anna Maria Catherine Clarke, during her life, to her sole and separate use, notwithstanding any coverture; and as to the other moiety to the use of the said Job Hart Price Clarke and his assigns, for life, without impeachment of waste, with remainder, after the death of the said Plaintiff the Marchioness of Ormonde, as to one moiety of all the said estates, in case the said Job Hart Price Clarke should be then living, but if dead, then as to the whole of the said estate, after the decease of the said Plaintiff the Marchioness of Ormonde, to her first and other sons successively in tail male, with remainder to her daughters in tail with cross remainders; with remainder, subject to a term of one thousand years, thereby directed to be vested in one or more trustee or trustees, for the purpose [379] of raising money for the payment of certain legacies, to the use of Job Hart Price Clarke, his heirs and assigns for ever.

The bill further stated, that the mansion-house and park at Sutton-cum-Duckmanton, was an ancient family seat; and that there were at the time when Clement Kynmersley entered into the possession thereof, many timber and other trees standing and growing in the park, and near the house, which served for ornament and shelter thereto, and were a great ornament and embellishment to the mansion-house and park, and were planted for that purpose; and that Clement Kynmersley, during the time he was so in possession of the mansion-house, lands and premises, felled and cut down many of the ornamental timber trees, or trees planted for ornament or shelter, which were standing in the park and about the house; and also divers saplings and young trees, not nearly come to maturity, and which were growing on other parts of the estate, and various spring woods, which grew on the estates, prematurely and before the same, according to the usage of the country, were arrived at the proper state for cutting; and he sold and disposed thereof for a very large sum of money in the whole, which he received and applied to his own use; and he committed other acts of waste, spoil and destruction upon the devised estates; and that Wenman Samuel, the tenant for life, in remainder, expectant on the decease of Clement Kynnersley, without issue male, died in his life-time, and the Plaintiffs, and Job Hart Price Clarke, being interested in the estates in manner aforesaid, made frequent applications to Clement Kynnersley, [380] requesting him to desist from felling and cutting the trees and woods, and from committing any other waste, spoil and destruction on the estate; and also to account for the produce and value of the timber and wood so felled, cut, and sold, or disposed of by him; but Clement Kynnersley did not attend to or comply with such requests.

The bill then stated, that Job Hart Price Clarke died, having by indentures of lease and release, bearing date respectively the 15th and 16th days of June, 1809, conveyed all his estate and interest in the demised premises to the Plaintiff the late Marquis of Ormonde, and his heirs, and by means thereof, and of the several limitations aforesaid, the Plaintiff and his wife, who had not any issue upon the death of Clement Kynnersley, became entitled in possession to the before-mentioned estates: that Clement Kynnersley made and published his will, bearing date the 21st day of January, 1815, and thereby devised and bequeathed his freehold, copyhold and leasehold estates in the county of Stafford, to his nephew the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynnersley, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns; and he thereby gave and bequeathed his real estates at Carshalton, and all other his real and personal estate to the Respondent Kynnersley, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, he or they paying all his debts, funeral and testamentary expences, for which purpose he declared it to be his desire, that his estate at Carshalton should be sold, in case his personal estate and effects should not be sufficient to pay the same, and appointed the Respondent Kynnersley, sole executor of his will: And that upon the death of Clement [381] Kynnersley, the Respondent Kynnersley, whom he left his heir at law, proved his will, and became his legal personal representative, and possessed his personal estate and effects to an amount more than sufficient to pay all his just debts, etc.; that upon the decease of Clement Kynnersley, the Plaintiffs the Marquis of Ormonde and Anna Maria Catherine his wife, entered into the possession of the estates devised by the will of Godfrey Bagnall Clarke, and being entitled as aforesaid, they frequently applied to the Respondent Kynnersley to come to account for the ornamental trees, or trees planted for ornament or shelter, which were standing and growing on the estates, and also of the other trees and woods improperly felled and sold by Clement Kynnersley, and to pay to the Plaintiffs, the value thereof with interest, which he refused to do.

The bill prayed an account of all timber and other trees growing in or near the mansion-house and park, and which were ornamental thereto, or which were planted for ornament or shelter thereto, and of other trees or woods growing on the estates unfit for felling, and which were felled and sold, or otherwise disposed of by Clement Kynnersley deceased, and of the monies received by him on the sale of such of them as were sold, and of the value of such of them, if any, as were not sold by him; and that his estate might be declared liable to make good the produce or value of the timber and other trees and woods which should appear to have been improperly felled; and that the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynnersley might be compelled to pay the same to the Plaintiffs accordingly, or into Court, for the benefit of the [382] person or persons ultimately to be entitled to the inheritance of the estates: and that the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynnersley might either admit assets, or that an account might be taken of the personal estate and effects of Clement Kynnersley, and of the rents and profits of the real estates devised in aid thereof by his will, and if necessary, that such will might be established, and the trusts thereof decreed to be carried into execution.

The Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynnersley put in his answer to the bill on the 6th of December 1816, denying the alleged waste, and referring to an answer of Clement Kynnersley, put in to a bill filed in the year 1807, by John Hart Price Clarke, Walter Marquis of Ormonde then Earl of Ormonde, and Anna Maria Catherine his wife.

The answer of Clement Kynnersley referred to in the answer of the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynnersley, was put in in the month of June, 1808, and it was thereby admitted by Clement Kynnersley, that he had in the years 1805 and 1806 cut down timber and other trees in Sutton Park, to the value of £3223 19s. 8d. but insisted that he had a right so to do.

To this answer the Plaintiffs replied, and issue being joined, witnesses were examined, and their depositions taken and published.

Walter Marquis of Ormonde, in Michaelmas term 1818, exhibited his bill of revivor and supplement against the Respondents Thomas Sneyd Kynmersley, and John Rickman, Richard Williams and John Allan Powell, stating the death of his wife, and her will, by which, under a power, [383] she appointed, devised, and bequeathed all the residue of her real and personal estates to the Plaintiff, his heirs, etc. and appointed the Respondents, Rickman, Williams, and Powell, and P. Gell, executors of her will, and Gell having renounced the other executors, with consent of the Plaintiff obtained letters of administration with the will annexed. The bill prayed that the suit might be revived, and that Rickman, Williams, and Powell might state their claims on the monies sought to be recovered in the suit.

The Respondents, Rickman, Williams, and Powell, by their answer claimed an interest in the monies, but submitted to have the suit revived.

The Respondent, Thomas Sneyd Kynmersley, having also put in his answer, the suit was revived.

The cause came on to be heard before the Vice Chancellor, on the 6th of May, 1820, when his Honour decreed that the Plaintiff's bill, so far as it sought an account of dilapidations of the buildings on the estate in question in this cause, should be dismissed, without prejudice as to the question of costs: and it was ordered, that it should be referred to one of the Masters of the Court, to inquire whether Clement Kynmersley, in the year 1804, or at any time subsequent, cut or felled any timber or other trees which were planted or left standing for ornament or shelter of the mansion-house or park in the pleadings mentioned, or any other timber or trees growing on the estate in question, that were unfit for cutting and felling: and if the Master should find, that Clement Kynmersley did cut any such timber or other trees, then it was ordered that the Master should enquire whether the same or any part thereof were sold [384] by him, and at what price: and it was ordered, that the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynmersley should be charged with such price: and if the Master should find that any part of such timber or trees was not sold, he was to set a value thereon: and it was ordered, that the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynmersley should be charged with such value: and it was declared, that the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynmersley was liable to answer out of the assets of Clement Kynmersley, what should be found due for the amount of the price or value which should be so found due by the Master, who was to state any special circumstances at the request of either party, etc.

On the 7th of August, 1820, and while such proceedings were pending, the Plaintiff the Marquis of Ormonde died, having made and published his will, bearing date the 28th day of February, 1820, whereby he appointed George Marquis of Huntly, Sir James Graham, Baronet, and the Appellant, executors: Sir James Graham and the Appellant alone proved the will.

By an order, dated the 8th day of March, 1821, the suit was revived.

By an order made in the case, bearing date the 13th of March, 1822, it was ordered, with the consent of the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynmersley, and all others the parties to the cause, that it should be referred to the Master to approve of a proper person to be the arbitrator or arbitrators of the matters in difference in the cause, as also all other matters in difference between Sir James Graham and the Appellant, as personal representatives of the Marquis of Ormonde, and the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynmersley, as [385] executor of Clement Kynmersley: and it was ordered, that the Master should settle and approve of proper bonds, to be entered into by Sir James Graham and the Appellant, and the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynmersley, for that purpose.

In pursuance of this order, the Master made his report, bearing date the 30th of July, 1822, whereby he certified, that upon the nomination and by consent of the parties, he approved of Hugh Parker to be arbitrator, and of two arbitration bonds, each of which was made in the penal sum of £10,000 for the performance of the award, so that the arbitrator should make the same ready to be delivered to the parties on or before the 1st of February, 1823, which time was extended by two successive orders.

An award, bearing date the 25th of November, 1823, was made and executed by High Parker, whereby he awarded and directed that Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynnersley should pay to Sir James Graham and the Appellant, on the 12th of February, the sum of £3871 of lawful money of Great Britain, in full of all their claims as personal representatives of the Marquis of Ormonde, against the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynnersley as executor of Clement Kynnersley: And he further awarded and directed certain payments to be made in respect of costs and releases to be executed.

In February 1824, a motion was made before the Vice Chancellor that the award might be made an order of the Court in the cause and be performed. This motion stood over upon a suggestion that proceedings would be taken to set aside the award, upon the ground that the re-[386]-presentatives of Job Hart Price Clarke (if any one) was entitled to the proceeds of the timber cut down.

The Vice Chancellor intimated that this was a proper ground for a re-hearing.

Sir James Graham died on the 23d of March, 1825, leaving the Appellant the sole surviving personal representative of the Marquis of Ormonde.

In the month of April 1825, the Respondent Thomas Sneyd Kynnersley presented his petition to the Court of Chancery, stating among other things, that he conceived himself to be aggrieved by the decree, except so far as it directed the bill to be dismissed, so far as it sought an account of dilapidations, and that he was advised that the whole of the bill ought to have been dismissed with costs; and therefore praying, that the cause might be re-heard before the Vice Chancellor, which was ordered.

The cause was re-heard on the 23d of April, 1825, when the Vice Chancellor ordered that the decree should be reversed, and that the Plaintiff's bill should be dismissed.

Upon the subject of the award, the arbitration bonds, and the order directing the reference, nothing was done.

The appeal was against the decree of the 23d of April, 1825.

For the Appellant: Mr. Sugden.

The original hearing in the Court below, is reported in 5 Madd. p. 369. The point then discussed was simply on the question of equitable waste. According to my note, the Vice Chan-[387]-cellor said it was a creature of equity, and that there was a breach of trust. The note goes beyond the report in Maddocks, in stating more fully the ground of the decision to be breach of trust. There was evidence as to the fact of equitable waste. The decree only directs inquiry as to equitable waste. There was evidence that timber was cut contrary to the custom of the country, and in the park. There were trees planted, and growing for ornament, and an inner row of oak trees. Timber growing to exclude objects is entitled to protection (Day v. Merry, 16 Ves. 375.) The original decree directs only inquiry, and only as to equitable waste as a breach of trust. It was held that legal waste stood on a different ground. The original decree decided that the assets of the tenant for life were liable for the equitable waste.

Besides this, where a decree is taken by consent it cannot be reversed. A consent order must purport to be so on the face of the order. By an order of 13th of March, 1822, it is stated "that all matters in difference should be submitted to the arbitration of a person to be appointed by the Master, and the parties consenting, the Master of the Rolls by consent orders, etc." A court of equity will not enforce an agreement to refer, unless it is made under its own authority in a cause. An award has been regularly made; all this being done, and the decree which is the foundation being taken away, it might be sufficient to leave the case here.

The ground of the decree on the rehearing was that Clarke had the reversion in fee. The question was in whom the right to the money pro-[388]-duced by the timber so cut is vested. It was held that the right to the money vested in Clarke. The decree is wrong for two reasons:—1st. Because Lord Ormonde is the first person entitled to the estate of inheritance. 2ndly, Because if it belonged to Clarke, it passed by the conveyance to Lord Ormonde. Money arising from the cutting such timber is by the Court settled to go in the same course as the estate.

It is a settled rule, that a remainder man in tail takes money absolutely; but as money so produced is considered as real estate in such cases, it is held that it does not belong to the tenant in tail, till he acquires the dominion over the estate.

No doubt there was a right in him, but the question is, whether the right remained with him? The trees could never have been enjoyed as a separate article of property. The money goes as the trees would, until a party having an estate of inheritance comes into possession.

The Lord Chancellor: Was the objection arising from the award before the Court?

For the Appellant: No.

For the Respondent: The question arose upon the attempt to enforce the award: the subject therefore must have been distinctly before the Court.

The Lord Chancellor: But it does not appear that it was argued.

For the Appellant: The fact of its being by consent was not before the Court.

[389] The Lord Chancellor: What has been done under the award?

For the Appellant: It was stopped by the decree on the re-hearing. The decree was not altered on the ground of non-liability.

Lord Eldon: Suppose the House were to reverse the decree: the cause must go back for the purpose of proceeding upon the arbitration: and what could you do till the arbitration is complete? If reversed, must the House say that the arbitration shall be completed?

For the Appellant: We only want the decree of reversal removed.

Lord Eldon: I wish to know how this award is to be got rid of?

For the Respondent: We should have a good case to get rid of the award, if we support the decree. The only consent was to appoint an arbitrator.

Lord Eldon: Is not this an order of the Court? Have you a copy of the petition of re-hearing?

For the Appellant: The decree on re-hearing appears to be merely a decree dismissing the bill.

The Lord Chancellor: What then is to become of the award? There must be a distinct application to get rid of the award. The petition of re-hearing takes no notice of the award. If a cause is going on, and you agree to refer, do you not take the chances?

Lord Eldon: There is a difficulty on both sides. The petition of re-hearing takes no notice of the award, and you go before the Vice Chancellor taking no notice of the award. The question is [390] whether you should not have brought the matter as to the award before the Court.

The Lord Chancellor: They seem to have begun at the wrong end; they should first have impeached the award.

Lord Eldon: The Plaintiff says I am entitled to the money arising from the sale of trees cut down by an act of equitable waste; that is the question: if he is so entitled, then another question arises as to what is due to him. If you say that he did not refer the matter of title, that is another question.

For the Respondent: The representatives of Clarke are not before the Court, and his creditors might claim.

Lord Eldon: That might be the subject of objection on your part.

The Lord Chancellor: But as long as the award stands, there can be no proceedings. May not this arbitration by consent operate as a reference of the fact and the law together: and if so, how can we decide until the matter is brought before us? If they left the whole question to the arbitrators there may be an end of the cause. If the award cannot be set aside, is not that conclusive?

For the Respondent: We must establish the decree before we can make any application as to the award: there is no objection on their part against the order for re-hearing.

The Lord Chancellor: What was done upon the application to pay the money into court?

For the Appellant: The payment was stopped by this proceeding.

[391] Lord Eldon: Is the decree signed by the Chancellor? it should be so stated in the petition of appeal. It may be hard that you should have to pay the money over again: but have you not referred the question upon the title?

The Lord Chancellor: The question of the award should have been before the court at the same time with the question of re-hearing.

For the Respondent: The award we may not be able to set aside.

Lord Eldon: If you will admit that, we may go on. The matter as to the award is original matter, and not within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal.

The Lord Chancellor: Can you point out any way in which the validity of the award can be questioned in the Court below. Any question of law might have been raised upon that submission.

Lord Eldon: When you consent to the reference can it be said that you did not either refer the right or admit it? The submission would be nonsense without such a construction.

The Lord Chancellor: All matters in difference comprise every thing both of fact and law.

For the Respondent: The objection made is upon matters subsequent, contrary to all principle and practice.

The Lord Chancellor: The appeal must be withdrawn that the parties may go before the Chancellor, in order that the decree and the award may be considered together.

After this observation the argument upon the [392] case was stopped, and the following special order was made.

24th July, 1828. It appearing to this House, that upon the re-hearing before the Vice Chancellor, when the decree of reversal complained of by the said appeal was made, the effect of the award was not discussed before the Vice Chancellor, and which award appears still to remain in force; this House thinks it proper, and it is therefore ordered, that the Appellant, upon withdrawing his appeal, shall be at liberty to present a petition of appeal to the Lord Chancellor against the Vice Chancellor's decree of reversal: the Appellant and Respondent being also respectively at liberty to make such motions or other applications to the Lord Chancellor touching the said award, and for the confirmation or setting aside thereof, as they may be advised to make, such motions, or other applications, to be heard at the same time with the petition of rehearing, so to be presented as aforesaid, or at such time or times as the Lord Chancellor shall direct. And it is further ordered, that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery, to proceed therein accordingly, reserving to each party the right of appealing from any order or decree to be made herein by the Court.

APPENDIX.

SCOTLAND.

(COMMISSARIES COURT AND COURT OF SESSION.)

MARY BLACK MACNEILL.—Appellant; MALCOLM MACGREGOR.—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. vii. 652; S. C. 1 Dow and Cl. 208.]

In May 1816, a marriage ceremony between M. and G. (according to the evidence of one witness, who spoke positively to the performance of the ceremony, and the identity of the parties, confirmed by another witness, who spoke with less firmness as to the identity) was performed by a minister of the Church of Scotland, upon the production of an instrument, purporting and proved to be a certificate of a proclamation of banns, which proclamation, from the date of the certificate as compared with a registrate of the marriage and the evidence of the witnesses, could not possibly have been made. But it was proved to be the usual certificate, and that according to the practice in Scotland at the time, banns were in fact scarcely ever proclaimed, when such certificates were given. The minister who performed the ceremony had afterwards been banished for forgery, and collusion in effecting a marriage, and became incompetent to give evidence, but a book kept by him, in which the marriage in question appeared to be regularly entered, was produced, and proved by the wife and daughter of the minister, who also proved the performance of the ceremony.

M., who had afterwards married another husband, upon a suit to establish the first marriage, in her defences admitted that one evening in May 1816, by means of threats, and particularly of personal injury to a rival suitor, who afterwards became the [394] second husband, she was induced to go, and went with G. to the house of the minister before mentioned, but from the agitation of her mind, that she was incapable of paying attention to what then passed, and was convinced that she did not consent to the marriage. She also admitted that after the ceremony she returned with G. to her father's house, but denied the consummation.

It was in evidence that M. was in the habit of calling upon G. at his printing office, late in the evening and alone; and that after the ceremony of marriage, in speaking of it, she said "it was not binding; what would two or three words of an outlawed man do?" It was also in evidence, that on two occasions, in the presence of her father, she was addressed, and her health drank, by the name of Mrs. G., which salutation was in one instance returned, and in another received without observation by her or her father. It was also in evidence, that upon two occasions J., the second husband, after his marriage came to the house of M. when G. was there, and went secretly to an upper room, where he remained alone.

The marriage with G., as alleged, took place in May 1816. In June 1816, a marriage was regularly solemnized between M. and J. It was proved that G. before his alleged marriage with M. had admitted that J. was a more favoured suitor; that upon the marriage between M. and J. he had accepted a present of a pair of gloves; that he had been frequently present in social parties with J. and M., to whom he drank by the name of Mrs. J.; that he slept in the same room where M. and J. were in bed together as man and wife, and in all his intercourse with them, which was very frequent, recognised them as such.

Two years after the marriage of M. and J., and their colibitation, G. raised an action in the Commissaries Court against M. of declarator of marriage and adherence. There was issue of the marriage between M. and J., but neither the children nor J. were made parties.

Held (reversing the judgment below) that if a celebration of the ceremony of marriage took place between M. and G., it was to be presumed, under the circumstances before stated, that there was no real consent to marry. [2 Bl. N. S. 470: 488.]

Whether it is necessary that the second husband, and the children should be parties to the suit. Quære. [Ib. 416.]

Semb. That according to the practice of the Ecclesiastical [395] Court, it is only necessary to make the principal a party, but that the other parties interested may intervene if they think fit, at any stage of the suit. [Ib. 417.]

Supposing that the evidence had been deemed sufficient to warrant a declarator of marriage between M. and G., whether a sentence of adherence ought also to have been pronounced. Quære. [Ib. 460: 487.]

Upon a summons which alleges an irregular marriage, followed by consummation, and a regular marriage celebrated with a view to complete the irregular marriage, whether proof of the latter marriage, no proof being given of the former, would be a sufficient proof of marriage. Quære. [Ib. 489.]

Whether after judgment upon such a summons, and proof negativing the alleged regular marriage, a new action could be brought to establish the irregular marriage. Quære. [Ib. 484.]

Whether according to the law of Scotland, entries made in a book kept by a minister of the Church of Scotland, in the manner above described, are admissible in evidence to prove a marriage; and how marriages are to be proved, supposing the minister and witnesses to be dead, or incompetent. Quære. [Ib. 495.]

Whether the admissions of a woman who may be claimed as a wife by two persons, under such alleged ceremonies of marriage, and circumstances as above stated, is admissible in evidence as proof of the first marriage. Quære. [Ib. 496.]

Whether a marriage celebrated by a minister of the Church of Scotland, upon such certificate as above mentioned, without actual publication of banns, is to be deemed, according to the practice, a regular marriage in Scotland. Quære. [Ib. 497-8.]

Assuming it to be an irregular marriage, previous and subsequent conduct of the parties is admissible evidence upon the question of consent. [Ib. 499.]

This was an appeal from certain judgments pronounced by the Commissary Court and the first division of the Court of Session, in an action of Declarator of Marriage, at the instance of the Respondent, against the Appellant.

[396] The summons was for a declarator of marriage and adherence, filed in the Commissaries Court on the 25th of March 1818: "It set forth, that an intimate acquaintance having for some time subsisted betwixt the Pursuer and Mary Macneill, sometimes called Mary Black Macneill, the reputed natural daughter of the late Dr. James Macneill of Stevenston, by Euphemia Black, they formed an attachment, and agreed to become husband and wife of each other; and accordingly, when they were together at Holytown, in the county of Lanark, in spring 1816, on a jaunt, in company with the said Dr. James Macneill, an irregular marriage between them was celebrated by the said Dr. James Macneill; and the marriage was consummated by their spending several nights together in the same bed, at Holytown aforesaid: That on the Pursuer and the said Mary Macneill, or Mary Black Macneill, returning to Edinburgh from the said jaunt, which they did in the month of May 1816, they considered it proper that no time should be lost in celebrating, in facie ecclesiae, that marriage which had been irregularly contracted between them at Holytown aforesaid; and accordingly they were, in the month of May 1816, regularly married by the Reverend Joseph Robertson, Minister of the Chapel in Leith Wynd, Edinburgh." Notwithstanding of all which, the said Mary Macneill, or Mary Black Macneill, casting off the fear of God, and forgetting her natural and Christian duty and promise made at her entering into said marriage with the Pursuer, now refuses to acknowledge her marriage, or to cohabit with [397] him as her husband: therefore the Pursuer, Malcolm Macgregor, ought to have our sentence and decree, finding and declaring, that he and the said Mary Macneill, sometimes called Mary Black Macneill, Defender, are lawful married persons, husband and wife of each other; and decreeing and ordaining the said Defender to adhere to, and cohabit with the Pursuer, and treat and entertain him in all respects as her husband; and further decreeing and ordaining the said Defender to make payment to the Pursuer, of the said sum of £100 sterling, as the expenses of this process, etc.

In the defences which were given in on the 1st of May 1818, the Appellant admitted the acquaintance, and the journey to Holytown, but denied "that a marriage was there celebrated by the Doctor, or that she either then or at any other period, consented to become the Pursuer's wife." On the other point she gave the following statement: "The Defender recollects perfectly well that the Pursuer, some time in the month of May 1816, made proposals of marriage to her, which she rejected, informing him, at same time, that she was pre-engaged with Mr. Jollie, her present Husband. Notwithstanding of this, some short time thereafter, the Pursuer called at Dr. Macneill's house, between ten and eleven o'clock at night, by which time the Doctor had retired to his bed room; and by means of threats, particularly of personal injury to Mr. Jollie, he prevailed upon her, or rather forced her, to accompany him to Edinburgh, and that he carried her to a house, which she afterwards understood was that of Joseph Robertson's; and, although from the agitation of her mind at [398] the time, she could pay no attention to what might then pass yet she is convinced that in no situation would she consent to marry the Pursuer, or break her engagement with Mr. Jollie, to whom she was sincerely attached, and had resolved to marry."

She then proceeds to state, "that having a short time thereafter been married to Mr. Jollie, the Pursuer on that occasion was presented with, and accepted a pair of gloves, as one of their friends, and frequently hereafter visited them in the Doctor's house, and only discontinued his visits from the month of December last."

In the answers to these Defences, the Respondent desired that the Appellant should be judicially examined, as to the facts stated in the summons, which was ordered by the Court, but the Respondent afterwards declined to avail himself of the right.

The Court then appointed a Condescendence, and the Respondent, on the 23d of April 1819, put in the following:

1. That having paid his addresses in the way of marriage to the Defender, who was living unmarried in the house of her reputed father, Dr. Macneill, with the approbation of the said Dr. Macneill, the Pursuer accompanied Dr. Macneill and the Defender in an excursion to Lanarkshire, in the month of May, 1816, for the purpose of visiting an estate belonging to Dr. Macneill, in the parish of Bothwell.

2. That in the course of this excursion, the parties slept several nights at the inn at Holytown, which is in the same parish with Dr. Macneill's [399] estate; and while in that inn, Dr. Macneill stood up and solemnly bestowed the hand of his daughter the Defender upon the pursuer as her husband, and gave the parties his blessing. That the Defender acquiesced in this by taking the Pursuer's hand; and while at the inn at Holytown, the Pursuer and the Defender slept in the same room for two nights, when the irregular marriage which had been previously solemnized by Dr. Macneill in the way here mentioned, was consummated.

3. That while upon this journey, the Pursuer was treated by the Defender and by her father in such a way as induced the tenants on Dr. Macneill's estate, and others in whose company they happened to be, to believe that the Pursuer and the Defender were either actually married, or were solemnly betrothed to each other as husband and wife. That the parties returned from this excursion to Edinburgh on the 20th May, 1816; and the Defender after her return to her father's house in Leith Walk, where she generally resided, admitted to various persons that an irregular marriage had been solemnized between the Pursuer and the Defender at Holytown, when she had accepted the Pursuer as her husband; and that this irregular marriage had been afterwards consummated.

4. That immediately upon their return to Edinburgh, the Pursuer and Defender thought it proper that their marriage should be regularly solemnized by a clergyman without any further delay; and with the view to this marriage, the Defender made the usual preparations in the way of dress which are customary on such occasions. In particular, she gave to Margaret Kinlay, who [400] is since married to a person of the name of Shewen, residing in Leith Walk, three gowns to be made for herself on the occasion of her marriage, also a marriage shift for herself and a marriage shirt for the Pursuer; all which articles she desired should be got ready by a particular day, with a view to the regular solemnization of her marriage with the Pursuer. And further, she requested the said Margaret Kinlay to officiate as her bride's-maid on that occasion.

5. That in pursuance of this resolution, the Pursuer obtained a certificate of proclamation of banns in the usual form; and thereafter the Pursuer and the Defendant proceeded, on the evening of Thursday, the 23d of May, 1816, from Dr. Macneill's house, near the bottom of Leith Walk, to the house of the Reverend Joseph Robertson, minister of the chapel of ease in Leith Wynd, Edinburgh, for the purpose of having their marriage regularly solemnized by that person. That upon arriving at Mr. Robertson's house, they made application to him to solemnize the marriage, producing to him at the same time the certificate of the proclamation of banns, and they were accordingly that evening regularly married by Mr. Robertson, according to the forms of the Church of Scotland, in the presence of Mr. Robertson's wife and his daughter; and the marriage was entered in a book kept by the said Reverend J. Robertson, as a record of the marriages which he solemnized.

6. That after the marriage was thus solemnized, the Pursuer accompanied the Defender from Mr. Robertson's house to the house of Dr. Macneill, in Leith Walk, and there the marriage was con-[401]-summated, by the Pursuer sleeping in the same bed with the Defender.

7. That the Defender has, upon a variety of occasions, admitted to sundry persons that she was married to the Pursuer by the Reverend Mr. Robertson as above mentioned, and that she thereafter slept with the Pursuer as her husband, in her father's house.

These facts the Pursuer undertakes to prove by the evidence of (Here follow the names of the witnesses).

On the 21st of May, 1819, the Appellant put in answers, by which, before making special answers to the articulate condescendence, she recalled the attention of the Court to the defence originally stated by her, and to the facts specially mentioned in the first part of her answers to a petition given in by the Pursuer. It was therein stated, that so far from the Pursuer having then had any idea that the Appellant was his wife, that, on the contrary, he not only knew of the previous courtship between Mr. Jollie and her, and that they were to be married, but at the time of the marriage he was presented with gloves, which he accepted of; and being considered as one of their most intimate friends, he repeatedly visited them, drank to them as husband and wife, by the names of Mr. and Mrs. Jollie; and when he so repeated these visits, was in the practice of partaking of their family fare, always acknowledging them to be husband and wife. It therefore appears a most extraordinary circumstance, the Pursuer afterwards claiming the Appellant as his wife, a person who may have been said to have been married with his consent and approbation to Mr. [402] Jollie, her present husband; and so far from this having given him offence at the time, that, as already mentioned, he visited and acknowledged them as married persons, and as such was entertained by them. When, however, the Pursuer first pretended to say that the Appellant was his wife, it appeared that his object was merely selfish, as he offered to renounce the claim of a husband upon condition that she and Mr. Jollie would pay him a sum of money; so that if they had complied with his wish, no such action as the present would have appeared in Court.

The Appellant submitted that before the Pursuer should be allowed to enter upon his proof of the condescendence, the above special facts should be discussed, and a proof thereof allowed to the Appellant; or should the Court be inclined to allow the Pursuer to proceed with his proof in the mean time, the Appellant should also be allowed a proof of what she then stated, with what follows as the answers to the articulate condescendence.

The Appellant then proceeded to answer the condescendence.

Art. 1. The Defender denies this article, excepting in so far as regards the circumstance of the Pursuer's having accompanied Dr. Macneill and the Defender first to Holytown and afterwards to Glasgow. In May 1816, the Pursuer mentioned to Dr. Macneill that he had occasion to go to Glasgow, and would accompany him to Holytown if he inclined. Dr. Macneill acquiesced, and the Pursuer accompanied Dr. Macneill and the Defender to Holytown, and afterwards persuaded Dr. Macneill to go the length of Glasgow.

[403] Art. 2. This article is denied.

Art. 3. This is also denied.

Art. 4. This is denied, in so far as regards the Defender's having any view of a marriage with the Pursuer, making preparations on that account, or employing Margaret Kinlay to make a shirt for the Pursuer, and requesting her to officiate as bride's maid on occasion of the alleged marriage. Dr. Macneill, when in Glasgow, gave money to the Defender to purchase there three gowns, and she employed Margaret Kinlay to make them; but she denies her then having any view of a marriage with the Pursuer.

Art. 5. The Defender recollects that, some time in May 1816, the Pursuer made proposals of marriage to her, which she declined, informing him of her being pre-engaged with Mr. Jollie, now her husband. Notwithstanding of this, some short time hereafter, the Pursuer called at Dr. Macneill's house one evening about nine or ten o'clock, by which time he had retired to his bedroom, and by means of threats, particularly of personal injury to Mr. Jollie, the Pursuer prevailed on her to accompany him to Edinburgh, and he conducted her to a house, which she afterwards understood to be that of Joseph Robertson; and although, from the agitation of her mind at the time, she was incapable of paying attention to what then passed, she is convinced that neither then, nor at any time, did she consent to marry the Pursuer, or break the engagement she had come under with Mr. Jollie.

Art. 6. The Defender admits that the Pursuer accompanied her back from the house of Joseph Robertson to Dr. Macneill's House, where she [404] retired to her own room, and the Pursuer staid all night in a separate room below; but there is no truth in his allegation of there having been any marriage, or consummation of marriage, betwixt her and the Defender, either then or at any other period.

Art. 7. This article is denied.

The Commissaries allowed the Respondent a proof of the fourth, fifth, and sixth articles of the condescendence, being those relating to the solemnization of the marriage in Edinburgh, superseding consideration of the other articles, "until the proof now allowed shall be led and concluded." By a subsequent interlocutor, on the 20th of August, the Commissaries allowed a proof of the remaining articles of the condescendence.

The evidence produced by the parties, as it finally appeared in the prints before the House on the appeal, was as follows:

On the part of the Respondent the proof was professedly confined to the allegation in the summons of a regular marriage at Edinburgh; the proof of the allegation of the irregular marriage at Holytown having been abandoned.

Charles Macpherson deponed, that the Appellant was in the constant habit of calling for the Respondent, and that the behaviour of the parties led to the general belief that a courtship was going on; that her visits to the Respondent at the printing house were frequent, sometimes twice or three times a week; that she was sometimes accompanied by her father, and sometimes alone. "Depones, that when the Pursuer came along to the office, she sometimes called as late as eight [405] or nine o'clock at night, at other times during the day. Depones, that when she called in company with her father, he does not recollect of her calling later than about two or three o'clock in the day. Depones, that on some of the occasions, the Pursuer left the office with the Defender when she came alone, and did not return again to the office that evening."

Margaret Kinlay deponed, "that she remembers that the Defender once mentioned to the Deponent, that her father, Dr. Macneill, wished to give her, the Defender's, hand to Malcolm Macgregor, the Pursuer, when they were together at Glasgow, but, as she said to the Deponent, she, the Defender, refused to marry him there, or till they came home, or something to that purpose; but she, the Deponent, cannot recollect her precise expressions." This witness afterwards mentions, that she was asked to be the bride's maid. Miss Macneill said, "when she asked me to be the bride's maid, that her marriage was to be private, and that it was to take place in Edinburgh; that the gentleman, and a friend of his, were to come in a coach to meet her at the minister's, but she neither mentioned the intended husband's name, or his friend's, or the minister's, or the name of the place where she was to be married; she just said that the gentleman was to come with his friend in a coach, to meet us at the minister's house in Edinburgh." The witness could not attend; and "it was some weeks after the time fixed for the marriage, that I asked Miss Macneill if her marriage with Mr. Macgregor was done; and she answered me, No; and added, [406] I am going to marry a man I like better, as I have before deponed to."

Mrs. Christian Macnaughton being interrogated "if she ever knew of Dr. Macneill, and the Defender and Pursuer going on a jaunt to Stevenston, in the west country, in the month of May 1816? depones, and answers, yes, I heard her speaking of it. Interrogated, what she said of the journey? deponed, the Appellant said, that when they were in an inn on the journey, with the Respondent, and Dr. Macneill had gone to bed, there was only another bed room with two beds in it, and the innkeeper's wife, or woman who kept the inn, asked her if she had no objections to sleep in the same room with Mr. Macgregor? that there were no curtains on the bed, and she objected to the want of them; and said, if she would hang sheets round the beds, she would have no objections; that she said that the woman hung sheets round the beds, and Mr. Macgregor and the Defendant slept in the same room in different beds that night."

Mr. Smyth, writer to the signet, made the following deposition: "I recollect him (the Respondent) speaking to me, some time after the execution of Dr. Macneill's second deed of settlement, in April 1816, about his marriage with the Defender, which was to be at the Black Bull Inn that evening, at nine o'clock, and wishing me to be present; but I was unwell at the time, and confined to the house; but I said, Mr. Court, my clerk, might go; and I think I called Mr. Court, and mentioned it to him, and he said he would go; and Mr. Macgregor said [407] he would call back at nine, but he did not call at the hour; and some little time thereafter, I said to Mr. Court, you had better go to the Black Bull, Mr. Macgregor may be expecting you there; and Mr. Court went to the Black Bull; and some little distance of time thereafter, he called back and told me he could hear nothing about him. Interrogated, when this took place? depones, and answers, this happened nearer the end of May than the beginning of it. Mr. Smyth being interrogated, if the Pursuer called upon the deponent, and informed him that he had been married to the Defender in Edinburgh, and by whom? depones, and answers, yes, he did. Interrogated, if that was long after the evening that Mr. Court went to the Black Bull? depones, and answers, it was some distance of time after,—not so much as a month, but more than a week. I think he said they had been married by Mr. Robertson."

The Respondent referred, in evidence of the certificate of proclamation of banns having been obtained, to an extract from the books of the session clerk, of the following tenor:—"Registrar of marriage.—Edinburgh, twenty-first day of May, eighteen hundred and sixteen.—Malcolm Macgregor, printer, Old Church Parish, and Mary Macneill, St. Cuthbert's Parish, daughter of Dr. James Macneill, Edinburgh."

Mr. Andrew Masson, the son-in-law of Mr. Wilson, session clerk in the city of Edinburgh, deponed, "That he made the entry in the day-book kept at his father-in-law's, which is now [408] exhibited to the deponent, and which is in the following terms—

" 22d May, 1816.

" Malcolm Macgregor, printer, Old Church Parish, and Mary Macneill, St. Cuthbert's Parish, daughter of Dr. James Macneill, Edinburgh. That the parties are free, unmarried, of legal age, and not within the forbidden degrees, and he has resided upwards of six weeks in Edinburgh, is certified by James Macdonald, running stationer, Edinburgh, and Patrick Neill, printer, Edinburgh.

E

(Signed) " Malcolm Macgregor.

" Js. Macdonald.

" Depones, that the entry of the above, transferred into the office day-book, in the following terms, also exhibited to the witness, is also in the deponent's hand writing:

" Edinburgh, 22d May, 1816.

" Malcolm Macgregor, printer, Old Church Parish, and Mary Macneill, St. Cuthbert's Parish, daughter of Dr. James Macneill, Edinburgh. Certyd. by James Macdonald, running stationer, and Patrick Neill, printer, Edinburgh.

(Signed) " Malcolm Macgregor.

" Jam. Macdonald."

Being specially interrogated, he depones, " that in no case was it the practice to transfer any of the entries in the house day-book, kept at his father-in-law's, to the office day-book, unless certificates had been given out to the parties." Then adding a qualification, which does not apply to the present case, he proceeds, " that he is [409] quite certain, that, with the exception now mentioned, certificates were issued in all cases where the entries appear to have been transferred. The deponent being now shown the copper-plate form of proclamation of banns in process, depones, that it is the form of certificate in use to be given out by the session clerk in the year 1816, and the same is marked by the Commissary Examiner, and deponent, as relative hereto."

The copper-plate form of certificate referred to, runs in the following terms:

" Marriage.

Edinburgh,

181

" That the parties are free, unmarried, of legal age, and not within the forbidden degrees, and resided in Edinburgh upwards of six weeks preceding the proclamation of banns, is certified to me, for which I shall be answerable. And are orderly proclaimed in several churches in this city, in order to marriage, and no objections made why the same may not be solemnized, is certified by——"

He depones " that the entries in the office day-book were transferred into a folio book in the office, called the registrar of marriage;" and upon the interrogation of the Appellant, he repeats his conviction, that a certificate of proclamation of banns must have been granted, in the present case, and the grounds upon which that conviction rests.

Robert Bow, the present session clerk, being interrogated as to the extract from the register of marriages, being dated 21st of May, 1821, when it is entered in the day-book of date 22d May? depones and answers, it must be a mere mis-[410]-take of mine in transferring the entry from the day-book to the register, and the date

22nd being placed below instead of above. Interrogated, if he is satisfied from the evidence of the entries appearing in the different books above deponed to, that a certificate of proclamation of banns must have been given out at that time in the form above deponed to? depones and answers, I have no doubt of it. Interrogated, if the entry in the register, above deposed to, shews the date of the certificate of proclamation being issued by the session clerk, or if it shews the date of the celebration of the marriage? depones and answers, it shews the date of which the lines were got out, but not the date of the marriage."

The Reverend Dr. Macknight depones, "That he is one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and has been so for nineteen years past. Depones that he has officiated as clerk to the presbytery of Edinburgh for thirty years past. Depones, that the old regulations in regard to the proclamation of banns were not strictly attended to at and previous to the year 1816. Interrogated, whether at and previous to the year 1816, the deponent, as a clergyman of the city of Edinburgh, would have celebrated a marriage betwixt a gentleman residing within the city and a lady residing in the parish of St. Cuthbert's, on the production of the certificate of the proclamation of banns then in use by the session clerk of the city of Edinburgh, without his requiring also a certificate of a similar nature from the session clerk of the parish of St. Cuthbert's? depones and answers, I always [411] disapproved of the practice, but found it so common that I certainly did celebrate marriages on such certificates of proclamation from one of the parties only; and that, in consequence, I was anxious to obtain that alteration in the form of proclamation which has since been adopted by the presbytery, a copy of which is now shewn to me." And "The copper-plate engraving of the certificate of proclamation of banns in use to be issued by the session clerk of the city of Edinburgh, in the year 1816, and referred to in the depositions of Robert Bow and Andrew Masson, being shewn to the deponent, and also the entry of the attestation for a certificate of proclamation of banns, in order to marriage betwixt the parties, of date the 22nd May, 1816, contained in the house day-book kept by Adam Wilson, referred to in the deposition of Andrew Masson, being also now shewn to the deponent, and interrogated, whether, if the copper-plate form of this certificate had been regularly filled up in conformity to the entry contained in the day-book, and duly signed by the session clerk, the deponent would, on such certificate of proclamation of banns, have celebrated the marriage betwixt the parties? depones and answers, most undoubtedly I would; it was what was done every day, by which I mean very commonly."

Mr. Bow, the session clerk, depones, "That in 1816 it was the practice for clergy men to consider the parish of St. Cuthbert's, and the parishes in the city of Edinburgh, as the same, and to marry parties upon single lines from either parish."

Mrs. Margaret Robertson, the wife of the Re[412]verend Joseph Robertson, by whom the ceremony was performed, depones, that her husband "kept a book, in which, so far as I know, he generally recorded the marriages celebrated by him; and being shewn a book produced by the Pursuer, and now subscribed by the deponent, and Judge-Examiner, as relative hereto, which commences on the 1st of January, 1814, and appears to end upon the 26th of November, 1817; and the deponent being interrogated, whether that is the book so kept by her husband, and by whose hand it is written? depones, and answers, it is the book that was kept by my husband, and is wrote by him. And being particularly desired to look at the entry in that book, under the date of twenty-third May, eighteen hundred and sixteen, 'married Malcolm Macgregor, printer, Old Church Parish, and Mary Macneill, St. Cuthbert's Parish, daughter of Dr. James Macneill, Leith Walk. 'Town Lines;' and interrogated, if that entry is in the handwriting of her husband? depones, and answers, yes. Interrogated, were you present at this marriage? depones, and answers, yes. And again being interrogated, do you perfectly recollect that there was a marriage in your house, and celebrated in your presence by your husband, upon the 23d of May 1816, as specified in the book? depones, and answers, I recollect of it being, but I cannot recollect the precise date. Interrogated, about what hour did the marriage to which you allude take place? depones, and answers, between nine and ten o'clock in the evening I think; I cannot be certain. Interrogated, did you see [413] any marriage lines produced? depones, and answers, I know that they brought lines with them; I saw them in my husband's hands, either when he was celebrating the marriage, or before or after the celebration. He generally held the lines in his hand while he was celebrating marriages. Interrogated, did you yourself read the paper that you call lines? depones, and answers, I really think I did, I believe I did." Her deposition closes as follows: "Re-interrogated for the Pursuer, did the parties in the marriage to which you allude conduct themselves in the ceremony, in the same manner as parties do on similar occasions, or did you observe anything particular? depones, and answers, they behaved just in the usual manner; I did not observe any thing particular.—Re-interrogated for the Defender, was it your husband's practice to put questions to the parties when he performed the ceremony? depones, and answers, It was his practice to ask parties if they were willing. Interrogated by the Court, have you any doubt he did so upon the occasion to which you allude? depones, and answers, none whatever."*

Mary Robertson, the daughter of the former witness, being interrogated, "do you know [414] the Defender? depones, and answers, I have known her by sight for several years, but I never spoke to her. And being shewn the book produced during the examination of the preceding witness, and interrogated, depones, that for more than fourteen years past her father recorded the marriages he celebrated; and the book produced, which she has now seen and examined, is of her father's handwriting. Interrogated, depones, that the entry under date the 23d of May, 1816, 'married Malcolm Macgregor, printer, Old Church Parish, and Mary Macneill, St. Cuthbert's Parish, daughter of Dr. James Macneill, Leith Walk.—Town lines,' is of her father's handwriting. Interrogated, depones, that the deponent was present at this marriage. Interrogated, do you know the Pursuer, Malcolm Macgregor, now in Court? depones and answers, yes; I recollect the face; he was one of the parties then married; I did not know him before the marriage, nor have I been acquainted with him since. Interrogated, what hour did the marriage take place? depones, and answers, late in the evening before supper. Interrogated, was there any candle lighted? depones and answers, No; I think there was not, I cannot recollect that there was any. Interrogated, did you see any marriage lines? depones, and answers, I did not see any lines, but I asked my father if there were lines; he answered me, that the Pursuer had town lines. I put this question before the ceremony was performed; I had not been present at any marriages for several years before, and had some delicacy about attending as a witness, which [415] led me to put the question." She also depones, "that the deponent had often before been present at the celebration of marriages, and the marriage in question was celebrated in the usual manner, and solemnly and deliberately."

The entry in the record of the marriages kept by Mr. Robertson, was in the following terms: "Twenty-third May, eighteen hundred and sixteen.—Married Malcolm Macgregor, printer, Old Church Parish, and Mary Macneill, St. Cuthbert's Parish, daughter of Dr. James Macneill, Leith Walk.—Town lines."

The Judge-Examinator certifies, "that he has examined the volume of the record of marriages produced: that it appears to contain upwards of one thousand different entries of marriages therein recorded, in regular order of date, with the exception of fifty-three, which are entered separately upon five leaves at the end of the book, in writing which, the pages are reversed, and which are marked as omitted in their place." He also certifies, "that the fifty-three marriages recorded as omitted in their proper places, are in other respects, regularly entered, and that the marriage now in question is not one of those, but appears to be regularly entered, at the time of celebration, in its proper place."

The certificate granted by the minister, is in the following terms: "Edinr. Car-rubber's Close, May 29, 1816.—These are to certify, that Mr. Malcolm Macgregor,

* This witness did not recognise the Appellant when pointed out to her upon the examination; and as to Macgregor, she admitted that she had never seen him before the ceremony; and being much pressed, as to how she could recollect so well his identity, answered, "Indeed, I know very little about it; I am so unwell to-day, I am unable to answer questions." "I recollect his face, I cannot be more particular." She also stated, that she believed there was a lighted candle in the room when the ceremony was performed.

printer, and Miss Mary Macneill, after producing regular marriage lines from the sessions clerks of the city, were married, before witnesses, by me,

“ Joseph Robertson, Minister.”

[416] Janet Nicholson depones, “ In spring, last year, I drank tea at the house of Archibald Macnaughton, type founder, in St. Patrick Square, in company with Mr. and Mrs. Macnaughton, and Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, that is, Mary Black, they call her Mrs. Jollie; there was no other person present but myself. I cannot recollect the precise time of the year. I was sent for by the Defender, and I went home from that company between eight and nine at night, and it was good day-light when I went home. Interrogated, was there any conversation about the Defender’s marriage in that company? depones and answers, the Defender, with whom I had been intimate, said to me, in presence of the company I have mentioned, that she had been married to Mr. Macgregor, but she could by no means think of living with him, and that she preferred Mr. Jollie, and that she would lay down her life for him. I do not recollect all she said, nor the precise words. Interrogated, depones, she asked me if I was married to Mr. Macgregor, and said I ought to have sent her livery, that is, wedding favours. I answered her that she was married to him, and that she should have sent livery first to me. I was urged to confess that I had been married to Mr. Macgregor. I never made any confession to Mary Black or Mr. Jollie that I had been married to him. Depones, Mary Black, in this company at tea, said that she had been married to Mr. Macgregor by the Reverend Joseph Robertson. I asked her if she had lines? she answered, What do I know? She Mary Black mentioned, that Mr. Robertson had said, when he married [417] them, how does such an old man get such a young wife? or something of that nature.”

“ Interrogated, if the Defender ever said any thing to the deponent respecting what she had done with the marriage lines? depones and answers, I don’t recollect exactly what she said about the marriage lines; I think she said something about giving them to Mr. Jollie, or something about Mr. Jollie having burned them. Mr. Jollie told me himself that he had gone to Mr. Macgregor about the marriage lines before he had married the Defender.” A question being put to this witness as to her having several natural children by the Respondent, she declined to answer.*

Mrs. Macnaughton depones, that (in spring 1818) “ she was sent for by the Defender. There was a deal of conversation betwixt Janet Nicholson and Mary Black, she having wished Janet Nicholson much joy, to which Janet Ni-[418]-cholson returned some answer, but I am not certain what it was. Mary Black began and told Janet Nicholson about her having been before Mr. Joseph Robertson; but how it began, I do not recollect exactly. That she described herself as being induced to leave her father’s house that evening, by the pretence that her presence was necessary to settle some business with a Mr. Bridges. She said she did not know where she was when she went into Mr. Joseph Robertson’s; and she said that Mr. Macgregor had used threats to induce her to go to Mr. Robertson’s, and said at the foot of the stair, that he would burn her deeds if she did not go, which deeds of her property. Mr. Macgregor, she said, had keeping at that time.† That she said Mr. Macgregor said he would employ one Macdonald, Esq. to stab Mr. Jollie, if she did not go to Mr. Robertson’s, and that Mr. Macgregor would go to London.”

* This witness also gave the same evidence as Mr. and Mrs. Macnaughton, as to the allegation of Mary Macneill respecting the pretence by which she was induced to leave home, and the threats by which Macgregor prevailed on her to go to Mr. Robertson’s for the purpose of being married. She deposed also to the expression of the Appellant, “ What will two or three words of an outlawed man do? ” She deposed further, that the next day after this conversation, she went to the Respondent’s printing office with Dr. Macneill, who told him that Jollie was a better marriage for Mary, and that he would not consent to the Respondent’s marriage with her; that the Appellant afterwards met the Respondent by his appointment, and in company with Jollie, when Jollie asked him if there was anything between him and the Appellant but the marriage lines of Joseph Robertson, to which he answered that there was not, and he desired the Appellant to take and burn them, and wished her and Jollie all happiness.

† This allegation refers to a matter which was in evidence upon the additional

Mr. Macnaughton depones, " that the Defender said that Mr. Macgregor took out his pocket-book, and gave him either a note or marriage lines, she could not say which, and he made no objections to perform the ceremony." Janet Nicholson deponed, that " she said that that marriage was not binding: what the devil signified two or three words of a minister?" Mrs. Macnaughton interrogated, " if she ever heard Mary Black, the Defender, say any thing about her [419] marriage not being binding with Mr. Macgregor? depones and answers, O yes, she said that night that it was not binding: she said, what will two or three words of an outlawed man do?" Mr. Macnaughton deponed, " when Janet Nicholson came in, Mary Black, the Defender, addressed her as having been married: to which Janet Nicholson said, that she was married herself to the person she mentioned, which was Mr. Macgregor. Interrogated, if he ever heard the Defender say any thing about the marriage not being binding? depones and answers, yes, I have heard her say it was not binding, on account of Mr. Robertson being afterwards under sentence of banishment by the Court of Justiciary for forging lines."

William Allan deponed, " that the Pursuer was in the habit of sleeping in Dr. Macneill's house all night, at different times during the period of the deponent being there;" though, upon being interrogated, " whether, upon that oath, he had ever seen the parties in bed together? depones and answers, I never did see them in bed together, nor does it consist with my knowledge that they ever were so."

Mr. White, lapidary, depones, that in June 1816, i.e. immediately after the marriage, " the Pursuer, with whom he has been long acquainted, came to the deponent's shop, and got three gold rings, and a brooch of Ayrshire jasper which he had bespoke, and for which he paid the deponent. Depones, that he was accompanied by the Defender and Dr. Macneill." He " also depones, that while the rings were making the Defender tried a ring upon her finger, to see [420] if it would suit: she came to my shop with the Pursuer when she tried it." And he concludes as follows: " Depones, about the month of June I made a gold brooch of a Brazil stone, by Mr. Macgregor's order, and, as he said, for the Defender. Interrogated, depones, I also furnished, by Mr. Macgregor's orders, a stone for the head of a cane, which he said he was to present to Dr. Macneill. Interrogated, depones, and answers, when the jasper brooch was delivered, Dr. Macneill being much fatigued, was in my room with Mr. Macgregor. He said to Mr. Macgregor, ' this will cost a deal of money, but it does not signify; it will be all yours.' Interrogated, depones, and answers, there was a glass of rum handed on this occasion. The Defender was also in the room. I drank to her, saying, ' Mrs. Macgregor, your health:' she said nothing, but she also drank to me."

Mr. Neill, printer in Edinburgh, depones, " that he is acquainted with the parties in this cause, and was also acquainted with the late Dr. Macneill of Stevenston. Depones, that he carries on the business of printing in Edinburgh, and that the Pursuer has wrought with him and his father as printer for upwards of twenty years. Depones that he has frequently seen Dr. Macneill and the Defender calling for the Pursuer at his printing office. Interrogated, depones, that he recollects, in the summer of 1816, calling at Dr. Macneill's house in company with the Pursuer, who had previously informed him of his marriage with the Defender. Depones, that upon his return from England, [421] in the beginning of the month of June that year, he was informed by the Pursuer of his marriage to Miss Macneill, and the Pursuer requested the deponent, that in consequence of his being so, he, the deponent, would call upon her at her father's in Leith Walk, in company with him: that the deponent begged that he would allow him to delay his call till after the rising of the session, in consequence of the great press of business at the time; and he accordingly delayed calling for a day or two after the rising of the session in July, when he called with the Pursuer, as deponed to. Depones, that they were cordially received by the Defender, and the deponent recollects of her shaking him, the deponent, by the hand, when she received them. Depones, that he recollects her going for her father, Dr. Macneill; and the deponent recollects, upon the doctor's coming into the room, proof, that in April 1816 deeds were prepared under the direction of Macgregor, and executed by Dr. Macneill, by which he gave his property to the Appellant, and the deeds were left in the custody of the Respondent.

that he went up to the Pursuer and took one of the Pursuer's hands in both of his, shaking hands with him in a fondling manner, and upon the Pursuer mentioning the deponent's name to him, the doctor politely came up to the deponent and shook hands, and conversed kindly with him. Depones, that the conversation was very general, and that there was nothing said, as far as he recollects, about the marriage of the parties, but he recollects of inviting Dr. Macneill and the parties to come to his house, and that the invitation was accepted by them. Interrogated, depones, that he recollects of some spirits and water being brought into the room before his coming away. Interrogated, whether any healths were drank [422] upon the occasion? depones, and answers, I most distinctly recollect of drinking the defender's health by the name of Mrs. Macgregor, it was the only opportunity I had of shewing what was the object of my visit, which was to visit them as a new-married couple, and I therefore most distinctly recollect it; there was nothing particularly marked in my way of drinking her health, further than that I distinctly called her Mrs. Macgregor, and drank to her by that name. Depones, that she returned the salutation, and drank the deponent's health."

Janet Stove, after mentioning that she recollects the celebration of the marriage between the Appellant and Mr. Jollie, depones, " That she recollects being employed in assisting in the doctor's house on an afternoon some time after this period, and seeing Dr. Macneill and the Pursuer and Defender come into the house together, from Edinburgh, and go into the dining room, which is down stairs, and that she recollects of Mr. Jollie calling at the house while they were in the dining room. Depones, that she opened the door to him, and that he walked up stairs, but whether he previously took off his shoes or not she cannot positively say, but that she thinks he did. Depones, that she is certain he did not go into the room where Dr. Macneill and the parties were, but went up stairs, as deposed to; that she does not know how long he remained in the house, as she did not see him again. Interrogated, depones, that she recollects of going into the dining-room, soon after Dr. Macneill and the parties had gone into it, to inform them that the kettle [423] was ready for tea, and that she recollects of addressing the Defender by the name of Mrs. Jollie; that the Defender seemed very much offended at the deponent for doing so, and exclaimed, in an angry tone, ' Mrs. Devil! ' that nothing more passed at the moment, and the deponent left the room. Interrogated, depones, that a little after the Defender came into the kitchen, where the deponent was, for the tea kettle, and took it herself into the dining room. Depones, that she said nothing to the deponent, nor she to her, as to what passed in the dining room, either when she came into the kitchen or any time after. Depones, that she recollects the Pursuer coming out of the dining room, on the evening deposed to, some time after the deponent had left it; and that he went up stairs, and called up Margaret Craig, the housekeeper, and the deponent, and asked them, whether it was possible that the Defender was married to Mr. Jollie? Interrogated, what answer they made to him? depones, and answers, Margaret Craig told him that it was not only possible that they were married, but that it was provable, for that she herself had been present on the occasion. Depones, that the Pursuer seemed very sorry, after receiving this information, and she recollects his repeating the words, was it possible?"

It was alleged, but not proved, on the part of the Respondent, to account for the absence of Dr. Macneill from the second marriage at Edinburgh, that he was debilitated both in mind and body by a habit of drinking; and it was said that the fact of his incapacity had been found [424] by the verdict of a jury, upon issues directed in an action of reduction; but the proof was not brought forward in this cause.

For the Appellant, the following evidence was produced in the Appeal, and relied on:

Dr. Robertson, after stating that he knew Dr. Macneill by sight, proceeds: " Interrogated, if he was applied to in June 1816 to come to Dr. Macneill's house to marry Dr. Macneill's daughter to Mr. Jollie, and what answer he made? Depones and answers, I was applied to; and I answered that it was not convenient to go to Dr. Macneill's house; but if they would come to my house in the evening, I would see them there. Mr. Jollie was the person who applied to me at this time, and he shewed to me then a certificate of proclamation of banns, in the usual form, otherwise I would not have invited them to my house. Interrogated, if the parties came to the deponent's house in a coach, at the time appointed? Depones and answers, yes; they came about half past seven that evening, which I think was the 13th of June, 1816. Interrogated, Who were the parties that came in the coach? Depones and answers, I was standing at my own window when the coach arrived, and Mr. Jollie was the first person who stepped out of it; he then handed out Dr. Macneill, and was followed by Miss Macneill, and some of the domestics; and the witness added, Dr. Macneill walked up the first flight of steps, amounting to ten, in my sight, with his arm in Mr. Jollie's, without any apparent difficulty; and when they were all assembled in the dining-[425]-room, Mrs. Robertson came and told me, and I went in to them. Interrogated, if Dr. Macneill made any observation previous to the marriage ceremony, and what it was? Depones and answers, I found them seated; he immediately rose slowly, and hoped I would excuse an old man, who, by reason of some infirmities, was unable to rise so readily, and make so polite a bow as he was accustomed to do in his younger days. Interrogated, What then took place? Depones and answers, I requested him to be again seated; he replied—No; I have come to give away my daughter to Mr. Jollie, and I must do so in the usual manner; on which he stepped forward, took her by the hand, and placed her near Mr. Jollie. Immediately thereafter I offered up a prayer, gave the parties a few exhortations, concluded with thanksgiving, in all which Dr. Macneill seemed to be much interested; for he requested them to remember the exhortation, and to act accordingly. When I found him so disposed, I said, I hoped he would be kind to the young people; to which he replied, Sir, I have been kind to them. I will be kind to them still; and nothing shall be wanting on my part to make them happy. I distinctly remember the expression. I then certified the marriage on the lines of proclamation, and my constant form of words are, 'the above designed parties were married before witnesses, by James Robertson, minister.' I then wished the parties much joy, and they left the room as they entered. Dr. Macneill in Mr. Jollie's arm, and the rest followed. Interrogated for the Pursuer, if he was acquainted with Mr. [426] Jollie previous to the marriage? depones and answers, I was not personally acquainted with him previous to his marriage; nor, to my knowledge, had I ever seen him, except in church, as he was a member of my congregation; and I knew there was such a person, though he did not visit my house, and I heard he was a suitor of Miss Macneill's. Interrogated, if he recollects from whom he heard that Mr. Jollie was to be married to Miss Macneill? depones and answers, no, I do not recollect it, but it was the general report of the parish at that time."

Afterwards, being "interrogated, who he gave the certificate of marriage to? depones and answers, I gave it to the bride, as I always do. Interrogated, in what form he asked the parties if they were willing to be married? depones and answers, I said to Mr. Jollie, do you take this woman, (they having joined hands) whom you have by the hand, to be your lawful married wife; and do you promise, before God and these witnesses, to be a faithful and a loving husband to her, till God shall separate you by death? Mr. Jollie replied, I do. I then said to the bride, do you take this man whom you have by the hand, to be your lawful married husband; and do you promise to be a faithful, a loving, and a dutiful wife to him, till God shall separate you by death? And the conclusion then is,—before these witnesses I declare you married persons; and whom God, in his good providence, has thus united, let no man put asunder."

Mrs. Robertson depones, "I recollect the marriage perfectly, but I cannot say exactly as to [427] the date; but I have no doubt but it was about that time (June 1816). Interrogated, if the parties came to their house in a coach? depones, and answers, yes they did. Interrogated, who accompanied them? depones and answers, Dr. Macneill was of the party, and a person who I understand was housekeeper to Dr. Macneill; and there was a bridegroom man, but I do not recollect his name. Interrogated, if, at the ceremony, Dr. Macneill gave away his daughter? depones and answers, yes, he did. Interrogated, if any conversation took place between Dr. Robertson and Dr. Macneill before or after the marriage ceremony? depones and answers, yes, a good deal. When Dr. Robertson came into the room, Dr. Macneill attempted to get up from the sofa, which he did with great difficulty, and said very politely, he hoped Dr. Robertson would forgive the infirmities of an old man; on which Dr. Robertson went forward and took him by the hand, and said he was glad he was giving his countenance to the young couple, as he knew it was in his power to be of use to them : to which Dr. Macneill replied, he did so with all his heart, as he had already done something for them, and he intended still to do more. Dr. Robertson told Dr. Macneill that he might sit during the ceremony. Dr. Macneill replied, that he had come for the purpose of giving away his daughter, and he would do it. Interrogated, if Dr. Macneill wished Mr. and Mrs. Jollie much happiness after the ceremony was over? depones and answers, yes, he did so with great affection. Interrogated, if the parties then went away? [428] depones and answers, yes, after getting the marriage lines signed."

Christian Robertson (one of the Respondent's witnesses) says, "I nursed the Defender, (Appellant) and have been acquainted with her, and occasionally at her father's house ever since. Interrogated, depones, that she went to the west country with her father in spring 1816. After they came back, I am not sure but she said to me that Mr. Macgregor, the pursuer (Respondent) had been with her there. She said nothing to me about her marriage, or marrying. Mr. Macgregor told me he had been with them in the west country. I asked him if he was going to be married to the defender? (Appellant) He said, no; Dr. Macneill says he thinks I will be the man; but I think it will be Mr. Jollie, for I know her pre-engagement to him."

John Carr says, "that he has been intimately acquainted with the pursuer (Respondent) for thirty years and upwards. Depones, that he recollects some time about April 1816, of walking down Leith Walk towards Leith, in company with the pursuer, (Respondent,) and John Manderson, a witness cited for the defender, (Appellant); and upon returning back again, they met, towards the head of Leith Walk, Mr. Jollie and the defender. Depones, that the pursuer stopped and had some conversation with the defender and Mr. Jollie; and upon his joining the deponent and Manderson, the deponent asked him if Mr. Jollie and the defender were married, to which he replied, that they were not married, but that they would shortly be so."

[429] John Manderson depones, "That he has been acquainted with the pursuer, though not very intimately, for, as he thinks, about five years. Depones, that he recollects going down Leith Walk one afternoon, with the pursuer and John Carr, the preceding witness, some years ago, the deponent cannot exactly say how long, when, either in returning or going down the Walk, they met the defender and Mr. Jollie. Depones, that the pursuer stopt to speak to them, when John Carr and the deponent preceded. Depones, that the pursuer afterwards rejoined the deponent and John Carr, and the latter put a question to him respecting the defender and Mr. Jollie; to which question the pursuer made some answer respecting a marriage that was to take place, as he thinks, between the defender and Mr. Jollie. Depones, that this circumstance happened so long ago, that the deponent has a very indistinct recollection of what the pursuer said upon that occasion; but he rather thinks he mentioned the intended marriage above alluded to was to take place in a short time."

Margaret Robertson depones, "that she heard her mother ask the Respondent, whether the Appellant was to be married to him or Mr. Jollie? When he answered, that Dr. Macneill believed that he (the Respondent) was the person to whom his daughter was to be married; but that he (the Pursuer) knew Mr. Jollie was to be the man, as the defender had entered into a pre-engagement with him."

Mrs. Macnaughton, Margaret Robertson's sister swears to the same fact, namely, the Respond- [430] ent's statement, "that Mr. Jollie would be the man, as he (the pursuer) knew of his pre-engagement with the defender."

William Allan depones, "that he never heard any report that the pursuer and defender had been married till the month of March last, (1818) when he heard it from the pursuer himself."

John Carr, after mentioning what had occurred in April, 1816, when the Respondent declared that Mr. Jollie was to be the husband of the Appellant, goes on to depone, "That about six or seven weeks after this," (which could not be above a week or two after the marriage,) "the deponent happened to be in the shop of a Miss George, in the Kirkgate of Leith. Depones, that Miss George then mentioned to the deponent that Mr. Jollie and the defender had been married by Dr. Robertson, minister of South Leith. Depones, that the first time the deponent saw the pursuer, he put it to him whether this was the case or not; and the pursuer intimated to the deponent that it really was so. Interrogated, whether the defender had ever shewed the deponent the gloves which he said he had received on occasion of the marriage of the defender and Mr. Jollie! depones, that he cannot charge his memory whether the pursuer did so or not; but he recollects seeing the pursuer have a pair of new gloves, which, according to the best of the deponent's recollection, he told him were the gloves he received on the occasion of the marriage. Interrogated, depones, that the deponent and Mr. Macgregor sat in the same pew in the chapel of ease, and [431] that subsequent to the period which has been alluded to, Mr. Jollie and the defender were in the practice of occasionally coming to sit in the same pew, as visitors of Mr. Macgregor. Depones, that he never knew Mr. Macgregor to come along with Mr. Jollie and the defender to the seat, but Mr. Macgregor was generally in it before they came. Depones, that after the service was over, the pursuer always walked away in company with the defender and Mr. Jollie. Depones, that upon one occasion, several months after Dr. Macneill's death, the deponent recollects of being in Mr. Jollie's house to tea, along with a number of other persons, and among the rest the pursuer. Depones, that upon this occasion the deponent recollects that wine and spirits were brought in, and the health of Mr. and Mrs. Jollie was drank by the company, the pursuer being present; but the deponent cannot exactly say that the pursuer personally drank their healths. Interrogated for the pursuer, whether he can say how often the defender and Mr. Jollie came to the chapel of ease, as above deposed to; and whether it was twice or thrice he saw them there? depones, that he cannot exactly say how often, but he is certain that he has seen them there at least a dozen of times."

Margaret Craig depones, "That she was in the service of the late Dr. Macneill, in the capacity of housekeeper, from Martinmas 1807, to Martinmas 1816. Depones, that she repeatedly saw the pursuer in the doctor's house, from July 1815, when the defender came to the house, till the deponent left the service; and [432] after the defender became Mrs. Jollie, which was on the 13th June, 1816, the deponent has seen him repeatedly there at dinner and tea, both in the drawing-room, and in the dining-room or parlour. Depones, that they dined several times in the drawing-room, to avoid disturbing the doctor. Depones, that upon these occasions she has heard the pursuer drink repeatedly to the defender and Mr. Jollie, by the names of Mr. and Mrs. Jollie; and the deponent recollects, on repeated occasions, of the pursuer asking the deponent, when he called at any time at the door, how Mr. and Mrs. Jollie did, after asking for Dr. Macneill. Depones, that she cannot recollect whether the deponent's husband was present on these occasions, when the pursuer drank to the defender by the name of Mrs. Jollie, but that nobody else was present. Depones, that Mr. Jollie always stayed in Dr. Macneill's house after the defender's marriage with Mr. Jollie."

William Allan, being interrogated, "Whether it consists with his knowledge that the pursuer acknowledged the defender and Mr. Jollie as married persons after their marriage? depones, that he has heard the pursuer, on various occasions, drink to them as married persons, betwixt the time of their marriage in June 1816 and the October following, when the deponent went to sea. Depones, that the pursuer has dined different times during that period in Dr. Macneill's house, and the deponent distinctly recollects of the pursuer drinking to them both as married persons." He then goes on to mention a party in which the Respondent [433] drank the Appellant's health as Mrs. Jollie. Afterwards, upon cross-interrogation, he depones, "That the defender's marriage with Mr. Jollie took place in the month of June 1816, and the deponent was present at the marriage. Depones, that he, the deponent, dined with the defender and Mr. Jollie in Dr. Macneill's parlour on these occasions, when he heard the pursuer drink to the defender and her husband by the name of Mr. and Mrs. Jollie; that he does not recollect whether Dr. Macneill was present on all these occasions that the deponent dined there, nor can he say whether he was present on any of the occasions when the pursuer drank to the defender by the name of Mrs. Jollie."

James Shank, tenant in Stevenston, after saying that he recollects the visit of October 18, 1816, when he paid Dr. Macneill a small sum of feu-duty, "Depones, that upon the above occasion, there were some spirits brought in, and the deponent recollects, that upon one occasion at least he heard the pursuer (Respondent) drink to the health of the defender (Appellant) under the appellation of Mrs. Jollie. Depones, that he, the deponent, repeatedly, at this time, addressed himself to the defender by the name of Mrs. Jollie, in presence of the pursuer, and without his objecting to it."

William Adie, with reference to the same visit, and to a settlement which took place between him and Dr. Macneill, as to certain deductions to be made from the witness's rent, swears, "That the pursuer wrote the settlement which then took place. Interrogated, depones, that after [434] the above-mentioned settlement was agreed upon, there were some spirits brought in, and the deponent himself, in drinking to the health of the defender, addressed her by the name of Mrs. Jollie, without any objection being made to her receiving that title on the part of the pursuer, who was present. Depones further, that to the best of his recollection, the pursuer also, in drinking to the health of the defender, gave her the appellation of Mrs. Jollie."

Mary Hastie, daughter of the inn-keeper at Holytown, depones, "that in October, 1816, Dr. Macneill, the Respondent, and the Appellant, and Mr. Jollie, remained two nights at the inn. That she, the deponent, then served at table to the party, and she recollects of hearing the pursuer recognise the defender as Mrs. Jollie, and drink to her health as such, and this he did during all the time they remained in the house. That during the two days they were at Holytown, as above deposed to, Mr. Jollie, the defender, and the pursuer, all slept in the same bed room at night, as it was a doubled bedded room: in one of the beds of which Mr. Jollie and the defender slept together, and, in the other, Mr. Macgregor, the pursuer, there being no further accommodation in the house. Interrogated for the pursuer, depones, that she judged that Mr. Jollie and the defender slept in the same bed, as above deposed to, from the circumstance of Mr. Jollie asking of the witness a bed for himself and Mrs. Jollie. Depones, that they all went at the same time into the bed room; and the deponent was not in the room till next morning, after the gentle-[435]-men had left it; and she went in and saw Mrs. Jollie."

Mrs. Margaret Miller depones, that she was in Dr. Macneill's house on the day of the funeral, when there were various persons present: "That the whole company, including the pursuer (Respondent) considered Mr. Jollie and the defender (Appellant) as the master and mistress of the house, and their healths were drank to as such. That upon this occasion, she repeatedly heard the pursuer, Mr. Macgregor, drink to the health of the defender as Mrs. Jollie, and she is perfectly certain of this fact. That she was also present in Dr. Macneill's house the day before the funeral. That the pursuer was there at the same time, and he went out alone with the deponent. That on this occasion, the deponent put the question to the pursuer, who it was that married Mr. and Mrs. Jollie? to which the pursuer answered, that it was Dr. Robertson, minister of South Leith; and the pursuer at the same time mentioned that he was personally present at the ceremony. That she, the deponent, after the funeral of Dr. Macneill, frequently visited in the house of Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, in which, on two several occasions she met with the pursuer, on both of which he recognised the defender as Mrs. Jollie. Depones, that indeed, upon many other occasions, when the deponent happened to meet him, the pursuer recognised the defender to the deponent as the wife of Mr. Jollie."

Mrs. Littlejohn states, that she was present on the day of the funeral; that the Respondent was [436] there, and that he appeared "to conduct himself entirely as a guest of Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, in the same manner as the rest of the persons present did, only he did not appear so forward as some of them; and as to drinking the defender's health as Mrs. Jollie, the deponent thinks he just did as the rest." Afterwards, being interrogated, "If she recollects who it was that first congratulated the defender, as above deposed to, as the lady of Stevenston? Depones, that she recollects of Mr. Macgregor doing so when he first came into the room."

Christian Menzies swears, that she had seen and heard the Respondent over and over again recognise Mr. and Mrs. Jollie as man and wife. "That Mr. Macgregor was very much in the house at the time Dr. Macneill died, and seemed to take a charge in advising Mr. Jollie to make arrangements for the funeral. That, at this time, Mr. and Mrs. Jollie invariably appeared as master and mistress of the family; and the pursuer was considered in the light of a visitor there merely. That upon the first Sunday after Dr. Macneill's death, the defender and Mr. Jollie were kirked in the chapel of ease; upon which occasion the pursuer accompanied them, both going on foot, and upon their return in a hackney coach; and he also dined with them upon the same day."

Mrs. Margaret Cunningham, "depones, that she was present in Dr. Macneill's house two days previous to his funeral, and the pursuer, Mr. Macgregor, was also present. That Mr. Jollie and the defender were present on the same occasion. That, on this occasion, a glass [437] of wine was handed about to the company, and the deponent distinctly heard the pursuer then drink to the defender and Mr. Jollie, under the appellation of Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, and then afterwards he drank to the health of the rest of the company. That the evening before the funeral, the deponent was again present at the chesting of Dr. Macneill, at which time the pursuer was present, and wished to make himself serviceable to Mr. Jollie and the defender, whom he invariably recognised as Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, and made an apology to them for being obliged to go away sooner than he could have wished."

Thomas Littlejohn depones, "that he was at Dr. Macneill's funeral in May 1817, and that he afterwards went, along with several other persons, among whom was the pursuer and Mr. Jollie, to the house of Mr. James Smyth, W.S. when he heard Dr. Macneill's deeds of settlement read over. That, on the same evening, the deponent went down to Dr. Macneill's house, where he saw the pursuer in company with the defender; and Mrs. Littlejohn, the deponent's wife, and Mr. Jollie were also present."

Benjamin Brown, surgeon in Edinburgh, swears, "that he recollects sometime in the month of October 1817, three years ago, of he, the deponent, and his wife, Mrs. Brown, being at the house of Mr. Jollie, the defender, when the pursuer was present." He depones, "that upon this occasion there were several other persons present. That it was the first time, so far as he can remember, that he had [438] visited Mr. Jollie and the defender; and as was the common practice on such occasions, the deponent has no hesitation in saying, that the company, in general, drank to the health of Mr. Jollie and the defender, as married persons." Hector Gavin adds, "that he, the deponent, sat next to the pursuer on the occasion alluded to; and although he is not certain, yet he thinks that the pursuer must have, along with the rest of the company, drank to the health of Mr. Jollie and the defender, as married persons, otherwise he thinks his conduct must have been taken notice of."

On advising the proof and memorials, the Commissaries, in June 1821, found, "that the Pursuer had established by sufficient evidence that a marriage was celebrated betwixt the Defender and him, by Joseph Robertson, late, etc. in the month of May 1816; that the Defender has failed to establish by evidence any circumstance sufficient to elide the legal presumption thence arising, of matrimonial consent having been duly adhibited by her on that occasion; and therefore found facts, circumstances and qualifications proven relevant to infer marriage between the parties, and declared them married persons accordingly and decerned." Upon advising a reclaiming petition in 1821, the Commissaries adhered to their former judgment, and found that "no circumstances had been attempted to be proved on the part of the Defender, from which to infer intimidation, as avowed by her; that the Defender's matrimonial consent, arising from the marriage ceremony at Robertson's, is strengthened by the Defender's admission, that [439] the Pursuer accompanied her back from Robertson's to her father's house on the same evening, and that a presumption thence arises of sexual intercourse having followed betwixt the parties, which is farther confirmed by what passed at White's, the lapidary, some time thereafter; and that the inference of the Defender's matrimonial consent is not contradicted by any part of the Pursuer's conduct immediately following the marriage ceremony; and that although his conduct, at a subsequent period, might infer his willingness to relinquish his legal claim to the Defender as his wife, such conduct cannot destroy the legal effect of the evidence adduced to establish the validity of the previous union of the parties."

Against this judgment a bill of advocacy was presented, upon which the majority of the Court was of opinion that the case should be remitted for farther proof, which was accordingly taken as to the marriage of Jollie, and the circumstances of the conduct of Macgregor after the marriage, and his possession of the title deeds.

Upon advising this additional proof, the Commissaries were equally divided, and accordingly, by the practice of the Court, the judgment was affirmed. They found the marriage established, and decerned in the terms of the libel.

The Respondent thereupon brought the case again under the review of the Court of Session.

On the 23rd of December, 1825, the Court adhered to the former judgment.*

[440] Against these judgments the Appeal was presented.

The appeal was heard on the 11th of June, in the session of 1827, when an objection being suggested for want of parties, it was moved, that the hearing should be postponed, in order that inquiry might be made whether, according to the practice of the Consistorial Court in Scotland, Mr. Jollie and the children should not be parties.

Upon that occasion Lord Eldon said, that this objection for want of parties was not raised in the papers, or in the arguments in the Court below: that it was a new question raised for the first time before the House, which made the House a Court of original Jurisdiction; that it was on this ground, that he had been in the practice of remitting cases, where new questions, not argued below, had been raised before the House: that in later years, considering that this course led to great delay and expense, he had discontinued the practice of remitting causes, and decided questions raised originally before the House: but that this state of things should not be permitted to exist, but should be remedied by a standing order of the House.

Lord Redesdale said it was the business of Courts not to consider the convenience of parties, but of the general administration of justice; that public convenience should be considered, rather than that of the parties to the suit: so [441] that it might be known to every body what is the law, and in what manner it is to be administered in Courts of justice; that parties should be held strictly to the rules of the House, and expense to them should not be saved by the public sacrifice, which must be the consequence of irregularity and uncertainty. He then proceeded to say that it was important to know what were the points in dispute between the parties: that in Scotch cases it was the habit to display an argument; that the printed case should be a simple statement of facts, and application of the law arising out of the facts: but in this case it was a printed oration, instead of a plain statement of facts, and the House was left to find out the case.

Lord Eldon further observed, that it was true, other persons deeply interested in the decision, as the case now stood, had no opportunity of being heard: but if it had been the practice of the Consistorial Courts in Scotland to proceed without such parties, he should hesitate to advise the introduction of a new practice, which might affect the judgment of those Courts in former cases. He therefore advised that cases should be laid on the table, and counsel heard upon the question of practice.

On the 29th of February, 1828, the question as to parties and the practice was argued.—

It was contended on behalf of the Appellants, that in former cases, where a second husband or wife, or children, were not called, the fact might not have been known, but here it was notorious; that in questions of pecuniary interest, it was always deemed necessary that a person to be affected by the judgment should be a party to the [442] suit: How much more was it necessary where parties were to be deprived of such valuable rights, as the status of husband and children? As to the right to intervene, it proved the necessity; and a party intervening after the commencement of a suit, does so to a disadvantage. Is Mr. Jollie to adopt the admissions of Mrs. Jollie, and be bound by them? It was farther contended, that the second marriage should have been stated in the pleadings.

For the Respondent it was argued, that in cases of marriage it is the practice of the Courts to require only that the principal party should be called, unless collusion is suggested; that in the Dalrymple case (2 Hagg. Rep. 51), the suit proceeded to a certain length, and the original decision was given without the presence of Laura Manners, a party interested; she came in afterwards upon the appeal. Suppose the children of a second marriage were in a foreign country, must the status remain in suspense for ever, or till what time? that Jollie had attended the proceedings, and could not complain of want of notice; that it would have been superfluous to state the second marriage in the pleadings, since a valid marriage could not be nullified but by a competent court.

* While this cause was pending, Macgregor presented a petition, praying for a sequestration of the heritable and moveable property of Mrs. Macneill, alias Jollie. In this and another proceeding Jollie appeared. But no application had been made in the principal action to have Mr. Jollie or the children heard for their interests. Nor had they in that action been sisted as parties.

On the question of parties, the following authorities were cited:

For the Appellant: Stair App. 792; 4 Ersk. 1. 66; Campbell, Dict. 10456; Pennycuik and Grinton, Dict. 12677; 4 Stair. 45. 20; 1. Ersk. 6. 49; Craig, 2. 18; Phill. Evid. 2. 239.

A great number of precedents were also produced from the Records of the Commissary Court, [443] in which persons affected by the judgment were not called as parties.

For the Respondent: Greenhill v. Aitken, 16th June, 1824; MSS. Cases in D. P.; Chapman and Lindsay, 23rd Feb. 1826, (4 Shaw and Dunlop, No. 320); Dalziel, Dict. 16780; Hargrave's Law Tracts; Case of Duchess of Queensberry; Scaccia de Sententiis; Heraldus de Rebus Judicatis; Mauritius de jure interventionis; Case of Dalrymple, Hagg. Rep. 2. 54.

Lord Eldon observed, that if according to practice Jollie might sist himself a party in the Court of Session at any time, he might do so perhaps in the House, as they were sitting as a Court of Session; and as to the question, whether he must adopt, and be bound by the proceedings as they stood, he must be heard on that point, before such a question could be decided. But that there was a difficulty as to the children, because the House could not appoint curators, and the cause must go back to the Court below for that purpose; and he doubted whether the House could permit Jollie, or the children, to intervene originally in that, the Court of Appeal: that the cause, if necessary, must be remitted for the purpose.

The case then, upon Lord Eldon's motion, was ordered to stand over for a week.

The case was again heard on the 7th of March, when the following observations were made by—

Lord Eldon: When this cause was heard at your Lordships' bar, in consequence of what passed in a previous session of Parliament, your Lordships were pleased to direct that counsel should be heard [444] on the question, whether the cause could be decided without bringing other parties before the house, who appeared to be interested in opposing the case of the Pursuer in this action. I am extremely glad that your Lordships were pleased to permit the matter to stand over, with a view that the question, whether there were sufficient parties before the House might be fully considered, before you ventured to say that you would not hear the cause upon its merits. First, because it is of very great consequence that the general doctrine in cases of this sort, with respect to who should be parties to a suit, should not be disturbed by what is done in this House. In the next place, because if it was necessary that those persons who have been mentioned, viz. Jollie one of the husbands, (if I may so describe him) and the children of Mrs. Jollie, probably by that Mr. Jollie, or who perhaps may have a claim now to say that they are the children of Macgregor, should be before the House, as parties, it is important that they should be made parties to the suit, before you enter upon the question of the merits.

This is not a mere action of declarator, unless the prayer with which the summons concludes, is the ordinary prayer in an action of declarator of marriage; and I mention that, because it does appear to me to be a matter of very great importance, that when the question is discussed upon its merits, some attention should be given to the prayer of this summons. It is not merely a prayer that it might be declared that Mary Macneill, sometimes called Mary Black Macneill, and Malcolm Macgregor, are lawful married persons, [445] husband and wife of each other; but it likewise prays, that the Court would decern and ordain the Defender, to adhere to and cohabit with the Pursuer, and treat and entertain him in all respects as her husband; and one question which may probably deserve consideration, (I speak this entirely without prejudice) is this: whether it is competent for a man, supposing him to have acted with respect to this second marriage in the manner in which these printed cases state Macgregor to have acted, to come into Court, not merely for the purpose of having the marriage declared with respect to the civil consequences of the marriage, but to call upon that individual woman, with reference to whom he had so conducted himself, to return to him, and cohabit with him as a wife.

What would be the case here, if it were a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights, and the husband had so acted who instituted that suit, I do not pretend to say that I know; but it is a point that I should wish to hear something of at the bar of the House, before I can make up my mind. If the case is made out in point of fact, with respect to the conduct of this man, (admitting that if it were a suit for civil purposes, as for rents and profits, and so on, that the suit might be entertained to the extent of having it determined judicially, that he was the husband,) I do entertain very considerable doubt indeed, whether a man who makes a present of his wife, in the manner in which this gentleman is stated to have made a present of her to Mr. Jollie, has any right to come into any Court, for the express purpose of calling her back again to cohabit with [446] him, and to act towards him as a dutiful wife ought to act to an affectionate husband.

With respect to the question of parties, your Lordships have heard from the bar, and have heard it very properly as well as very learnedly stated, what is the general rule with respect to making parties to such a suit as this. If you are disposed to say that you agree with the doctrine that the husband Jollie and the children should be made parties, yet I am sure that your Lordships will feel that it is not in your power originally to determine a point of that nature, but that it would be necessary to direct the cause to be remitted, in order that the question with respect to the rights of those parties might be fully considered and properly adjudicated.

On looking through the papers, I find that it is insisted, and has, in fact, been pronounced upon by the Court below, that Jollie is not a necessary party: that might, perhaps, fall under your Lordships' consideration as a matter of appeal. With respect to the children, their right to intervene, or rather the necessity, I should say, of having them as parties before the House, does not appear to have been considered at all in the Court below, but that would not relieve you from the necessity of sending the cause back again, if a point on their behalf is to be made with reference to the question whether they should be made parties or not: and really there is a most curious circumstance in this case, with regard to that point: for whatever might be the case with respect to children in other circumstances, I apprehend that prima facie you have the right of those children now before the Court, because those children be-[447]-ing prima facie the children of her husband, if this person (Macgregor) is her husband, they are prima facie his children, and until he is divested of the prima facie character of the father, of those children he would be, in truth, their tutor, or the person to take care of their interests; and a singular distribution of parties it would be, if he had the onus of that duty laid upon him under such circumstances, for no one could suppose for a moment that it would be honestly discharged.

But whatever is the general doctrine with respect either to the necessity of having parties, or the rights of persons to intervene, it has been very properly admitted by the counsel that the general rule is, (as Dr. Lushington and another gentleman has remarked it to be,) that it is not necessary to have any parties but the parties principally interested; and there are many considerations of policy, with respect to marriage suits in particular, that may make it expedient not to depart from that rule, and it can hardly be denied that this rule is a rule familiar in many other cases besides matrimonial cases. In a Court in which I long sat, we all know that a suit may go on against an infant tenant in tail, and if that infant tenant in tail should happen to die, yet the proceedings had against him would be good against the remainder man when he came into existence, because the tenant in tail was the principal party interested when he was before the Court. It has not, on the other side, been denied that the husband may intervene if he pleases. It has not been denied that, in a special case, the Court may call on the parties to bring before it other parties than those admitted to be interested in [448] the suit, and if that doctrine is to be applied only to special cases, it is quite clear that before we can say a word as to whether that applies to this case, we must be able, after hearing this case on its merits, to determine whether this is that special case in which we shall call for such an intervention as I have now alluded to.

Upon that ground, as well as upon the other grounds, it appears to me that it may be right to go on with the hearing of the case on its merits, for this appeal is brought before your Lordships under the sanction of very eminent counsel, as an appeal fit for you to hear; and I am sure I may say, without offence to any body, that if the intent of desiring counsel to sign appeals and other proceedings in Courts of Justice were fully attended to, I believe it would work as beneficial a change in the administration of the law as any whatever that can be mentioned. The suit being a proper suit to be heard upon appeal, it is quite clear that Mr. Macgregor, if your Lordships should happen to reverse the judgment, can have no reason to complain if you reverse it on the merits. It is a case, therefore, in which, in one view, and supposing the cause to come to one end, you may decide this matter, which it is agreed on all hands at the bar ought to be decided, without all the delay which must take place if you were to go through the operation of remitting it to the Court of Session, and then discuss it in the shape of a future appeal from the Court of Session, which may not take place for some years; and the final decision of this case might not be obtained till a great lapse of time shall have taken place, and these parties be kept [449] in the state of misery in which some of them must be at present.

There is another circumstance in this case, which it strikes me is a very material one, and I take the liberty of mentioning it, that the counsel may consider whether there is any thing in it, or rather I should say, in the papers before us, that may require much to be said upon it; and it is this—I observe that, in the Commissary Court, it is found that there are not proofs of circumstances sufficient to elide (I think is the expression) the intention of marriage. They apply that species of finding to a marriage which is said to be regular, and in facie ecclesiae.

I observe too, there are a great many cases cited on both sides, with a view to bringing under discussion the question, whether a marriage cannot be attacked upon the ground of want of consent, the want of consent being made out by proof of force or fear? There is a great deal likewise to be found in the papers with reference to the question, whether evidence of circumstances may not be adduced, to shew that, notwithstanding the marriage was regular in facie ecclesiae, and though you cannot attack it on the general ground either of force or fear, (the point is a very singular one—the point is a very important one in its decision one way or the other) whether it is not consistent with the law of Scotland, that even where there is no force or fear, there may yet be circumstances which shall give the parties a right to deny the intention of being married persons, though they went through the ceremony regularly? and I mention this, because I do not see how this House can either affirm or disaffirm [450] the judgment of the Court below, without taking notice of some parts of the contents of the interlocutors which have been pronounced, bearing reference to that most important point.

Under these circumstances, therefore, it appears to me proper, humbly to advise your Lordships to call upon the counsel at the bar, if they are now prepared so to do, to go through the case upon its merits; or if they are not now prepared so to do, to mention some day on which it will be convenient for them to undertake to go through the merits, and I propose to your Lordships that that course should be adopted. My Lords, I would just mention that this is not an action of declarator concluding for a divorce, but it is an action of declarator by a person stated to have conducted himself in the manner I mentioned, concluding for what we should call a restitution of conjugal rights. Nor is it an action of declarator of any other species, where upon the proof of the marriage civil rights of property are to be enforced.

Upon this motion, it was ordered that the appeal should stand over for a week.

On the 14th, 18th, 20th, and 25th of March, the case was argued upon the merits.

For the Appellant—It was argued, that the conduct of the parties, although it could not annul a regular marriage, was evidence that there was no serious consent in a solemnization which was not in all respects regular, and the following authorities were cited: Campbell v. Cochrane, D. P. 31st Jan. 1753; 1 Ersk. 6. 10; 1 Bank. 5. 23; Cameron Dict. 12680; Allan, 11th Aug. 1773; McInnes, [451] Dict. 12683; Taylor, Dict. 12687; McLauchlan, Dict. 12693; Mcgregor, Dict. 12697; Napier, (see the case of Dalrymple) Sanctius de Matrimonio; Haggard's Rep. 2. 280; Hailes; Tait on Evidence; Forbes, Dict. 16718; Murray, Dict. 16741.

For the Respondent: It was contended that the marriage being regular in facie ecclesiae, consent was necessarily implied in the act itself, and could not be controverted by circumstances of conduct as evidence of the want of consent. The authorities were: 1 Ersk. 6. 10; McInnes quâ supra; Taylor q. s.; McLauchlan q. s.;

McGregor q. s.; Napier, q. s.; McKenzie, F. C. 8th March, 1810; Niven, Fount. 1. 501; Tait on Evid.; Barber, Diet. 16712; Young, Id. 16713; Hailes' Canon; Hume on Crimes, 1. 462, 2. 329; Morge, Addam's Rep. 2; Fletcher, Coxe's Rep.; Hailes' Rep. 1. 561; Elchies No. 7. Voce Proof.

In the course of this argument, Lord Eldon enquired whether the words, "and decern," in the interlocutor of the Commissaries, were applicable to the whole of the conclusion of the summons; and observed, that if the interlocutor of the Court of Session was to be understood as not having yet determined the question of adherence, it could not be discussed in the House as an original question for its judgment. He also observed that the question, whether the fact of consent could be controverted, was very important to be argued; that in the Dalrymple case it was not necessary to determine that question; that certain expressions in the interlocutor of the Commissaries in this case, and the judicial arguments in the Court of Session, led to the inference that evidence might be admitted on the question of consent, [452] even if it were conceded that the marriage was regular. He also suggested an objection, that the judgment was for a good marriage at Edinburgh, while the summons alleged a good marriage at Holytown; that if the first was good, the second was only a form; that both could not be good, nor proof of a second valid marriage be properly given, upon a summons which alleged a prior valid marriage; that the question upon the first should have been disposed of by the judgment, that it might be consistent with the pleadings; that the evidence was inconsistent with the summons, for the certificate of banns was, that the parties were "free and unmarried;" that as there was no judgment on that part of the summons which alleged a marriage at Holytown, if the House should reserve the interlocutor, the Respondent might bring a new action, insisting upon the marriage at Holytown; that, in English pleading, if a declaration should allege a marriage in Scotland, and then, as in this case, that a marriage was celebrated in England, to make good the marriage in Scotland, proof of the marriage in Scotland would negative the allegation of the marriage in England.

At the conclusion of the argument, Lord Eldon said, that as to the objection raised by him, with respect to the proceeding upon a summons having two objects, he had been misled, by not having read the petition of appeal, which was regularly founded upon the provisions of the act of Parliament, which authorizes an appeal to the House after an interlocutor has been pronounced, which may have a material effect upon the ulterior pro[453]ceedings in the Court below; but that there was nothing in the act which prevented the House from remitting the case to the Court below, with a direction that they should give a judgment upon the question of adherence.

The case was then adjourned for further consideration.

On the 13th of May, 1828, the case was again brought on, when the following observations were made in moving the judgment.

Earl Lauderdale: My Lords, this is an action of declarator of marriage, brought by Malcolm Macgregor, a man of very low birth, and of distinguished immorality of character, against Mary Black Macneill, the natural daughter of the Reverend Doctor Macneill, a clergyman, in respect of immorality of conduct, certainly worthy of sustaining the relation of father-in-law to the Pursuer, who by this declarator aims at the honour of becoming his son-in-law.

On the first interlocutor of the Commissaries, I only wish to call your attention at present to the circumstance, that the finding is completely different from the allegation in the summons and condescendence; for they allege that a regular marriage was celebrated at Edinburgh, to give form and effect to the private marriage which was alleged to have taken place at Holytown.

Now, before calling your attention to the particular grounds upon which I shall humbly offer to your Lordships my reasons for thinking that those interlocutors ought not to be affirmed, I wish to call your Lordships' attention shortly to the outline of this case.

[454] It appears that this Mr. Macgregor was married to the step daughter of a woman of the name of Christian Robertson, to whom Miss Mary Black Macneill was given in charge to be nursed; from that time, though she returned again to her mother's house, with whom she lived to the age of twenty-three, Miss Mary Black Macneill seems to have frequented principally the society of Mrs. Christian Robertson; her step-daughter, the wife of Mr. Macgregor; of another daughter, Margaret Robertson; a type-founder of the name of Macnaughton, and his wife, another daughter of Christian Robertson; and, lastly, of a cousin named Janet Nicholson, by whom it appears that Mr. Macgregor, after the death of his first wife, the daughter of Christian Robertson, had two natural children, if indeed there is not evidence in the case that he was married to her; because your Lordships will find that, in the course of the examination of this Janet Nicholson, though she asserts broadly that she never had confessed it, either to Mr. Jollie, or to Mary Black Macneill, and though she is asked by the examiner whether she ever confessed it to any body else? the examiner has carefully abstained from putting the question direct, whether she actually was married.

In such society, your Lordships cannot suppose that this unfortunate woman got any very distinguished education, or that she could contract habits other than those which were calculated to debase her mind; but, in the mean time, it appears that this man, Mr. Macgregor, who must have been a man of considerable art and cunning, though of low birth and station, had [455] got such an influence over the mind of Dr. Macneill, that in the end of the year 1815, when the mother of Miss Mary Black Macneill died, we find him boasting that he had used his influence to get Mary Black Macneill acknowledged by her father, and taken into his house. What his object was in so doing, I think I shall convince you, for I think I will make it impossible for your Lordships to doubt that he at this early period laid the project, through the influence he had gained over the mind of Dr. Macneill, of getting to himself Dr. Macneill's property, through the medium of the hand of this natural daughter.

In pursuance of this design, your Lordships will find that, by Dr. Macneill's direction, sometime about the middle of April, 1816, he managed to get a deed executed, which gave to Mary Black Macneill the house which Dr. Macneill inhabited, and £500 of money; and, on the 1st of May following, Mr. Macgregor got him to execute a deed, which conveyed to Mary Black Macneill, by disposition mortis causa, his whole landed property lying in Lanarkshire, in the neighbourhood of Holytown.

It was not long before Mr. Macgregor took steps to follow out the design which he had thus early formed, for, in the middle of May, it appears that he went with Dr. Macneill and his daughter, for the purpose of giving his advice concerning the management of the property near Holytown, and it is alleged, that there the irregular marriage, stated in the summons, took place. How it was irregular, when compared with the marriage subsequently contracted at [456] Edinburgh, it is very difficult to discover, because, in neither was there a proclamation of banns, and that marriage was celebrated before a clergyman of the church of Scotland, as well as the other, and I believe the most immoral clergyman, with the exception of Mr. Joseph Robertson, that possibly could have been picked out from the members of that church.

Mr. Macgregor states, that he returned to Edinburgh with the family, on the 20th of May, 1816, and that the parties there formed the design of celebrating regularly the marriage, which had been irregularly contracted at Holytown.

Now, whether the parties were or were not conscious that upon this occasion they had contracted marriage, I shall, in stating the facts of this case, submit to you my opinion subsequently, but, in the mean time, it is sufficient to say, that there is not in the whole mass of evidence any proof whatever that, from the moment that that alleged marriage was contracted, either of the parties acted as if they had actually thought they had been married persons. I know very well that the Commissaries have stated, that the inference of the Defender's matrimonial consent is not contradicted by any part of the pursuer's conduct immediately following the marriage ceremony. I think there is direct evidence that immediately following the marriage ceremony there was such contradictory conduct, because there is an admission in the action of the sequestration by this very Mr. Macgregor, that he saw Mr. Jollie and Mrs. Jollie together within a few days of the marriage. Within a few days of what [457] marriage? The marriage that he charges, is the marriage that he says took place at Holytown, and if you are to take it to have been to within a few days of that, it becomes a doubt with me, whether it was before or after the alleged celebration of this marriage at Edinburgh, that this meeting took place in Pelrig Street, when Mr. Macgregor puts it beyond all controversy that he never behaved subsequently as if he had been a married man; because, he states that from that hour he abandoned her, and formed an idea that he would get a divorce. Thus, it is clear, that even at that early period, he did not conduct himself in such a manner as to shew that he was conscious in his own mind that he was married. On the other hand, it is certain that the lady from the very first conducted herself in a manner that shewed that she had not the most distant idea that she was married, as sufficiently appears from her having married within a very few days another man, with the consent of her father.

If you look at the general outline of this case, you will see that Mr. Macgregor, having placed himself, as he thought, in such a situation that he might assert his right, if it turned out that this woman really possessed her father's fortune, and that he might abandon her if it turned out otherwise, (for that seems to have been the object of his attempt) abstained from doing any thing to assert this right, till he saw her married to another man, till he saw children born of that marriage; and he then comes forward (thinking that she was then secured in the possession of the property, and overlooking the scandalous nature of the attempt) to deprive an innocent man of the [458] wife, to whom he thought he was really married; overlooking also the scandalous nature of the attempt to transfer to himself, as his legitimate children, the children of another; or perhaps rather with the view to found some future proceedings, with a view to illegitimize those very children, and deprive them of their birth-right. I think your Lordships will perceive, that a more scandalous case never was brought before any court of justice.

Your Lordships must recollect that last year there was a case discussed at your bar—I mean that of a Miss Turner and Mr. Wakefield; compare the circumstances of that case with this case. It is very true that Mr. Wakefield seemed to have formed a scandalous plan to possess himself of that young lady's property, though he did not know her; but is the disgrace even of that attempt, any thing like Macgregor's plan? which had for its object, to place himself in such a situation that he might, if he found it convenient, at a subsequent period, claim this woman as his wife, to the effect of annihilating the status of the children she bore by another husband, and deprive this man of his wife, who, it does not appear, had the smallest idea that she really was married to Mr. Macgregor.

If on that occasion your Lordships thought it necessary to interpose in your legislative capacity, I am sure that, acting consistently, it is impossible, before your Lordships could affirm this judgment, that you should not pause; and that, in your legislative capacity, you should not send down a bill to the other House of Parliament, to dissolve this marriage, and by that means do [459] away the chance of this immoral man getting the fruits of the fraud that he has attempted to commit. Fortunately, however, I think I can state to you grounds, which will shew you, that there is no occasion to resort to this extraordinary means of remedying the evil; because I think it is impossible, when the case is explained, not to see that you cannot affirm the decisions of the Court below.

That you may follow me the more easily throughout the reasoning I am about to submit to you, I will state to your Lordships the order in which it is my intention to proceed.

In the first place, I mean to submit to your Lordships, that under the summons, as it is drawn, it would be impossible for your Lordships to affirm the interlocutors now appealed against. In the second place, I mean to submit to your Lordships, that if the summons had been otherwise drawn, and if, instead of charging an irregular marriage at Holytown, of which there is not an atom of proof, if, instead of charging an intention at Edinburgh of celebrating a regular marriage, to give effect to that irregular marriage at Holytown, it had been otherwise worded, and there had been charged in the summons an irregular marriage at Edinburgh, that there is not any evidence that has been produced upon this occasion, I mean any legal evidence, such as can carry conviction to a judicial mind, that there was any marriage ceremony at all took place upon that occasion. Thirdly, I mean to submit, that supposing the summons had been otherwise formed, so as to charge an irregular marriage, and supposing there had been evidence, such as [460] was sufficient to convince you that a ceremony had taken place, still the species of ceremony proved, does not exhibit the existence of that free, deliberate, real consent to form the connection of marriage, which the law of Scotland requires, to give validity to an irregular marriage. Lastly, I shall very shortly call your consideration to the cases that have already been decided in the Courts below, and in this House, with a view to shew your Lordships, that you must abandon every principle upon which you have heretofore decided, if you can possibly think of affirming the interlocutors in this case.

I will not detain your Lordships upon the conclusions of this summons. You will recollect, that when the counsel were arguing this case at your bar, I put to them whether they could state any case of this sort, any declarator of marriage brought in Scotland, that had a conclusion where there was a proof of a second marriage, desiring it to be ordained that the parties should adhere and cohabit. There is no such case existing. It is very true, that Doctor Lushington alleged, at first, the case of Mrs. Dalrymple : but that is not a case of a declarator of marriage. It was a case of an action for restitution of conjugal rights in this country, under rules of law perfectly different from those applicable to the present action. It is obvious what was the design of this man in so framing his summons, because if he had concluded for a divorce, her property, being mostly heritable property in Scotland, on which she was infert, he might have lost his right to that which it was his sole object to acquire : but waiving that consideration, the interlocutor finds, not that [461] there was a regular marriage, but that a marriage was celebrated between the Defender and him, by the Reverend Joseph Robertson. Is such a thing mentioned in the summons? It alleges that an irregular marriage was entered into at Holytown. There is no finding that such a marriage was proved. In fact, there was not an attempt to prove it. And the finding is not of an irregular marriage at Holytown, as alleged in the summons, but of an irregular marriage at Edinburgh, which under the words of that summons it was impossible for them regularly to pronounce ; and it is impossible, for that reason, for your Lordships to affirm, for before you can, under this summons, find these parties married, you must find, in the first place, evidence to convince you that there was an irregular marriage at Holytown, of which there is not an atom of proof ; and then you must have evidence that that marriage derived further efficacy, and further validity from the celebration of a regular marriage at Edinburgh, of which there is not, as I shall shew to you, any thing like a proof.

Having stated thus much upon the subject of this summons, on which I certainly could enlarge much, for a more extraordinary summons than that which has been exhibited to your Lordships in this case, and one more irregularly framed, for the purpose for which it is intended, never was drawn ; I will now proceed upon the supposition that this summons had been regularly formed, and assume that this summons had charged a marriage ceremony before Mr. Joseph Robertson, of Edinburgh. What evidence is there that can justify you in judicially finding that any ceremony what-[462]-ever took place? The evidence upon this subject is like the evidence in all cases where there is a consciousness of deficiency of proof, very various in its nature. The attempt seems to be, to patch up with one sort of evidence the deficiencies which they are conscious of in another sort of evidence ; for you have an attempt to establish it by documentary proof, you have an attempt by the evidence of witnesses to establish the fact, and lastly, you have an attempt to establish it by resting upon the admission of the party.

With regard to the documentary evidence, I must submit to your Lordships that there never were documents more deficient tendered to a Court, with a view to produce conviction, upon any subject. In the first place, you have produced to you a paper, intituled a registrate of marriage, and this paper is produced to you with a view to convince you, aided by the evidence of Mr. Bow and Mr. Masson, that there actually was that which it is impossible ever could have existed, and which there is no proof ever did exist, a certificate of proclamation of banns, granted upon this occasion ; when I say it is a fact that never did exist, it is confessed never to have existed, by the witnesses brought forward. But it is more material to shew your Lordships that it could not exist. You will recollect that those parties returned from Holytown on Monday, the 20th of May, and at that time, it is asserted, they first formed the design of celebrating this regular marriage in facie ecclesiae. On Thursday, the 23rd, they were said to be married: now, although there could be no intervening Sunday between the Monday and the [463] Thursday, you are desired to believe, upon the strength of those documents, that a proclamation of banns actually took place, the parties telling you a story which makes it perfectly impossible.

This registrate of marriage is in the following words: "Registrare of Marriage, Edinburgh, 21st day of May, 1816. Malcolm Macgregor, printer, Old Church parish, and Mary Macneill, St. Cuthbert's parish, daughter of Doctor James Macneill, Edinburgh, 3rd December, 1817. Extracted from the Register of Marriages for the City of Edinburgh." Now it is very material that you should attend to the date of the registrate of marriage, which is the 21st of May. The date of the register of marriage is the 22nd, so that you have two documents to prove a fact that is admitted not to be true, and which it is shewn cannot be true; these two documents having dates that would destroy their effect, even were they resorted to, to prove a fact not otherwise impeached.

The next documentary evidence is on a par, at least, with that which I have already described: for you have produced to you, a book of private memorandums of Mr. Joseph Robertson's, a man before whom, it was proved in a case in the Court of Session, in the year 1811, (of Dow v. Adie) that a private marriage was celebrated, one of the parties being represented by a person hired for the purpose.

This is a book formed by a man who at that time was in prison, for having celebrated irregular marriages, contrary to the act of Charles the second, and for the forgery of marriage lines; and you are desired to give credit to this book, there [464] being upon the face of it, obvious marks that a great many of the entries must have been made at one and the same time, in one hand; and, after all, it being only an irregular private memorandum of this man, who was convicted of bad practices with respect to certificates. But, my Lords, you have another document, which, if this had been a regular register, kept by Mr. Joseph Robertson, a man of unimpeachable character, would have defeated the force of this entry; because you have a certificate, in the handwriting of this very same man, of the date of the 29th of May, certifying that those parties were married by Mr. Joseph Robertson on the 29th. Then what am I to believe, if I believe any thing, that is to be inferred from these documents? Did this marriage take place on the 29th? or did it take place upon the 23rd? It is impossible for you to discover upon which day it did take place; for though it has been attempted to confirm this by the evidence of witnesses, you will see that they do not recollect the date of the marriage. I hold, therefore, that it is impossible for you to allow your minds to be, in the smallest degree, influenced by a registrate of marriage, which is contradicted by the register of marriage; or by a book, kept in the irregular manner that I have described, which is contradicted by the certificate of the person who keeps it.

The parties were conscious that this documentary evidence was not worth much, and consequently they have relied upon the pari voce evidence of Mrs. Robertson, the wife of this man, and of Miss Robertson, his daughter; and it does so happen, (which is worthy of remark, because [465] it places those witnesses in a very suspicious situation,) that the very day on which they were examined, was the day on which this man was liberated from prison, and on which his further punishment of banishment was to commence. They were, therefore, persons who had an obvious interest to explain away his conduct, and to make it appear as regular as possible, looking undoubtedly for some mitigation of the punishment which the Court had inflicted upon him.

Mrs. Robertson, his wife, (and it is not alleged that there was any other person present but his wife and his daughter) is the first person examined, and to the first question, which was (Mary Black Macneill being pointed out to her) whether she knew this woman, she distinctly says, that she does not know her, and that she does not recollect ever having seen her before. The moment that answer was given, the witness should have been sent out of Court, as it was quite obvious that no benefit could be derived from her testimony. But that was not the mode that was pursued. Mrs. Robertson's recollection was refreshed, by producing the book to which I have alluded, and reading to her the entry of the marriage, in order that she might, in some degree, gain some recollection of the facts of the case; a proceeding which ought not to have taken place, for this book not being itself evidence, never could have been regularly brought forward to prompt the recollection of a witness, they knew must be willing, from her situation, to say any thing upon that occasion. She is then asked, if she knew Mr. Macgregor. He is pointed out to her, and her answer is, that she [466] knows him perfectly, but she never saw him, either before or after the time on which, according to this entry, the marriage was celebrated. This seemed very extraordinary, when she professed to have that perfect knowledge of his person; it therefore naturally suggested this question: How did she recollect a man that she had never seen before or since? to which her answer is, "Indeed, I know very little about it." Now this is one of those witnesses, who are brought forward to identify the parties, and I wish to know whether it is possible for your Lordships to say, that Mrs. Robertson's evidence can be held, in the smallest degree to contribute to your conviction, that Mary Black Macneill and Mr. Macgregor were present on the day on which this ceremony is stated to have taken place, at Mr. Robertson's.

Miss Robertson certainly has a more perfect recollection; when I say a more perfect recollection, that is all I possibly can say; because, though she says she knew Mary Black Macneill as Dr. Macneill's daughter, still it comes out in a future part of her evidence, that she applied to her father, in the course of the ceremony going on, to know whether it really was Dr. Macneill's daughter. With regard to Mr. Macgregor, the evidence is pretty nearly the same with that which her mother gives. The one contradicts the other, both in the fact of there being a lighted candle, and in the fact of there being marriage lines; and the two agree in no one thing but a very important fact, on which I shall presently comment, that Mary Black Macneill did not utter a word from the time she [467] came into Mr. Robertson's house to the time she left it.

Taking then the viva voce evidence in its utmost extent, you have only the evidence of one suspicious witness, that can tend in the smallest degree to identify the parties who were alleged to be united by this marriage ceremony; and, according to the law of Scotland, one witness is not sufficient to establish a fact; you must concur with me, therefore, in thinking that there is no proof whatever upon which you can rest a judicial decision, that there was any ceremony took place on the 23d of May, 1826. The parties seem, in some degree, convinced of this, and, accordingly, the defect in the evidence is made up throughout the whole proceeding, by appealing to judicial admissions, and to extra judicial admissions, which it is proved Miss Mary Black Macneill made.

Now, my Lords, I am at present looking at this case, with a view to ascertain whether there is evidence that any ceremony took place; and, therefore, it is needless now to enter into the substance of those admissions, but I wish you to consider this question, whether it is possible that in a case such as this, where you have evidence of a legal marriage, subsequent to the irregular one, said to have been contracted, the admission of the party should be received as evidence, that the marriage actually did take place. If such admissions are received as sufficient evidence, there is no woman who has a fortune of her own, and who wishes to get rid of her husband, to whom she is married, and to betake herself to the arms of her paramour, that [468] might not, by connivance, get him to bring a declarator of marriage, and subsequently establish the fact of a previous marriage by her own admission. There is perhaps a feeling of delicacy in the other sex, that is not so prevalent in ours, which might prevent the frequency of such an occurrence; but, if the principle applies to one sex, it applies also to the other; and then any man who has married a lady, who, bona fide, believes him to be unmarried, any man who has contracted an alliance with a family of distinction, by whom he has many children born, if he takes a dislike to his wife, may get a similar proceeding instituted, on the ground of his having engaged in a previous marriage, alleging that there is evidence of that fact; and then the man has only himself to admit it, to the effect of destroying the status of his own children, born in lawful wedlock, and of ruining the reputation of a woman of high rank, and of great family connection, and who never dreamt of any such thing. Your Lordships must be convinced that this must be a precedent of the most dangerous nature. It has been stated, that the law of Scotland, with respect to divorce, gives too great a latitude, but, establish this principle, and then I will venture to say, this House will have very little cause in future to comment upon the law of divorce in Scotland; because, this new device for obtaining a divorce, would be so much more easy, and so much more rapid, that I can not doubt it would totally supersede that law, upon which I have heard criticisms sometimes in this house, and do it away as effectually as if it were repealed by act of Parliament.

[469] I must, therefore, contend that, as there is no vis à voce evidence, establishing that this ceremony took place, and as the documentary evidence is of such a nature, that your Lordships cannot possibly rely upon it, and, as I trust you will not receive as evidence, the admissions of the party to prove such a fact, that, in point of fact, there is no legal evidence that any ceremony took place, such as you can say ought to bring home conviction to a judicial mind. But supposing that you could rest upon the admissions of this lady, how far could the admissions promote the object of the Respondent? The general tenor of her admissions, amounts only to this, (here the noble Lord read the admission).

Now, what does this admission amount to? If there was a marriage before Mr. Joseph Robertson, it was undoubtedly an irregular marriage, and, in law, must be considered as such. Without troubling your Lordships with reference to the reasoning on the law, as laid down by Mr. Erskine and Lord Bankton; without referring to the opinion of Mr. Hume, to the opinion of Mr. Craigie, to the opinion of Mr. Erskine, of Mr. Clerk, and all the great lawyers, given in the case of Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, I will venture to say, that I may state this without fear of contradiction, that, in the case of an irregular marriage in Scotland, it is the practice, and it is the law of the country, to take evidence of all the facts and circumstances antecedent to the alleged ceremony; of all the facts and circumstances pending the ceremony, and all the facts and circumstances of the conduct of the parties subsequently to the ceremony; and that, [470] from a complex view of all these circumstances, you are to infer, whether that real and deliberate consent was given, which constitutes marriage; and in doing this, you do not resort to the conduct of the parties subsequent to the ceremony, for the purpose of undoing a marriage contracted, but for the purpose of learning whether the parties did, or did not, by their conduct, exhibit a conscious feeling that no such ceremony had taken place between them, as was sufficient to lead them, in their own minds, to the conclusion that they were married persons. Looking, in this case, at the conduct of the parties before the ceremony; looking at the circumstances proved at the time of the ceremony; and looking at the conduct of the parties subsequently, there is not a case in all the books, where there is half the mass of evidence to shew that the parties did not think a marriage was to take place; to shew that the circumstances which attended the ceremony ought not to lead us to feel that a free consent had been given; and, undoubtedly, to shew by the conduct of the parties subsequently, that neither the one nor the other ever conducted themselves, in any one instance, in such a manner as to lead any reasonable mind to conclude that they felt that a consent had been given.

How does the evidence stand? I will not go through it in detail, it would take up too much of your time to read it, but, I have made some short extracts, to shew that Mr. Macgregor himself, antecedent to this alleged ceremony taking place, uniformly held that there was not the smallest chance that he should marry this woman; [471] that he knew she was pre-engaged to Mr. Jollie. Upon this subject, you have the evidence of a witness, who cannot be suspected, Mrs. Christian Robertson, the step-mother of Mr. Macgregor's first wife, who states this, "Mr. Macgregor told me he had been with them in the West Country;" a circumstance which shews the probable date of this communication: "I asked him if he was going to be married to the Defender! he said no, Dr. Macneill says he thinks I will be the man, but I think it will be Mr. Jollie, for I know her pre-engagement to him." Margaret Robertson, the daughter of this Mrs. Christian Robertson, states that she was present when her mother had this conversation, and she proves the same thing to have taken place.

John Carr says that he was walking towards Leith, in company with the Respondent Macgregor, and John Manderson, a witness cited for the Appellant, and, upon returning back again, they met, towards the head of Leith Walk, Mr. Jollie and Mary Macneill. That Macgregor stopped, and had some conversation with Mary Macneill and Mr. Jollie, and upon his joining the deponent and Manderson, the deponent asked him if Mr. Jollie and Mary Macneill were married, to which he replied, that they were not married, but that they would shortly be so. Not therefore contemplating his marriage, but, in conformity to the testimony of the witness, already quoted, stating that such a marriage never would take place, because she was previously attached to Mr. Jollie, and that the marriage would soon take place between Mr. Jollie and her.

[472] Mrs. Macnaughton, another daughter of Mrs. Robertson, states, in confirmation of her mother and sister, that she heard Macgregor say that Mr. Jollie would be the man, that she knew of his pre-engagement with Mr. Jollie; and, afterwards, you have a witness beyond all suspicion, I might almost say, one who stands in the situation of being the only witness beyond suspicion, I mean Dr. Robertson, the clergyman who is supposed to have performed the ceremony of marriage, betwixt Mary Black Macneill and Mr. Jollie, who says that a general report had taken place in the parish, that Mary Black Macneill was to be married to Mr. Jollie.* How then does the evidence stand antecedent to the marriage? If it had been to be proved from circumstances antecedent to the marriage, that there was a design of marriage with Mr. Jollie, you would have had satisfactory proofs, but, with reference to Mr. Macgregor, there is not any one circumstance which does not go to shew that he himself actually believed that it never would take place.

Now, my Lords, what is the proof of what took place at the time of the marriage? you have this plain matter of fact, that both Mrs. Robertson and Miss Robertson say, that Mary Black Macneill never gave any consent whatever; that she never uttered a word during the progress of the ceremony. I admit that in the case of a regular marriage, when the parties come before a clergyman, after due proclamation of banns, where [473] they have given their consent to the marriage, as expressed in the marriage settlements, antecedent to the marriage, that a nod of the lady, or a bow in the church would be evidence of consent; but, where you know that parties have appeared who were not the parties to make that bow and that nod, as in the case of Dow v. Adie, where you know that every irregularity has taken place, and has been practised, something more is necessary than that nod, which might be sufficient in the case of a regular marriage; it is indispensable that consent should be really expressed, which is not the case, according to the evidence we have here received. Neither is there any proof of a consummation; Mr. Macgregor, indeed, alleges that he attended Mary Black Macneill home to her father's house on that day. Upon other occasions, where parties have gone to the father's house, and passed the night in that house, that might be a circumstance to produce some effect, but Mr. Macgregor had a bed in the house, he was in the regular habit of sleeping there; and the fact is, that there being no evidence of her being in the same bed with him that night, which might have been proved, is rendered much stronger from the circumstance of Mr. Macgregor having a bed in the house. The absence of that testimony is more remarkable, for there was not a servant of the house who might not have been questioned; first, as to whether Mr. Macgregor slept in his own bed? secondly, as to whether he passed the night with Mary Black Macneill? either of which circumstances, would have led to a definite conclusion on this important point. What is the conclusion? First, I say you have [474] proof that the parties in no respect contemplated a marriage antecedent to the alleged ceremony; secondly, there is absence of all proof of consummation, which, by the by, is not even alleged in the summons, for there is an allegation of the consummation of the marriage at Holytown, but not of the marriage at Edinburgh.

Thus far then, I maintain that you have no circumstances established, on which a presumption can be founded that, at the time of this irregular ceremony, any real consent was given by the parties.

I have already commented upon the interlocutor of the Commissary Court, wherein it is found that the inference of matrimonial consent is not contradicted by any part of the Pursuer's conduct immediately following the marriage ceremony. I have shewn your Lordships, that even from the time of the celebration of the marriage, the conduct of Mr. Macgregor, and the conduct of Mary Black Macneill

* See Tait on the Law of Evidence in Scotland, p. 431, where it is said that proof by notoriety, repute, or general belief, is privileged hearsay in the service of heirs, kenning of widow's terce, and other cases, as to the fact of relationship. So as to the shire jurisdiction, or parish, in which lands lie. But these are excepted cases.

was such as to satisfy any body that they were conscious of not being married persons. From the time of this marriage Mr. Macgregor was in the habit of regularly visiting Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, there are no less than eight witnesses who prove being present when they heard him drink their health as Mr. and Mrs. Jollie. There are witnesses who state distinctly that they recollect seeing Mr. Macgregor having a pair of new gloves; John Carr, says, according to the best of his recollection, Macgregor said he had received the gloves as a present at the marriage of Mr. Jollie. This man, who tells you he was married upon the 23rd of May; who tells you that a few days after he took such an aversion [475] to this woman, on account of her conduct in Pelrig Street with Mr. Jollie, that he formed the resolution of divorcing her, though, afterwards, he brings an action for adherence; this man, I say, is proved, on the 13th of June, within a few days of this, to have received a present of gloves upon the occasion of her marriage to another man. You have this Mr. Macgregor sitting in the same seat at church, listening to divine service, and afterwards walking home, to enjoy conviviality with Mr. and Mrs. Jollie for the rest of the evening. Is it possible to believe that there can exist such profligacy as that, this man knowing that he was married to her, sits in church with the adulterer and adulteress, and goes home with Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, to enjoy conviviality during the rest of the evening, drinking to their healths as such?

Must you not, under such circumstances, think that a man who could so conduct himself, must have believed and known that the marriage ceremony was not a ceremony that could be binding? That in fact the parties had never given consent; on that ground his conduct may be explicable, but, on any other ground, it is impossible to believe that he could conduct himself in a manner so profligate and disgraceful.

Mrs. Margaret Miller tells you "that the day before Dr. Macneill's funeral, she put the question to Mr. Macgregor, who it was married Mr. and Mrs. Jollie! to which the Pursuer answered that it was Dr. Robertson, minister of South Leith; and the Pursuer, at the same time, mentioned that he was personally present at the ceremony." If you believe this witness, surely there never did exist such a state of facts [476] in the world; but as none of the other witnesses seem to think he was present at the ceremony, the leaning of my mind is to the conclusion that he was not present at the ceremony, but that he very soon afterwards knew it. That he actually accepted gloves is beyond all doubt; that he frequented the society of the parties, heard them drinking to the health of Mrs. Jollie, and drank to her himself in that capacity; that he went, according to the evidence of Mr. Hughes, and Mr. Nicholson, the tailor, with Jollie on the occasion of the death of Dr. Macneill, accepting mourning, which Mr. Jollie presented him with, and which Hughes and Nicholson both state him to have received, is equally undoubted.

Though these facts are strong enough to carry conviction to any one's mind, that it is not in human nature that a woman should have conducted herself in the manner that this woman is supposed to have done, if she was conscious that a marriage ceremony had taken place; or that a man should have conducted himself in the way that Mr. Macgregor did if he had been conscious that the marriage ceremony took place; you have still stronger circumstances that lead to the same conclusion, for in the month of October following this marriage, Mr. Macgregor again attends Dr. Macneill, to advise with him in the management of his property at Stevenston, accompanied by his daughter and Mr. Jollie; and you have the evidence of Mary Hastie, the maid of the inn, who proves that, there being only a double-bedded room, Mr. and Mrs. Jollie slept in one bed, and Mr. Macgregor in the other. Can you believe that this man thought himself at [477] that time married to Mrs. Jollie on the 23rd of May? Is it possible that he would not have run from the place, and sought a bed any where, and even slept on straw, rather than have disgraced himself by sleeping in a bed, and seeing the adulterer and adulteress (which they must in his estimation have been, if he had thought he was a married man) enjoying those rights which he had exclusively the privilege to enjoy, in bed in the same room with him? I say, therefore, that when you look at the evidence which has been produced in this case, with reference to the conduct of the parties before marriage, the evidence which is adduced with reference to their conduct at the marriage, and the evidence that is produced of their subsequent conduct, it shews you that there is no reason to suspect that there was any consciousness immediately before or after the supposed marriage, or, at the time at which it took place, that they had really contracted marriage. If it had been otherwise, it is impossible there should not have been some evidence to shew that the parties had consummated the marriage which has been charged in the summons; and lastly, it appears that there never were any two people, who conducted themselves in a manner tending more strongly to induce you to believe that they were not married people, and to create a positive belief, that they themselves never thought that the ceremony was binding: certain it is, that they never for one moment acted upon it as if it had been such.

It is impossible under this summons, drawn as it is, to affirm the decision of the Court of Session, which is declaratory of a fact that is not even alleged: or to find that there is any legal evidence, [478] such as ought to convince a judicial mind, that any ceremony took place at Edinburgh: or that the ceremony, such as it is, which the evidence attempts to persuade you did take place, is a ceremony from which you can infer that deliberate consent immediately to enter into marriage, which the law of Scotland requires.

I will call your attention to one or two of the cases which have been cited, to shew your Lordships the spirit of the decisions which have heretofore been made in this House, and before the Court of Session. We have in the books, cases similar to this in one respect, viz. cases of declarator of marriage where a second marriage avowedly took place, such as the case of Malcolm v. Cameron, and Napier v. Napier; and it is very important that you should advert to the evidence which Mr. Hume gives in the case of Dalrymple v. Dalrymple: you will there see, that in those two cases he states that the principal ground of deciding against the first marriage, was because the parties lived in the same town, and had allowed a second marriage to take place, and had allowed a length of time to pass, the second marriage being unchallenged. How much stronger is this case, which exhibits a person living in the same house, and accepting gloves on occasion of the second marriage ceremony, daily frequenting the society, and living in habits of intimacy with the parties contracting the second marriage, and actually sleeping in the same bed room with them? To be sure this is indisputably a much stronger case than that of Napier v. Napier, yet in that case the circumstances were found sufficient to induce the Court to decide against the validity of the first [479] marriage, though there were strong circumstances to prove consent in the case of the first marriage.

You have then the case of Patrick Taylor v. Kello, decided in this House. In that case, the parties exchanged mutual declarations, such as if it had not been for their conduct, either before or after the time of marriage, (which the Court always takes into consideration, pronouncing upon a complex view of the whole case) would in their judgment have constituted a marriage in the law of Scotland. The writings they interchanged were to the following effect. The lady signed this: "Skirling Mill, February the 16th, 1779. I hereby solemnly declare you, Patrick Taylor in Bricken-shaw, my just and lawful husband, and remain your affectionate wife." He on his part signed a similar paper, and signed himself her affectionate husband. An action of declarator having been brought in the Court below, the marriage was held to be valid: and it came to your Lordships' House, but it appearing to you, that at the time of the interchange of those letters, there was an understanding, which was inferred from the conduct of the parties, that those letters were to be given up on demand, this House reversed the interlocutor of the Court below, and found that there was no marriage. Now, my Lords, how feeble is this case in comparison to that which your Lordships now have before you? This is not a case where the parties agreed to withdraw the written documents on demand, but a case where the one party stands by, and sees the other party married, and the other absolutely contracts a marriage, and they conduct themselves to one another as if they had never [480] dreamt of the marriage ceremony having been performed.

In the case of McInnes v. Moore, in December 1781, the House of Lords reversed the interlocutor of the Commissary Court, and of the Court of Session, because it appeared that though the letters which were produced were sufficient to constitute marriage, they were written and delivered, not with the intent of contracting marriage, but with the intent of getting the lady the privilege of lying-in in the house of her own relations. Upon this ground, the House of Lords reversed the judgment, shewing that in a case where the circumstances were infinitely slighter than that of Macgregor's, yet they were sufficient to destroy the effect of the consent to marriage.

The case of Macgregor v. Campbell is a very strong case. It appears that Captain Campbell, an officer in the army, formed a connection with a woman who was cohabiting with him, that he admitted his brother officers, and their wives, to visit her as his wife, and that she was by habit and repute received as such; but on the validity of this marriage being challenged, it appeared that this woman had actually received wages and livery meal, which is board wages according to the language of Scotland; that she displayed herself not as acting in the capacity of wife, but in that of his servant. Upon that evidence, the inference from other facts was rebutted, and it was declared that the marriage was invalid, because she continued to accept the wages which she had been in the habit of receiving antecedently. How much stronger in this case! where the party is proved to have connived at a marriage with ano-[481]-ther man, living in habits of intimacy with his alleged wife, and never stating any claim to her.

There is one branch of evidence which has escaped me, and I do not wish to omit any thing which can, either in one way or another, be deemed of importance. What I allude to, is the attempt to establish in evidence the intention of the parties to marry, as is inferred from the evidence of Mrs. Kinlay, alias Shewan. Mrs. Kinlay is first examined in the year 1819, and she tells a story that she had received from Mary Black Macneill three pieces of stuff, for the purpose of making a gown, and a piece of linen to make a shirt, in contemplation of her marriage, stating that, on that occasion, Mary Black Macneill asked Mrs. Kinlay to be a bride's maid; when pressed whether it was with a view to a marriage with Mr. Macgregor, or Mr. Jollie, she declared in the year 1819, that she could not say which. This woman is again examined in the year 1823, and some how or other, there is a great difference between the year 1819 and the year 1823: in the year 1823 it comes fresh to her mind, that it was with a view to marry Mr. Macgregor, for she then, in her evidence, states that she recollects perfectly when she heard of the marriage with Mr. Jollie, having said to Mrs. Craig, "Good God, is it possible she can be married to Mr. Jollie, when she asked me to be her bride's maid upon the occasion of her marriage to Mr. Macgregor." It is needless to comment upon the evidence of a witness who stands in such a suspicious point of view, that in point of fact she recollects distinctly in the year 1823, facts of which she knew nothing in the year 1819, reversing the order of human [482] nature with regard to recollection; but it so happens that the evidence of this woman, Mrs. Kinlay, is contradicted in other respects, because, unfortunately for her, she states that she gave that piece of linen to be made into a shirt to a woman of the name of Leslie, and Leslie states that she recollects dressing and carrying home that shirt on Saturday night; it must therefore have been with a view to the marriage of Mr. Jollie, and not with the view to the marriage of Mr. Macgregor, because you will recollect that Mr. Macgregor first formed the design of this marriage upon Monday, the 20th of May, and that the marriage, as alleged, did actually take place on the Thursday following, the 23d of May, and that there could therefore be no intervening Saturday for this shirt to be delivered.

There is another point which escaped my recollection, in going over the evidence, I mean, the details given by Mr. White, the lapidary, and Mr. Neill, the printer, brought by Mr. Macgregor with a view to shew that he, in two instances at least, subsequent to the marriage was acknowledged in the character of husband to Mary Black Macneill. Now, I confess to you, it is impossible for me to give credit to either of those witnesses; can I believe that Mr. Macgregor brought his friend Mr. Neill, in the beginning of July, to the house of Dr. Macneill, for the purpose of introducing him to his wife, and introducing him to a person as his wife, from whom he had accepted gloves on her marriage with another man? and that he introduced him to a person as his wife, of whom he had expressed his disgust, in consequence of the interview in Pelrig Street, and [483] declared a fixed and settled intention, as early as possible of divorcing her? The story is not credible, and it is totally inconsistent with the other facts proved, of his drinking her health as Mrs. Jollie, and associating with her and Mr. Jollie, they living as man and wife.

Neither can I believe the evidence of White, the lapidary: indeed the whole force of it depends on whether, at the time of uttering the words imputed to Dr. Macneill, he was looking at Mr. Macgregor, or at his daughter; if Dr. Macneill, looking at Mary Black Macneill, who was in the room at the time, said, "you will get it all by and bye," the thing is quite clear; and that is much more probable, under the circumstances of the case, than that he was directing his eyes towards Mr. Macgregor. Consider the whole detail of Dr. Macneill's conduct, when present at the marriage of Mr. Jollie. Dr. Robertson, the minister of North Leith, distinctly proved, that Dr. Macneill told him that he would take his part in giving away his daughter; that he said to Dr. Robertson, in reply to some observations of his, that he had done a great deal for the parties, and he would do more. Can you believe that this man, within two days or three days of this having taken place, went to Mr. White, the lapidary, for the purpose of declaring that Macgregor, instead of Jollie, was married to his daughter, and uttering the sentence that he is said to have uttered, with a view to express that the whole of his fortune would belong to Mr. Macgregor? or is it not more reasonable to believe that, in point of fact, all he meant to say upon that occasion was, fixing his eyes on his daughter, "It will all be yours"?

[484] On all these considerations, I must submit to your Lordships, that it is impossible you should, under the circumstances of the mode in which this summons is framed, sanction and affirm the interlocutor of the Court below, in this case; that there is no evidence, on which you can legally rely, to prove that any ceremony whatever took place on the 23rd of May; and that, at all events, the ceremony which is proved is such, taking into consideration all the conduct of the parties before and after that, in conformity with your Lordships' former decisions, it is impossible you can say it proceeded on that free, that deliberate, that real, and that immediate consent to enter into a marriage, which is the species of consent required in an irregular marriage, under the law of Scotland. With regard to the nature of the judgment, I will read at present the sketch of the judgment I am inclined to propose; but I should think it much better to delay this, for the purpose of taking some time to consider how it should be worded. I confess that I should very much wish that, in this important case on the law of marriage in Scotland, your Lordships should introduce the allegations in the summons, as well as the conclusions thereof, so as to bring before the minds of the Judges in that country the precise grounds on which you determine; and I should think it very desirable, as the Court have obviously adopted the interlocutor they have pronounced, for the purpose of declaring that an irregular marriage had taken place at Edinburgh, that your Lordships should negative that conclusion, otherwise the effect of your judgment would be, that of dismissing this action, but leaving the parties in [485] such a state that they may bring a future action, charging an irregular marriage at Edinburgh; which I am sure you would not wish, after all the litigation which has taken place. The heads of the judgment I would suggest to your Lordships are, that on due consideration of all the facts and circumstances established by the evidence in the Court below, in an action of declarator of marriage, at the instance of Malcolm Macgregor against Mary Black Macneill, by summons on the 25th of March, 1818, wherein it is set forth "that an irregular marriage was celebrated between the said Mary Black Macneill, daughter of the late Dr. James Macneill, in the spring of 1816, which was consummated by their sleeping several nights together in the same bed; and, further, that they considered it proper on their return to Edinburgh, in the month of May 1816, that no time should be lost in celebrating, in facie ecclesiae, that marriage which had been irregularly celebrated between them; and, accordingly, that they were in the month of May, 1816, regularly married by the Reverend Joseph Robertson, minister of the chapel in Leith Wynd," it appears to this House, that there is no proof whatever of any marriage between those parties having at any time taken place, or any regular marriage, in facie ecclesiae, having been celebrated at Edinburgh, in the month of May, 1816; neither does it appear to this House, taking into consideration the facts established in evidence, in relation to the conduct of the parties, both before and after the 23rd of May, 1816, and all the other facts and circumstances proved, that there is evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion [486] that the said Mary Black Macneill, and the said Malcolm Macgregor, did at that, or at any other time, voluntarily, and deliberately express that mutual consent immediately to contract marriage, which, by the law of Scotland, is necessary to give validity to an irregular marriage. That, on these grounds, this House reverses all the interlocutors complained of, and remits the cause to the Court of Session, with instructions to the Commissary Court to dismiss the action of declarator of marriage.

It would be sufficient merely to state that you assolzie the defendant, Mary Black Macneill, from all conclusions therein; but, in this case, I should prefer adopting the form to dismiss this declarator, raised at the instance of the pursuer Malcolm Macgregor, by summons, of the date of the 25th of March, 1818, absolving the Appellant, Mary Black Macneill, from the conclusions thereof, that she should be declared married to the said Malcolm Macgregor.

Lord Eldon: My Lords, if this was not one of the most important cases that has ever occurred, in the course of my experience, before any Court of judicature, I should be perfectly satisfied with what has been already stated to your Lordships, that there is sufficient ground to reverse the interlocutor of the Court of Session.

But I am anxious, for different reasons, at least to occupy a short portion of your Lordships' time; I am extremely desirous that it should appear that this judgment, at least as far as I am concerned in agreeing to it, does not proceed upon suppositions and notions, which, unless we protest against them, may be understood to be involved in the [487] effect of the judgment. When I first looked at these cases, and saw that the summons concluded with desiring that it should be found and declared not only that these parties were married, but that it should be decreed that the Appellant should return to her husband; that he should enjoy what is called, in this part of the country, a restitution of conjugal rights, I could not help feeling considerable doubt whether, supposing there ought to be a declarator of marriage, this was a case in which, at the instance of Mr. Macgregor, you would compel this woman to return to cohabitation with him. I have reason to believe that no such judgment would have been given in this part of the island; and I have further reason, from what I see of the conduct of the parties, to believe that Mr. Macgregor had no wish that any such judgment as that should be given. When I look at the process with respect to the property, I think that the principal reason for praying a declarator of marriage was, not to repossess himself of the person of the lady, but to get the enjoyment of that property, to which he would insist, as the husband of his wife, he might have some claim. I desire, therefore, that it may be understood, if we are to consider this, as I believe it to be, an appeal from an interlocutory judgment of the Court of Session, brought under the authority of an act of Parliament, in consequence of a difference of opinion amongst the judges, that your Lordships will be pleased to allow the individual, who has now the honour of addressing you, to say, that he does not admit; (he does not deny, because it would be improper that he should either admit or deny) that he [488] desires to be understood as standing quite neutral upon the question, whether this lady ever could be decreed to return to the embraces of Mr. Macgregor.

My Lords, there is another point upon which I am exceedingly anxious to be perfectly distinct, and that is this: that when you are once satisfied that, according to the law of Scotland, there has been actually a marriage between A. and B., no subsequent conduct is to be received in evidence, in order to entitle you to say that that marriage which has been actually had, and actually celebrated effectually, is to be undone. If it be a regular marriage, actually celebrated, and completely contracted, it is not to be undone upon probabilities arising out of subsequent acts and circumstances. On the other hand, notwithstanding what has been said about these Scotch marriages, that they are very easily formed, and very easily got rid of, I take it that there is nothing that the law of Scotland more clearly, more solemnly, or more consistently insists upon than this, that where a marriage is alleged to have been had, by a promise per verba de presenti, or by a promise per verba futuro, or by virtue of the implied promise, that arises out of cohabitation, habit, and repute, there is nothing it does so solemnly require, as that the consent to marry should have been full, deliberate, and free; that it should neither be the effect of force or fraud.

I desire also to give no opinion upon the question at present, for it is not before the House, though it is a question of very great consequence in my judgment, namely, whether you can, or cannot, there having been a regular [489] marriage in facie ecclesiae, give evidence whether the marriage intended to be had was effectually had. Upon that I desire to express no opinion whatever, upon which some cases are found in the prints upon the table.

I am therefore exceedingly anxious, in this very important case, to press upon your Lordships' attention, this, as what I take to be an indisputable proposition in law, namely, that if you find there was a marriage duly celebrated, actually had, that marriage cannot be got rid of by evidence of facts and circumstances done, or observed by persons afterwards, thinking it proper to disentangle themselves from the connection of marriage, actuated by caprice or dislike of each other, or a base motive of inducing other persons to think that they may form matrimonial connections with the parties. When once you have got clearly to the conclusion that a marriage has been had, that marriage must be sustained, let the consequences be what they may of sustaining it with respect to third persons. Therefore the question now before your Lordships is really this: was the ceremony that did take, or is alleged to have taken, place at Joseph Robertson's, upon the 23d of May, was it a mere ceremony gone through? or was it, on the other hand, an actual constitution of marriage? If it was an actual constitution of marriage, I am afraid we must consider it to be an actual constitution of marriage; you cannot undo it by reasoning upon circumstances, which may have great weight upon your minds, leading you, however, deeply to lament that any such thing had taken place.

I would beg to add here, that, in giving my [490] humble opinion upon this case, I feel myself fortified by what I have been desired to state, that, upon a very anxious attention to this case, a noble relative of mine, who long held the situation of Judge in the Ecclesiastical Court of this country, gives his full assent to its being stated to your Lordships, that he could not possibly sustain this marriage.

Having said thus much, I am led to revert now to the consideration of the substance of this summons. I hope I may be excused, taking into consideration that I had the honour of sitting in an important judicial seat, the most important judicial seat, in this House, for nearly twenty-five years, if I take the liberty to repeat, perhaps for the last time, that which I have often before stated, that I do most anxiously wish, whilst on the one hand no man has been more desirous than I have been, whatever may have been said to the contrary, that questions arising upon the law of Scotland, should be decided here upon the grounds and principles of that law, and that we should not govern ourselves by English principles, or the application of English law, where it cannot be applied consistently with the principles of the law of Scotland, I say I trust I may be excused, if I express my anxiety, for the sake of the judicature of that country, that their pleadings may be somewhat more accurately attended to, than they usually are. I have been very much struck with the extraordinary nature of the present summons from the first, and also upon the intermediate consideration of this case, and upon the present consideration of this case. Taking the summons to be what we call the [491] declaration of the party, the Pursuer, it is next to impossible for any man to reconcile what he is pleased to state in the summons, with what the real nature of the case is, as he has since made it out, by the proofs he has offered to you, in order to induce you to discern in his favour.

I shall not trouble your Lordships, by repeating what has been very accurately stated already upon the subject of the connection, (not the relationship, but the connection,) that subsisted between these different parties, before the occurrences, which form the subject of your Lordships' consideration, took place. I begin, therefore, by adverting to the journey to Holytown, in the spring of 1816, and let it be remarked that, unless I have deceived myself, upon looking at this evidence, or by looking at it too often, which is sometimes the case; let it be remarked that, before the journey to Holytown, it seems to have been pretty well known to Mr. Macgregor that Mr. Jollie was a suitor to this lady; and not only a suitor to this lady, but Mr. Macgregor seems to have felt that Mr. Jollie was preferred by the lady to himself. Mr. Macgregor, and Dr. James Macneill, who, let it be observed, was a clergyman, as well as a medical man, go, according to the summons, to Holytown in the spring of 1816 on a jaunt, in company with the Appellant, natural daughter of Dr. James Macneill, where an irregular marriage between them is alleged to have been celebrated by Dr. James Macneill; an irregular marriage is alleged to have been celebrated, and the marriage to have been consummated by their spending several nights together in the same bed, at Holytown aforesaid. If [492] you come to look at the condescendence, that important circumstance, of sleeping in the same bed, is softened down to something of this nature, to its being stated that they slept in the same room; and the actual fact is disguised, both in the summons, and in the condescendence, that fact which has been spoken to by Mary Hastie, a servant in the house, and who represents thus—but before I state what her representation is, give me leave to say, that this matter of consummation, that is alleged to have happened at Holytown, was capable of proof, and might have made an end of the whole matter; but instead of there being any such proof, all the proof that there is, the great weight of evidence, as far as relates to it, is the testimony given by Mary Hastie, which goes directly the other way. If it had been true, that Dr. Macneill, a clergyman, married these parties; if there was mutual consent on both sides, and Dr. Macneill, the father of the lady, a clergyman, gave the benediction, and put their hands together, in the manner that is stated in the condescendence; if that had been true, what difficulty was it likely there should be, (unless Scotchmen differ from Englishmen) in their going into the same bed? There would have been consummation quite of consequence; it would have been the natural consequence, and nothing else could have happened.

Now what Mary Hastie says upon that is, (and if consummation, which, with respect to this marriage, you observe, is stated in the summons, had taken place, it was impossible that Mary Hastie's evidence can be true; but there is nothing to contradict it)—What she states is this: that it [493] happened unfortunately, in this Scotch inn, that there were not beds enough, or rather, not rooms enough for three persons to have separate rooms, there being two beds in one room, and one bed in another; and the Doctor having taken care of himself, by going to bed first, a difficulty arose what was to be done. It seems a difficulty existed in the actual circumstances, viz. that the bride and bridegroom, as the summons represents them, could only find out one room with two beds in it. I think they would, in all probability, have been satisfied with one bed, if they had been married at that time, as it has been alleged; at least I should suppose so. But an arrangement is made in a very curious way, and, as far as we have any evidence, instead of there being consummation, we must hold there was no consummation, because Mary Hastie says, that the lady was disturbed at sleeping in the same room with her newly acquired husband; that he slept in one bed, and she went to another bed; but she had just so much delicacy, which I am very glad to see among our neighbours in the north country, that she would not go to that bed, unless it was surrounded by sheets, so that even her husband could not set the eyes of his affection upon her. They accordingly slept in separate beds the whole night, and instead of any body being called to prove those circumstances which would have been undoubtedly proved to establish consummation, if it had taken place, the whole evidence tends directly the other way.

What is done next? The parties return to Edinburgh upon the 20th of May, in the same year, 1816, and this ceremony at Holytown hav[494]-ing been thought very irregular, (though Dr. Macneill was a clergyman,) and no consummation of the marriage having taken place, it was thought there should be some regular marriage, so the summons states it, or rather that the marriage at Holytown should be regularly celebrated at Edinburgh. This marriage at Holytown is in the summons considered as an irregular marriage, and in the proceedings no proof is made of it. If this was an irregular marriage, the defect of proof of which was to be supplied by another ceremony of marriage at Edinburgh; if that marriage at Holytown, as the summons states it, was to be regularly celebrated at Edinburgh; if this celebration was to be free from all objection, Macgregor proceeds in the most uncommon course that, in affairs of this kind, one has ever heard of. See how it is carried on: on the 20th they get to Edinburgh. Here I may as well state that a regular marriage in Scotland is, as I understand it, a marriage after publication of banns has taken place three times. In Erskine's Institutes, he gives a very good reason for that: he says, that the banns must be proclaimed three times in the church, because it gives people time to consider whether, by the third Sunday they will or not consent; but Mr. Macgregor thinks that the right way of getting rid of the difficulties that belong to that irregular marriage, and that private marriage, at Holytown, is—to do what?—that the right way is, upon the 23rd, to procure, or to endeavour to procure, a certificate of the publication of banns, as having taken place upon three Sundays, which could not possibly have taken place, because between the 20th and 23rd no [495] Sunday whatever could have intervened; and then he thinks it proper to apply him self to Mr. Smith, stating that he means to be married that night; Mr. Smith mentions it to his clerk, and some persons connected with him, and they have a direction given them where to attend upon that night. Mr. Smith himself could not go; the clerk, I think, does go, according to the direction, to the Black Bull, and he finds nobody there. But this ceremony of marriage is had in the evening late: there is a difference about the time of night, Mrs. Robertson saying there was a candle, and Miss Robertson saying there was no candle; but for the purpose of having a public, indisputable, regular marriage celebrated before Joseph Robertson, there were Mrs. and Miss Robertson present at the ceremony, which, I suppose, could not have been made any better, by his being a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, than the marriage by Dr. Macneill himself, he being also a clergyman of the Church of Scotland. A ceremony passes at the time of night spoken to by Mrs. Robertson and Miss Robertson, and that is the only evidence, unless it is supposed to be evidenced by the book, the contents of which are inconsistent with some other parts of the evidence; a book, with reference to which I have wished to hear, but I have not heard yet, what made such a book as that producible in evidence; it may however be so. I know why a register in England is admitted in evidence—because it is kept as the law requires it to be kept. The law requires that there should be such a register kept, in a particular manner and form; but whether a private book, kept by a private clergyman, not in such manner [496] and form, not under and according to the authority of the law, would be evidence in England, is a question which could scarcely bear to be agitated.

Now I will not follow my noble and learned friend, if I may take the liberty to call him so, through all his statement of this case, because upon such a subject as this, he is much more competent to speak than I am: and I am happy to acknowledge, at this time of my life, the benefit I have received from his communications with me upon the Scotch law. I will not follow him in discussing the effect of the evidence of Mrs. and Miss Robertson, as to its being, or not being, defective in the respects in which he has contended that it is defective. After observing that I wish not to be understood to have conceded it to be clear, that a cause of this sort should go on without other parties to it, or that there is not great danger in admitting a marriage, certainly unobjectionable in form and circumstances, such as the marriage with Mr. Jollie, to be affected by the admission of the woman, who is represented to be a party in both marriages, I proceed here to say, that, notwithstanding all the difficulties that rest upon the testimony of Mrs. Robertson, and Miss Robertson, I must look at this case, as a case in which the woman's admission has been read and used as evidence; and whatever observation may be made upon the evidence of Mrs. Robertson, as not sufficient to prove the identity of the parties, or the particulars of the ceremony, in her admission this lady herself has made an acknowledgment that some ceremony of some sort took place at the house, where she and Macgregor were pre-[497]-sent. But then you must take the whole of her admission together, and taking the whole of her admission together, the question turns round again to be this—Can you, or can you not, admit evidence of facts antecedent to that period? Can you, or can you not, admit evidence of facts and circumstances subsequent to that period, with a view to aid and confirm her in her admission, taking it altogether, in which she represents that what then passed, was not a case in which she can be held to have given consent, much less that free, solemn, full, and deliberate consent, upon which Macgregor claims, as against her, the character of husband?

Now, my Lords, that you may, with respect to what are called irregular marriages in Scotland, look at prior facts and circumstances, and that you may look at the subsequent facts and circumstances, I take to be quite indisputable. The next question, therefore, is—Can you look at such facts and circumstances, with respect to an alleged marriage, such as is represented to have been had in this case? Can you look at them as evidence to enable you judicially to determine whether there has been effectually had, a marriage?

With respect to irregular marriages generally, there can be no doubt at all, looking at the text writers; there can be no doubt if you examine the opinions of the Scotch lawyers, which are to be found annexed to the case of Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, and I take it that the opinions of the Scotch lawyers would be evidence of what is Scotch law. We have the illustrious names which are there mentioned, to which I may generally [498] refer your Lordships: we have the illustrious names of Erskine, Craigie, Hamilton, Hume, Dr. Hay, and a gentleman whom I shall call by the name of John Clerk, for fear you should think I am mentioning myself, and Cathcart, and Gillies, and Sir Islay Campbell.

Then the next question is—Is this alleged marriage such as is to be looked at by the application of the same rules of law that apply to the marriages mentioned in the books as irregular marriages? I find in these papers that doctrine of the same nature has been applied, in two or three cases even of regular marriages.

I have already desired to protect myself against its being understood that I give any opinion, whether it can or not be applied to what is strictly called a regular marriage in facie ecclesiae; but if there have been decisions that apply them to regular marriages in facie ecclesiae, surely there can be no difficulty in applying them to a marriage that is not a regular marriage; and then comes the question, is this a regular marriage?

Now the authority of the text writers, holds this not to be a regular marriage, because they say it must be a marriage with proclamation of banns; here there could be no proclamation of banns. My Lords, I cannot adopt that expression, without guarding against its being understood that I mean to intimate that, if there is an irregular marriage without proclamation of banns, but where there has been a full, actual, deliberate consent given, that any subsequent circumstances will authorise you to say, that that irregular marriage can be represented in any way as invalid. I do not mean to call in question at all the [499] validity of such marriages, God forbid I should, but if you have defective evidence with respect to the actual proof of a deliberate, clear, and solemn consent in the transaction of the ceremony, the question then is, whether you may not admit evidence with respect to the species of marriage, as an irregular marriage, such as you will admit with respect to other marriages that are acknowledged to be irregular marriages? and seeing that it is constantly admitted in irregular marriages, it does appear to me, I own, in this case, admissible evidence.

The next question will be, if it is admissible evidence, what is the effect of it? Now undoubtedly, with reference to that, I must say, with these eminent men whose names I have mentioned, that though there may be, with respect to a great many cases, doubts whether those decisions are just applications of the evidence, upon the effect of which the decisions have been made, that does not affect the principle at all of the admissibility of the evidence, and the duty of the court to attend to the full effect of the evidence, according to the best of its judgment, when that evidence is offered to its consideration.

With respect to cases of marriage, where the young man is fourteen and the young lady twelve, these are cases, in which perhaps more effect has been given to the supposed operation of deceit and fraud upon such persons than perhaps can be fully justified, recollecting that the law has said, that at those ages they are perfectly capable of giving full, and deliberate, and sufficient consent, though some allowance must be made for the difference of discretion between [500] twenty-one and fourteen, yet, with respect to this particular contract, the law, strictly speaking, has held them equally capable as older persons of giving their consent. With respect to all the cases, to which I am now alluding, both with respect to those very young persons, and with respect to other persons, in those cases that have fallen under the consideration of the Courts, it does appear to me one matter is worthy of great consideration, viz. what is the effect of all that passed with respect to the question, was free, deliberate, full, and solemn consent given at the time when the ceremony passed? or did the ceremony pass without that which constitutes a marriage, such a consent to the consortium omnis vitæ at the time of the ceremony?

Now, my Lords, if that be so, let us look and see what the case is with respect to the conduct of the parties. I think it is sufficiently proved in this case, that before the parties went to Holytown, Mr. Macgregor was fully acquainted with the circumstance that Mr. Jollie was a preferable candidate. There is, in my judgment, no proof of the truth of that assertion, which is to be found in this summons, that a marriage ceremony took place at Holytown, or that a marriage there was consummated; but I go further than that, because I think myself judicially authorized to say, that the allegation, with respect to that supposed marriage at Holytown, is utterly unfounded, that there was no marriage there of any kind—that none was there consummated.

When the parties come back again to Edinburgh, what is done, for the purpose alleged in this summons, of having a regular marriage? for the purpose of having a public regular marriage, a public marriage in order to cure all the evils and inconveniences that might arise from a private irregular marriage, that is so alleged to have taken place at Holytown, they go to Mr. Joseph Robertson's. If such was the purpose, how does it happen that you can scarcely find any thing in this evidence, (I do not say there is absolutely nothing, but there is nothing that I think you can call material or substantial, when thoroughly examined with all the proofs) by which it appears, that Dr. Macneill, that any friends of the family, that any persons who visited, that any persons who had any intercourse with the family, had ever heard of such a thing as that this marriage was intended, and that it was to give regularity and publicity to the former marriage.

My Lords, we know very well what happens in England about such things. If parties have gone to Scotland and got married, and are to be married again in England, does not every man know, that under such circumstances, the purpose of having the marriage is to satisfy all the friends and connections, as well as the parties themselves, that the holy estate of matrimony has been effectually and properly contracted. That is one of the purposes, as well as the purpose of giving ease and happiness to the minds of the parties themselves; and I believe it would be thought a very extraordinary thing, if a marriage for that purpose was to be had here without any body in the world having previously heard of it. Joseph Robertson, the priest, and his wife and daughter, are the only persons who know of this ceremony of marriage, except the individual parties to it. [502] Can any man suppose, if Dr. Macneill had, according to the allegations of this summons, at Holytown given away his daughter in marriage, had put her hand into the hand of this gentleman as her husband, and given the priest's benediction upon that occasion, that Dr. Macneill, between the day on which that marriage happened at Holytown and the 23d of the month of May, should have become so weak and impotent in point of understanding, or so dreadfully addicted to drinking, that they would not let him know any thing at all of the matter? there is no proof that he knew any thing at all of this matter. Can any body believe that, if Dr. Macneill had conducted himself at Holytown in the way stated in this summons, can any man believe that Dr. Macneill would not have been present at this marriage, if such a marriage was to be had? but not only do you find that Dr. Macneill did not know of it, but, bating the evidence of the application to Smith, and Smith's communication to his clerk generally, and the reference of Smith and his clerk to the Black Bull inn, (your Lordships know what followed on that communication and reference) no human being seems to be acquainted with this intended marriage previously to the ceremony, but the very individual who ought to have known nothing of it, if it was intended to be a satisfactory celebration of marriage. I mean the man who appears to have been a disgrace to his profession. Of Mrs. and Miss Robertson I say nothing, but I am sure no person, meaning to celebrate a regular marriage, in order to support an irregular marriage, would think of being married at that time of night, in the house of such a [503] man as Joseph Robertson, with no witnesses but these ladies, and not only with no other witnesses, but without a single person out of the room where this ceremony of marriage was performed, being acquainted with the matter that was to take place, or with the purpose for which they were supposed to go there, and having it in their power to attend.

Then what says the summons in another respect? Those, who know any thing of the law of Scotland, know the immense importance of the allegation of, and proof of consummation. It is not even alleged in this summons that this marriage was consummated; but I can conceive a reason for not alleging it, for I am satisfied it was not consummated.

My Lords, I agree in this, that the story Mrs. Jollie states, is improbable; but, is it half so improbable as the story that Mr. Macgregor states? Can any body doubt that, if this was meant to be a regular marriage, in order to do away the objections against an irregular marriage, can any body doubt that there would have been proofs of consummation, when Mr. Macgregor must have known there were,—at least I think there were proofs of the non-consummation at Holytown! Can any body doubt you would have had such proof by the servants in the house of Dr. Macneill? But there is not the least evidence that deserves the name of an attempt to prove consummation at Edinburgh; and, allow me to say, there is evidence to the contrary. When you come to consider the conduct of Mr. Macgregor with respect to Mr. Jollie, (and here let me notice that unless I misunderstand this evidence, it does not [504] appear that Mr. Jollie was ever acquainted with what passed before Joseph Robertson at this strange place; it does not appear that Mr. Jollie had ever been acquainted that Mr. Macgregor was the husband of this lady. I do not find any evidence of that, if there is any evidence of it, I have passed it by.)

Lord Chancellor: No, there is not any.

Lord Eldon: When you come to consider that after this, Mr. Jollie is united to this lady, upon the 13th of June, I think it is, in the subsequent month, and when it is proved that Dr. Macneill, who is said by this summons to have given his consent to the marriage, and performed the ceremony of marriage himself at Holytown, when you consider that he is present, goes to Dr. James Robertson's, that he goes there, and conducts himself in the deliberate, solemn, serious manner, in which Dr. Robertson states his conduct to have been regulated, whilst he gives away his daughter to Mr. Jollie; when you consider further, that there has been an attempt made to prove, (let those believe it who can, after having read the evidence of Dr. Robertson, and of his lady) that this Dr. Macneill was in a state of such imbecility, either from drunkenness, or a failure in his constitution, or some other cause, between the journey to Holytown, and this marriage, upon the 13th of June, I say, that the evidence in my judgment, which goes to impute to Dr. Macneill (in order to render inefficacious the evidence on the other side as to the state of Dr. Macneill) that imbecility, from whatever cause it arose, that evidence I say must have been brought for the purpose of destroying the effect, the dreaded [505] effect of the important inferences to be drawn from his attendance on the marriage of the 13th of June, and his non-attendance upon the other, on the 23rd of May. The attempt to prove that imbecility, in my judgment, wholly fails; I should have thought myself bound by judicial oath, if I had been trying this before a jury, to have told them they ought to give no credit to that testimony.

My Lords, it does not rest there; so far from Mr. Macgregor supposing he had a right to the person of this lady, I find in the evidence that it is usual to give the friends, upon a Scotch marriage, gloves, that is the present that is made to them, and Mr. Macgregor receives a present of gloves, as a friend and well wisher to the parties who had just been married: he does not attend, I believe at the wedding dinner, but he very frequently afterwards is to be found as a guest in the house of the parties; and when we come to the month of October, in the year 1816, these parties go to Holytown again, and the Doctor goes too. He was so far recovered from this imbecile state, in which it was attempted to be proved that he was at the time of the marriage, in June, 1816, he had so far recovered from his malady as to be able to go there again. Mr. Jollie and Mrs. Jollie, and Mr. Macgregor and the Doctor, form the party; and here let us see whether we can come exactly to the conclusion that parties are sleeping in the same bed, because they are sleeping in the same room, as in the antecedent spring. What is the conduct of Mr. Macgregor? Who is now to convince us that there was a real marriage, with full, free, and de [506] liberate consent given upon the 23rd of May, 1816? he is at Holytown along with the parties. What are the beds required? Doctor Macneill is there, and has a bed to himself; another is required for Mr. and Mrs. Jollie; and Mr. Macgregor contents himself with a bed for himself, as I understand the evidence. Let me fairly say that Mary Hastie does not say expressly that Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, slept together in the same bed, but, she says, she gave them a bed, because a bed was asked for, for Mr. and Mrs. Jollie. According to the first marriage at Holytown, Mr. Macgregor and his lady, as she must be supposed then to be, according to his case, lie in different beds, when there could be no reason in the world why they should not follow the good advice of Dr. Macneill, for he must be taken so to advise if he had married them, by getting into the same bed; and then, after it is supposed she had been deliberately married to Mr. Macgregor, having taken a fancy to be married to Mr. Jollie, when they meet in October, 1816, Mr. Macgregor then does not sleep in one bed and she in another, but, according to all, that is the probable effect of this evidence. Mr. Macgregor sleeps in one bed, and Mr. and Mrs. Jollie in another; and that is to be taken in Scotland, which would not in England be taken to be proof of a deliberate consent, that Mr. Macgregor should be the husband of the lady and not Mr. Jollie.

My Lords, I will call your attention to another circumstance, Mr. Macgregor had been in some measure, or sort, employed as the man of business of Dr. Macneill. Dr. Macneill had made a provision for his daughter, this Mrs. Jollie, or [507] Mrs. Macgregor, according as your Lordships shall determine her to be, the one or the other, he had given her not the whole of his substance in the first instance; however, from a sense of duty to his natural child, he seems to have thought it was necessary to give her the whole of his substance, and he gives it her by deed. Those deeds were put into the possession of Mr. Macgregor, as I understand the case, and Mr. Macgregor might naturally enough think, that if he was to tell this story to Dr. Macneill, about this lady having first married him, with his consent at Holytown, and then married him again at Edinburgh, for the purpose of having no doubt left upon the effect of the Holytown marriage: and that she had then married Mr. Jollie afterwards, and in the Doctor's own presence, and given away by him, he might perhaps think that all the Doctor's good intentions, in favour of this lady, might be frustrated, if he told the Doctor of these most improper transactions on the part of his daughter, as they must be admitted to be, if Mr. Macgregor represents what were really the facts of the case. He is silent, as it is alleged, for some such reason until Dr. Macneill died. But, speaking the truth after a man is dead, will not enable him to act as if he was a living man. When, therefore, the Doctor was dead, does Macgregor claim his wife? No! he attends the funeral, where Mr. Jollie acts as chief mourner, and not Mr. Macgregor; after the funeral the deeds are called for, he delivers them himself; he is as a visitor of Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, as other friends visit Mr. and Mrs. Jollie, for some time; and he says nothing about this marriage, till about the [508] month of December, 1817. Then, in that December, 1817, my Lords, he makes a claim of marriage: it has escaped me if the proofs establish an earlier claim. Permit me, my Lords, to say that, when I first read this case, I thought it a case so disgusting, with respect to the moral conduct of the Respondent, that nothing upon earth would have induced me to give my opinion upon it, whilst I was under those impressions. I therefore made a covenant with myself that no detestation of the conduct of this gentleman should influence my judicial mind; I trust and hope that it has not. I have nothing to do with the case, except merely as to the law of the case, as it applies to the established facts. My Lords, what he then does, is to state that he has a claim of marriage; and your Lordships know the nature of his claim, and he then lodges his summons, for the purpose of having a declarator of marriage, according to the prayer of the summons, that this virtuous lady, as he must think her, might be restored to his arms, that she might live happily with Mr. Macgregor, as Mrs. Jollie, or Mrs. Macgregor. But this claim is not brought forward till after those circumstances had taken place. Notwithstanding all that, it is your Lordships' duty, if, under these circumstances, you can believe that there really was a marriage constituted effectually, constituted upon the 23d of May; it is your duty, notwithstanding all that, to say she must be restored to his arms; whether you ever will restore her to his arms I do not know, but I do not think your Lordships will readily make yourselves a party to that sort of business.

[509] My Lords, my judgment with respect to this declarator goes upon this, that, regard being had to the nature of the evidence which you have, it appears to me there is no reason to believe that there was a free, deliberate, full, voluntary, solemn consent given, to constitute immediately the relation in law of man and wife, at the house of the priest Robertson: that there is no reason, from the proof, to believe that there was consummation. The circumstances go to shew there was no such consent: they are evidence that the marriage was not understood by this gentleman himself to be a binding and valid marriage. This appears clear from his conduct subsequent to it, as well as from his conduct prior to it: the whole tends to show no such consent was given, and although her story is improbable, it is not half so improbable as his story.

Under all the circumstances, admitting as I do the extreme danger that attends all questions about the dissolution of supposed marriages: looking, on the other hand, to it as a most important principle, that you should see that the most sacred relation of life is formed deliberately and fairly: upon the whole, I think the decision you ought to come to, (in all these cases you cannot, perhaps, be quite safe, all that you can do, is to be satisfied, when you pronounce judgment, that you are pronouncing the real effect of the proofs,) the best decision, in my opinion, is that which should lead you to reverse this interlocutor of declarator of marriage.

I will again repeat, that if this declarator of marriage should be supported, I still should entertain very considerable doubts indeed, whe[510]-ther, regard being had to all the circumstances of this case, the Court of Session ought to have been permitted to proceed one step further, for the purpose of the ulterior object of this summons, without considering the point, whether, under such circumstances, they would, or would not, decern a restitution of conjugal rights. As to the fact of the alleged marriage itself, my opinion goes along with that which has been expressed by the noble Lord who has addressed the House, subject nevertheless to some consideration of the terms in which the judgment should be expressed, because nothing can be of greater importance, than that you should take care that, by the terms of the judgment, you do not prejudice any future case. I would, therefore, with your Lordships' permission, submit to you, that you should take some time to consider in what terms the judgment should be expressed; but, with respect to the substance, that this declarator of marriage ought not to be supported, I perfectly agree with my noble friend who has preceded me.

Upon another subsequent day, Lord Eldon said—My Lords, it has occurred to me, since I before addressed your Lordships, that I omitted to notice the evidence of the lapidary, White, and that of a witness of the name of Neill. I shall only now say, that after repeatedly considering the effect of the testimony of both those witnesses, and the effect of the observations contained in the different printed memorials and cases, in support of, and against their testimony, that testimony might render inaccurate some few expressions, to be found in what I had before the honor of stating [511] to your Lordships upon this case, yet that testimony does not, in any degree, in my judgment, authorise any change of opinion—that this reversal should take place.

Upon due consideration of all the proceedings in this action of declarator of marriage, at the instance of Malcolm Macgregor against Mary Black Macneill, particularly of the summons, dated 25th March, 1818, wherein the allegations set forth are—"That an irregular marriage was celebrated between the said Malcolm Macgregor and the said Mary Black Macneill, by Dr. Macneill, at Holytown, in spring, 1816, which was consummated by their spending several nights together in the same bed; and that they considered it proper on their return to Edinburgh, in the month of May, 1816, that no time should be lost in celebrating, in facie ecclesiæ, that marriage which had been irregularly celebrated between them; and, accordingly they were, in the month of May, 1816, regularly married by the Rev. Joseph Robertson, minister of the chapel in Leith Wynd, Edinburgh;" and upon examination of what has been established by evidence in the Courts below, with reference to the facts alleged in the said summons, this House is of opinion that there is no proof whatever of any marriage between these parties having at any time taken place at Holytown, or of any regular marriage, in facie ecclesiæ, having been celebrated between them at Edinburgh, in the month of May, 1816. And further, this House, taking into consideration all the facts and circumstances proved in relation to [512] the conduct of the parties, both before and after the 23d of May, 1816, is of opinion that there is not evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion, that the said Mary Black Macneill, and the said Malcolm Macgregor, did on the 23d of May, 1816, or at any other time, voluntarily and deliberately express that real mutual consent immediately to contract marriage, which, by the law of Scotland, is necessary to give validity to such an irregular marriage, as is alleged to have taken place. It is therefore ordered and adjudged, by the Lords spiritual and temporal, in Parliament assembled, that the said several interlocutors, complained of in the said appeal, be, and the same are hereby reversed; and that the farther proceeding in this action be, and the same is hereby remitted to the Court of Session, with instructions to give directions to the Commissary Court to dismiss the declarator of marriage raised at the instance of the said Malcolm Macgregor, by summons of date 25th of March, 1818, and to assolzie the defender, the said Mary Black Macneill, from all the conclusions thereof. And this House having so ordered and adjudged, doth not think it necessary to determine upon what has been submitted to its consideration, viz. Whether the several interlocutors, herein before mentioned, could have been deemed duly pronounced, in proceedings to which Robert Jollie, and the children of the defender, Mary Black Macneill were not parties?

[513] The principal topics of argument in support of the judgment in the Court below, are comprised in the following speeches of the Lord President, on advising the case in the Court of Session.

Lord President: This is a most distressing case. I shudder at the consequences of touching what may be considered a solemn marriage. Regular celebration is a matter of order, which, by removing doubts, gives certainty to consent. No woman of twenty-six years of age can doubt the purpose for which she goes before a minister, if she is not an idiot: and idiots are not capable of consent. I have great delicacy in touching a marriage so celebrated. It is said here, that the pursuer wishes the marriage declared, for the purpose of bringing a divorce; but if Mr. Macgregor makes her his wife, he can never get a divorce. Instantaneous repentance, after deliberate consent, will not dissolve a marriage. If such was the case, there would have been many instances in point. Look at the case of Mac Adam (D. P. May, 1813, MSS.). He was married at breakfast time. In the afternoon he blew out his brains. Here it was wished to dissolve the marriage, but the House of Lords would not hear of it. This might have been a rash marriage, but it was a regular one. I cannot believe there was concussion. If such existed, she would have shewn it. Macnaughton's evidence does not prove it. But from circumstances posterior to the marriage, Macgregor does not seem to believe he was married. It is a new case, and should be farther investigated, particularly as to Dr. Macneill's presence at Mr. Jollie's marriage. It is said, that the doctor not only consented to Macgregor's marriage, [514] but that he knew it had taken place. If so, he was the most criminal of all, to connive at Mr. Jollie's marriage. I should wish to be of the opinion of Lords Hermand and Balgray, for the sake of the children: but even if the first marriage should be adopted, the bona fides of Mr. Jollie, in contracting the second, would perhaps protect them, although it would not do so on the other side of the water. I recollect something similar happened in Mr. Riddell's case (reported by Bell), but the child died before a decision. I had, however, then spoken to the late Lord Meadowbank on the subject, who concurred with me, in thinking that the child must be held to be legitimate. I am for remitting to the Commissaries, to take further proof upon every circumstance which can bear upon the case.

(11 June, 1825.) Lord President (after the remit): I wish very much I could have taken the same view as my brother, considering that there are children of this marriage, and considering also, that Mr. Jollie seems to be the only person against whom there can be no reproach. As to both of the other parties their conduct is shameful.

There is no objection to Mr. Jollie's marriage: every thing was regularly and solemnly conducted, and there can be no doubt it would be a good marriage if it had not been vitiated by a previous marriage, but that is the question: And therefore, what does the Pursuer say as to Mr. Jollie's marriage, which did not take place till the 14th of June? that on the 23d May preceding he was married by the Reverend Joseph Robertson; Mr. Robertson was at that time an ordained minister of the gospel, and was entitled by the law of the church and state to marry. The Pur-[515]-suer produced marriage lines from the session clerk of Edinburgh, and the witnesses to the marriage were Mrs. Robertson, and her daughter. No doubt there might have been a deficiency in the evidence, for, although both the wife and the daughter recollect a marriage, they might have been mistaken about the lady: but unfortunately, that is supplied by the lady herself, for the Defender acknowledges it. It is true Mr. Joseph Robertson may have turned out not so respectable a character, but as to his capability of celebrating a marriage he was just as fit as the other. The parties were thus married in facie ecclesie, in both the marriages, but in both of them without actual proclamation of banns: neither of them were regular; the one was just as irregular as the other.

But the Defender says she was forced into the first marriage: that no consent was given by her; that no consummation followed, and that the Pursuer knew she was engaged to Mr. Jollie. All this may be true; but has she proved either deceit, threats, or force? Is there the slightest evidence of it? She says the Pursuer asked her in the evening to go to Mr. Bridges, that he had led her to Mr. Robertson's, and, under threats of burning the settlements, and murdering Mr. Jollie, he frightened her to go in. There is no evidence of all this; where did it happen? Was it on the height of Lammermuir, where she could get no assistance? No, this took place in a summer evening, in the end of the month of May. When there was good day light, she is led through the streets of Edinburgh under threats of burning her father's deeds, and murdering her sweetheart: [516] was there no person near to protect her and take her part? Surely, when she got into Mr. Robertson's house she was under protection: she could at least have told him of the threats that had been used against her, and desired him to send for a constable; but she says nothing: she does not even object to the ceremony; she is no child at the time; she was twenty-six years of age. There is no evidence of all this alleged force and threats, and, to me, it is quite incredible, that all this could have taken place in day light in a summer evening and in the streets of Edinburgh.

Then, what happens afterwards: they walked home together; they sleep at least in the same house together. It is true there is no evidence that consummation did take place, and you will presume it the more that this lady slept in the same room with him only a few days before. It would have been more suitable if, on that occasion, she had slept in the same room with her father; there might have been some indecency in this, but at least there would have been no impropriety, and where there was such a scarcity of rooms, it would have been more proper that she had slept in the room with her father, instead of that of a stranger; therefore, I cannot take it off her hands that there was no consummation, but at all events they walked home together arm in arm.

No doubt it is true that both parties seem afterwards to have repented of the marriage, but repentance however soon it follows consent will not do. In one case there was the most tremendous symptoms of repentance in the case of McAdam. In that case there was only an acknowledgment before servants, much less solemn than in the [517] presence of a clergyman, as to which no person in their senses could doubt of the object in view, no mortal can be mistaken; but in that case it was found both in this Court and the House of Lords, that the most instantaneous repentance could not undo the marriage. Therefore the repentance of the first marriage, and the consent to the second, will not do.

I will not say and I have no occasion to say that the consent before a clergyman is to be held as propatio probata. But this I will say, that there is no case where the consent before a clergyman was found not to constitute a marriage, except these two cases of the children, where they did not come before the clergyman for the purpose of being married, but where when the mother was out of the room the marriage was performed, and the girl was taken away by the mother before it was published, so that there was no consummation.

The only thing at all corroborative of the Defender's story, is the fact, that he was possessed of Doctor Macneill's settlements; but then his answer is just as good, that it was in consequence of the marriage that the Doctor gave him possession of them. And then there is another incomprehensible part of the story, that is, what took place at Mr. White's, the lapidary. Dr. Macneill was present on that occasion, and Mr. White drank to his daughter's health as Mrs. Macgregor, and no objections are stated. Then something took place about presents, upon which the Doctor said to Mr. Macgregor, "It will all be your's"; which corroborates the story, not only of their being married, but of his knowing of, and being entrusted with the settlements.

[518] The only thing that would have weighed, and weighed strongly, in my mind, if this first marriage had been constituted in any other way than in facie ecclesiae, for you will observe that all the clergymen say, that they never saw a case where the marriage lines were not delivered to the lady, but Joseph Robertson gave the marriage lines on this occasion to Macgregor himself. The object of giving the lines to the lady is, that she may have the proof of the marriage in her own possession, and in that case there can be no want of evidence of consent; but in this case it was of less consequence, because the lady could have recourse to the evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Robertson, and their daughter. In this case, the evidence is completely supplied.

There can be no doubt that the Pursuer's conduct is most extraordinary, and most unjustifiable. He saw what was going on with Mr. Jollie; he delivered up the title deeds to him; he allowed Mr. Jollie to act as chief mourner at Dr. Macneill's funeral; he went to church with Mr. and Mrs. Jollie; he sat in the same pew with them. In short, he has been guilty of the most gross lenocinium that can well be imagined, and sure I am that, under such circumstances, he will never be able to get a divorce.

I wish I could separate this second marriage, which was every way regularly conducted, so as to give effect to it. But this I cannot do, and considering all the circumstances, I regret I can not do it. But the first marriage being constituted, by what appears to me to be a legal consent, nothing on earth can dissolve it, except a divorce, which this man, I think, will never be able to obtain.

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

JAMES PATTISON, and others.—Appellants; WILLIAM MILLS, and others.—Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. viii. 286; xiii. 1103, 1350. S. C. I Dow and Cl. 342. On point as to the law applicable to the contract, see De laurier v. Wyllie, 1889, 17 Ct. of Sess. 4th Ser. 191.]

A. and Co. carrying on business in England as an Insurance Company, had an office and an agent in Scotland, with whom C. D. etc. for themselves and others, as joint owners of a vessel, made an insurance, receiving from the agent a memorandum in general terms, importing, without exception of any sea risks, that the vessel was insured, and that a policy would be prepared and sent to be delivered to the assured, or their order, "on the third Monday in the ensuing month, or on any subsequent day." Notice of the effecting of the insurance was transmitted by the Scotch agent to the principals in London, who, two months after the date of the memorandum, transmitted to the agent a policy of insurance, containing a clause, by which the operation of the policy was to be suspended while the vessel should be at sea. This policy was not demanded by, nor delivered, nor shewn to the assured, who at the end of the year renewed their policy by the medium of the agent in Scotland, but by a memorandum of renewal, signed by the agent in England, and referring to a specific policy, which although it was lying at the agent's office, was not then demanded by, nor delivered or shewn to the assured. Soon after this renewal of the policy, the ship was lost at sea by fire. Under these circumstances, a judgment of the Court of Session, reversing a sentence of the Judge-Admiral, was affirmed on appeal, but on distinct grounds, the House of Lords being of opinion, that the memorandum was the contract between the parties, and therefore properly admitted in evidence, upon the trial of an issue directed before the Jury Court; that the stat. 6 Geo. I. c. 18, so far as relates to Insurance Companies, did not extend to Scotland; that a contract made under the circumstances above stated, was a Scotch contract; and that the principals and their agents were properly included in the same action.

[520] The Appellants in this case represented the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company. The Appellant, Warner Phipps, being the Secretary to the Company in London, and the Appellant, Thomas Hamilton, being their Agent at Glasgow, but neither Mr. Phipps nor Mr. Hamilton were Proprietors. The other Appellants were Directors of the Company and Proprietors. They carried on their business in London.

where their policies were invariably executed, and all the Appellants were resident in London, excepting Thomas Hamilton.

The Respondents were the Proprietors of a Steam Boat called the Robert Bruce.

In the month of July, 1820, the Respondent William Mills, (being then the managing owner of the steam boat called the Robert Bruce, and of another steam boat called the Superb,) in the name of himself and others of the Respondents, but as the agent, and for the benefit of all the Respondents, applied to the Appellant Thomas Hamilton, as agent in Glasgow for the Albion Company, to effect an insurance to the extent of £3000 on each of the said steam boats, and to have certain policies cancelled which had been theretofore effected by individual owners on their respective shares.

Upon the occasion of effecting this insurance with Thomas Hamilton, a memorandum or certificate was delivered to the Respondent William Mills, by the Appellant Thomas Hamilton, of the tenor following:

"Albion Fire and Life Office, Glasgow, 4th July, 1820.—James Dennistoun, William Mills, [521] Colin Arrot, James Moffat, John T. Alston, Esquires, as a committee of management for themselves and others, having this day effected an insurance of £6000 with the undersigned, on behalf of the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company of London, on the property specified in the check corresponding with this memorandum: a policy will be forthwith prepared at the office in London, for the said insurance, and such policy will be delivered to the assured, or to his, her, or their order, on the third Monday in the ensuing month, or on any subsequent day.

(Signed) P. THOMAS HAMILTON.

"Agent for the Company."

The proposed insurance being accepted by the directors, a policy of insurance was made and executed in London, on the 11th of September, 1820, containing a stipulation that the insurance was to be suspended, and remain out of force during the time the boat might be at sea.

The policy was never applied for by the Respondents until after the loss of the Robert Bruce, but it was transmitted from London soon after it was executed, and was lying in the office of Thomas Hamilton at Glasgow.

In June 1821, the Respondent William Mills, (in the name and on the behalf of himself, and the other Respondents,) renewed for another year the insurance effected on the Robert Bruce and the Superb. The premium was paid to the Appellant Thomas Hamilton, who delivered to the Respondent William Mills, a memorandum or certificate in the following terms, subscribed by the Appellant Warner Phipps, as secretary of the Company:

[522] "Albion Fire and Life Office, London, Midsummer, 1821. Renewal Certificate on Fire Policy, No. 56,978, insuring £6000 to James Dennistoun, William Mills, Colin Arrot, James Moffat, and John Thomas Alston, Esquires.

" One Year's Premium	£31 10
Duty	9 0
Total payment	£40 10
" £1000 insured with Eagle Company per Policy, No. 61,725,
Premium and Duty	27 0
	£67 10

" 1821.— This is to declare that the above Policy has been renewed, and that the insurance granted thereby will continue in force from the 24th of June, 1821, to the 24th of June, 1822.

(Signed) WARNER PHIPPS, Secretary."

On the 28th of August, 1821, the Robert Bruce was destroyed by fire at sea, while on a voyage from Liverpool to Dublin.

Application was then made by the Respondents at the office of the Appellant Thomas Hamilton, for payment of the sum insured on the Robert Bruce, and upon that claim being resisted by the Appellants, the Respondents required a policy, framed in the terms in which they contended that it ought to have been executed, to be delivered to them. Upon this application, a policy excepting the risk of loss by fire at sea, was tendered to the Respondents, but they refused to accept it, insisting they were entitled to have a policy without any exception of risk by fire while the boat might be at sea, and upon a policy of that unlimited nature being refused, they raised their [523] action against the Appellants in the High Court of Admiralty in Scotland, concluding that the Defenders ought, and should be decreed and ordained conjunctly, and severally by decree of the Judge of the said High Court of Admiralty, immediately to furnish and deliver to the Pursuers a valid and effectual policy of insurance upon the said steam boats or packets for the said sum of £6000 sterling, and that for the period of one year from the 24th day of June then last 1821, when the premium therefor was paid, and containing in the said policy, the usual clauses, and an obligation of insurance against the usual risks as before specified, and among others an insurance against the risk of damage occasioned, or which might be occasioned, to the said steam boats or packets by fire, at any time and any where during the period aforesaid of the insurance, and whether such policy should be furnished and delivered to the Pursuers or not, or in whatever terms they might express or had expressed the same, they the said Defenders should be decreed and ordained by decree foresaid, conjunctly and severally to make payment to the Pursuers of the foresaid sum of £3000 sterling, being the sum insured upon the said steam boat or packet, Robert Bruce, with lawful interest, etc.

The Appellants put in defences amounting in substance to a denial that they had ever undertaken the insurance upon the terms alleged, and further contending that such an undertaking even if made, would have been void in law by the operation of the statute* 6 Geo. I. c. 18: by the [524] 12th section of which act it was enacted, "That from and after the granting or making of the said respective charters or indentures for erecting the two Corporations before mentioned, and passing the same under the said Great Seal, for and during the continuance of the same Corporations respectively, or either of them, all other Corporations or Bodies Politic before this time erected or established, or hereafter to be erected or established, whether such Corporations or Bodies Politic, or any of them, be sole or aggregate, and all such societies and partnerships as now are, or hereafter shall or may be entered into by any person or persons for assuring ships or merchandizes at sea, or for lending money upon bottomry, shall by force and virtue of this act be restrained from granting, signing, or underwriting, any policy or policies of assurance, or making any contracts for assurance of or upon any ship or ships, goods or merchandizes at sea, or going to sea, and from lending any monies by way of bottomry as aforesaid, and if any Corporation or Body Politic, or persons acting in such society or partnership, (other than the two Corporations intended to be established by this act, or one of them,) shall presume to grant, sign, or underwrite, after the 24th of June, 1720, any such policy or policies, or make any such contract or contracts for assurance of or upon any ship or ships, goods or merchandizes at sea or going to sea, or take or agree to take any premium or other reward for such policy or policies, every such policy and policies of assurance of or upon any such ship or ships, [525] goods or merchandizes, shall be ipso facto void, and all and every sum and sums so signed or underwritten in such policy or policies shall be forfeited, and shall and may be recovered, to wit, one moiety thereof to the use of His Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the other moiety thereof to the use of such person or persons as will inform or sue for the same in any of His Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster, in which action, suit or information, no essoin, protection, privilege, wager of law, or more than one imparlance shall be granted or allowed. And if any Corporation or Body Politic, or persons acting in such society or partnership as aforesaid, other than the two Corporations intended to be established by this act, or one of them shall presume to lend, or agree to lend, or advance by themselves, or any others on their behalf, after the said 24th of June, 1720, any money by way of bottomry as aforesaid, contrary to this act, the bond or other security for the same shall be ipso facto void, and such agreement shall be adjudged to be an usurious contract, and the offenders therein shall suffer as in cases of usury. Nevertheless it is intended and hereby declared, that any private or particular person or persons shall be at liberty to write or underwrite any policies, or engage himself or herself in any assurances of, for, or upon any ship or ships, goods or merchandizes at sea or going to sea, or may lend money by way of bottomry as aforesaid, as fully and beneficially as if this act had never been made, so as the same be not upon the account or risque of a Corporation or [526] Body Politic, or upon the account or risque of persons acting in a society or partnership for that purpose as aforesaid: any thing herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding."

The Judge Admiral by an interlocutor bearing date the 16th of May, 1822, repelled the defence founded on the statute 6 Geo. I. c. 18; but subsequently on advising a petition for the Appellants, the Judge Admiral superseded consideration of the defence on the statute. The Judge Admiral afterwards assized the Appellants from the action, on the ground that the insurance undertaken by the Appellants did not extend to loss at sea, but he found the Appellants entitled to no costs.

The case was thereupon removed into the Court of Session by mutual process of reduction of the decrees of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty—the Appellants insisting they were entitled to costs—the Respondents that judgment ought to have been given for them (the Respondents,)—and the Respondents' summons of reduction, after praying that the Judge Admiral's interlocutors against them should be reduced, retracted, rescinded, cassed, annulled, decerned and declared null, etc. concluded (in the same terms as the process in the Admiralty Court,) that the Defenders (Appellants) ought to be decerned and ordained to deliver a policy for a year from the 24th of June, 1821, without any exception of risk by fire at sea, and whether such policy should be so delivered or not, that they ought to be decreed and ordered to pay the sum stated to be insured, viz. £3000, with costs, etc.

Memorials and condescendences and revised [527] condescendences were presented and put in on each side. In the memorial for the Appellants, they stated the act of 6 Geo. I. c. 18, as incapacitating them from undertaking an insurance against loss at sea, and relied also on circumstances before referred to, and other particulars, as shewing that in point of fact they had not undertaken an insurance against such a loss.

The memorial and condescendence presented and put in on the part of the Pursuers, (Respondents) set forth a variety of matters with a view of proving that when they effected their insurance on the Robert Bruce, they supposed they were effecting an absolute insurance without exception of sea risk.

On the 13th of May, 1826, the second division of the Court of Session pronounced a special interlocutor, by which "having resumed consideration of the conjoined actions and proceedings therein, with the condescendences, revised condescendences, and answers for Thomas Hamilton, they remitted the actions to the Jury Court, to be there proceeded with according to the statute."

The following issue was adjusted by the Jury Court for the trial of the cause, which was directed to be tried at Glasgow.

"It being admitted that on the 27th or 28th days of August, 1821, the steam vessel called the Robert Bruce, the property of the Pursuers, was destroyed by fire while at sea, on her voyage betwixt Liverpool and Dublin; whether the Defenders promised and agreed to insure the Pursuers to the extent of £3000, or about that sum, from loss and damage which might [528] be caused by fire to the said steam vessel while at sea as aforesaid; and whether the Defenders have failed to perform the said promise and agreement to the loss and damage of the Pursuers. Damages laid at £3000. (Signed) WILLIAM ADAM, Lord Chief Commissioner."

The issue was tried before the Lord Chief Commissioner, at Glasgow, on the 20th day of September, 1826, when a general verdict was found for the Pursuers, subject to a bill of exceptions, which after stating the issue, etc. proceeded thus: And, upon the trial of the said issue, the counsel learned in the law for the said Pursuers, to maintain and prove his case under the said issue, did offer to give in evidence, certain certificates or receipts, being eight in number, the same having been formerly given by the said Thomas Hamilton, as such agent as aforesaid, to the several individuals (whereof six only are parties to the present action) on occasion of those eight individuals effecting each one a several insurance with the said Company upon his several share and interest in the said ship, for the year from the 11th of August, 1819, to the 29th of September, 1820; of which said certificates or receipts, one was and is in the following or similar terms:—Albion Fire and Life [Insurance] Office, Glasgow, 14th of August, 1819. William Mills, Esq. having this day effected an insurance of £200 with the undersigned, on behalf of the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company of London, on the property specified in the check corresponding with this memorandum, a policy will be forthwith prepared at the office in London for the said insurance, and such policy will be [529] delivered to the assured, or to his, her, or their order, on the third Monday in the ensuing month, or on any subsequent day.

" (Signed) Pr. THOS. HAMILTON, Agent for the Company, ROBERT MITCHELL.

" Premium	£1	4	6
" Duty	0	7	0

											£1	11	6

" Insured up to the 29th of September, 1820."

And on the back of which said certificate or receipt there was and is the following indorsement:

" This receipt insures, viz. on the Robert Bruce steam-boat, at present plying between Glasgow and Liverpool, £200.

" (Signed) P. THOS. HAMILTON, R.M."

And the remainder of which said certificates or receipts, so offered in evidence as aforesaid, were and are in the same or similar terms. And the said Counsel for the said Pursuers, in further maintenance of the said issue on the part of the said pursuers, did further tender and offer in evidence a letter, dated the 31st of August, 1819, from the said Thomas Hamilton, the said Defender, and agent for the said Company at Glasgow, to Warner Phipps, Esq. London, secretary to the said Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company of London, Defenders aforesaid, and a letter in answer thereto, from the said Warner Phipps, dated the 3d of September, 1819, to the said Thomas Hamilton, respectively written and sent on occasion of effecting the said insurance referred to in the said certificate: From which said letters the Counsel for the Pursuers proposed to offer in [530] evidence as aforesaid excerpts in the terms following; that is to say: " I have this day sent, per mail-coach, a parcel containing commission account and account-current; and inclosed you will receive bills for the balance at the credit of the Company, amount £1215 6s. 5d.

" The parcel contains also twenty fire orders, fire renewal sheet for August, Midsummer, and life renewal sheet for August, amount to the credit of the Company, as noted below; also order on Eagle Company for £8 10s.

" I am not disposed to think that the insurers of the Robert Bruce steam-boat, as per fire orders No. 14 to 22, inclusive, excepting No. 21, will be satisfied with the introduction of the clause, 'but not while the same shall be at sea.' I think that, in addition to the rivers, the channel ought to be admitted, as this vessel is expressly to ply between Clyde and Liverpool, and will be a great part of her time in the channel."

And which said answer of the said Warner Phipps, was offered in evidence as aforesaid, and is in the terms following, that is to say:

" In answer to your remarks respecting the clause which exempts the Company from loss on steam-boats while at sea, I have to state that it is a point in which we have no choice. The Royal Exchange and the London Assurance are the only Companies which have a right, as Companies, to undertake insurances on vessels while at sea, and no other Company can lawfully undertake such risk. If, therefore, the Proprietors of the Robert Bruce are not content to hold our policies with the exception [531] complained of, I will thank you to advise me, and we shall then, of course, consider the insurance not to be renewed after the present."

To the admissibility of all which certificates and letters, or excerpts therefrom, being given in evidence, the Counsel learned in the law for the said Defenders did object, as not legal or competent matter to be given in evidence in maintenance of the issue on the part of the said Pursuers. But the said Lord Chief Commissioner did then and there deliver it as his opinion, that the certificates and letters were legal and competent evidence in maintenance of said issue; and did allow the same to be produced, and given in evidence on the part of the said Pursuers. And the said Counsel for the said Pursuers, in maintenance of the said issue, did propose to give in evidence a certificate and receipt dated the 1th of July, 1820, granted by the said Thomas Hamilton, agent as aforesaid, at the time of receiving the order to obtain a policy of insurance from the said Company on the said steam vessel; which said certificate was and is in the terms following, that is to say:

"Albion Fire and Life Office.—Glasgow, 1th of July, 1820.—James Dennistoun, William Mills, Colin Arrott, James Moffat, and John T. Alston, Esqrs. as a committee of management, for themselves and others; having this day effected an insurance of £6000 with the undersigned, on behalf of the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company of London, on the property specified in the check corresponding with this memorandum, a policy will be forthwith prepared at the office in London for the said [532] insurance, and such policy will be delivered to the assured, or to his, her, or their order, on the third Monday in the ensuing month, or on any subsequent day.

"(Signed) P. THOMAS HAMILTON, Agent for the Company, ROBERT MITCHELL.

"Premium	£31 10 0
"Duty	9 0 0

	£40 10 0"

And the Counsel for the said Pursuers, in further maintenance of the said issue, on the part of the said Pursuers, proposed to give in evidence a policy of insurance, of date the 11th of September, 1820, numbered 56,978, made by the said office in pursuance of the said last mentioned certificate or receipt; and which policy of insurance was and is in the following terms:

"Whereas James Dennistoun, William Mills, Colin Arrott, James Moffat, and John T. Alston, Esqrs. of Glasgow, as a committee of management, for themselves and others, have paid to the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company of London, the sums above stated to have been received on the grant of this policy, for premium and duty, and have agreed and conditioned to pay, or cause to be paid to the said Company, from time to time, at its house in New Bridge Street, London, or to some one of its accredited agents, the sums above stated to be in future due, for the renewal or continuance of this policy, at the period or periods also above stated. Now, be it hereby known, that from the 30th day of June, 1820, and so long as such future payments so conditioned to be made [533] shall be made, and the directors of the said Company, for the time being, shall agree to accept such payments; the capital stock, and the funds of the said Company, shall be subject and liable to pay, and make good to the person or persons above-mentioned, and by whom such payment is so acknowledged to have been made, or to his, her, or their heirs, executors, or administrators, all such loss or damage, as the said person or persons so assured shall suffer by fire on the property herein after described, not exceeding in the whole the sum of £6000 sterling, and not exceeding in any case, the sum which shall be specifically stated against the property herein after described: that is to say, £3000 on the steam boat Robert Bruce, including machinery and apparatus belonging thereto, now plying as a passage boat between the Clyde and Liverpool, and £3000 on the steam boat Superb, including machinery and apparatus belonging thereto, and now plying as a passage boat between the Clyde and Liverpool. N.B. It is agreed that the said boats shall have liberty to lie or ply in any port, harbour, river, dock, or navigable canal in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, but that the insurance by this policy shall be suspended, and remain out of force, as regards either of the said boats, during the time she may be at sea. £1600 are insured on each of the above mentioned steam boats, with the Eagle Insurance Company."

"Memorandum. It being the intention of this Company, that only one of its policies shall be in force at any one time, in favour of the same [534] person or persons on the same property, it is declared, in the case of any former insurance having been granted by the Company to the person or persons herein named, on the property above described, that this policy shall not take effect, until such former insurance shall have ceased, or shall be given up. The unexpired value of former policies may be at all times received in aid of new insurance. It is farther expressly declared, that this policy shall be valid only on the condition of the former policies of the said Company. No. 54,600, 54,601, 54,602, 54,603, 54,604, 54,605, 54,606, 54,608, 54,611, and 55,107, being held to be cancelled and made void."

And it was further proposed by the Counsel for the said Pursuers, to prove, in support of the said issue, that the said policy of insurance was not transmitted by the said Defenders, the Albion Company, to the said Defender Thomas Hamilton, their agent, until the month of December, 1820; and that the said policy, regularly executed, was then transmitted to Glasgow, to the said Thomas Hamilton, in pursuance of the said order of insurance, and was, at the date aforesaid, in said office at Glasgow, ready for delivery, and that the same was not sent for by the said Pursuers; nor did the said Thomas Hamilton send the said policy to the Pursuers, but that it remained in the office of the said Thomas Hamilton, and was not delivered prior to the loss of the said vessel, but offered, when demanded, under protest, on 3d September, 1821.

And the said Counsel for the Pursuers did further, in order to maintain the said issue, give in [535] evidence a certificate or receipt, dated London, Midsummer, 1821, given by the said Thomas Hamilton to the said William Mills; which said certificate or receipt was and is in the following terms: that is to say: "Albion Fire and Life Office, London, Midsummer, 1821.—Renewal certificate on fire policy No. 56,978, insuring £6000 to James Dennistoun, William Mills, Colin Arrott, James Moffat, and John T. Alston, Esquires."

" One year's premium, £31 10s. duty £9, total payment	£40 10
" £4000 insured with the Eagle Company, per policy No. 61,725, premium and duty	27 0
	<hr/> £67 10

" (Signed) WARNER PHIPPS, Secretary."

And the said counsel for the said pursuers, in further maintenance of the said issue on their part, did propose and offer to give in evidence, by Peter Gillies, clerk of the said pursuer William Mills, that in the month of June or July 1820, and in July 1821, conversations took place in his, the witness's, presence, between the said William Mills, acting for himself, and as the agent and manager for the other pursuers, and Robert Mitchell, clerk of the said Thomas Hamilton, defender, he the said Robert Mitchell acting for the said Robert Hamilton in the insurance in question, that the said conversations related to [536] the terms or conditions of the aforesaid proposal to insure, and to renew the insurance on the said Robert Bruce steam-boat, for the year from the 24th day of June, 1820, to the 24th day of June, 1821, and from June 1821 for another year; and that in the said conversations no allusion was made by the said Robert Mitchell as to the risk being limited in any way on the said Robert Bruce steam-boat.

And in further maintenance of the issue aforesaid, and for the purpose also aforesaid, the said counsel for the said pursuers did further offer to give in evidence, by the testimony of the said Peter Gillies, that a certain other conversation was had, in his presence, in July 1821, between the said William Mills and the said Robert Mitchell, acting as aforesaid, viz. that at the time when the said certificate of renewal was so given as aforesaid, and that in such last-mentioned conversation nothing was said about a limitation of the insurance as to sea risk. To the admissibility of which said evidence respecting the said conversations, the counsel of the said defenders did then and there object, as not legal or competent evidence in maintenance of the said issue on the part of the said pursuers. But the said Lord Chief Commissioner did then and there deliver it as his opinion that the same was legal and competent evidence to maintain the said issue; and the same evidence was accordingly then and there admitted and received on the part of the said pursuers. And the said counsel for the said pursuers, in further maintenance of the said issue, did further propose and offer to give in evidence, that the premium paid to the Albion [537] Fire and Life Insurance Company, for insuring steam-vessels against risk of fire at sea, was 10s. 6d. per cent. which was equal to the rate of premium proved to have been paid in certain other cases for such insurance at the time of ordering the insurance in question. To the admissibility of which said evidence, the said counsel for the said defenders did then and there object. And the said counsel for the said pursuers did further propose to give in evidence, that the practice of agents in Glasgow for English and Scottish insurance companies, including the agents for the defenders, the Albion Company, is, to send the policies effected at those offices to the assured, as evidence to shew, that it was in like manner the duty of the said defenders, the said Albion Company, or of the said Thomas Hamilton, as their agent, to have sent the said policies so effected with them as aforesaid to the said assured. To the admissibility of which said evidence the said counsel for the said defenders did then and there in like manner object, as not being legal or competent evidence on the part of the said pursuers in maintenance of the said issue. But the said Lord Chief Commissioner did then and there deliver it as his opinion, that the said several matters so proposed and tendered in evidence for the purposes aforesaid, and so objected to as aforesaid, were fit and competent to be given in evidence under the said issue; and then and there allowed the same to be, and the same were accordingly given in evidence in that behalf. And the said counsel for the said defenders did then and there insist, before the said Lord Chief Commissioner, that all the said parole evidence [538] so allowed to be given, and the certificates and letters, or excerpts thereof, so allowed, to be produced and read on the part of the said pursuers, and so objected to by the said counsel for the said defenders, should not have been left to the Jury, or referred to their consideration, because the aforesaid parole and written evidence admitted to be given as aforesaid, was not evidence admissible in law to maintain the case under the said issue.

And the said counsel for the said defenders did then and there request the said Lord Chief Commissioner so to direct the said Jury; but his Lordship did then and there deliver it as his opinion to the said Jury, that they might and ought to consider the same as legal evidence to be weighed by them in considering the agreement and promise, and failure of performance of the same, in the said issue contained.

And it was then and there admitted, by and on the part as well of the said pursuers as of the said defenders, that the said Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company, during all the time herein mentioned, was a certain company carrying on the business of insurers against loss by fire at London, and that the said several defenders, (excepting the said Thomas Hamilton, the agent at Glasgow of the said company,) were respectively resident in London; that the said company, by means of agents in Scotland and elsewhere, was and is in the habit of insuring property in those places respectively; but that all the instruments of policies of insurance heretofore insisted upon, made and entered into by the said company, were executed by or on the part of the said company in London, and not elsewhere.

[539] And the said counsel for the said defenders did then and there also insist, before the said Lord Chief Commissioner, that even if legal and competent evidence had been given before the said Jury, whereby to prove that the said defenders (the said Albion Company) did promise and agree, as in the said issue mentioned, still that, by a certain act of Parliament made and passed in the sixth year of the reign of King George the First, entitled "An act for better securing," etc. such promise and agreement would be illegal and void, and that the said pursuers could not maintain any action thereon, and that the said Jury should be directed to find a verdict for the defenders. But the said Lord Chief Commissioner did nevertheless direct the said jury, if they were satisfied that the evidence admitted to be given on the part of the pursuers was sufficient to support the said promise and agreement in the said issue mentioned, that they should find a verdict for the said pursuers; whereupon the counsel for the defenders did tender their exceptions to the said direction, and did insist, that, under the provision of the said statute, the pursuers could not maintain the said action, and, therefore, the said Jury should have been directed to find a verdict for the defenders.

The said counsel for the defenders did also then and there submit, and humbly insist before the said Lord Chief Commissioner, that if the said evidence were sufficient to warrant the Jury in finding a verdict for the said pursuers, still that the said Jury should not be directed to find a general verdict against all the defenders, but only against the said Albion Company, the prin- [540] cipals, or else against the said Thomas Hamilton, the agent; and then and there requested the said Lord Chief Commissioner so to direct the said Jury. But he, the said Lord Chief Commissioner, did, then and there, deliver it as his opinion, to the said Jury, that, if their verdict should be in favour of the pursuers, to find against all the defenders generally; to which the counsel for the defenders excepted, insisting that the Jury should have been directed to find either against the Albion Insurance Company, or against Thomas Hamilton, as aforesaid.

And the said Jury then and there delivered their verdict in favour of the pursuers, and against all the defenders; but the counsel for the defenders insisted that the verdict should have been in favour of the defenders, inasmuch as the said several matters admitted to be given in evidence under the said issue were not in law admissible, and ought not to have been referred to the consideration of the said Jury; and that the several other matters herein before set forth, as admitted and given in evidence respecting the residence of the said Albion Insurance Company, the defenders, in respect to the execution of all the said instruments and policies of insurance, were a bar to the said action, by virtue of the statute of the 6th Geo. I. herein before-mentioned; and farther, that the said Jury should not have been directed to find a verdict against all the defenders. And the said counsel for the said defenders, did then and there propose the aforesaid exceptions to the directions aforesaid of the said Lord Chief Commissioner, and did request [541] him to sign the said Bill of Exceptions according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided; and thereupon the said Lord Chief Commissioner did sign the said Bill of Exceptions, on the 21st day of June, 1827, in the eighth year of the reign of his present Majesty.

The Jury found the issue in the affirmative, and returned a general verdict for the Pursuers (Respondents) against all the Defenders (Appellants).

The exceptions taken by the Appellants' counsel were put in the form of a Bill, as hereinbefore set forth, which was afterwards duly signed by the Lord Chief Commissioner according to the statute.

The Bill of exceptions, having been allowed and remitted to the Second Division of the Court of Session, came on to be argued before the Court on the 11th July, 1827, when the exceptions were disallowed by the Court, who then pronounced the following Interlocutor: "The Lords having heard counsel for the parties in terms of their former deliverance, disallow the exceptions, and declare the verdict final and conclusive in terms of the statute: find the pursuers entitled to the expence of this discussion: allow an account thereof to be put in, and remit the same when lodged to the Auditor of Court to tax and to report, reserving all other questions of expences."

This is one of the Interlocutors against which the present appeal was instituted.

On the 22d of December, 1827, the Court by Interlocutor approved of the Auditor's account [542] of expences, by which the Pursuers (Respondents) costs were taxed at £67 18s. 7d.

This Interlocutor is also included in the appeal.

The Appellants then moved the Court of Session to pronounce judgment upon the defence raised by them under the Statute 6 Geo. I. cap. 18, which on the discussion of the Bill of Exceptions they had considered to be a question not properly raised at the trial, but reserved for the consideration of the Court of Session after the remit to the Jury Court was exhausted by the trial of the question. After hearing the counsel for both parties, the Court, on the 20th of December, 1827, appointed the parties to give in mutual cases. On the 22d of January, 1828, the Court pronounced the following Interlocutor, repelling the defence raised under the Statute of 6th Geo. I. and finding the Appellants liable to the payment, not only of the sum insured, but also of interest thereon from the time of the loss.

"Having resumed consideration of these conjoined actions of reduction, and advised the same with the verdict of the jury award of Mr. Thomas Robertson, referred to and produced; and having also advised the mutual cases for the parties on the defence in law, founded on the act 6th Geo. I. cap. 18, which was reserved by the Judge Admiral; and having now heard counsel thereon:—in respect the insurance in question is an insurance against the risk of fire on a Steam Vessel, which is not a marine insurance contemplated by the said Act: the Lords, in the action of reduction, and for payment at the instance of William Mills [543] and others, find that the statute founded on does not apply to this case, repel the defence founded on the said statute, as well as the other defences to the said action, and reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the reductive conclusions of the libel, and in respect of the said verdict and award find the defenders, conjunctly and severally, liable to the Pursuers in damages, modify the same to the sum of £3000 and decern for payment thereof with interest thereon in terms of the libel; and in the action of reduction at the instance of the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company, sustain the defences, assoilzie the defenders and decern: find the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company and the defender, Thomas Hamilton, conjunctly and severally, liable in the expences of the conjoined processes incurred in this and in the Admiralty Courts, allow an account thereof to be put in, and remit the same when lodged to the Auditor of Court to tax and to report."

Against this Interlocutor also the Appeal was instituted.

The cause being then again transmitted to the Jury Court upon the question of costs, the judges of that court, on the 25th January, 1828, ordered the Appellants to pay to the Respondents the costs incurred in that court.

This order is also included in the Appeal.

The damages, with interest and costs, amounting together to £1675 16s. 8d. were afterwards paid by the Appellants, in pursuance of an order of the Court of Session made for that purpose, security being found for the same being refunded [544] in case the judgment of the Court below should be reversed.

The Appeal was against the Interlocutors of the Court of Session, bearing date the 11th day of July, 1827, the 22d day of December, 1827, and the 22d day of January, 1828, and the order of the Jury Court, bearing date the 25th day of January, 1828.

For the Appellants: The original Policy renewed by the Memorandum of Midsummer 1821, expressly excludes risk of fire at sea, and this was the only contract made by the Appellants. It was not competent for the Respondents on the trial of the issue to adduce any parole or collateral evidence in order to control and vary the clear import of the written evidence. It was more especially incompetent for the Respondents to adduce on the trial of the issue, parole evidence of the matters set forth in the Bill of Exceptions, the same being (in great part) matters which had taken place inter alios, and in which the Appellants were not concerned. It is inconsistent and repugnant to the whole body of evidence adduced in the cause, to make all the Appellants, some of them being principals and some agents, joint contractors, and jointly liable to indemnify the Respondents.

The Contract of Insurance founded upon by the Respondents was a Contract made and signed in England, by a Society established there, and from the date of that Contract, until and at the time of the loss of the Robert Bruce, the Statute 6, Geo. 4, c. 18, was in force, and by the operation [545] of that Act, it was incompetent for the Appellants to make themselves legally responsible for any risk which might befall the Robert Bruce "while at sea."

For the Respondents: The whole evidence tendered by the Respondents at the trial, and admitted by the Judge, was competent and proper evidence for proving the matters in issue, and fully warranted the verdict returned by the jury.

It is argued that the loss occurred under the renewal receipt of 21th June, 1821, which bears expressly to be a renewal for another year of the policy, numbered 56,978, subscribed by the Appellants, in September 1820, and containing a clause expressly "excluding all the time the vessel might be at sea." The terms of that policy thus form the only admissible evidence of what was truly the contract of parties; and, therefore, no extrinsic or other evidence should have been admitted, in support of an allegation that their contract was different.

But this objection proceeds upon a misconception of the nature of the action, and of the issue that was tried. This was not an action on a policy, but for a policy, or for damages in consequence of not obtaining one. The foundation of the Respondents' claim was, that after contracting and paying for a policy to cover a special risk, no such policy was delivered; and the first conclusion of their summons, is, that the Appellants should be ordained to deliver such a policy, on which action might be brought.

The evidence produced by the Respondents, [546] proved, that the price or premium advanced by the Respondents, was the highest premium then taken in Glasgow, for insuring steam vessels against fire, whether at sea, or in ports and rivers; that several of the Respondents had recently, at the same or a less premium, obtained such insurances upon other vessels of this description; and that they had taken no measures for covering by any other insurance, the principal risk which they ran, viz. that of fire, while at sea. The premium paid for insurance of vessels against fire, while in port or harbour, was proved to be 2s. 6d. or 3s. per cent. whereas the premium paid to the present Appellants, was 10s. 6d. per cent.: that the vessel was originally insured as a vessel "then actually plying between the Clyde and Liverpool," and when her employment was afterwards changed to plying between the Clyde and Ireland, notice of that, as a material change of circumstances, was given and received by the Appellants: that immediately after taking the Respondent's money for the first insurance, (of which all the others were confessedly mere renewals or continuations,) and in transmitting the consequent order for a policy, the public and accredited agent of the Appellants, distinctly intimated to them, that the Respondents expected to be insured against fire risk while at sea, and that he, himself, was of opinion, that the policies then ordered, should be worded accordingly: and that though the Appellants are said to have rejected this suggestion, in a private letter to their agent, no communication of that rejection, nor any intimation whatever, of the limitation proposed to be inserted in the policy, was ever, at any time, [547] made to the Respondents, till after the loss had occurred: that though it was the universal practice of insurance agents in Glasgow, to send round and deliver the policies which they had engaged to furnish, the policies stipulated for by the Respondents, were retained and withheld by the Appellants, or their agents, and never tendered or exhibited till after the loss had occurred; and, that although there were repeated conversations on the subject of their insurance, between the Respondents, or some of them, and the agent of the Appellants, subsequent to the correspondence above referred to, no intimation was ever given of the restrictions, which are said to have been in their contemplation, nor any hint of the limited protection they proposed to afford.

Even if the policy, with the limitation referred to, had been tendered or delivered to the Respondents, they would not have been bound by that limitation, if they could show by clear evidence, that it had been inserted, either through fraud on the part of the Appellants, or through gross mistake on their own;* and the evidence admitted at the trial would have been competent and receivable evidence to prove such fraud or mistake. The general doctrine relied on by the Respondents is given, under those limitations and exceptions, by all the authorities. As there is no question here of the sufficiency of the evidence produced for the Respondents, it is not necessary to say more of it, than, that being calculated to prove [548] fraud or gross mistake, it was, at all events, competent to be received in the trial of such an issue; and that there is no room for an exception against the act of the Court in sending it to the Jury. At the same time, it is conceived to be quite clear, that it was sufficient and conclusive as to both points. That the limitation in the policy, could only have been inserted from the grossest mistake of the meaning, object, and understanding of the Respondents, was made out, beyond all possibility of question; and that it was inserted fraudulently and mala fide by the Appellants and their agent, is equally demonstrated by the facts, of their knowledge of the premium being equal to that required for an unlimited policy, their consciousness, as evidenced by the letter of their agent, that the Respondents relied on it as unlimited; and by their retention of that premium, and their concealment, and non-delivery of the instrument itself, till after the loss had occurred.

The statute of the 6th Geo. I, c. 18. had no bearing upon the question of fact set forth in the issue which was sent to trial; and could not competently be brought under the view of the Court or Jury, in the course of that trial, although it might have been (as it afterwards was) founded on as a bar to the Respondents recovering any judgment in the cause, or applying the verdict as the ground of such judgment. The Appellants indeed, did not insist on this ground of exception in the Court below;

* Phil. Evid. i. pp. 550, 558, etc. Fell on Guarantees, p. 58, etc. and cases there cited. Marshall i. pp. 349, 351, and cases cited.

and acknowledged by their subsequent proceedings, that they were aware it could not be sustained in that form of pleading.

The verdict of the Jury was properly returned for the Respondents generally, and without distinguishing between the case of the Appellant Hamilton, the agent in Glasgow, and that of the other Appellants, the office-bearers and partners of the Albion Insurance Company of London; and the Judge did, justly and legally refuse to direct the said Jury, to find alternatively, against one or other only of these Appellants.

It is objected that if the agent acted within his powers, then he bound only his constituents, and not himself individually, and the verdict ought to have been against the former only. If on the other hand, he acted beyond his powers, then he did not bind his constituents, and the verdict should have been against him only as an individual. But the resident agent or mandatory of a foreign party is, by the law of Scotland, liable, along with his principal, to any judgment or decree obtained in the Courts of that country, in the issue of suits maintained for behalf of such party, by such agent or mandatory, although confining himself strictly to the terms of his mandate or instructions. And an accredited agent in the general business of a party, whether in the same or in a foreign country, will bind that party to individuals who, bona fide contract with him in the name of such party, as to all matters falling apparently within the line or course of that general business, although it may happen, that by his private instructions, he was debarred from entering into such transactions.

No evidence being produced by the Appellants, to show whether the actings of the agent, in his dealings with the Respondents, were or were not within his powers or instructions, the justice of the case required that the verdict [550] should be against both, conjunctly—their ultimate claims of relief, as against each other, being left entire, on the application of such verdict.

The act of 6 Geo. I. c. 18. plainly did not extend to Scotland, and was intended only to give the two favoured companies a monopoly of Marine Insurances in the English market; while the property insured, in the present instance, was Scottish property, and the contract for insurance entered into in Scotland, in a public office or place of business in Glasgow, and by parties who were not bound to know, and could not be affected by the provisions of any foreign law. It is said not to be clear that the statute did not extend to Scotland; and if it applied only to England, the contract here was between the Respondents and an English Company, known and held out to the Respondents as such; and, though locally concluded at Glasgow, by means of an agent, was no more a Scottish contract than if it had been arranged altogether in London, either by some of the Respondents repairing to that place in person, or by their corresponding with the Appellants in that city by post. But the act is manifestly applicable to England alone; as the necessary actions for giving effect to it are directed to be brought in the Courts at Westminster only; whereas, in another branch of the same statute which was meant to extend to Great Britain and Ireland, the relative actions are allowed to be brought in the Courts, either of Westminster, Edinburgh, or Dublin; and when it was afterwards thought expedient, that its provisions should be made operative in the American colonies, it was found necessary to pass an additional [551]—tional or supplementary statute (the 11 Geo. II. c. 37.) expressly extending them to these colonies.

Monopolies are unfavourable in law; and are therefore to be strictly construed, especially when the sanction under which they are protected is that of nullity in bona fide contracts, entered into by persons not bound to be cognisant of their existence. The Appellants came into Scotland, and there set up an establishment, exactly similar to those which Scotchmen might lawfully set up; and for the express purpose of dividing with such native establishments, the employment of Scottish customers. Quoad hoc therefore, their's was truly a Scottish establishment; and there is no reason to think that even the Appellants transgressed any law which was binding on them, when they undertook this business in Scotland, (the monopoly of the companies favoured by the statute being manifestly the monopoly of the English Market only)—and it being free to them as British subjects, to carry on any branch of trade in Scotland, with the same privileges as natives. Nor could their connection with a head office in England take away those privileges, as to a true Scottish transaction. But, at all events, it will not make this an English contract, that one of the parties to it was settled in England. That party may, perhaps, be liable in penalties; but the foreign party who actually contracted in his own country, and was neither bound nor presumed to know the English statute, ought not to be exposed to loss, by the annulment of his contract. The law of England may justly punish its proper subjects who violate its injuncti-^[552]ons; but ought not to forfeit the rights of those who are not subject to it, and do not contract within its territory, or subject them to losses of which they had no warning.

The monopoly of the favoured Companies did not extend to the insurance of steam-vessels, which had no existence at the date of the statute, and are exposed to hazards of a particular description, and substantially different from any that could then be contemplated as the objects of marine insurance. Monopolies and restraints on the employment of capital and industry, are always to be construed as narrowly as possible, and never to be extended, by mere implication and analogy, to cases which they did not originally comprehend. The statute of apprenticeships, accordingly, has not been held applicable to trades that were not in existence at the time it was passed; and the same rule has been applied to many other cases far less clear and favourable than the present.

Even if the Appellants were themselves disabled by the statute from granting the Respondents a policy extending to the whole voyage, they were bound by their onerous contract, to have procured such a policy from one or other of the Companies favoured by that act, and are bound to repair to the Respondents the loss arising from their failure or omission so to procure it. By taking the Respondents' money (a sum of money proved to have been fully equal to the value of an unlimited policy,) they obviously became bound to procure and deliver such a policy. The Respondents, who did not know, and were not bound to know any disabili-^[553]ties which might attach to them by the law of England, might, indeed, understand that the Appellants were themselves to fulfil this engagement, by executing and delivering such a policy in their own names. But they who pretend that they knew the law of England, and were bound to know it, cannot be permitted to say that they had any such understanding. They are barred from so construing the contract, by every principle of consistency and common honesty; and, considering that it is now finally established by the verdict of the Jury, that they did covenant and agree to deliver to the Respondents, a policy covering them from risk of fire while the vessel should be at sea, as well as while in port or in rivers; and as it is plain that such a policy might, at all events, have been procured from one or other of the privileged Companies, it seems undeniably to follow that it was their duty so to procure it; and that they have been justly subjected in reparation of the damages arising from their omission. They might have met the first and leading conclusion of the Respondents' summons, by delivering such a policy; but as they have not chosen to do so, they cannot be relieved from the other alternative, of paying the damage that has ensued.

The Lord Chancellor: (26th June): There is a case which stands for judgment, of the Albion Company against Mills. It was a case of this description, upon which at present, for a particular reason, I will say only a few words, as I wish to have an opportunity of further considering the course which ought to be adopted:—the Plaintiffs, the ^[554]Pursuers in the action below, were the Proprietors of a steam vessel called the Robert Bruce. There is an Insurance Company in London for Fire and Life Insurance, called the Albion Insurance Company: they have an establishment at Glasgow, a regular establishment and office there, conducted by a person of the name of Hamilton. A considerable quantity of insurance business on account of the London Insurance Company was transacted at that office. The owners of the Robert Bruce applied at the office at Glasgow to have their vessel insured—a steam vessel called the Robert Bruce. An agreement was entered into for the purpose by Mr. Hamilton the agent, and a policy was afterwards effected. Various questions have arisen, which were agitated in the Court below, and which have been much considered and discussed. One objection on the part of the Albion Insurance Company to pay this loss, was an objection arising out of the statute of 6 Geo. I. c. 18: it was said, that any policy of insurance, or any agreement for insurance entered into, under the circumstances under which this particular insurance was effected, was by means of that act of Parliament altogether void, and much argument was made use of both in the Court below, and at the bar here, for the purpose of determining this material and important question, whether that act extends to Scotland, to contracts entered into, and executed in that part of the United Kingdom. The Court below were of opinion that the statute did not apply to Scotland, and I am very much disposed to concur in that opinion.

[555] But another most material and important question arose, one much more complicated, which was of this description, namely, whether the contract was a contract entered into in Scotland or in England, in other words, if the statute does not extend to Scotland, whether it was a contract so entered into in Scotland as to render it valid and binding. The Court below appear to have differed on that point, and they came to no conclusion with respect to it; but they decided the question on another point, quite wide of the decision of that question: they said this was a case of loss that did not come within the act, and I wish for the purpose of directing the attention of your Lordships and the parties to this point of the case, to read the very terms of their judgment—the final judgment: “Having resumed consideration of those conjoined actions of reduction, and advised the same with the verdict of the jury award of Mr. Thomas Robertson, referred to and produced, and having also advised the mutual cases for the parties, on the defence in law founded on the act 6 Geo. I. c. 18, which was reserved by the Judge Admiral, and having now heard counsel thereon, in respect the insurance in question is an insurance against the risk of fire on a steam vessel, which is not a marine insurance, contemplated by the said act, the Lords in the action of reduction and for payment, at the instance of William Mills and others, find that the statute founded on does not apply to this case, repel the defence founded on the said statute, as well as the other defences to the said action.”

[556] Now I confess I am not disposed at all to concur in that judgment. I think it is impossible that that judgment, according to my apprehension and understanding, can be sustained. In the first place, if you look to the words of the act of Parliament, they are most general and comprehensive; the words are:—“that if any of the persons described, shall presume to grant, sign, or underwrite, after the 24th of June, 1720, any such policy or policies, or make any such contract or contracts for assurance of or upon any ship or ships, goods or merchandizes at sea or going to sea, or take or agree to take any premium or other reward for such policy or policies, every such policy and policies of assurance of or upon any such ship or ships, goods or merchandizes, shall be ipso facto void.” It is in my opinion impossible to say, that an insurance on a steam vessel against fire was not distinctly and precisely within the language of this act of Parliament; and there is another circumstance to which I wish particularly to advert, which is this,—that fire is one of the risks expressly mentioned in all policies of insurance, according to the form that now exists, and as far as relates to that part of the case, existed at the time when this act of Parliament was passed. It not only comes expressly within the words of the act of Parliament, but within the terms of policies in use at the time. It appears to me therefore impossible, merely because some alteration has taken place with respect to the mode of propelling vessels of this description at sea, to say that cases of that kind do not come within the meaning and language of this act of Parliament. [557] It appears to me, with all respect and deference, (and I entertain the greatest respect and deference for the learned Judges by whom this is decided,) to be a proposition which cannot be supported. But at the same time that I state that decision to be in my opinion erroneous, I do not undertake at this moment to say whether on other grounds the judgment may not be sustained: and if your Lordships should be of opinion that on other grounds the judgment may be sustained, whether the House ought to decide at once upon the case as it at present stands, or whether it should be remitted to the Court in Scotland, for the purpose of calling upon the Tribunal there to come to a decision upon the point, which they seem to have avoided deciding, and to have cut the matter short by deciding the case, upon the ground open to the objection, as it appears to me, to which I have referred, that is a question on which I have not yet made up my mind. I have had some consultation with a noble and learned Lord, at present in the neighbourhood of this House: he thinks it is a question which deserves consideration, and I will endeavour to-morrow to give my opinion upon it, if I am in a condition, with propriety, to propose to your Lordships a judgment on the materials at present before you, without remitting the case to the Court below, in order that the Court below may come to a determination and decision on the question,—whether this is to be considered as an English or a Scotch contract. If I am, on the materials before me, authorized to propose to your Lordships a judgment, and it will be proper for this House to give a judgment on those materials, without calling on the Court [558] below to pronounce their judgment upon the question I am ready to state my opinion: what that opinion will be, I will not at present anticipate, but I am prepared to give that opinion on the point of form. I feel desirous that this case should stand over, for the purpose of giving me an opportunity of considering that question, till to-morrow.

(27th June.) After looking at the papers, and attending to them throughout, I should recommend to your Lordships to decide, that on the ground upon which the Court below pronounced their judgment, it cannot in point of law be sustained; but upon the whole, looking at all the papers, and the proceedings which have taken place in the Court below, and the transaction itself, there is, I conceive, sufficient to justify your Lordships in affirming the judgment, though on a different ground.

The circumstances of the case are these:—There is a Company in London called the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company; that Company is so constituted, that, according to the law as it existed by virtue of the act of 6 Geo. 1. c. 18. it is incompetent to effect insurances upon ships and merchandizes at sea; that is a point which is admitted in the case, and with respect to that it is not necessary I should make any further observation. This Company has an establishment at Glasgow, and a regular office at Glasgow, called the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Office, and they have a person attending there as their agent, a person of the name of Thomas Hamilton. They had been in the habit of entering into contracts and engagements to a considerable extent in Glasgow. When I say they had been in the [559] habit of entering into contracts and engagements to a considerable extent, I mean contracts and engagements similar to those which are the subject of the present inquiry. There were certain persons, who are the Respondents in this appeal, residing in Scotland, who were the owners of a steam vessel called the Robert Bruce. The owners of this vessel were desirous of insuring her, and they applied for that purpose to Mr. Hamilton, at the office at Glasgow, and upon their application at the office in Glasgow, the contract to which I will call your Lordships' attention, was entered into in these terms—"Albion Fire and Life Office,—Glasgow, 4th of July, 1820.—James Dennistoun, William Mills, Colin Arrot, James Moffat, John T. Alston, Esquires, as a committee of management, for themselves and others; having this day effected an insurance of £6000 with the undersigned, on behalf of the Albion Fire and Life Insurance Company, London, on the property specified in the check corresponding with this memorandum, a policy will be forthwith prepared at the office in London for the said insurance, and such policy will be delivered to the assured, or to his, her, or their order, on the third Monday in the ensuing month, or on any subsequent day. (Signed) P. THOMAS HAMILTON, Agent for the Company, ROBERT MITCHELL. Premium £31 10s.—Duty £9."

This contract was drawn up at Glasgow, dated at Glasgow, and signed at Glasgow, by Hamilton, who was the agent for the Company. According to the ordinary course of business, Hamilton communicated this transaction to his principal [560] in London, and a policy of insurance was sent down to the office at Glasgow. It was not sent within the period limited by the contract, for it was not sent till the month of September, the contract having been entered into in the month of July. Any person looking at that contract must see, that it is in its form a general contract of insurance; that is, a contract for a policy, which shall be a general policy of insurance. There is no limit whatever, as to the places to which the contract is to extend; there is no exception in the contract; there is nothing expressing that when the policy comes down, it shall contain a clause, that the insurance is to be suspended while the vessel is at sea. It is a general contract of insurance; or rather they undertake that a general policy of insurance shall be executed. The policy of insurance that was sent down to the agent at Glasgow, (an insurance on the steam vessel against fire,) contained this clause, "this policy of insurance to be suspended and remain out of force, during the time the steam boat may be at sea." This policy of insurance, however, remained in the office of Hamilton. There is no evidence that it was ever shewn to the parties insured, nor any evidence to shew that the fact of this clause of exception, was ever communicated to them. Thus the transaction went on for a year.

At the expiration of the year, or shortly before that time, the Respondents applied to Hamilton, the second time, to extend the insurance another year; they paid Hamilton the premium of insurance for another year. There is no evidence to shew that the policy was then communicated to [561] them; there is no evidence whatever of that fact. On the contrary, there is evidence of a different description. There is no evidence to shew that the exception in the policy, was at that time, or any previous time, communicated to the assured. The money was received by Hamilton, and a memorandum given that the policy had been renewed.

A short time after the renewal of the policy, the vessel was destroyed by fire, on her passage from Liverpool to Dublin, and the persons who thus considered themselves assured by this contract, applied to Hamilton, for the payment of the loss. The answer they received was this: You are not entitled to recover: for if you advert to the policy, you will find there is an exception in the policy: the policy is not to have operation during the time the vessel is at sea. The assured upon this commenced proceedings, for the purpose of recovering the amount of the loss. Their proceedings were in the first instance instituted before the Judge Admiral, and the judgment was against the insured. It is unnecessary for me to enter into the terms of that judgment, for afterwards the proceedings came before the Court of Session.

On this question coming before the Court of Session, it was considered that there were two points:—One point was the question of fact, as to what the nature of the insurance was:—the other was the question of law, to which I yesterday alluded, and to which I shall again call your Lordships' attention. It was conceived that the question should be remitted to the Jury Court: it was so remitted, and the issue I am about to [562] read, was that which was drawn up for the purpose of the trial. It is in these terms, "whether the Defenders promised and agreed to insure the Pursuers to the extent of £3000, or about that sum, from all loss and damage which might be caused by fire to the said steam vessel while at sea, as aforesaid: and whether the Defenders have failed to perform the said promise and agreement, to the loss and damage of the Pursuers." The question turned entirely upon this part of the issue, namely, whether the agreement to insure extended to the period while the vessel was at sea. The cause came on for trial: the evidence was heard, and a verdict was found for the Pursuers. Exceptions were taken to the evidence, in the process of the trial. These were afterwards embodied into a bill of exceptions, which was signed by the learned Judge, who presided in the Court: and has been printed in the papers, which have come before your Lordships for your consideration.

It appears to me, on looking at the exceptions, that there is only one material point to which it is necessary to call your Lordships' attention. It was said, and justly said, that where there is a written agreement to insure, a preparatory agreement, and afterwards a policy of insurance is effected in pursuance of that agreement, it is the policy which is the contract between the parties. The ordinary course of proceeding in the City of London is, that a slip is in the first instance signed, and after that slip is signed a policy is effected, and it is the policy which is the contract, and the slip cannot be adverted to for the purpose of explaining the meaning of the [563] parties. It was argued that no contract had been entered into at Glasgow, that it was an agreement for a policy, that the policy had been afterwards executed, and that must be considered, having been sent down to Scotland, to be the agreement between the parties. But there was this fallacy in that argument, the Pursuers brought their action upon the agreement as entered into by Hamilton, as signed by Hamilton. What was that agreement? That was an agreement for a general insurance. It was an agreement that a policy should be executed. That policy to be executed was to conform to the agreement. The policy had, it is true, been sent down, and if the parties had agreed to it, that would have bound them. But that policy did not conform to the original agreement: it was never communicated to the parties that there was an alteration, and if the agent agreed to a general insurance that being within his duty as agent, it was imperatively his duty under those circumstances to communicate to the assured, that the policy having come down, the parties in London did not conceive themselves authorized in executing a general policy, but only a policy with the exception to which I have referred. No such communication was made by Hamilton, and therefore the owners of the vessel never adopted that, for they never knew it.—What then did they feel themselves justified in saying? It was this—We have entered into an agreement with your agent at Glasgow, for a policy of a particular description: you have never fulfilled that agreement:—you have received our money by which you bound yourselves to send down a [564] general policy: instead of that you have sent down another policy, and we call upon you to fulfil that agreement.—That was the nature of the action.

But this agreement was only for the year, and at the expiration of the year, as I have stated to your Lordships, an application was made to the Company to renew the policy: and if the policy had been shewn at the time of the renewal, the policy would have been the contract. But when it was renewed nothing was said by Hamilton about the terms of it, nor was it shewn to the assured. When, therefore, the money was paid for the renewal, according to every principle of equity—(and this Court had jurisdiction both legally and equitably) according to every principle of law and equity and justice this renewal had reference to the original agreement, and they ought, therefore, to have executed it conformably to the stipulations of the original agreement. When, therefore, it was contended as it was strenuously in the Jury Court, that the Court had no authority to look into any thing but the policy, that was rightly over-ruled: and when it was repeated at your Lordships' bar, it was impossible not at once to feel the fallacy of it, for it was clear that a policy was sent of a different description from that stipulated, and that it was not communicated to the parties that the agreement had not been fulfilled. The Jury, therefore, were in my opinion, justified in the verdict they found, and when we dispose of this general question on the bill of exceptions, it appears to me unnecessary to refer your Lordships to the other grounds of objection, stated in the bill of excep-[565]-tions, because I think your Lordships will be of opinion, that if the way in which I am putting the question is the correct mode of deciding it, they are of little consequence in the decision of this case.

The question of fact being disposed of, the next in consideration was the question of law—it was said that they could not recover on this policy. Why? Because by the 6 Geo. I. c. 18, the monopoly of insurance by Companies on ships and merchandize at sea, is given to two particular Companies; namely, to the London Insurance Company, and to the Royal Exchange Assurance Company, and that, therefore, that contract was altogether void, whether it was an agreement for a policy, or a policy executed:—that the act of Parliament was a bar, the act of Parliament declaring that all policies executed by six persons other than those companies, shall be absolutely null and void.

The first question which arose in the discussion was this, and a very important general question it was: Does that act extend to Scotland? that is, does that part of the act to which I have referred extend to Scotland? The act was passed with two views; it is the act generally called the Bubble Act: it was an act for the purpose of preventing those wild speculations which had currency at the period to which I have referred, and that part of the act specifically extends to Scotland: for it is stated in the body of the act, that the penalties which shall be imposed for the violation of that part of the act, shall be recovered in the Courts of Edinburgh, Dublin, or London. It is clear, therefore, that that part of the act was intended [566] to extend to Scotland. But with respect to the other part, it is quite different. In the first place it is a little too strong to suppose that only these two English Companies could be intended to have a right to insure, not confined to England only, but extending to other parts of the kingdom: there is, in respect to that question, this important distinction, that the penalties are recoverable only in the Courts of Westminster, and it is impossible not to see that that part of the act of Parliament was intended to apply only to England. That point being decided, I conceive your Lordships will think yourselves justified in concurring in the judgment of the Court below.

Another question, very important in its nature, a question of law, was raised. There is an English Company it is said effecting an insurance, an English contract, and although this act of Parliament may not extend to Scotland, this is an insurance by an English Company, and therefore it is argued that it would be mere evasion to say that the parties in this case could recover on this in Scotland. This turns entirely on the question whether or not this was an English contract, or a Scotch contract. The way in which it was argued at the bar, and in the Court below, appears to me very fallacious. It was analogous to the argument, to which I have already referred, which was raised in the Jury Court, that the Policy is to be considered as the contract, and that the Policy was executed here by the Company, and if the Policy were the ground of action, the proceeding on a Policy so executed in London, might admit of doubt and question. But that is [567] not the case here. What is the nature of the action? Here is a contract entered into, not in London, but in Glasgow: written in Glasgow, dated in Glasgow, and subscribed in Glasgow, the consideration paid in Glasgow, at the office established, and for a long time established in Glasgow. Why is it then to be said, that that contract, I mean the original contract, was not a contract in Glasgow? If I send an agent to reside in Scotland, and he in my name enters into a contract in Scotland, the contract is to be considered as mine, where it is actually made. It is not an English contract, because I actually reside in England; if my agent executes it in Scotland, it is the same as if I were myself on the spot, and executed it in Scotland. The original contract, therefore, must be considered as a contract entered into in Scotland, and it was that original contract, and not the Policy, which was the ground of action: the action was brought for the infringement of that contract. You agreed to give me a general Policy, you did not give me a general Policy, I call upon you therefore for damages. It is said that the Insurance Company could not comply with that agreement, for that they could not have a general Policy. But if that is so, what had the assured to do with that? The agent stipulated to do it, if the directors in London could not do it. It is my opinion, that the agent in Glasgow might have made a valid Policy; but that if he could not have made a valid Policy, they are bound to make compensation for the breach of that contract so entered into in Glasgow. They were bound, in my humble judgment, by that contract by which they engaged [568] to effect a Policy of a particular description, which they have not done; and not having done that, they are bound to make compensation to the party, in respect of all the loss he had sustained by their not having done so: the party being entitled to consider the case precisely as if the agreement had been executed.

Then with respect to the renewal of the Policy. What sort of a renewal was that to be? Here is an agreement to execute a valid Policy: the party insuring was entitled to consider that as a Policy, an undertaking to do that which was to be done. The rule operates upon that which the party agreed to do, and which a Court of Equity considers as already done, and therefore it is a renewal of a Policy having effect in Scotland. I am happy to say, that although the Court of Session were not unanimous upon this point, three of the judges were of opinion that this was to be considered as a contract in Scotland, and the Pursuers declared upon it as a contract so framed, a contract to be executed in Scotland. The other learned judge seemed to entertain a contrary opinion, and it was in consequence of the judges of the Court below differing in opinion upon this point, that they were led to do that which I think they were not justified in doing, namely, to decide the question on another point, which I consider as utterly untenable, the judges below having declared, that according to their opinion, this act of Parliament which prohibits all Companies from making insurances on ships and merchandizes at sea, does not apply to the case of a steam vessel. I stated to your Lordships yesterday my reasons for differing in opinion [569] from those learned judges, with respect to that point; and I do that with the utmost deference and the utmost respect. From all I have seen as to the judgments of those learned judges, I am led to entertain the highest respect for their knowledge and their attainments, but I am bound here in advising your Lordships in reference to the judgment here to be pronounced, after paying every attention to the subject, to act according to the result of my own opinion. I think that the grounds on which the learned judges decided this case in the Court below, cannot be sustained, but that upon the proceedings and the evidence, it is clear that the Pursuers are entitled to recover: they are entitled to recover upon the principle of this being an agreement for an insurance entered into in Scotland—a contract made in Scotland. The act of the 6th Geo. I. c. 18, not extending to Scotland, the contract is a valid contract, and the Plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages, for the purpose of affording them compensation for the loss they have sustained by the breach of that agreement.

On these grounds, I should suggest that the judgment be affirmed, not in the terms in which it has been pronounced; but that, in your Lordships' opinion, the Pursuers have made good their claim. The form of the judgment shall be prepared, and I will on a future day submit it for the opinion of your Lordships.

[570] (27 June, 1828). It is declared, that although this House is of opinion that the insurance upon which the Respondents sought to recover damages, is a species of insurance to which the statute 6th Geo. I. c. 18. does apply; yet inasmuch as this House is of opinion that the said statute, as to that part of it to which the interlocutor of the Court of Session of the 22d of January refers, does not extend to Scotland, the said appeal upon the facts of this case ought to be dismissed, and the interlocutors affirmed. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the appeal be dismissed, and with the above declaration, that the several interlocutors complained of be affirmed.

REPORTS of CASES heard in the House of Lords, upon Appeals and Writs of Error, and decided during the Session 1829. By RICHARD BLIGH, Barrister-at-Law. Vol. III. New Series.

IRELAND.

(EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.)

RICHARD BALL, a Minor, by HENRY WEMYSS, his Uncle and next Friend, - Plaintiff in Error; PATRICK MANNIX, Lessee of Laurelot Shinton Ball, Defendant in Error.

[Mews' Dig. iv, 81; S.C. 1 Dow and Cl. 380. The modern test of contractual capacity in the case of insane persons and of persons of weak capacity is given in Imperial Loan Co. v. Stone (1892) 1 Q.B. 599. See also Balby v. Smith (1900) 1 Ch. 588, as to lunatic; and notes to Huguenin v. Bassey (1 Wh. and T. L. C. 7th Ed. 247) as to undue influence.]

By a deed in 1762, lands were conveyed to the use of the grantor for life, and after his death in trust for D. S. his daughter, the wife of R. S.; and after her death, to the first and other sons successively of D. S. by R. S., with remainders over, and subject to a power of revocation. In 1763 the grantor, by a will made in execution of the power, directed and desired that if there should be no issue male of the existing marriage, the lands should stand limited (subject to the dispositions of the deed of 1762) to the first and other sons of his daughter, by any other husband.

R. S. died in 1778, leaving D. S. his widow, and four sons surviving. Soon after his death, D. S. married R. B., by whom she had a son A. B.

J. S. the eldest son of the first marriage, having been from his infancy a person of weak capacity, in the year 1785, as soon as he came of age, joined with his mother and father-in-law, [2] as party to a deed, by which reciting his title as tenant in tail in remainder, subject to his mother's life interest in the lands, and an agreement which had been made for providing thereout, a present maintenance for him; and that the younger children of his mother had been left without provision by the deed of 1762; and further reciting certain expenditure made on the premises by R. B. the husband of his mother, for the benefit of the inheritance, the lands were assigned to trustees for a term of five hundred years, in trust to secure to J. S. an annuity of £ , and subject thereto to the use of the mother for life; remainder to R. B. for his life, remainder to trustees for a term, to raise portions for the younger children of D. M. his mother, and subject thereto to the use of J. S. and the heirs male of his body, and in default of male issue to such other of the children of D. M. as she should appoint, and in default of appointment, to R. S., E. S., and A. B., three of her children; remainder to her right heirs.

A fine and recovery were levied to give effect to this deed, which was registered in 1789.

J. S. died in 1794. In 1800, L. S., the second son of the first marriage, filed a bill in Chancery against R. B. and D. his wife, to establish the deed of 1762, and to set aside the deed 1785 on the ground of fraud. This bill was dismissed by the plaintiff in 1805.

By deed in 1803, D. the mother, appointed the lands to A. B. her youngest son, subject to the payment of annuities. In 1809 the lands were, by deed executed on the marriage of A. B., settled on the husband and wife, and the issue of the marriage, notwithstanding notice given to the parties by L. S. of his claim.

R. B. died in 1813. A. B. died in 1814, leaving a son. D. the mother died in 1818. Upon this event, L. S. brought an ejectment against the parties in possession under the deed of 1785. This ejectment was not prosecuted, but in 1821 L. S. being dead, an ejectment was brought against the same parties by his son. Upon the trial it was agreed between the parties, that the sole question should be, whether the deed of 1785 was void at law as the deed of J. S. It was sworn upon the trial by some witnesses, that J. S. was not competent at the time of executing the deed, and they spoke to acts and conduct evidencing mental incapacity. On the other hand, it was by others sworn, that he was competent to execute. It was admitted that the incapacity did not arise from lunacy,—no evidence having been given of lunacy.

[3] The Judge, in his charge to the jury, told them that the question for them to try was, whether J. S. was a person of sound mind or not, and that to constitute such unsoundness of mind as should avoid a deed at law, the person executing such a deed, must be incapable of understanding and acting in the ordinary affairs of life, that it was not necessary that he should be without any glimmering of reason, and that as one test of such incapacity, the jury were at liberty to consider whether he was capable of understanding what he did by executing the deed in question, when its general purport was fully explained to him. To this direction a bill of exceptions was taken, upon the ground that the Judge refused to tell the jury that in order to avoid the deed at law, the unsoundness of mind must amount to that which constitutes idiocy according to the strict legal definition of an idiot.

Held that this direction was right, and that the case could not be argued or decided upon an objection that the direction was too general and vague, because such objection was not taken at the trial, and did not form part of the bill of exceptions.

In the year 1762, John Ball was seised in fee of the town and lands of Bannagh-nough, otherwise Three Castles, Neaglesland, Boards, and Pricksheath and Monabricka, lying in the parish of Bannagh-nough, otherwise Three Castles, in the barony of Cranagh and county of Kilkenny.

Dorothea Margaret Ball, his only child, intermarried privately with Richard Shinton.

For the purpose of making a provision for Dorothea Margaret and her issue, independently of her husband, John Ball executed an indenture of release upon the 10th of July, 1762, by which he granted, released, and confirmed the said town and lands to certain trustees, in trust to the use of himself for life, remainder to his daughter Dorothea Margaret for life, remainder to her heirs in [4] tail male, with divers remainders over, reserving a power to alter these limitations by deed or will.

On the 6th of March, 1763, John Ball, by his will, after charging the town and lands with an annuity of £100 per annum to his wife during her life, devised and directed as follows: "And I hereby devise, and direct and declare, that the said trustees mentioned in the said deed of the 10th of July, 1762, shall as far as the law can permit, be deemed and taken to stand seised of my estate vested in them or granted to them, in the first place, to the uses of this my will: and that they do every act in their power to establish and fulfil the same; and my further will is, that as there are now seven years of a lease of the house and gardens and seventy acres of land to come, commencing from the 25th of March, 1763, to Folliot Warren, Esq. that at the expiration of the said lease my daughter Dorothea Margaret Shinton may live in said house, and may have said number of acres during her life, but not her husband or any one of their family after her decease: but to be set by my said trustees after her decease, to the best improved rent for the benefit of her children, nor shall the said Shinton have any power during said Dorothea Margaret's life to turn, plough, or cut down any oak, ash, elm, hazle, or apple trees or hedges whatsoever, or on any account, and to keep up the improvements for the benefit of her children." By this will the testator also made a large provision for the younger children of his daughter.

John Ball died soon after executing this will.

In the year 1778, Richard Shinton, the husband [5] of Dorothea Margaret, died, leaving issue, John, their eldest son, who was from his infancy weak in mind; Lancelot, their second son, the father of the Defendant in error; Richard, their third son; George, their fourth son, and an only daughter, Dorothea. All these children took the name of Ball.

Soon after the death of Richard Shinton, Dorothea Margaret intermarried with Richard Ball, for many years a practising attorney, by whom she had an only son Abraham, who was the father of the Plaintiff in error.

By deed, dated October 17, 1785, and executed by and between Richard Ball and Dorothea Margaret, his wife, of the first part, John Shinton Ball of the second part, the Reverend Wardlow Ball, clerk, and Serjeant John Ball of the third part, John Humphrey of the fourth part, and Samuel Foley of the fifth and last part, reciting the title of Dorothea Margaret and John Shinton Ball to the said estate, and an agreement entered into for providing a present maintenance for him thereout, and that the younger children of Dorothea Margaret had been left wholly without any provision by the former deed; and further reciting the expenditure made by Richard Ball on the house and demesne, for the benefit of the inheritance, Richard Ball and Dorothea Margaret, his wife, and John Shinton Ball, joined in assigning the said lands and estate to Wardlow and John Ball, to the use of John Humphrey, for a term of three hundred years, in trust to secure the maintenance and present provision for John Shinton Ball, payable quarterly, and subject thereto to the use of Dorothea Margaret, without impeachment of waste, for her life, with remainder to Richard Ball for [6] his life, in like manner with remainder to Samuel Foley for a term of five hundred years, in trust to raise the portions so agreed to be provided for the younger children of Dorothea Margaret, and subject thereto to the use of John Shinton Ball, and the heirs male of his body; and in default of such issue, to the use of such other of her children, and for such estates therein, as Dorothea Margaret should by deed or writing, under her hand and seal, and attested by two or more credible witnesses, or by her last will, direct and appoint; and in default of such direction and appointment, to the use of Richard Shinton, George Shinton, and Abraham Ball, three of her children, share and share alike as tenants in common in tail general; and for default of such issue, with remainder to the right heirs of Dorothea Margaret for ever. And the deed, after reciting that a fine with proclamation had been levied in the preceding Trinity term, of the lands, by Richard and Dorothea Margaret Ball, and John Shinton Ball, to Wardlow Ball, directed that the fine should enure to make him a perfect tenant to the precipe of the lands, that a common recovery might be suffered thereof by the said parties, in order to bar all estates tail and remainders therein, and to enure to the uses declared by the said deed, and reserved a joint power of revocation of the said uses and trusts, and of new appointment of others in their stead, to Richard and Dorothea and John Shinton Ball, during the lives of Richard and Dorothea; and to John Shinton Ball, and the survivor of Richard and Dorothea Margaret, during the life of such survivor. This deed was registered on the 21st day of October, 1789.

[7] The recovery was suffered by John Shinton Ball as of Michaelmas term, 1785, by virtue of a warrant of attorney duly executed by him for the purpose, in which recovery Thomas Ball was defendant, and Wardlow Ball was tenant to the precipe, who appeared and vouched John Shinton Ball, who appeared by his attorney and vouched the common vouchees.

John Shinton Ball died in the year 1794, and his brother Lancelot Shinton Ball exhibited his bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland upon the 24th of December, 1800, against Richard Ball and Dorothea his wife, stating the settlement and will of John Ball, the imbecility of John Shinton Ball, and that fraud was practised upon him, and praying that Richard and Dorothea might bring into Court the deed of 10th July, 1762, and that the trusts thereof might be performed, and that the fraudulent deed might be set aside, and that the fine and recovery might enure to the uses of the deed of 1762.

This bill was afterwards dismissed at the instance of the Plaintiff.

By deed dated May 14, 1803, Dorothea Margaret Ball, in pursuance and execution of the power reserved to her by the deed of the 17th of October, 1785, limited and appointed the lands, after her own and her husband's death, and subject to the trust terms thereby created, to the use of her youngest son Abraham Ball and his heirs, subject however to and charged with an annuity of £40 yearly to Richard Shinton, her third son by her first husband, for his life; and a further annuity of £30 yearly to her daughter, Dorothea Shinton, for her life, payable thereout.

[8] Abraham Ball afterwards intermarried with Jane Wemyss, in consideration of which marriage, a settlement, dated April 4, 1809, was executed by and between Richard Ball and Dorothea Margaret, his wife, of the first part, Abraham Ball of the second part, James Wemyss, and Jane his daughter, of the third part, and the said James Wemyss, Sir John Blunden, Bart. and the Rev. Sterne Ball, clerk, of the fourth and last part, whereby the said lands and premises were settled and limited to the uses of the said marriage, viz. to provide a present maintenance for Abraham Ball, and a jointure for his intended wife, and subject thereto after the decease of the said Dorothea Margaret and Richard Ball, to Abraham Ball for his life, and after his death, to the use of the issue of the said marriage, subject to his appointment by deed or will as therein mentioned.

The marriage afterwards took effect, and there was issue born thereof, Richard Ball, the Plaintiff in error, and two daughters, Martha and Dorothea.

Richard Ball died in 1813, leaving his wife, Dorothea Margaret, surviving him.

Abraham Ball died in 1814, leaving his three children surviving him, and without having exercised the power of appointment given him by the deed of the 4th of April, 1809.

Dorothea Margaret Ball died in 1818; upon her death, Richard Ball, the Plaintiff in error, and his sisters, took possession of the estate.

Immediately after the death of Dorothea Margaret, Lancelot Shinton, her second son, the father of the Defendant in error, as of Michaelmas term 1818, brought an ejectment in the Court of Exchequer to recover the possession of the lands [9] and laid demises therein in his own name, and in the names of several other persons, in whom the legal estate in the premises might be considered to be outstanding; defence was taken to this ejectment for all the premises therein in the names of the Plaintiff in error and his sisters, and the cause being at issue, a consent was entered into between the parties therein, limiting the issue to be tried between them to the sole question of the competence of John Shinton Ball to execute the deed of the 17th October, 1785.

The issue in the cause came on to be tried before a special jury of the County of Kilkenny, at the summer assizes 1819, when after the Plaintiff had gone through his case, and three witnesses having been examined for the Defendant, a compromise was proposed and agreed to on both sides, and made a rule of the Court, and the jury was discharged by consent without giving any verdict.

Launcelot Shinton having subsequently refused to abide by the compromise, and to fulfil its terms, and having proceeded to bring another ejectment to recover possession of the lands in the Court of King's Bench, and obtained judgment by default therein, a conditional order was obtained from the Court of Exchequer for an attachment against him for his contempt of the Court in so proceeding under the circumstances, unless he should forthwith vacate the judgment.

Launcelot Shinton having subsequently refused to abide by the compromise, and to the order could not be served upon him in person, and in February 1821 he died without having been served therewith, leaving the Defendant in error his eldest son and heir at law, who immediately thereupon as of [10] Hilary term 1821, brought an ejectment for recovery of the lands in the Court of King's Bench in Ireland, on his own and other demises, to which ejectment defence was taken in the name of the Plaintiff in error.

In the following year the father of the lessor of the Defendant in error died, and in the next year an ejectment was brought by the Defendant in error against the Plaintiff, which came on to be tried at the assizes for the county of Kilkenny, on the 4th day of August, 1823, when (as the record bears) it was admitted and agreed by the counsel concerned for the parties on each side, that the sole question to be tried should be, "Whether a certain deed executed by the said John Shinton Ball in his lifetime, bearing date the 17th day of October, 1785, was or was not valid at law, as the deed of him the said John Shinton Ball, which deed had been executed by the said John Shinton Ball and the other parties thereto, for the purpose of leading the uses of a certain fine and common recovery levied and suffered by the said John Shinton Ball in his lifetime, of the lands in the said ejectment mentioned, as remainder-man in tail thereof, in conjunction with his mother Dorothea Ball, the preceding tenant for life of the said lands, and that if the said deed should be found to be not valid, as the deed of the said John Shinton Ball, that then a verdict should pass for the lessor of the Plaintiff in this case as heir male of the body of Laurelot Shinton his father, deceased, who in his lifetime was next remainder-man in tail of the said lands, and in such right entitled to the said lands on the death of his mother the said Dorothea, the te[11]-nant for life, (the said John Shinton Ball his elder brother being then dead, without lawful issue of his body,) and on the other hand, if the said deed should be found to be valid as the deed of the said John Shinton Ball, then that a verdict should pass for the Defendant; and it was further admitted and agreed by the counsel on each side for the said parties, that the said John Shinton Ball had died in the month of December 1791, and had not left any lawful issue of his body, and that Richard Ball, the second husband of the said Dorothea Ball, had died in the year 1813, and that the said Dorothea had died in the year 1818, leaving the said Laurelot Shinton, the father of the lessor of the Plaintiff, her then oldest surviving son by her first husband, and Abraham Ball, father of the Defendant, her son by the said Richard Ball, her second husband, her surviving; and the counsel for the lessor of the Plaintiff having thereupon opened the case in his behalf in order to maintain the said issue, on his part produced several witnesses, who being duly sworn deposed, that the said John Shinton Ball at the time of his executing the said deed, was not, in their opinion, competent to execute the same, and further deposed to acts and conduct of the said John Shinton Ball, as evidencing his mental incapacity, and having given such evidence, and the said deed of the 17th October, 1785, having been read in evidence, the said counsel thereupon closed the Plaintiff's case; and the counsel for the Defendant thereupon, after stating the case on his behalf, called several witnesses to maintain the issue on his part, who being [12] sworn and examined deposed, that in their opinion the said John Shinton Ball at the said time was competent to execute the said deed, and further deposed to acts and conduct of the said John Shinton Ball as evidencing his mental capacity, and deposed that the said John Shinton Ball was certainly not an idiot; and thereupon the case and evidence having been closed on both sides, and it having been admitted and agreed by the counsel for each of the parties, that the alleged incapacity of mind of the said John Shinton Ball did not arise from lunacy, no evidence having been given of lunacy in him, the learned Judge in his charge commented and observed upon the evidence given on each side, and told the jury, that the question for them to try was, whether the said John Shinton Ball was a person of sound mind or not; and that to constitute such unsoundness of mind, as should avoid a deed at law, the person executing such deed must be incapable of understanding and acting in the ordinary affairs of life; that it was not necessary that he should be without any glimmering of reason, but that it was sufficient if he was incapable of understanding his own ordinary concerns, and that as one test of such incapacity, the jury were at liberty to consider, whether he was capable of understanding what he did by executing the deed in question when its general purport was fully explained to him; whereupon the counsel for the Defendant in the action called on the learned Judge, and required him to tell and direct the jury, that in order to avoid said deed at law, the unsoundness of mind of the said John Shinton [13] Ball must amount to that degree of unsoundness which constituted idiocy according to the strict legal definition of an idiot. But the learned Judge refused so to tell or direct the said jury on the said trial, but, on the contrary, directed them as before stated; wherefore the counsel for the said Defendant on his behalf excepted to the said opinion and direction of the learned Judge on the said trial; and, at the request of the counsel for the Plaintiff in error, the learned Judge who presided at the trial put his seal to a bill of exceptions to the above effect, tendered by them.

The matter having been argued upon the exceptions before the Court of King's Bench in Ireland, that Court, on the 8th February, 1825, overruled the exceptions, and judgment was thereupon entered for the Defendant in error.

The Plaintiff in error being dissatisfied with this judgment of the Court of King's Bench, brought his writ of error returnable in the Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, insisting "that in the record and proceedings aforesaid, and also in the matter recited and contained in the bill of exceptions, and also in giving the judgment aforesaid, there is manifest error in this, to wit, that the Honourable Mr. Justice Jebb, the learned judge before whom, and so forth, at and upon the trial of the issue so joined between the parties aforesaid, did direct and tell the jury so impanelled to try the issue, that the question for them to try was, Whether the said John Shinton Ball was a person of sound mind or not, and that, to constitute such unsoundness of mind as should avoid a deed at law, the person executing such deed must [14] be incapable of understanding and acting in the ordinary affairs of life. That it was not necessary that he should be without any glimmering of reason, but that it was sufficient if he was incapable of understanding his own ordinary concerns; and that as one test of such incapacity, the said jury were at liberty to consider whether he was capable of understanding what he did by making the deed in question, when its general purport was generally explained to him: And there is also error in this, to wit, that the learned Judge, upon the trial of the issue, did refuse to tell and direct the said jury, though called upon so to do by counsel for the said Richard Ball, that in order to avoid the deed so executed by the said John Shinton Ball at law, the unsoundness of mind of the said John Shinton Ball must amount to that degree of unsoundness of mind which constituted idiocy, according to the strict legal definition of an idiot. And there is also error in this, to wit, that by the record aforesaid it appears that the verdict aforesaid was given upon the issue for the said Patrick Mannin, whereas the verdict, by the law of the land as to the issue, ought to have been given for the said Richard Ball," etc.

The case was argued before the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, upon the 15th day of June, 1826, when the Judges gave their opinions seriatim, six of them being of opinion that the judgment should, and the remaining six that it should not be reversed: whereupon, according to the practice of the Court, the judgment remained undisturbed and was affirmed. Richard [15] Ball then brought his writ of error returnable in Parliament, and assigned for errors the several matters on which he insisted before the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, to which the said Patrick Mannin rejoined that there was no error.

For the Plaintiff in Error: Mr. Sugden and Mr. Swan.

There are only four kinds of insanity known to the law, lunacy, idiocy, accidental loss and wilful deprivation of understanding (Co. Litt. 248, a. Beverley's Case, 4 Co. 124). This case does not fall within the two last divisions, and lunacy being excluded by agreement, the question is confined to idiocy. In the cases of drunkenness and blindness, and where the question is as to the degree of understanding, the courts proceed on the ground of fraud, which is a good objection at law as well as in equity. There are cases peculiar to equity, which proceed on equitable grounds (Osmond v. Fitzroy. Citing Johnson v. Medlicot, 3, P. W., 130). The judgment in this case seems to have proceeded on the principles applied in commissions of lunacy and in courts of equity, which is a different species of jurisdiction; and even in those cases the jury must find that the person is of unsound mind,—it is not sufficient to find that he is of weak judgment and understanding, and incapable to manage his affairs, and formerly commissions were not granted upon this ground (Exp. Barnsley, 3 Atk. 168. Lord Donegal's case, 2 Ves. 407. See Ridgway v. Darwin, 8 Ves. 65).

[16] Where courts of equity make deeds void on the ground of weakness of understanding, it is in cases where there is inadequacy of price, or undue influence, by parental authority or otherwise; and even in such cases effect is given to such deeds, so far as they are providently executed (Bennet v. Vade, 2 Atk. 324).

If insanity were the only ground, the case would be sent to a court of law. If weakness of understanding is the ground of proceeding, it is only one among other ingredients which in equity constitute fraud. To direct a jury to consider whether a man is capable of understanding a deed is a dangerous practice, and contrary to the practice on commissions of lunacy.

In exp. Holmes * the jury found that the party was "not competent," and the proceeding was quashed because the return was deemed insufficient. In exp. Cranmer (12 Ves. q. 415) the return was, that "he was so far debilitated in his mind as to be incapable of the general management of his affairs." This return was quashed for insufficiency: so a return in the words of the Judge's direction to the jury in this case would have been quashed. If the finding is not in the words of the commission, it must be in words of known legal import, that the party is of unsound mind. In Ridgway v. Durin (8 Ves. 65. See Sherrwood v. Sanderson, 19 Ves. 280), Lord Eldon ordered physicians to visit a lady whom a jury had found not to be a lunatic, for the purpose of determining whether her state of mind was competent to the [17] management of her affairs, with a view to personal control without a commission, and he said that, although it was not a case of insanity, he thought himself bound to do this, if it was only made out that it was not fit that she should have the management of her pecuniary affairs. But this is language unfit to be addressed to a jury, and the doctrine cannot be applied at law. The cases of supposed partial insanity* are in fact total:—the proof only is partial. At law the only question is, whether the party is of unsound mind. Before the Lord Chancellor the question may be, where insanity is not proved, whether the protection of the Court is not necessary for the individual. There is a case now before the Lord Chancellor, where the party has lost his faculties by age (Exp. Clement, still pending). The case of Faulder (3 Camp. 126, more full 1 Coll. Lun. 390) v. Silk is no authority for the Defendant, it is an authority for the Plaintiff. There the fact of lunacy was established prior to the execution of the bond, and the only question was, whether it was executed during a lucid interval. In this case the question of lunacy is excluded. The direction of the Judge was wrong, because it was not confined to idiocy, and because it induced the jury to look to the whole life of the party who executed the deed, not precisely to the particular time of execution.

* Before L. C. Lyndhurst, 23d Nov. 1827: a new commission issued on the 26th November, under which the party was found of unsound mind.

In the case of wills, the question turns upon general capacity, and wills have been found void [18] where the testator would not have been found insane if living. The question as to deeds stands on different principles. That is a question between parties dealing for consideration, whereas in wills it is between representatives and voluntary donees.

The charge of the Judge is vague, uncertain, and calculated to mislead the jury. If the jury were satisfied that the party was capable at the time of executing the deed, they were not at liberty to enter into the question whether he was capable of acting in the ordinary affairs of life. The jury should have been directed to inquire, whether he understood the act, and to go no further. They were directed to try a question not before them. His general conduct was not a question at issue. He might have been prodigal, and apparently incapable of acting in ordinary affairs, yet not insane, and incapable of understanding and executing the deed in question. The great objection to the Judge's direction is, that the capacity to do the act is not put as the real criterion and distinct matter in issue, but only as one test to shew the soundness of his mind as to all the acts of his life. So that upon a question of purchase, no man could act safely without inquiring as to the whole conduct in a vendor's life. The question upon a direction to a jury, and the influence which it may have, is very different from the opinion of a judge, on a point of law. The direction is wrong both in what is directed and what is omitted.

For the Defendants in error: The Solicitor General and Mr. Jervis.

This case has been argued as if it were an application to the Court for a new trial, upon the ground of a general misdirection, whereas the [19] question is upon specific exceptions. The statute (W. 2, 13 Ed. 1) provides, "that the judgment shall be given according to the exceptions as allowed or disallowed." It was the object of the statute that the trial of the Judge should be limited to the precise exception. If new exceptions are to be argued, the Judge is treated unfairly. It has been decided, that a party is not at liberty to go into the general question (Warre v. Miller, 4 B. and C. 538). If the matter is on the record as a bad declaration, the whole record

* Dow v. Clarke. Addams' Exc. Rep. 3, 79. Haggard's Judgment of Sir J. Nichol before the Delegates, 1828. Before the L. C. on application for a commission of review, 1829, not repd. Exp. Mitchell heard before the Lord Chancellor in private.

being before the Court, it might be questioned. The question here was limited to the objection, that the Judge refused to direct the jury that in order to avoid the deed, the unsoundness of mind must amount to that degree which constituted idiocy. This raised the question, whether any incapacity short of idiocy could avoid a deed at law. But with this is now mixed up another part of the Judge's address to the jury, which should have been made the subject of exception, if the parties intended to avail themselves of any objection to it. The point was hardly raised in the argument of the case below, and, in fact, was not open for discussion even as to this point. The question put by the Judge is in substance whether the party was capable of understanding the deed which he executed, not merely as to the general propriety of his conduct.

The letter of the writ, in a commission of lunacy, requires the jury to inquire whether the party is lunatic or idiot, but now that form is disregarded, and it is held sufficient to find the party of unsound mind. Why should not a similar change be admitted in the practice at law.

[20] Other rules of law have undergone equal alteration. The rule as to access on a question of legitimacy. The rule that a man cannot stultify himself.* So drunkenness is a good evidence on a plea of non est factum and delivery, as an escrow may be given in evidence on the same plea. The real question is, whether the party is capable of understanding the deed he executes. The distinction between deeds and wills is not admitted. The question upon a will is, whether the testator has a mind capable of disposing of his property. The question upon a deed is substantially the same, and juries are always so directed in the case of deeds. The question in Faulder v. [Silk] was the same as this. The direction was there given with a greater latitude, and the inquisition was held to be evidence [3 Camp. 126].

Lord Tenterden: In forming an opinion upon this case, the House can only look to the bill of exceptions to ascertain the facts and questions for decision. Facts not there to be found must be wholly disregarded. Before I enter upon the substance of the question, it is right to advert to a topic so strenuously urged by the counsel for the Plaintiff in error, that six of the Judges were of opinion that the direction was calculated to mislead the jury. That is an argument which cannot prevail in this House. If all the Judges of Ireland were of one opinion upon this subject, and the House had entertained a different opinion, it would have been their bounden duty to act upon their own opinion. A court of error ought [21] not to be influenced by the judgment of those from whose decision the appeal is brought. (Here the noble Lord stated the substance of the record.)

The question arising out of this record is, whether the Judge's direction to the jury was correct.

It was argued by the counsel that the party was not a lunatic,—that is, that he was not at one time of sound mind and at another time unsound; but whatever the state of mind might be, that it was not temporary but permanent. The Judge told the jury that the question was, whether the party was of sound mind or not,—and that mode of stating the question was quite correct. He then proceeded to give a definition, "That to constitute such unsoundness as should avoid a deed at law, the party executing such deed must be incapable of understanding and acting in the ordinary affairs of life." In that, perhaps, he went too far. The Judge then directed the jury that "It was not necessary he should be without any glimmering of reason; and as one test of such incapacity, they were at liberty to consider whether he was capable of understanding what he did by executing the deed in question, when its general purport was fully explained to him."

The counsel for the defendant then required the Judge to tell the jury, that in order to avoid the deed at law, the unsoundness of mind must amount to idiocy, according to the strict legal definition of an idiot; and this being refused, the bill of exceptions was tendered and sealed.

It is impossible to read this record without seeing that the point of the objection is this, and this only,—that it was erroneous to direct the jury [22] to make any other enquiry than this, whether the party was an idiot. If the Judge ought so to have directed, the direction given was erroneous: but it is impossible so to contend. The jury were in substance directed to enquire whether the party was of unsound mind: and I find that the Lord Chancellor, according to the authorities, has held that a finding in these terms is sufficient.

As to the strict legal definition, I find in an old book on this subject, that if a person is capable of learning the alphabet he is not within the legal definition of idiocy; yet it is impossible to hold that persons no further qualified are capable of executing a deed. The question at law is, whether, in substance, there is such capacity of execution: and, in effect, the Judge in this case so put the question to the jury, when he told them that the question was, whether the party was of sound mind or not, and directed them to consider whether he was capable of understanding the deed when explained.

The observation as to the glimmering, will not make the whole direction erroneous, nor was it irregular or improper when considered in connexion with the other parts of the direction to the jury. In my opinion it was right.

The objection that the direction was too vague, indefinite, or general, cannot be taken upon this record. Counsel intending to raise such objection, should call upon the Judge to give more specific direction, that he may have the opportunity of correcting his error.

Lord Plunket: I concur in the proposed judgment: it is unnecessary to assign the reasons. But as to the ambiguity of the direction, if that [23] is to be made a ground of objection, it should be distinctly stated to the Judge at the time, and put on the record. The ambiguity of the direction would then be a question for the consideration of the Court of error.

Judgment affirmed.

IRELAND.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

JOHN O'NEILL, Esq.—Appellant: The Right Honourable JAMES FITZGERALD, JAMES BURKE, and the GOVERNOR and COMPANY of the BANK of IRELAND,—Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. xi. 713.]

By the stat. 23 and 24th Geo. III. of the Parliament of Ireland, for securing the monies of suitors of the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer, by depositing the same in the National Bank, which provides for the appointment of an Accountant-General for the Court of Exchequer, it is enacted that "So long as he observes the rules thereby, or by the Court to be prescribed, he shall not be answerable for any monies which he shall not actually receive, but that the Bank shall be answerable for all monies deposited with them;" and regulations for the transfer of stock are specified in the act.

Under this act A. was appointed Accountant-General of the Court of Exchequer, in the year 1796.

In the year 1810, A. executed a power of attorney, authorising S. B. his chief clerk, to make transfers in the Bank books of any stock, of which A. should first have executed a transfer draft under his hand, on cheque paper, pursuant to the orders of the Court. This power was deposited at the transfer office at the Bank.

Under this power S. B. producing a certificate or transfer draft, purporting to be signed by A., but in fact forged, and in several respects not conformable to the particulars required by the power and the statutory regulations, obtained a transfer of stock from one cause to another, for the purpose of supplying deficiencies in the stock in the latter cause, which had been caused by transfers under certificates formerly forged by [25] S. B. Upon the discovery of this transfer from the first to the second cause, two creditors in the first cause, who had proved their debts, made a motion in the cause, calling upon A. to refund the stock transferred: which, after hearing affidavits of the Appellant and the Bank of Ireland, was ordered by the Court. Upon appeal against this order, it was questioned whether the Court of Exchequer had jurisdiction to make such order by a summary proceeding, not in a cause, and whether the House of Lords had jurisdiction to entertain such appeal. But eventually the order was reversed.

The Appellant was Accountant-General of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland.

In the year 1810 he executed a power of attorney, by which he appointed Sampson Browne the chief clerk in his office, his attorney, for him and in his name to transfer, in the books of the Bank of Ireland, all government and other stock of every kind, which should be in the Bank on his account, as Accountant-General of the Court, and which the Appellant should, by draft under his hand, written on cheque paper, (as usual in his drafts as Accountant-General on the Bank) transfer, pursuant to the order of the Court: And the Appellant, by the power of attorney, authorised and empowered Sampson Browne, in the Appellant's name, to do all acts required by the forms of proceeding in the Bank, which should be necessary for completing the transfer of such stock in the books of the Bank, as the Appellant should, by such draft under his hand, transfer: and thereby ratifying all such lawful acts as Sampson Browne should do, for the purpose of carrying such transfer, as the Appellant should so execute, into full and complete effect.

[26] The cheque paper, mentioned in the power of attorney, was paper having on it an impression in copper-plate, with blanks for names, dates, and sums, to be filled according to each occasion, so as to make a certificate that the writer had transferred certain stock as therein stated.

This power of attorney, thus restricted, was deposited in the Bank.

Sampson Browne, on the 16th December, 1818, produced at the Bank a certificate, bearing date the 14th of that month, entitled, in two causes then depending in the Court of Exchequer, viz. Blakeney and others against Annesley and others, and Hickey against Fitzmaurice and others. The certificate was in the words and figures following:

December 14th, 1818.

Blakeney and others a. Annesley and others.

Hickey a. Fitzmaurice and others.

Pursuant to order, dated 7th December, 1818, I do hereby transfer from the credit of the first cause to the credit of the second cause, Government stock at five per cent. to the amount or one thousand nine hundred and twenty pounds, two shillings, and one penny, which place to my account in said second cause.

£1920 2 1 5 per cent. Gov. stock.

JOHN O'NEILL,

JOSEPH MACARTNEY.

To the Governor and Company of the Bank of Ireland.

This certificate was written on plain paper, and [27] the whole of the writing on it, except the name Joseph Macartney, was that of Sampson Browne.

After the certificate had been examined and passed by the proper officers of the Bank of Ireland, the transfer was immediately completed.

At the time when the certificate was brought to the Bank, the balance of 5 per cent. stock to the credit of the cause of Hickey v. Fitzmaurice, was £1549 2s. 3d., and the sum of £1920 2s. 1d. having been added to the sum of £1549 2s. 3d. 5 per cent. stock, by means of the transfer, the balance of 5 per cent. stock to the credit of the cause then amounted to £3469 4s. 4d.

Afterwards, on the same day, Sampson Browne produced at the Bank another certificate, which was in the words and figures following:

Hickie
a. { To the Govt. and C^o. of the Bank of Ireland.
Fitzmaurice { Accountant-General's Office. and others. }

IN THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.
1 per cent. Gov. stock.

No. 1241.

£3082 10 10

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Pursuant to an order, dated the 9th December, 1818, I do hereby transfer to Harman Fitzmaurice, or James Fitzmaurice, his attorney, government stock at 5 per cent. to the amount of three thousand and eighty-two pounds, ten shillings, and ten pence, which place to my account in the above cause.

[28] Provided that, if this draft be not paid within one month after date, the same shall be void.

JOSEPH MACARTNEY.

Dec. 16th,
1818 eighteen.

JOHN O'NEILL.

Accountant-General of the Court of Exchequer.

This certificate was on the cheque paper, and the whole of the writing at foot thereof was of the hand-writing of the Appellant.

On the production of this certificate, the transfer mentioned in it was immediately completed, the fund being then sufficient for that purpose, by reason of the preceding transfer to that cause.

On the 10th of February, 1826, a notice, entitled, in the cause of Blakeney and others against Annesley and others, was served on the Respondents, the Governor and Company of the Bank of Ireland, on behalf of the Right Honourable James Fitzgerald and Jane Bourke, creditors under a decree made in the cause, of an application intended to be made to the Court of Exchequer to oblige the Appellant to replace the sum of £1920 2s. 1d. government stock; and that the directors of the Bank should permit an inspection of their books and other documents relating to the account in the cause, or furnish a copy of the account to the attorney of the said creditors. In support of this application, affidavits were filed by the solicitor of the applicants, and by the Accountant General of the Bank.

On the 15th of February, 1826, the Court of Exchequer made an order that the Bank should allow the parties to inspect the books and documents relating to the account, or furnish a copy of it; and that the Accountant General should [29] replace the said stock and the interest thereon, unless cause should be shown in four days after service of the order.

The Appellant made an affidavit, stating that the document of transfer was a forgery, and the transfer made without authority, and contrary to the form in which he was accustomed to make transfer drafts.

On the 22d. of February, 1826, the Appellant's affidavit having raised a question in which the Bank might be concerned, the Court, to give them an opportunity of laying the facts, on their part, before the Court, by affidavit, ordered that the motion should stand over till the Saturday following (February 26th).

On the 25th of February, 1826, an affidavit was made by Mr. Brabazon Stafford, the transfer officer of the Bank of Ireland, stating the power of attorney, the course of business, the transfers of the £1920 2s. 1d., and of the £3082 10s. 10d., the state of the account in the cause of Hickie against Fitzmaurice, and a transfer by the Appellant in December, 1819, some former transfers of the same kind which had been acted on by the Appellant, and the transfer then in question, insisting, that from the whole it was manifest, that the course of business, in such cases, was authorised by the Appellant, and that the particular transfer in question was known to him; and that, by so acting on it, he had deprived the Bank of the power of transferring back the stock in question; had affirmed the act of his clerk, if defective before, and had discharged the Bank from all responsibility thereon.

On the 26th of February, 1826, the Court, on the application of Appellant, ordered that the [30] motion should stand over till the 1st of March, with liberty for him to answer these affidavits, and for the Bank to file any further affidavits as they should be advised.

On the 1st of March, 1820, being the day to which the motion stood adjourned, a further affidavit was made by the Appellant, in which he objected to the certificate in question, as not being on cheque paper, and that, on examining the accounts it appeared that the transfer in question was made to replace the amount of three transfers previously made in the cause of Hickie against Fitzmaurice, to private persons, one of a sum of £110 14s. 7d. in money, one of £627 5s. 10d. of five per cent. stock, and one of £909 2s. 1d. of the like stock: and that the certificates for these transfers were never signed by the Appellant.

On the 1st of March, 1820, the Court ordered that the motion should stand over till the first day of the next term, with liberty to the Bank to file answers to the affidavit last mentioned.

On the 17th of April, 1820, several affidavits were filed on the part of the Bank of Ireland, and among others, Mr. Brabazon Stafford made a further affidavit, setting out some instances of transfers of stock to other causes, made by Browne under certificates on plain paper, and afterwards acted on by Appellant by certificates on cheque paper, signed by himself, for transferring over such stock, or part thereof, respectively to private persons, which transfers were made by Browne accordingly; and stating, that there were many more instances of the same nature.

On the 29th of April, 1820, on consideration of the several affidavits, and the several documents contained in them, the Court "Ordered [31] that the cause shown by the Appellant should be disallowed, that the order of February the 15th should be made absolute: and that the Appellant should, by the first day of the next term, replace to the credit of the said cause the sum of £1920 2s. 1d., five per cent. stock, with interest, from the said 16th day of December, 1818, until lodged, and that the cause shown by the Bank should be allowed, without prejudice to the rights of the creditors in the said cause, in making any further application against the said Bank, if it should thereafter be found necessary; and the said Court did declare that no costs were given on the said motion, and ordered the said Bank to furnish forthwith a correct copy when applied to, of the account in said cause, as standing in the books of the said Bank, with liberty to the creditors, or Connell O'Connell, their attorney, to compare the same, if found necessary."

From this order the appeal was presented.

The case was first argued in 1824, when the counsel for the Appellant entered upon the argument of the case on the merits, but were stopped by the Lord Chancellor (Eldon) and Lord Redesdale, who, in the course of the argument, made the following observations:—

The Lord Chancellor * (1821, Mar. 4): In matter of form, how is it that you make the Bank of Ireland a party? The application was in the cause of Annesley v. Blakeney, in which the order was made upon the Accountant-General. The Bank of Ireland was [32] not a party in the cause. There was no motion that the Bank should replace the stock, nor in the alternative that the Bank or the Accountant-General should replace it. They were ordered to produce their books, and having complied with that order, how could they be made parties? It being admitted that the Appellant in this proceeding does not seek to make them liable, how is it that they are brought here?

With respect to the injury to the parties in one way, the Court might have redressed it. If a sum of money, by means of a forged instrument, is transferred from one cause to another, the Court might order it to be re-transferred.

If the Accountant-General is an officer of the Court, they may have jurisdiction; if not, they have none. The order is a nullity, and how can it be the subject of appeal?

If at all the subject of appeal, it must be so as between the Accountant-General and the persons who applied for the order. If they are made parties, how can the Bank of Ireland be brought in?

If a short order cannot be made, but the proceeding must be by suit, for what purpose should we send it to a re-hearing in the Court of Exchequer, where they can make no order! How are the Bank parties! On notice from you they appear, being mere affidavit-men. You cannot summon witnesses to appear as parties. The order is upon the Accountant-General to replace the stock, and then, upon the supposition that he might be unable to do so, a power is reserved to the creditors to make such application as they may be advised. How do the counsel for the Appellant shew that the Bank of Ireland are par-[33] ties! It is said to have been treated in the Court below as an interpleading suit. It was an application of creditors in a suit to have money replaced. An order was made for that purpose on the Accountant-General. If he is an officer of the Court, there might be jurisdiction; if not, then the question is, by what right the jurisdiction was exercised! If this was a case in which there was no jurisdiction, and the House entertains an appeal, the consequence may be, that all orders in the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer may be brought here by appeal. If there is no redress here, there may be elsewhere, but it is not our duty to tell the parties what other Courts have jurisdiction.

The question as to the jurisdiction of this House must first be argued. The petition of appeal asks that the Bank of Ireland may answer. Suppose the Accountant-General to be civilly responsible, and an action brought against him, if the Plaintiff in the action had failed to obtain a verdict, could the Court of Exchequer have then made an order upon him in this summary way, without suit! It is clearly made upon him now as an officer of the Court. The Appellants may consider whether they will proceed to argue the question of jurisdiction. In the mean time the order is not to be drawn up. If they proceed no farther, the Bank of Ireland must have their costs.

Lord Redesdale: The Act of Parliament makes the Bank liable in case the Accountant-General observes the directions of the Act. But this is a summary proceeding; I doubt whether it is a subject of appeal.

If this had been the fraud of an attorney of the [34] Court, and they had ordered him to replace the stock, is there a jurisdiction in this House to entertain an appeal! It is a very important question, and might open the door to a flood of appeals. Suppose this had happened in a Court of Law, could any application have been made! The jurisdiction, I believe, was formerly much more extensive than it has been exercised now for many centuries. There is no precedent of appeal upon any summary order of this kind. It was much debated formerly, whether orders in the matter of appointing guardians could be the subject of appeal. There is a general notion that the jurisdiction now exercised by the House of Lords, belonged to and was derived from the ancient Parliament. They certainly exercised a much larger jurisdiction. I find in the rolls of Parliament, that the Commons contended that the appeal ought to be to the whole Parliament, but this happens to be in contradiction to the disclaimer of the Commons in the reign of Henry the Fourth.

In the case of Gibson, an attorney, who forged a certificate, the indictment was laid with intent to defraud the Bank of England. There was no application to the Court of Chancery in that case. According to the case made by Mr. O'Neill, there is no forgery as to him; for he says he is not answerable. It is, therefore, a fraud or forgery with intent to defraud the Bank of Ireland, or parties, it does not appear which. There was a power to Browne which might affect the question of forgery. There is a difference between the Irish and the English acts upon this subject. Here the order itself is required to be produced at the Bank. Supposing the Bank of Ireland not to be parties responsible in this proceeding, the difficult [35] question is, to know how to dispose of the matter as between the Appellant and the other parties. If there is no jurisdiction in this House to give redress upon appeal, and the Court of Exchequer in Ireland should proceed by attachment against Mr. O'Neill, for disobedience of the order which is now the subject of appeal, then, upon a writ of habeas corpus, or an action for false imprisonment, the question as to the jurisdiction of that Court would be raised.

As far as the House is concerned there are two questions: first, whether we have jurisdiction as to the Bank of Ireland; secondly, as to the other parties. As to the latter, it is material to consider on what ground the Court of Exchequer could make the order. Probably only upon the ground that the Accountant-General is an officer of the Court, subject to its summary jurisdiction. If so, this would be a precedent applicable to every case where an Attorney or other officer of the Court was censured. Every such case would be the subject of appeal to the House of Lords.

The case was again brought before the House in 1825.

For the Appellant: Mr. Hart and Mr. Shadwell.

Mr. Hart: The first question arising is this, was the order in itself an extra judicial order, such as it was not within the competence of that Court to have pronounced against such an officer: and, in the next place, if it was not an extra judicial order, such as it was not competent to the Court to pronounce, then whether it was not erroneous.

By the principles of the law of this country, [36] no subject of property can be finally decided without ultimate recourse to the protection of the superior judgment of the House of Lords, in reviewing those decisions which are fit subjects of appeal, and the present appeal was therefore presented to your Lordships. As I understand the case, the consequence of that appeal was to bring to your Lordships' view two points: first, whether the Court below exceeded the limits of its jurisdiction—if it did, then whether the House of Lords is not a proper tribunal to bring that Court to a sense of its duty, in keeping within the limits of its jurisdiction: or if not, whether the subjects of this country are in this dilemma—that although in causes depending between suitors upon subjects of property, where a Court acts, and acts judicially in the decision of rights, there is, in every case, an appeal to your Lordships to review the judgment: yet, if the Court thinks fit to travel beyond its jurisdiction—to exceed the proper bounds which the constitution and law of the country have prescribed—that neither your Lordships have a right to rescind orders so pronounced, nor any other tribunal that we are aware of, or of which we have been able to acquire any information from the learning of those who have looked into the subject.

It has been urged, that this House does not originate causes—that your Lordships only exercise jurisdiction upon the ground of appeal from some inferior tribunal—that in cases where there is no suit depending, your Lordships can take no notice of any injuries inflicted upon rights of persons or property, however grievous they may be—in other words, that your Lordships will not permit your House to be occupied by original com-[37]-plaints, but only to review those grave and solemn decisions, which it shall be considered as fit for the wisdom of a superior tribunal to set right when complained of. I admit that to be the case, and that in no instance where rights of property are infringed, can the party whose rights are thus affected, come originally before your Lordships. The case must go through the ordinary tribunals in the first instance, and those who have ground of complaint against the decisions of those tribunals, must come by appeal to the House: the rights of property between suitors cannot in any case, by any process or course of proceedings, which the Courts in this country admit, be so finally concluded as not to come under revision of your Lordships' judgment: but then a question arises whether your Lordships, who exercise a control over the judgments of the Courts below in rectifying erroneous judgments, are precluded from looking into the grounds of those judgments, to see whether those Courts have travelled beyond the authority which the King, who constituted them, intended to vest in them for the distribution of justice among his subjects.

If complaints on this subject were of frequent occurrence, we should probably have some precedent on subjects of the kind, enabling us to see how, when Courts of Justice in this country, I mean the Superior Courts of Justice, travel beyond the line of duty prescribed to them by the law of the country, that transgression is to be corrected. That there must be some mode of doing it no one can doubt: one would not attribute such an anomaly to the law of England, as to suppose that a regular judgment between parties is always [38] subject to review by your Lordships, as a tribunal of appeal, and yet that the misconduct, the mistakes, and the errors of judgment, in Courts below, in deciding that which they had no authority to decide, is of a description not to come either within the limits of your Lordships' authority, or the cognizance of any other known authority in this country. That would be an anomaly, an absurdity which no man could impute to the system of English law. There is that species of regular gradation of authority in this country, that every inferior Court has a superior tribunal to correct its errors, of whatever description those errors may be, in a regular gradation, until they travel up to your Lordships' House, and here, as there must be in every established Government, they find an ultimate judicature. The King, who is the fountain of justice to all his subjects, acts, in distributing that justice ultimately through the judgment of the House of Lords, in all decisions upon rights of property, and your Lordships have the jurisdiction to control the Superior Courts within the limits of their authority, as those Courts have to control the inferior Courts of Justice, who have peculiar jurisdictions.

The Ecclesiastical and the Maritime Courts of this country are as much a component part of the judicial establishment of the Kingdom, are as much vital institutions, original in themselves, as the Court of Chancery or the Court of King's Bench: but they are, by the policy of the law, placed in a degree of subordination to other Courts, and as their jurisdictions are peculiar and limited, confined to the cognizance of a certain species of causes, whenever they travel beyond [39] those limits which the law has prescribed to them as the extent of their jurisdiction, the Court of King's Bench, or the Court of Chancery, as occasion may be, issues a prohibition, and stops them, by telling them that they have erred in taking cognizance of such subjects. Now as when the Spiritual and Maritime Courts exceed their authority, the constitution has provided a superintending control to read them within the limits of their jurisdiction, is it not a necessary consequence in principle, that where those Courts, which are Courts liable to be appealed from in the decision of rights, by mistake or from any other motive, go beyond the limits of their authority, in taking cognizance of subjects which are not within their cognizance, there must be inherent in the law of this country some tribunal to which the subject may resort, to have them brought within the limits of their duty. If there be no such tribunal the dilemma must arise, that a subject of this realm, however aggrieved and oppressed by extra judicial acts, may have no remedy: unless it be said that the law places a remedy in his own hands, that is, that whenever a Court of Justice acting in a matter not within its jurisdiction, thinks fit to affect the person or the property of the subject, inasmuch as such acts may be considered as acts coram non jure, the subject is entitled to resist manu forti. Unless it be argued that such is the remedy which the law prescribes, I have not been able to find any other mode by which such an error can be controlled and corrected, except by recourse to this House.

We know that within almost the memory of man, the jurisdiction of your Lordships, as an appellate jurisdiction, has been the subject of [40] question and of dispute. When appeals from the Court of Chancery were first brought here, complaints were made to the House of Commons, and the House of Commons pretended to exclude the interposition of your Lordships in reviewing orders of the Court of Chancery, upon the ground that it was affecting the property of the subject, and they assumed the right, not to control your Lordships directly in taking such cognizance, but they assumed the right of imprisoning those who should presume to execute your Lordships' orders. They went further, and assumed the right of imprisoning those members who should think fit to resort to your Lordships to review judgments between commoners of the realm decided in the Court of Chancery. The Commons, at that period when their own authority was not very great, might be willing to arrogate a little more, and the other party be willing to concede a little less as to the authority of this House. I have not been able to find, supposing the Commons of England had carried their point in excluding your Lordships' jurisdiction in cases of appeals from the Court of Chancery, how they would act where one of the suitors happened to be a commoner and the other happened to be a peer of the realm. But the subject was at last settled in a way, the benefit of which has resulted to all the owners of property in the realm.

You are here for the purpose of hearing appeals, as well as for the purpose of assisting the King in his great council of the nation, and there must be in your Lordships the right to control the King's Courts, because you sit here under the direct authority of his Majesty, [41] to review those judgments which in his personal capacity he was incapable of reviewing, but which in his political capacity it was his duty to have reviewed. That being settled, it seemed to me to follow as a necessary consequence, where your Lordships have jurisdiction in appeals from decisions between A. and B. contesting rights of property in a cause, that if that Court whose decision was subject to review and appeal before your Lordships, thought fit to step aside from the parties and to make an order upon a subject affecting his property, that must fall to be considered also as subject to appeal, being an excess of authority. It would be very desirable to ascertain what other tribunal could take cognizance of such an excess of jurisdiction. Although I have understood that the limits were not very accurately defined in former days, that the King, sometimes in Parliament, sometimes by his Privy Council, sometimes by portions of that Privy Council, authorized by commissions to act concurrently, and at other times by your Lordships alone, determined on matters of appeal; yet, looking at those views of the case which are now presented to us, the present alternative only is this, that either your Lordships or the Privy Council must have jurisdiction upon the subject, or that it is the fact that suitors and individual subjects of his Majesty throughout the kingdom, may be aggrieved to any conceivable extent, and yet not have any remedy against that grievance.

No man will presume in the existing state of our constitution, to say that a petition to the King alone could be attended to, for the purpose of looking into subjects of that description: no man [42] will suppose that his Majesty could act in any other way than through one or other of the great councils, namely, your Lordships, as the first and the most important of those great councils, or the Privy Council, who is to advise him as to the general affairs of the kingdom. As to the limits of distinction between these two great and supreme tribunals, whose judgments are not subject to be reviewed, but constitute the law of the country as conclusively as if a statute had been passed upon the subject, (I do not say makes the law, but is declaratory of what the law is,) your Lordships are the King's council for regulating and controlling those legal decisions respecting rights of property that occur between the King's subjects within the limits of the kingdom of England; and the office of the Privy Council, as far as it goes, is to regulate the rights of property that are referable to those foreign dependencies, and those other questions of judicature that do not come within the ordinary control of the King's Courts of Justice, and which must be ultimately decided where judgments are erroneous, or where Courts travel beyond their jurisdiction.

It would be a singular state of absurdity in the law of England, that if the Court of Chancery, between two individual suitors, were to make a decision which is subject to appeal, they may come to your Lordships to rectify it, because an order is made between A. and B., the suitors in the Court; but if the Court pronouncing an order in that cause, think fit to direct that a third person, not a party to the cause, shall pay the whole amount of the demand from the one to the [43] other, or to make an order which will subject that individual to imprisonment, your Lordships' hands are tied from setting that right, merely because the individual whose rights of property, and the freedom of whose person, is affected by such an order is not a party named in the suit; that your Lordships must say, here we are in a state of imbecility, we can give no relief; true it is that order is made in a court of competent judicature; it has all the colour of being a judicial order, and if it were a judicial order deciding the rights of property of individuals in the cause, we could correct that which is erroneous; but as the Court has thought fit not to decide between the individual parties as to the rights of a party, but has made an order that a third person shall pay the whole subject in demand, that being the case, the subject must either submit to pay the sum so awarded against him, or find out, God knows where, some other tribunal to do him right upon that subject.

Let the Courts act as erroneously as they please; and for the purpose of this argument, I may suppose the Court of Justice below to act from the most corrupt motives that can be attributed to persons acting in a judicial character. I will suppose the judge to be intending to benefit himself, and to make an order against an innocent third person to pay a sum of money, which, in circuitry must otherwise have come out of his own pocket, I may be told that with respect to such nefarious conduct the law is open to impeach a Judge who so acts, that he may be proceeded against criminally; but, my Lords, what answer is that to the innocent subject, who wants not to vindicate the justice of the country at large at his [44] own expense, and at the loss of all that he possesses in the world, but who simply desires to be restored to that state of quiet possession of his rights, which, without the unjust intervention of a Court of Justice he would not have been deprived of. We know that the law is open wherever violated, and however high the subject who dares to violate it, to the vindication of right by criminal proceeding; but that is not concurrently with the title of the individual whose rights of property are infringed, by resisting that infringement by the ordinary legal modes. If this order was extra judicial on the part of the Court below, I shall hardly be told that such a case is not subject to a revision by your Lordship, but was a void and null act, which a subject may resist mann forti; I shall hardly be told that the law of England, in this state of civilized society, puts any subject, of any condition, under the obligation of raising commotion in the country and resisting by force. If it appears to be a regular order of a Court of Justice, I shall hardly be told, if I understand it rightly, that the law of the country looks not to so important a condition as that of preserving the peace of the community, and omits to provide that in no case shall the subject be under the necessity of protecting himself against the violation of his person or his property by his own hand, or by the assistance of his friends, but that in all cases where they are violated he shall have redress by legal means, pointed out to him by the law.

If that be the case, I apprehend that these legal means must be by application to this tribunal in the nature of appeal, to be entitled undoubtedly in a cause in which the order aggrieving the [45] subject has been pronounced, and which your Lordships will take cognizance of as an existing cause, to see whether any order has been made in that cause which the law of the country does not sanction.

Looking upon this case therefore as if it were new, as if your Lordships were for the first time to assume, or to repudiate a jurisdiction upon the subject, I submit to your consideration, whether you would not necessarily make a precedent. All cases that depend upon precedent, must at some time have existed in a condition in which the precedent was to originate, and in the absence of all precedents in Courts of Justice, you only look at the reason, at the fitness and the principle of the jurisdiction proposed to be exercised, and doing so you make the precedent, because no record of any anterior proceeding exists; but in making a precedent, the Court does not make the law upon the subject, but declares by the precedent, that that which they are doing is inherent in the constitutional law of the country, and if the occasion has never before arisen, which required the Court to make such an order, it then becomes fit that an order should be made, not only to prevail in the instance of the existing case, but to guide the judgment of all future Courts in similar subjects. If this appeal were totally destitute of precedent, I should with great confidence submit to your Lordships such would be the principle on which the House would act. It being admitted that in an order regularly made between suitors in a cause, it is universally subject to review by appeal to this House, I should contend that a fortiori whenever the Court goes [46] beyond its jurisdiction and affects third persons, they have a right to seek refuge at your Lordships' bar, to see whether such an order was or was not a just order. There may be two grounds on which you may decide a case so represented, the first is, that the order is irregular—is extra judicial, that it seeks to attach and affect the person and the property of a subject who is not a party to the suit, that the Court therefore had no right to make such an order, and upon that ground you would rescind it, leaving those who obtain the order to pursue the regular course, whatever that might be, to attain the same end which such extra judicial order was intended to produce. If it be supposed that the order was not extra judicial, would you not hold as an appellate jurisdiction, that as the making of that order was within the competency of the Court, that it must be equally within your competency as a Court of Appeal, to review that order. It cannot be an order legitimately made by the Court below, but by an irresistible inference it must be subject to the judgment of your Lordships.

I have been contented to take this, as a case in which the Court below had jurisdiction to pronounce the order, if in justice it was fit to be pronounced; but taking it to be so, it is competent to me to shew, that according to the facts of the case, this was not an order fit to be made, that the Court which made the order erred in its judgment, mistook the law, did not properly view the facts upon which it ought to proceed. I am only desirous to go into that case, if you think fit, to satisfy you that there never was pronounced in any Court, an order so deeply or [47] vicious as this is, when you look at all the facts of the case.

The Lord Chancellor: In the discussion of this case you have a right to assume that the order was as wrong as it possibly can be. The first question for the House to decide, is, whether it has jurisdiction, supposing it should be so? We had some thing of the same nature this morning.

Mr. Hart: I am apprised of that case,* and I apprehend there is no case more dissimilar in principle than that which we take leave to present to your Lordships. It is unbecoming in counsel, to solicit any Court of Justice to intimate what source of relief a party may resort to for justice. At the same time, looking at the great and valuable protection which you give to all suitors, for you are the last and only refuge, if a party is injured and aggrieved by proceedings in the Courts below, I know not what relief for such injuries can be had, if your Lordships say your jurisdiction is not co-extensive with that which is exercised in the Courts where such orders are pronounced. Some course must be pointed out, for that a failure of justice cannot take place by the laws of this country, I take upon myself to assume, without qualification and without doubt. At present I am bound to consider it as yet doubtful whether your Lordships have or have not jurisdiction, whether you will [48] or will not consider yourselves as having jurisdiction, for if you think fit to say you have jurisdiction, you have it as a matter of course.

Before I advert to the cases of recent date, supposed to affect the present question, I will call your attention to a case that seems to me, to be precisely in unison with the present. I know it has been stated that it is but a single case, that however it may be a precedent, it was a precedent doubted at the time: but the same objection may be made to every precedent where one anterior judgment only exists. Where a claimant of justice comes to demand his rights at the hands of a Court of Justice, it is not usual to repel a precedent, by saying it has been decided once, and but once: true it is, that we can find but one instance in which the House has exercised the jurisdiction, but that arises not from any doubt of the validity of the precedent, but from the happy dispensation under which the subjects of this country exist, that they seldom have to complain that the King's ordinary Courts of Justice travel beyond their duty, either from intention or mistake. Lord Hale, that great and constitutional lawyer, upon the subject of appeals from the Court of Chancery, lays down a doctrine which I quote as not applying specifically to the case itself, with respect to the present application, but to the principle which governs universally the law of the country, applicable to the subjects' rights. He was of opinion, that it was highly unreasonable that the decree of a Chancellor, who may err as well as another man, should be conclusive, should be unexaminable by any other Court, but be as binding as the law of [49] the Medes and Persians, or as an act of Parliament.

He says (Hale's Jurisd. of the H. of L. c. 22), "the Court of Parliament, as sitting in the House of Lords, for the Lords Spiritual and Temporal assembled in Parliament, are the highest Court of Justice in the realm. Here the judgments at law, of the greatest ordinary Court of Justice, namely the King's Bench, are examinable and reversible for error, and what reason can there be, that a decree in a Court of Equity should have a greater sacredness than a judgment at law?" Now I would ask of those who mean to oppose this reasoning, what greater sacredness can an error of judgment, if the Chancellor or any other Judge sitting in Law or Equity, who travels beyond the legal limits of his jurisdiction in making an order not warranted by his jurisdiction—what greater sacredness can such an order as that have over an order pronounced by a judicial authority, acting within its proper limits, but mistakenly exercised? I apprehend, the principle which I am now stating applies emphatically to this case, and I do not know how to reason this case in a stronger point of view, than to say that it must be argued by those who resist the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, that in all cases in which a Judge confines himself within the limits prescribed by law, but acts either unwisely, erroneously, or corruptly, the House of Lords can correct his errors in judgment; but where he travels beyond his jurisdiction, and inflicts injuries a hundred-fold more grievous upon a subject [50] of the country, than he could have inflicted by any decision or decree he could judicially have made upon the matter in contention, that those injuries must remain unre-

* O'Sullivan v. Hutchins, D. P. 1825, MS. The appeal was against an order of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, respecting an award made upon a submission to reference, under the provisions of the Irish statute, 10 W. 3. c.—and not in a cause. The case was argued on the 15th of February, 1825, and stood over till the 30th of June, 1825, when the appeal was dismissed, upon the ground that the House had no jurisdiction.

dressed, or at least it is not within the competency of the House of Lords to redress them. When he travels within the limits prescribed by the constitution you may control his decision, but when a Judge travels beyond the limits of his jurisdiction, and does an infinitely greater mischief, you cannot control him.

But there is a precedent which is precisely in point. The case * of an appeal from the Court of Exchequer by a person not a party in any [51] suit, and against an order not pronounced in any cause. A cause was depending in the Court of [52] Chancery between Lord Wharton, Plaintiff, and Sir W. Robinson and others, Defendants. An order had been obtained by Lord Wharton [53] upon a motion made in the Court of Exchequer, there being no cause depending between those parties, that a certain parchment, alleged to be a record of the Court, in the hands of one Thompson, an officer of the Court, might not be filed by him among the records of the Court, it being the object, as he apprehended, of the Defendants to the suit in Chancery, to make use of this parchment as evidence in that suit. This order was afterwards rescinded, by an order made upon the motion of Sir W. Robinson and others, and it was directed that the parchment, being a commission, articles and survey should be filed as a record of the Court.

From this latter order there was an appeal by Lord Wharton. It was objected that the order was not made in a cause, and that other persons, parties in the suit as defendants, were not before the House. The answer to this objection, so far as relates to the defect of parties, was that Squire was the only defendant who supported the order in the Exchequer, and employed Thompson to file it. Upon this state of things, the House of Lords directed that a trial should be had in the next term in the Court

* The case was in substance as follows: An order had been made in the Exchequer containing the following recital—"Whereas, upon the 26th of February last, upon motion on the part of Thomas Lord Wharton, it was ordered by the Court, that a commission issued out of this Court in the 15th year of the reign of King James the first, together with six several articles of instruction, and eight several schedules thereunto annexed, purporting to be a boundary and survey of the Honor of Richmond and the Lordship of Middleham, in the County of York, taken by virtue of the commission by Sir Timothy Hutton and Sir Talbot Bowes, Knights, and other Commissioners, and dated at Richmond, the 19th of October, 1618, should be left in the hands of Mr. Thompson, one of the attornies, but should not be received as a record, or filed, nor any use made thereof, or of the enrolment thereof, until further order:" The order then proceeds to recite, that a motion was made "on behalf of Sir William Robinson, Baronet, and others, praying that the said order might be set aside, and that the said commission articles and survey might be allowed of as a record, and filed accordingly:" The order then recites the evidence produced for the purpose of satisfying the Court of Exchequer that it was an authentic document, viz. that it had been taken from the files, and therefore ought to be restored to the records of the Court. The effect of the evidence, as stated, is to trace this parchment from the hands of one professional man to another, till recently found in the hands of a person who had got the papers of a Mr. Grainge. It was also shewn, that at a prior trial, within the limits of the commission, this document was used as evidence. The order then recited an affidavit on the part of Lord Wharton, opposing the filing of the survey. Upon these recitals, and upon view of the document and perusal of the commission and articles, and survey, the Court ordered the former order, which directed that the record, paper or parchment, should not be filed as a record, should be rescinded, and they ordered that the said commission articles and schedules, purporting to be the survey, be filed accordingly on the proper file, amongst the inquisitions and extents of King James the first.

From this order an appeal was entered by Lord Wharton. In the petition of appeal it was stated, "That the Appellant had purchased certain mines in question before this pretended record was brought into the office, and that if such writing should be suffered to be filed as a record, after such length of time, the searching the record office, which was the common security of every subject, would signify nothing; settlements and purchases would be easily defeated, and no man could be safe on his estate or inheritance. The Appellant shewed that the other Defendants in Chancery were not made parties to this appeal, because the Respondent Squire was the only defend-of Common Pleas, in which the question should be—whether the parchment in dispute was such record of the Court as pretended?

The House did, therefore, in that case, hold jurisdiction in the case of an order which was not made in cause, and although this objection was expressly taken and pressed. There was, indeed, a protest against this order of the House, but the protest rather adds to the authority of the order. In a new case, unanimity was not [54] to be expected. The protest shews at least that the matter did not pass without discussion, and the decision is that of the great majority of the House, including the Chancellor, a great parliamentary as well as constitutional lawyer. It therefore, establishes a precedent deliberately argued which ought not now to be shaken. The opinion of the small dissenting minority was bound by the superior reasons and judgment of the great majority of the House, who thought it right and advantageous to the community that such a jurisdiction should be exercised. The reasons given in support of the protest, appear to me to be inconclusive. The first objection is, that by the order they assume jurisdiction in an original cause, because there was no suit between the parties in the Exchequer, and that the petition could not be called an appeal from that Court. But how is it an assumption of jurisdiction in an original cause, to make an order in a matter which had been adjudicated in an inferior Court? It cannot surely be necessary, that in a matter adjudicated, however important, A. should be personally a plaintiff, and B. personally a defendant, to make it a fit subject of appeal. There are in fact, many cases subject to appeal, where neither appellant nor respondent were parties in the suit; as where a third person has become the purchaser of an estate sold under a decree in a suit, it has been ant who made affidavits for the supporting the survey, and the principal person who solicited therein, and employed Thompson to file and enrol it." The Defendants petitioned the House of Lords, and "setting forth their case at large, prayed to dismiss Lord Wharton's petition, and discharge the order for their answering thereto. But the Lords, on the 22d of January, 1702, ordered that Squire and Thompson should answer Lord Wharton's petition, and Lord Wharton, on the 25th of January, 1702, obtained an order that Thompson should not be obliged to answer." Squire, in his answer, proceeded to state the grounds on which he objected to the order, and in the result, the House ordered, that the officers of the Exchequer should bring into the House the bundle or roll in which the survey of the Honor of Richmond was, which was taken in the 15th year of King James the first, the original affidavits upon which the survey was filed; the office book, in which there was an entry of a survey taken of the Honor of Richmond in the 7th of King Charles the first; and the survey also itself." On the 7th of January, an objection was taken to the House taking cognizance of the order. "Upon the 12th of February, 1702, after hearing Counsel upon the petition and appeal by Lord Wharton, touching the order of the 15th July, 1701, it was ordered by the Lords, that a trial should be had next term, at the bar of the Court of Common Pleas, by a jury of the County of Middlesex, in an action wherein this should be the feigned issue, viz. Whether the skins of parchment directed by the order of the Court of Exchequer of the 15th of July, 1701, to be filed, are the perfect, unaltered, exact, and entire commission and return first filed in the Court of Exchequer in the 15th year of King James the first." Against this order there was a protest; eleven of the Peers, including Lord Nottingham, dissented from the decision of the House. The reasons of the protest are—first, "Because we conceive that by this we assume a jurisdiction in an original cause; for these reasons: first, because there has been no suit between the parties in the Court of Exchequer, and consequently this petition cannot be called an appeal from that Court. Secondly, although there was a suit in the Court of Chancery, yet one of the persons required to answer was not a party in that suit, and therefore, as to him at least, it must be an original cause. Thirdly, though all had been parties in Chancery, yet it never was heard that an appeal lay from one Court that had no suit depending in it because there was a suit depending in another Court. Fourthly, because no Court can take any cognizance of a cause in which that Court cannot make an order, because very many are concerned in this record who are not before the House, therefore this House cannot take any cognizance of it." (Signed) Nottingham, etc. See the Lords' Journals, vol. 17.

considered* that he might be dealt with as a party in the suit. Although he is not actually before the Court as a formal [55] party, yet being affected in his rights by an order discharging his contract, it has been held competent for him to appeal against such order to the House of Lords, if he thought such order erroneous. Why was it assumed that such a purchaser being no party in the suit might appeal, plainly upon this ground, that the order affected his right of property acquired by the contract. This was a subject incidentally brought into the cause: but the purchaser was neither plaintiff nor defendant. It was argued that he would be put to file an original bill, but it was considered by the Court, that if the order was erroneous it would be the subject of appeal.

The Lord Chancellor: I have from Lord Redesdale a copy of a case, in which an appeal to the House of Lords was presented against an order of a Court of Equity rescinding a purchase.†

Mr. Hart: Then there is another authority for holding that the House of Lords has jurisdiction by way of appeal against orders of Courts of Equity, affecting the property of a subject not a party in a suit; and in truth, it is a refined and metaphysical distinction to entertain jurisdiction between party and party in a cause, and to refuse relief to a third person more deeply affected in his rights by an order in the same cause.

In the case of Lord Wharton it was not an order in a cause, it was an order ex parte, and yet an appeal was entertained. In the case now before the House, the order was made in a cause most injuriously affecting a third person, and why it should be less an order in a cause, and [56] by what magical operation it should be less subject to appeal than if it injured the plaintiffs or defendants in the suit for whose benefit it was intended, I cannot conceive. In general a court abstains from making orders in a suit which affect third parties, but here the Court has made an order in a cause, and if it be erroneous, either because the Court had no jurisdiction to make such an order, or because having jurisdiction it is unjust, it is equally an order made in a cause affecting the rights and property of a third person, and must be a proper subject of relief by way of appeal to this House. The third reason for the protest I really do not understand, the reasoning seems to proceed in a circle: first, to assume a proposition and draw an inference from it, and then to endeavour to establish the original proposition by means of the inference.

There is a difficulty in supposing how the House should be precluded from making an order in which it directed that a document should not be filed as a record, because some parties were absent or should be present: the House deciding merely between these parties, the one contending that it should be considered as a record, and the other contending that it should not, how can it be said that the House, when it came to a decision, that it ought not to be considered as a record, concluded the rights of absent persons by doing it? Sir William Robinson failed in making out his title to have this document filed; and made an authentic document, his evidence slipped from under him. By this order the House only exercised a jurisdiction to affirm the order [57] of the Court of Exchequer, in case the evidence should bear it out, but to disaffirm it in case the evidence should not bear it out; the House looking at the conflicting testimony, and thinking that the trial by jury was the proper mode of deciding the facts upon which the rights of property might turn, rather than upon affidavits, the House said the order may or may not be right, but certainly it is not right to confirm it without some preparatory steps to ascertain the facts, and therefore the House ordered that that Court which had stepped a little too forward in deciding facts as conclusive upon affidavits, should suspend the operation of the order it had pronounced, until a jury had decided whether it was an authentic record or not.

There may be cases in which the House of Lords may have no jurisdiction, and would not spontaneously exercise a jurisdiction. In the case of the Attorney General

* See Watkins v. Maule in Chancery, an order 23d February, 1825, rescinding a purchase. There was an appeal by the purchaser to the House of Lords, upon which the order was affirmed. Bailey v. Maule, MS. 3d May, 1825.

† Probably the case acted in the note, p. 54, in which Lord Gifford and Lord Redesdale spoke on the motion for judgment.

v. *Wall the decision proceeded upon a different principle. Whenever the united legislature have thought fit by statutory enactment to give particular forms of proceedings for the remedy of injuries, and make no farther provision, then it is a principle of the law, that the statutory regulation being a jurisdiction collateral to the common law jurisdiction of the [58] country, is not subject to the same mode of appeal as in other cases; for if the legislature had intended that an appeal should have laid from the inferior jurisdiction, it would have directed that there should have been such appeal. That is an old and inherent principle in the construction of statutes, and looking at a recent statute (52 Geo. III. c. 101) giving the new jurisdiction in cases of charity, by which the legislature enabled the Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls to make certain regulations in charity matters, which it was not competent for them to make unless it was in an existing cause, the legislature foreseeing that by force of the natural construction of the Act of Parliament it would have prevented a review of the decision in the Court below, they provided that an appeal should lie to this House, if presented within two years: so far, therefore, from this Act of Parliament being an argument that you have not jurisdiction in those cases, it is affirmative, for it shews that in all cases arising out of the old established judicatures of this Kingdom, there shall be an appeal; but where there is new statutory jurisdiction, if it does not expressly permit a suitor to appeal, it must be taken to imply that the case shall go no farther.

The case of the Attorney General v. Wall was of that description: it was a case of an extent, a purely common law process, and a statute was passed giving a new remedy to those who were entitled to equitable incumbrances upon the estates seized by the Crown. Such incumbrancer before the passing of the statute was obliged to go into a Court of Equity: [59] instead of which it gives him a short mode of proceeding, by which he has his equitable rights ascertained without the delay and expense of a suit in equity; but when it gave him that mode of proceeding, it was provided that if he chose to adopt it, he must do it subject to the hazard of the judgment to be pronounced finally in the Court below. That is analogous to a new jurisdiction, and where a party chooses to submit to it, he cannot go farther in litigation. So again in the cases of bankruptcy a new Court is created: the Lord Chancellor sitting in the Court of Chancery, exercises an authority over the bankrupt's estate, and the claims of all parties, but it is the statute that gives to the Lord Chancellor authority to make orders that shall bind the parties, the statute creating a new jurisdiction; and it has been always considered as the true construction of that Act that it gave a jurisdiction not inherent in the law of this country, and therefore, this House cannot review decisions in matters of bankruptcy, as you may in the case of common law proceedings. With such nicety have the limitations of jurisdiction been settled, that in cases where serious questions have arisen, the Lord Chancellor (Eldon) with a forbearance not often necessary, is in the habit of saying that he does not wish parties to be bound by his individual judgment, and rather than bind them by an order in bankruptcy, he gives them leave to file a bill, so that if he same judge happens to preside in Chancery, and the party thinks he errs in judgment, he may go to the House of Lords, which is the refuge to all [60] those who conceive themselves aggrieved. I can conceive a variety of cases in which the greatest injury might be inflicted by the King's Courts below, by their orders most intolerable injuries might be inflicted on the King's subjects, which would be irremediable unless this House would take cognizance, with a view of annihilating those orders.

Suppose that in the Court of King's Bench criminal proceedings took place against a person, not an officer of the Court, nor in any way a party to a suit then pending, and that the Court should think fit upon an ex parte proceeding to call upon him to answer the matters contained in the affidavits, and that he should be examined upon interrogatories. The effect of such an order upon the individual to be bound by it would be of the most intolerable description, and shall it be said that the Court shall be permitted to make such an order, and yet if the individual were to apply to your Lordships to review that order, he is to be told he must submit to it. If he had had the good fortune to have been the defendant, however delinquent he might have been—if he had happened to have been an attorney of the Court, however great his delinquency, being a party, this House would review the order;* but because he is quite independent of the Court, although the Court has thought fit to violate the limits of its jurisdiction by making an order upon him, which it ought not to have made; there is no tribunal which can correct it, and the party aggrieved must go out of this House, subject to all the consequences of having the im-[61]position of an order upon him which is extra judicial. He must submit to it, unless he can repel it by force, which in all other cases the law of the country takes care shall not be necessary, by providing that every man shall have redress for all that which is erroneously done by individuals or Courts of law.

* D. P. 1822, 1824, MS. The case was thus:—Lands subject to mortgages had been seized under an extent, a Commission of Bankrupt afterwards issued against the mortgagor, and an Act of Parliament was passed enabling the Court of Exchequer to make reference to the Master to ascertain priorities, etc. and make orders respecting the funds in Court under the extent upon motion or petition as in causes in Equity. The appeal was against an order made under this Act, and the House of Lords held that they had no jurisdiction.

Mr. Shadwell: It may be admitted that the House has no jurisdiction to hear an appeal against an order made by the Lord Chancellor, or the person having authority under the sign manual in a case of lunacy (Rochford v. B. of Ely, 6 B. P. c. 329), nor upon a decree from any Ecclesiastical Court (1 Vern. 118), but the judgments of the Ecclesiastical Courts in Scotland are subject to revision in the Courts of Great Session in Scotland, and thereby this House acquires a jurisdiction over the decrees of the Ecclesiastical Courts in that country; so again with respect to the decrees of the Court of Admiralty, with the same distinction as it relates to Scotland. There is no appeal from a Colonial decree; in those cases, and in lunacy it is considered that the King is the supreme authority, and that no other Court can interfere. Neither is there any appeal in an order made by the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, or whoever holds the Great Seal in Bankruptcy, that is decided upon the construction of the statute, because those who entertain jurisdiction in bankruptcy, interfere not as judges in the Court of Chancery, but as persons named in the Act. The question in this case will be, whether where an order has been made in a cause actually existing between persons who are not parties to the cause, the House of Lords has jurisdiction to review the order.

[62] In the general assertion of jurisdiction, which was made by the House of Lords in that question which arose upon Sir John Fagg's case, the House of Lords by their notice to the Commons, represent the House as "the place where the King is highest in his royal estate, and where the last resort of judging upon writs of error and appeal in equity in all causes, and over all persons, is undoubtedly fixed and permanently lodged" (see Hargraves's Preface to Hale's Jurisd. of the House of Lords). I point your attention to the expression "all causes," because the order complained of in this case, is an order in a cause essentially differing from the case of the Attorney General v. Wall. There extents having issued at the suit of the Crown, the mortgagee, a special incumbrancer upon the estate of Paul Bentfield, came in under the extent and the provisions of an Act of Parliament, without filing a bill for that species of relief which is ordinarily administered in the Court of Exchequer. It was argued in that case, that inasmuch as the proceedings which took place under the extent and the statute were denominated causes, and the orders made from time to time were styled decrees, that the particular order complained of, which was pronounced by the Court upon exceptions to a Master's report made in pursuance of what appeared upon the face of it to be a decree, it ought to be considered as made in the cause; but your Lordships were satisfied that it was not strictly speaking a proceeding in a cause in equity, however proceedings of that sort might have been by common practice and habit, entitled and styled decrees in causes. [63] That was the point decided in the Attorney General v. Wall.

Now this case differs essentially from that, for here is a cause subsisting between parties. It appears there was an application made in the cause, as the respondent has stated himself, by persons who were not creditors in the cause as plaintiffs upon the record, but persons admitted as creditors in the decree made in the cause; they were the persons who applied against the Accountant General of the Court in the cause, for the purpose of having the stock in question re-transferred.

* Not so as orders of a Court of Common Law

The Lord Chancellor: The application here is to replace a certain quantity of stock. I think one of the questions may be whether the stock, by virtue of this instrument having got out of one cause to another, should not be re-transferred, or in other words, whether the party who caused the stock to be transferred should retain the benefit of a transfer which had been made by forgery.

Mr. Shadwell: It could not have been done, for there was not stock enough to allow of a re-transfer into the cause of Blakeney v. Annesley.

Although this were to be considered as an order upon parties who were no parties in the cause, still there are a variety of cases in which a Court of Equity deals largely with the property and personal liberty of parties who are not parties in the cause. One of the most familiar instances is this:—I will suppose that a bill is filed by a residuary legatee against an executor to take an account; the decree directs an account to be taken of debts and credits: the creditors come in under that decree, though by [64] no means parties to be bound in all respects by the decree, as they would have been in the case of a bill filed by one creditor on behalf of himself and others: but they come in as creditors, and the question is discussed in the Master's office, whether the debts claimed by them are or are not due. Now suppose a Court of Equity should think it right upon the claims made by the creditors in the Master's office not to give the creditors an opportunity to except to the Master's report; or suppose that leave were given to except, and the exception heard, and the Court decided against the creditors, and no leave given to file a bill, in what situation would they be placed? If a creditor under such circumstances were to file a bill, he would be met by a plea that the party was not bound to answer. What, under these circumstances, is the situation of a creditor, if the Court making such a decree is not to make it subject to revision?

Let me put the case of an administrator of a testator's estate, in which a legacy is carried to the account of a particular legatee, with leave to apply to the Court, and he does so, and the Court refuses to make an order:—I am putting, it is true, a strong case, but I am doing so in order to illustrate my argument:—in that case what must a legatee do, if not allowed to proceed by appeal upon his petition, for the legacy actually severed from the testator's estate and carried to his account, which would be a complete discharge to the executor? He would actually be without redress, unless the House of Lords were to control the decision of the Court below.

If the resolution of the House of Lords in the case of Sir John Fagg is of any avail, it must [65] be acted upon in such cases as I have put, and I can put cases in which the personal liberty of the subject might be affected by proceedings of the Court of Equity, which if the narrow doctrine now contended for were to prevail, no redress could be obtained; suppose for instance, an injunction was granted to restrain a Defendant and his servants and agents, from doing a certain act in the common form of injunction, suppose that the Court should be satisfied that some person, bearing the character of servant or agent of the Defendant, had committed a breach of the injunction, and the Court being so satisfied, an order is made out in the proper form for the party to be committed to the Fleet: what redress has the individual in that case? If the Court chooses to stand by the order it has made, and this House does not give relief, he can have no relief whatever. In that case he can have no relief by Habeas Corpus, for if the Court has competent jurisdiction, which it has as matter of course, and the order is made out in the proper form, if the individual applies for a Habeas Corpus he would be remanded, and he might be compelled to linger out his existence in prison until the Court should relent and rescind its order, or this House would interfere. Suppose the case where an infant ward has been married, and upon a motion made against the parties, the Court of Chancery should order some clergyman to be committed to the Fleet upon the ground of having committed an offence against the jurisdiction of the Court, by having married a ward, and yet he may have been no party to the business; is there to be [66] no appeal in that case? I put these cases as those, which if they did happen, and could not be reviewed by the House of Lords, would entail the greatest misery upon the subjects of the country: and I have always understood, that the House of Lords assume a general jurisdiction in causes, for the purpose of rectifying orders which are erroneous, and all the cases I have put would be errors in orders, though the victims were not parties to the cause. Upon what principle is the House not to interfere! you will interfere, though no one of the cases which I have stated has been adjudged, or although there are no received cases prescribing rules to the House. The last application in all the cases which I have put, would be to your jurisdiction for relief, and if you did not interfere, there would be a defect in the administration of justice.

With respect to the cases which I first put, as to want of jurisdiction, they are grounded upon this reason, that there is no cause in Equity depending between the parties, but that reason totally fails in the cases which I have just supposed, and in the cases now at the bar: upon what ground therefore, can it be said that the House of Lords is not to interfere! In the case of the Attorney General v. Wall, there was no defect in the proceeding, as against the parties who claimed, for this reason, they themselves elected to go and claim their equity upon the common law side of the Court; that was a new common law proceeding given by the statute, but they might have filed a bill; and there is a case in Coke's Reports, where it appeared that [67] it was originally the practice for parties to file a bill, in order to have that equitable relief, which the statute entitles them to have in cases of extents; but if parties voluntarily intervene, and choose to take the course prescribed by the statute, that subjects them to the order of the Court, which must be final when once made. If the parties complain of that order, it was their own option to adopt that course. But in the case at the bar, orders are made in which the party has not voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction, but attempted to repudiate or wished to avoid it; so that the reasoning applied to the case of the Attorney General v. Wall, is reasoning that cannot be applicable to the present case, for here the Accountant-General did not intervene, he asked nothing. I consider this, though it may be a case of the first impression with regard to particular features of it, as a case not governed by any one of the cases decided upon the point, and if so, then the only question will be, whether you will hold that a Court of Equity has any right to exercise unlimited jurisdiction over parties who are not parties in the cause? Would it not be a singular anomaly, that if there be a decree against a party in a cause which is erroneous, he shall have redress by an appeal to this House; but that where a person is a total stranger to the cause, an order may be made ruinous to his property, and injurious to his liberty, and such an order is not to be reviewed? You will long hesitate before you lay down a general rule in such cases, that this House will not interfere; for it is quite contrary to the principles of the constitution, that [68] a person not a party in a cause shall be liable to have an order made against him which is not subject to review; it cannot be conceived that a Court of Equity has a larger power over persons who are not parties in a cause, than it has over those who are parties in a cause.

I conceive this to be a question of great importance, and a case in which you may soon have to apply the very same doctrine, whatever it be which you may lay down in this particular case, for there is now pending an appeal before the Lord Chancellor in the Court of Chancery, from an order made by the Master of the Rolls, in which he has refused to interfere with respect to a person not a party in the cause, it being an application praying that that person should do a certain act. It was asserted that a certain portion of stock was obtained in an improper manner, and a petition was presented praying that the individual in question should be ordered to replace the stock; the present Master of the Rolls dismissed that petition, and an appeal is now pending in the Lord Chancellor's paper; it is not, therefore, a mere speculative opinion, arising from the dictates of fancy, which we are calling upon your Lordships to pronounce, but you will have immediately to reconsider this point in another case.

I should conceive that in a case like the present, where there seems to be pregnant reason why the House should interfere in the case of an order made in the cause, that the House of Lords would be mainly aided by considering what it has actually done, where an order has been made without a cause being in Court.

[69] The Lord Chancellor: If no injury can be done without a remedy, how is it in the Courts of Common Law, where, although there may have been fifty erroneous orders in the course of the proceedings, this House cannot touch them? In the case of the Court of Chancery, the interlocutory orders may be appealed against, but there are many orders which may be made in certain cases, in which there is no appeal

Mr. Shadwell: The House of Lords assumes a general jurisdiction in orders made by Courts of Equity, in consequence of the magnitude of property, and the necessity, therefore, of interfering.

The Lord Chancellor: I have asked many people why there should be that difference, and if they would give the real answer, they would say they cannot tell, though a person who practised in the Court of Equity, would be able to tell them without any difficulty.

Mr. Shadwell: A Court of Law confines itself to one single point; a Court of Equity, particularly in the administration of an estate, undertakes to solve all manner of questions between all manner of persons, not only between the parties who have their names on the record, but persons whose interests may be affected, and which must be finally disposed of before it is possible for the Court to make a decree between the Plaintiff and the Defendant. So in the case of a residuary legatee, the Court must take care that a due portion of the fund should be paid to individuals who are properly entitled to it, and the mere severance of a fund from the bulk of the estate, is not sufficient of itself; so that [70] there is the widest difference possible between an interlocutory order of a Court of Law, and an interlocutory order of a Court of Equity.

If in the case of Wharton v. Squire the House has actually entertained jurisdiction where an order was made not in a cause: what weight of precedent is there, or what precedent can be alleged in which the House of Lords has refused to interfere where an order has been made between parties? The cases cited are all beside the present: they are authority for the right proceeding of the House as far as they go, but do not furnish the least ground of argument for your not exercising jurisdiction in the present case. I should say prima facie, that the House of Lords will act up to the spirit of the resolution in Sir John Fagg's case, and it is not enough to be asked, where there is a precedent, whether the House will act or not: We have, even if there was no precedent, all the authority of principle in our favour, and no one case can be produced where the House of Lords has refused to interfere, where an order has been made on parties not in the cause: great inconveniences will be sustained, if this House does not interfere in cases of this description.

For the Respondents, the Bank of Ireland.* Mr. Horne and Mr. Phillimore.

It is not true that there is a remedy by appeal to this House in all cases where there is no remedy elsewhere against erroneous judgments, or excess of jurisdiction; there are many cases wholly with-[71]-out relief by way of appeal. As for the case of purchasers and creditors who not being original parties, come in under the decree in a suit, they become by adoption for all technical as well as substantial purposes parties in the cause. The doctrine of Lord Hale that all decrees in Courts of Equity are subject to appeal to this House, is indisputable, but not applicable to the case before us. In the case of a bill by a creditor, a decree obtained by one is a decree for all, when they come in under it, and being in Court by their own act, they would be subject to the general jurisdiction in the same manner as original parties. This is not an exception to the rule, but an instance of it. There are two objections to this appeal, as it regards the other parties, first, that the order was made by the Court below upon its own officer, and secondly, that the Court had no jurisdiction to make such order.

In the case of Wharton v. Squire there was a case pending in Chancery between the parties, and a question arose whether a certain parchment in the hands of a private individual was a record of the Court of Exchequer, to be used as evidence in the suit in Chancery; the parties in the suit were applicants to the Court of Exchequer, and submitted to the jurisdiction, and by the order of the House an issue in the cause in Chancery was directed to try this question of fact. There was in that case, therefore, no question whether the Court below had jurisdiction to make the order, for the parties had submitted themselves to the jurisdiction. In this case one of our objections to the appeal is that the Court below had no jurisdiction to make [72] this summary order. If this could be described as an order in a cause, the Bank of Ireland are not parties in the cause nor to this order. The motion was made by Mr. Fitzgerald against Mr. O'Neill; no order was prayed against the Bank, they merely made affidavits for the information of the Court, and are brought here improperly by the process of the House, no order has been or can be prayed against the Bank of Ireland.

* The Respondents Fitzgerald, etc. had been served with process, but declined to appear, and the Appeal was set down as ex parte against them.

In the course of the argument, the Lord Chancellor made the following observations:

The Lord Chancellor: The case as it stands upon the appeal, states only a conditional order made, that the Defendants should pay the money, and the Bank should permit inspection of their books, and that that order should be made absolute, unless cause was shewn to the contrary. Cause was shewn to the contrary, and the order stated upon this appeal is only that Mr. O'Neill should pay the money. The order was absolute against the Bank to make them produce their books; the Bank appeared, they made no objection to the order, and with respect to Mr. O'Neill paying the money they have nothing to do; that is a mere question between him and Burke and Fitzgerald. If Fitzgerald and Burke did not put in their answer within a given time, then according to the practice of the House a petition should have been presented to the House, upon which an order would issue, calling upon them to put in their answer within the time limited, or the House would act upon it.

The journals are not evidence of the order made upon such a petition, and the service of the order upon the proper persons.

[73] If you are both agreed to argue it as a question of merits whether the Court of Exchequer had or had not jurisdiction, that is another thing, but consent alone will not give this House jurisdiction.

Whether the Court of Exchequer or whether this House has jurisdiction or not, the question now before the House is whether this jurisdiction existed at the time of making the order; I apprehend the House must determine that question, which it cannot do until the evidence is before it; I do not mean to prejudice the question at all.

With respect to the service of the appeal, the person who speaks of the service is Mr. Burke, the Attorney for John O'Neill, and he certifies that he had given notice to Connell O'Connell the Attorney for all the Respondents.

Under the standing order of January 1819, having presented your appeal, and no answer having been put in in proper time, you are empowered to set it down ex parte without any further notice; the result is, that the order so far as the Bank is concerned is right, because every thing is done by this order, that it was prayed the Bank should do; they therefore, have nothing to oppose. With respect to the rest it may be an argument between the counsel for Mr. O'Neill and the reasoning of the House upon what appears to be right to be done; the judgment of the House must be given upon that view, and the House must take care to be right upon it. The first question is as to the jurisdiction; the House itself must be satisfied that it has jurisdiction, if the House is satisfied that it [74] has jurisdiction, you will go on upon the case as between O'Neill and the other parties who do not now appear; the Bank of Ireland are out of the field, they are entitled to their costs, and need not appear any more.

There will be no reply, if the cause is to be heard ex parte as against those persons who are not here; when you have stated your case against them, and they do not appear to state their case against you, your statement of the case leaves it to the House to decide. At the same time it is a matter upon which we shall be very glad to receive information, and if you have anything further to state we shall be happy to hear it.

If the House should inform you that it has jurisdiction, you will have to state your case upon the merits; but you will not have to state your case upon the merits as against the Bank. With respect to the new practice in the Court of Chancery, of an injunction restraining a creditor proceeding at law, though he is no party to a suit, that would be very grievous, if that person were not permitted to appeal against that injunction. Lord Thurlow never would adopt that practice, though Lord Rosslyn afterwards established it upon very mature consideration; he said, if a creditor by a motion in a suit in which he is no party, is stopped from going on at law, it is a very material thing to consider what his remedy is by way of appeal.

On the 7th of March, 1825, the case came again before the House for argument upon the [75] merits, when the Lord Chancellor (Eldon) made the following observations:*

The Lord Chancellor: The first question which the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery in Ireland makes here, is whether that Court had any right to proceed against him by order. That will depend upon the construction of the Irish Act of Parliament.

According to the statements in the appeal before this House, supposing the Court of Exchequer to have had jurisdiction by order, to have directed the Accountant-General to do this, they do not appear to have had any jurisdiction by the nature of the application to them to award any thing respecting the Bank, because the application to them was neither more nor less than that the Bank should produce their books. Nor was there any application of any body in the Court of Exchequer as far [as] I can see to make the Bank answerable at all.

It is quite clear that the Bank in meeting the motion, that they should produce their books, appears to have entered into a sort of controversy as to who was liable; with reference to which the Court had no more jurisdiction upon that motion, to say whether they were liable or not, than the Court of Exchequer in Westminster Hall.

If the Court of Exchequer in Ireland had any jurisdiction to make the Accountant-General answerable by order, instead of making him answerable by bill—I think if they had proceeded as in all such cases as this, the Court of Chan-[76]-cery here would have done to bring all the parties before the Court, in order to give them all a hearing, the Bank among others might have been brought before the Court. It appears to me, that the proceeding is exceedingly defective, supposing the Court of Exchequer had jurisdiction to proceed against the Accountant-General. Whether this House has any jurisdiction at all in the matter is a different question.

I have said nothing conclusive on the subject of jurisdiction, because I know the matter is one of very grave consideration, whether the House has jurisdiction in this case; and that is under the consideration of a noble and learned Lord who knows more upon the subject than I can pretend to do. I have no difficulty in telling you that if the House has jurisdiction, the inclination of my mind will be to direct the Court of Exchequer to order a bill to be filed.

The first question whether we have jurisdiction must depend upon this: supposing the Court of Exchequer had no jurisdiction in the case, can we set them right. That is the first question, which in truth involves the question whether we have any jurisdiction in any such case as this or not; nobody I think can hear the case stated without having, (if there be such a thing,) a judicial appetite to exercise the jurisdiction.

I have communicated to the noble and learned Lord to whom I have been alluding what has passed by way of argument here; some delay will occur before we can learn his opinion. I do not wish to intimate my own until I have his opinion.

Does it appear to have been considered in the [77] Court below, whether the Court of Exchequer had any authority to proceed by a motion against the Accountant-General?

If the Court had jurisdiction to proceed by motion against the Accountant-General of that Court, either they must have proceeded against the Accountant-General of that Court, dismissing from their minds all question of what other persons were to do, or they must have assumed jurisdiction to make other persons answerable upon application by motion, as they must have gone to this length at least, to hold that they would not determine that the Accountant-General of the Court was liable unless the matter were put into such a shape—a bill for instance, which would have brought before them all persons as against whom the Accountant-General might have a right to say that they were first liable; upon this question, it is a material circumstance that this money was paid without all those checks which the Act of Parliament required. The question then would be in what way the parties were to be brought before the Court and in what way, in point of fact, their liability was in issue before the Court of Exchequer.

If this case had been brought before the Court of Chancery in England, if an application had been made against the Accountant-General there, I have had no experience how the Court would proceed—I mean no experience in the article of charge against the Accountant-General; but I apprehend that the Court of Chancery would have said, file a bill, bringing all parties before the Court.

[78] The Bank appears to have agitated here the question not only of the Accountant-General's liability, but their own liability, and the affidavits go to that point; the application to the Court at the time had nothing to do with their liability.

The question in some way would be raised necessarily, whether the Bank was liable; there is no doubt if these facts are as they have been stated, that an action might be brought, and probably maintained too as well as brought.

If this House has jurisdiction, I do not think it will take much time to deliberate what it ought to do: whether it has jurisdiction or not, is a question of so much importance, that without the assistance to which I have before alluded, I do not think it right to offer to the House my advice. We will therefore, let you know when we shall be prepared to give judgment upon it.

The Lord Chancellor (4th July, 1825): There was a cause heard before your Lordships in which Mr. John O'Neill was the Appellant, and the Right Honourable James Fitzgerald and others were the Respondents: this was certainly a very important case, with respect to the value of the property which was in dispute between the parties. I mean the amount of the stock, for which the Accountant-General of the Court of Exchequer in Ireland was sought by a motion made in a summary way to be held answerable. That Court was of opinion, that they had jurisdiction to hear the matter in that summary way, and they were also of opinion that the Accountant-General of the [79] Court of Exchequer in Ireland, was answerable for that sum. He appealed to this House upon a motion made not in a cause, but upon a motion made in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, to charge the Accountant-General of that Court, (regard being had to the special manner in which he was appointed by act of Parliament,) with a sum that had been transferred, (taking it to have been improperly transferred,) out of one cause into another cause.

A question arose, whether supposing that the Court of Exchequer had jurisdiction to charge him by that species of summary process, there lay any appeal to this House. With the assistance of my noble and learned friend (Lord Redesdale) who sits near me, a great deal of consideration has been given to this case; there can be no doubt, I apprehend, that if a cause had existed on the Equity side of the Court of Exchequer, the Court of Exchequer had jurisdiction to decide that case, and that an appeal would lie to your Lordships; but on the other hand, if the Court of Exchequer in Ireland had a summary jurisdiction to charge the Accountant-General, as one of its officers, for misconduct in the nature of negligence, it becomes then a serious question indeed, whether this House has jurisdiction in such a case. At present I may say there is no precedent: I may venture in the presence of my noble friend to say we both doubt, whether the Court of Exchequer in Ireland had jurisdiction to proceed in this summary way; and it has, therefore, appeared to us most advisable to submit to your Lordships this proposition, that the [80] cause should stand over, with liberty in the mean time, (notwithstanding the appeal,) to Mr. O'Neill the Appellant, to apply to the Court of Exchequer for a revision of the order on the question of jurisdiction, leaving it open, whether, if they have jurisdiction, they have duly exercised it. If they should be of opinion that they have jurisdiction, it will be for your Lordships to dispose of this appeal, after it has so stood over; in which case you must determine, whether you have jurisdiction or not. If on the other hand, they should be of opinion on reviewing that case that they have no jurisdiction, the consequence of that will be, that in the form of a cause which may be originally decided in the Court of Exchequer in Ireland, it may be brought here by regular appeal. I therefore, propose that the cause should stand over till the next Session of Parliament, and that in the mean time Mr. O'Neill should be at liberty to apply to the Court of Exchequer for a reversal of the order appealed from, for the purpose of discussing the question of the jurisdiction of the Court to make an order in the nature of this order in a summary way. After that application shall have been made, and the judgment of the Court of Exchequer shall have been pronounced upon that application, then that this matter should further come on in this House, any of the parties then being at liberty to apply as they shall be advised.

Lord Redesdale: It appears to me impossible, considering the subject, that your Lordships can entertain jurisdiction of this case in the manner in which you have already entertained jurisdiction on appeals, for there is in truth no record [81] before you. It is a question whether an officer of the Court of Exchequer has executed his duty so negligently, that he has made himself responsible to suitors in the Court to answer to them in damages for the injury they have sustained, and whether by his being so made responsible, he is to relieve the Bank of Ireland from being responsible. It appears to me that that is properly the subject matter of a distinct suit, and that there ought to be before your Lordships, some record upon which you can proceed. The proceeding which has been had is not a matter of record, it is not incidental to the record, but it is, in my humble judgment, a complete distinct new cause of action. If such action can be sustained, a distinct new cause of action, which ought to be made the subject of a distinct and separate suit, it might then probably come before your Lordships in the way of appeal; but in the manner in which it is framed I apprehend your Lordships can no more take notice of it by way of appeal, than if the Court of Exchequer had proceeded against any officer for misconduct in his office, either by removing him from that office, if they had a right so to do, or by proceeding against him in the way of contempt by process of contempt, for having so conducted himself.

These are proceedings, from which I apprehend no appeal can be allowed to your Lordships' House; because they are matters incidental to the Court, for the sake of keeping the officers in proper order in the execution of their duties in the Court; but this is a distinct question of property, which ought, therefore, to have been made the subject of a distinct suit, and not the sub-[82]-ject of such an order. It does not appear that the Court of Exchequer entered into any consideration of that subject; it does not appear to have been a case properly before them. The Court of Exchequer, therefore, not having considered that question, the proper way appears to be to refer the matter again to the Court: if they conceive that they have jurisdiction they will state the grounds on which they conceive they have that jurisdiction, and then your Lordships will know how to deal with it, but it is a matter which cannot properly be on record in the Court of Exchequer. In the manner in which it is brought forward, I do not apprehend it can be the subject of appeal. In a distinct suit, the question will properly arise, whether this gentleman was responsible for the misconduct of an under clerk of his office, and whether the Bank of Ireland are to be relieved in the manner in which this order relieves them, it being at least extremely questionable, whether there was not as much of misconduct in the Bank of Ireland as in this gentleman.

Die Lunae, 4th July, 1825.—On hearing the said petition of appeal, a question having been made, whether the Court of Exchequer in Ireland had jurisdiction in a summary proceeding, to make the order appealed from: and it not appearing that that question had been fully considered in the said Court, let this matter stand over, with liberty for the Appellant, notwithstanding the appeal before this House, to apply to the said Court to discharge the order complained of, to the intent that the question whether the said Court had jurisdiction to proceed in a summary way to make such order, may be further considered by the said Court.

[83] In consequence of the above order, the Appellant in 1827 moved the Court of Exchequer in Ireland that the order of 1820 might be reconsidered and discharged. The motion was many times before the Court: but in December 1827, the Court of Exchequer refused to make any further order. Upon this motion, the creditors, the original applicants, were served with notice, but did not appear: the Bank of Ireland were not served but did appear, and opposed the motion.

In 1829, the case came again before the House of Lords for further consideration, when Counsel again appeared for the Bank of Ireland: but Fitzgerald, at whose instance the order complained of was originally made, purposely abstained from appearing.

On the 6th of April, 1829, the order was reversed without observation, the Counsel of the Bank of Ireland consenting to take £100 for costs.

Order Reversed.

For the Appellant, Mr. Sugden and Mr. Bligh; for the Respondent, the Bank of Ireland, Mr. Horne and Mr. Phillimore.

J. S., by a will properly executed, gave a sum of £1000 to be laid out in Government or real securities, in trust for L. the wife of S., for her separate use for her life; remainder to J. for his life; remainder to the children of L. by S. He then devised certain lands and tenements specified to various persons named in the will, and after bequeathing several pecuniary legacies, he concluded thus: "And I do hereby expressly charge and make liable my real and personal estate to and with the payments of the aforesaid several legacies." Held, reversing the decree of the Court below, that the lands specifically devised, were not liable to the payment of the legacies on a deficiency of the personal estate.

John Spong, by his will, dated the 20th of August, 1811, bequeathed and devised as follows:

I give and bequeath unto my dear wife, Rosamond Spong, the sum of £200 of lawful money of Great Britain, and direct the same to be paid into her hands immediately after my decease; also, I give and devise unto my said wife the possession of the dwelling house in which I now reside, and also the cottage adjoining, now in the occupation of Andrew Kemsley, with the outbuildings, garden, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, free from all rent, except [85] government and parochial taxes, so long as she continues my widow, sole and unmarried; also, I give and bequeath unto my said wife, all my furniture and wines, and moveables of every description, not consisting of money or securities for money, in and about my said dwelling house and cottage, outbuildings, garden and premises, for and during her natural life, she continuing my widow, sole and unmarried. And after the decease of my said wife, or her marrying again, which shall first happen, I give, devise and bequeath my said dwelling house, cottage, outbuildings, garden and premises, and my said furniture, and all wines which shall not be previously used by my said wife, together with my moveables of every description, not consisting of money or securities for money, in and about the said premises, unto and to the use of my son Thomas Spong, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for ever.

Also, I give and bequeath unto my said wife and her assigns, for and during the term of her natural life, one annuity or yearly rent-charge or sum of £100 of lawful money of Great Britain, free and clear of and from all taxes and deductions, whether parliamentary or otherwise (except property tax), the said annuity to be chargeable and charged on, and issuing and payable out of the lands hereinafter mentioned, (that is to say) the yearly sum of £300 part thereof, to be chargeable and charged on and issuing and payable out of the lands by this my will hereinafter given and devised unto my said son Thomas Spong, now living at Mill-hall; and the yearly sum of £100, [86] the remaining part of the said yearly rent-charge of £400, to be chargeable and charged on and issuing and payable out of my mill and premises at Snodland, hereinafter by this my will given and devised unto my son William Spong, etc. And I order and direct that the several provisions made for my wife by this my will, shall be by her accepted and taken in lieu and stead and in full satisfaction of all dower and thirds, free bench and customary right, which she as my said wife could claim to be entitled of, in, to or out of all or any part of my estates, etc.

Also, I give and bequeath to my executor hereinafter named, the legacy or sum of £1000 of like lawful money current in Great Britain and Ireland, to be by him laid out and invested in his name, in the public stocks or funds, or upon government or real securities; and the stocks, funds and securities in or upon which the said sum of £4000 shall be laid out and invested, I direct shall and may be from time to time altered, varied and disposed of, and the monies arising therefrom again laid out and invested in or upon new or other stocks, funds and securities, and so often as to him my said executor shall seem meet; upon trust, that he my said executor do and shall pay the dividends and interest thereof from time to time when and as the same shall accrue due and payable for and during the natural life of Letitia the wife of John Spong, late of the Borough of Southwark, hop factor, during such time only as she remains a widow and unmarried, in such manner as she the said Letitia the wife of the said John Spong, notwithstanding her coverture, [87] shall by any note or writing direct or appoint, or into her own proper hands for her own separate and peculiar use and benefit, so as not to be subject to the debts or control of her husband the said John Spong; and in like manner in all respects as the said annuity or yearly rent-charge of £100 is hereinafter made payable to my daughter Rosamond, and only upon the receipt or receipts of the said Letitia Spong, or her appointee or appointees, which alone shall be a good and sufficient release and discharge, releases and discharges, to my said executor for so much of the dividends, interest and produce of the stocks, funds and securities in or upon which the said sum of £4000 shall be invested and laid out, as shall be therein expressed to be received.

And from and immediately after the decease of the said Letitia Spong, I give and bequeath the interest and dividends of the said sum of £4000 unto my executor hereinafter named, upon trust that he do and shall from time to time well and truly pay or cause to be paid the said interest and dividends into the proper hands of the said John Spong, for and during the term of his natural life; and it is my express will and meaning, that the same shall continue and be paid and payable to the said John Spong during so many years only of his life, as he the said John Spong shall not alien, sell, or assign the same, or attempt to alien, sell or assign the same, to any person or persons whatsoever; but if the said John Spong shall sell or assign the same, then and in such case the said bequest and the trusts hereby created and declared of and con-[88]-cerning the same shall cease, determine, and be utterly void, and the same shall go to and be paid and payable to the said John Spong's children by the said Letitia his wife as hereinafter mentioned; and it is my express mind, will and meaning, that the receipt of the said John Spong shall alone be a sufficient discharge to my said executor. And from and immediately after the decease of the said Letitia Spong and the said John Spong her husband, then I give and bequeath the said principal sum of £4000 upon trust that he my said executor do and shall pay and apply the said principal sum of £4000 for the benefit of all and every the child or children of the said Letitia Spong by the said John Spong her husband, to be equally divided, etc. Provided always, that in case all the said children shall happen to die before any of them attain the age of twenty-one years, and without leaving lawful issue as aforesaid, then upon trust that the principal sum of £4000 shall sink into and be deemed and taken as part of the residuum of my personal estate.

Also I give and devise unto my son Thomas Spong, his heirs and assigns, all and every my freehold and leasehold estates, situate at Mill-hall, East Malling, Aylesford, Burham, Ditton, and Sandgate, in the said County of Kent, and Acton in the County of Middlesex, comprising the estate called the Dunkin Estate, together with the mansion-house, thereunto belonging; and also those three dwelling houses in the occupation of John Smitherman, John French, and John Jarratt, together with the barn, called Ashbarn, lodges and yard; and also all those [89] four other dwelling houses in the occupation of E Oakley, etc.; and also all those two acres and a half of land planted with apples and cherries, leading from Mill-hall to the London turnpike road; and also a field, called Old Hithe Field, containing about one acre and a half; and also certain lands at New Hythe, called Simmons, together with the dwelling houses, etc.; and also all those two houses next adjoining, late in the occupation of, etc. with the lodges, gardens, and appurtenances thereunto belonging; and also all that estate which I lately purchased of Mr. Richard Round, containing by estimation about eighteen acres, together with the willow plot adjoining and next Baldock's wharf; and also all that estate which I lately purchased of Sir John Honeywood, Baronet, likewise adjoining, containing about ten acres (be the same more or less); and also all those two plots of land near the Brook-gate, allotted by the commissioners for dividing the waste lands of East Malling, together with the appurtenances, to hold the said estate and premises by this my will devised to my said son Thomas Spong, unto and to the use of my said son Thomas Spong, his heirs and assigns for ever, subject to the annual payment of £300 to my said wife, during her life, part of the said yearly sum of £400 by this my will given to her; and the annuity or yearly sum of £100 hereinafter given in trust for my daughter Rosamond Spong.

Also I give and bequeath to my said son Thomas Spong, all the farming stock, goods and chattels, books, debts and things contained in an inventory lately made out by me, and signed with my [90] name, which my said son Thomas Spong is in possession of.

Also I give and devise unto my said executor hereinafter named, all that my messuage or dwelling-house, barn and outbuildings, and also twenty acres of land, (be the same more or less) situate lying and being at Cow Lease, in the parishes of Aylesford and Burham aforesaid, late in the occupation of Rebecca Underhill, her under tenants or assigns, but now in my own occupation, with the appurtenances thereunto belonging, upon the trust and to and for the several uses intents and purposes hereinafter mentioned; that is to say, upon trust, that he my said executor shall and do from and immediately after my decease, permit and suffer my son Daniel Spong, and his assigns, to have, hold and enjoy all that my said freehold estate to my said executor given in trust as aforesaid, and to receive and take to his and their own use and benefit the rents, issues and profits thereof, for and during the term of his natural life, he my said son Daniel keeping the said freehold premises in good and tenantable repair.

And from and immediately after his decease, I give and bequeath the said freehold messuage or dwelling-house, barns and outbuildings, with the lands and appurtenances thereunto belonging, unto my said executors, until the youngest child of my said son Daniel shall attain his or her age of twenty-one years; and in the meantime to receive the rents, issues and profits of the same, for and towards the maintenance, education, and bringing up of all and every the child and children of my said son Daniel Spong, upon the [91] trust hereinafter mentioned; and when and so soon as such child shall have attained the said age of twenty-one years, then I do hereby direct my said executor to sell and absolutely dispose of the same by public auction or private contract, as to him shall seem expedient, for the best price or prices in money that can be reasonably had or obtained for the same, and to convey the same accordingly, etc. And from and immediately after the decease of my said son Daniel upon trust, that he my said executor, do and shall pay or transfer all such principal monies, stocks, funds and securities, so to arise by sale of my said estate, until all and every the child or children of the said Daniel Spong, lawfully to be begotten, equally to be divided between or among them, share and share alike, if there shall be more than one; and if there shall be but one such child, the whole to be paid or transferred to such one child, etc.

But in case all the said children shall happen to die without leaving lawful issue of his, her or their body or bodies as aforesaid, then I give and devise the said last mentioned messuage or tenement, lands, hereditaments and premises, unto and to the use of my said son Thomas Spong, his heirs and assigns for ever, etc.

Also I give and devise Snodland Mill, and the several cottages attached thereto, and also the drying houses, sheds, and wharf, and about nine acres of land thereunto belonging, unto and to the use of my son William Spong, of Snodland, his heirs and assigns, for ever, subject and charged with the annual payment of £400 to my said wife for her life, part of the [92] said yearly sum of £400 by this my Will given to her.

And I give, devise and bequeath unto my executor hereinafter named and his heirs, during the natural life of my daughter Rosamond Spong, spinster, one annuity, yearly rent charge, or annual sum of £100 of lawful money of Great Britain, to be issuing and payable out of the estates and premises devised to my said son Thomas Spong as aforesaid.

Also I give and bequeath to my executor hereinafter named, the sum of £1000 of lawful money of Great Britain, to be by him laid out and invested in his name in the public stocks or funds, or upon government or real securities; and the stocks, funds, and securities in or upon which the said sum of £1000 shall be laid out and invested, I direct shall and may be from time to time altered, varied, sold and disposed of, and the monies arising thereupon again laid out and invested in or upon new or other stocks, funds and securities, and so often as to him my said executor shall seem meet, upon trust, that he my said executor do and shall pay the interest and dividends thereof, from time to time, as the same shall accrue due and payable, for and during the natural life of my said daughter Rosamond Spong, in such manner as she shall by note or writing direct or appoint, or into her own proper hands, for her own separate and peculiar use and benefit, so as not to be subject to the debts or control of any husband she may have; and in like manner, in all respects, as the said annuity or yearly rent-charge of £100 is hereinbefore directed to be [93] paid to her my said daughter Rosamond Spong, and only upon the receipt or receipts of my said daughter, or her appointee or appointees.

And from and immediately after the decease of my said daughter, upon trust, that he my said executor do and shall transfer and assign the stocks, funds and securities, in or upon which the said sum of £1000 shall be laid out and invested, unto between and among all and every the child and children of my said daughter, by any husband she may happen to have, etc.; and in case my said daughter Rosamond Spong should not happen to have any son who shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, nor any daughter who shall live to attain that age, or be married, then upon trust that he my said executor do and shall transfer and assign the stocks, funds and securities in or upon which the said sum of £1000 shall be laid out and invested unto, between and among all and every, or any one exclusively of the others or other of my sons and other daughters, as my said daughter, (whether covert or sole) shall by her last will and testament in writing or writings, purporting to be or in the nature of her last will and testament, or a codicil or codicils thereto, to be by her respectively signed and published in the presence of and attested by two or more credible witnesses, direct or appoint; and in case my said daughter Rosamond Spong should happen to depart this life intestate, as to the whole or any part of the said stocks, funds and securities, then the said sum of £1000 shall sink into and be deemed and taken as part and parcel of the residue of my personal estate.

[94] Also I give and bequeath to my daughter Mary, the wife of Charles Brenchley, Esq. the legacy or sum of £2000 of lawful money of Great Britain, which will make up her fortune to the amount of £3000, I having on the marriage of my said daughter Mary with the said Charles Brenchley given her the sum of £1000.

Also I give and bequeath to my executor hereinafter named, the legacy or sum of £2000, etc. upon trust, that he my said executor do and shall pay the dividends and interests thereof from time to time, when and as the same shall accrue due and payable, for and during the natural life of my daughter Martha, the wife of Major William Rowan, in such manner as she shall appoint, etc.; and from and immediately after the decease of my said daughter Martha, then upon trust, that my said executor do and shall stand possessed of the said last mentioned stocks, funds and securities, upon such and the same trusts, and subject to the same provisos and directions in all respects, for the benefit of all and every the children, or the only child, as the case may be, of my said daughter by her present husband, or by any other husband she may hereafter happen to have, as herein before expressed, of and concerning the stocks, funds and securities in or upon which the said sum of £2000 shall be laid out and invested for the benefit of all and every the children or the only child of my said daughter Martha, etc. Also I give and bequeath unto my said daughter Martha Rowan, the further sum of £1000 of lawful money current in Great Britain and Ireland, to be paid and payable to her executors [95] administrators and assigns, within twelve months next after my decease.

Also I give and bequeath to the two children of my deceased daughter Elizabeth, the wife of William Bowles, Esq. the legacy or sum of £1000 each, of like lawful money, when they shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years; also I give and bequeath unto John Spong, the son of the said John Spong by Letitia his wife, the sum of £500 of like lawful money current in Great Britain and Ireland, to be paid him when he shall attain his age of twenty-one years.

And I order and direct the several legacies and sums by this my will given and bequeathed, or which I may hereafter give or bequeath by any codicil or codicils to this my will, and which shall not be otherwise directed to be paid, to be raised and paid, or put out and invested, as the case may require, within twelve months next after my decease; and I do hereby expressly charge and make liable my real and personal estate, to and with the payments of the aforesaid several legacies, etc. The Appellant was appointed executor of this will.

The will was executed and attested so as to pass real estates. The Testator died in the month of January, 1815, without having revoked or altered his will, leaving the Respondent Daniel Spong, his eldest son and heir at law, and Daniel Spong and the Appellant Thomas Spong, and the Respondent William Spong his co-heirs in gavelkind.

After the death of the Testator the Appellant proved his will, and possessed himself of the per-[96]sonal estate and effects of the Testator, and he paid the principal part of the debts and some of the legacies of the Testator; but he did not pay the whole of a mortgage debt which was charged upon the estate devised to the Respondent William Spong, nor the legacy of £1000 to the Respondents John Spong and Letitia his wife and their children, nor invest any sum for the benefit of the several persons entitled to such legacy, and the legacy of £2000 by the Will given to the Respondent Martha Rowan and her children, remained unpaid. Upon the death of the Testator, the Appellant and the other devisees named in his Will, respectively entered into the possession of the several estates thereby devised to them respectively.

The Respondents John Spong and Letitia his wife and their children, together with the Respondent Charles Penderanda da Frauchimont, who married one of the daughters of John Spong, on the 13th of December, 1821, filed their bill in the Court of Exchequer against the Appellant, and the bill was afterwards amended by making the Respondents Daniel Spong, William Spong, Rosamond Spong, William Rowan and Martha his wife, and William Bowles and Mary Bowles Defendants to the suit. The case stated upon the amended bill, was to the effect before mentioned. The bill prayed that an account might be taken of what was due and owing to the above mentioned Respondents for principal, in respect of the aforesaid legacy of £4000, and also of the interest which had accrued due upon such legacy, and that such interest might be paid by the Appellant to the Respondent Letitia [97] Spong, for her sole and separate use, and that the Appellant might be directed forthwith to pay into the Bank of England, in the name and with the privy of the Accountant-General of the said Court, in trust in the said cause, the sum of £1000, and that the same when paid in, might be invested by the said Accountant-General, in the purchase of three per cent. Bank Annuities, for the benefit of the above named Respondents, according to their respective interests therein, under the said Testator's said will, and that the trusts thereof might be declared accordingly; and that the Appellant might also be decreed to make good to the above named Respondents such loss as they had sustained, by the non-investment by him of the said sum of £4000 at the time when he ought to have invested the same; and that an account might be taken also of what was due to the Respondent John Spong the younger, for principal and interest in respect of the legacy therein mentioned; and in case the Appellant would not admit assets of the said Testator come to his hands, sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, then that an account might be taken of the personal estate and effects of the said Testator, which had been received by the Appellant, or by his order, or for his use; and that the same might be applied in a due course of administration; and in case the personal estate of the Testator should not be sufficient for the purposes aforesaid, then that such deficiency might be made good by the sale of a competent part of the real estates of the Testator, and that all necessary parties might join in such sale; and that in the mean time a Receiver might be ap-[98]pointed of the rents, issues and profits of the real estates of the Testator; and that such Receiver might be directed out of such rents and profits to keep down the interest then due, and thereafter to accrue due upon the legacy; and that the Appellant, and the other Defendants therein named, might be restrained by injunction from interfering, or in any manner intermeddling with such real estates.

The Appellant, upon being served with process, put in his answer to the original bill, and also his answer to the amended bill, and thereby admitted the will of the Testator as stated in the bill, and his death; and that he the Appellant had duly proved the will, and had taken upon himself the execution thereof, and that he had possessed himself of the personal estates and effects of the Testator, to the amount thereafter stated, but he thereby denied, that the estate of the Testator was nearly sufficient to pay all the debts and legacies of the Testator: and the Appellant, by his answer, admitted that he had entered into and then was in possession of the real estates of the Testator, devised to him by the will.

The other Defendants also put in their respective answers to the bill, and the Respondents Daniel Spong and William Spong, by their answers respectively admitted the will and death of the Testator: and the Respondent William Spong, by his answer further stated, that the premises devised to him by the Testator, were mortgaged by the Testator in his life time to John Simson, Senior, of Hertford, in the County of Hertford, latter, for the purpose of securing the payment to John [99] Simson, of the sum of £2200 or thereabouts, with interest: and that the Defendant had, since the death of the Testator, paid or accounted for the sum of £1100 or thereabouts, on account of such mortgage, out of the Defendant's own proper monies: and he submitted, that the sum secured by such mortgage being a debt of the Testator, the sum of £1100 so paid by the Defendant on account of such mortgage, ought to be repaid to him, with interest, out of the estate of the Testator.

The several answers of the Appellant, and of the other Defendants to the suit, were replied to: and a witness having been examined on the part of the Respondents, the Plaintiffs in the suit, and cross examined on the part of the Appellant, the cause came on to be heard (reported 1 Young and Jervis, 300) before the Lord Chief Baron, and was argued on the 19th and 20th of December, 1826, and on the 29th of January, 1827, when it was decreed that the will should be established, and the trusts thereof carried into execution: and it was referred to one of the Masters of the Court, to take an account of the respective values of the several real estates of which the Testator was seised at the time of making his will and of his death: and to take an account of the debts, legacies, and funeral and testamentary expenses, and of the personal estate of the Testator come to the hands of the Appellant, etc. and how the same had been disposed of: and upon taking such accounts, if it should appear that the personal estate of the Testator was not sufficient for the payment of the legacy, then the Court declared, [100] that the Testator had, by his will, charged so much as should remain unsatisfied upon the whole of the real estates, whether specifically devised or otherwise, and also upon his personal estate specifically bequeathed: And it was further ordered, that Rosamond Spong, the widow of the Testator, should be at liberty to elect, whether she would claim her dower out of the real estates of the Testator, or whether she would take under the will of the Testator John Spong: and that the Master should enquire and report to the Court accordingly: and whether the Respondent William Spong had paid off any mortgage made by the Testator on any of his real estates, etc.

From this decree, except so far as it directs, that Rosamond Spong, the widow, should be at liberty to elect whether she would claim her dower out of the real estate of the Testator, or whether she would take under his will, the appeal was presented.

For the Appellants: Mr. Fonblanque and Mr. Swann.

For the Respondents: Mr. Sugden and Mr. Stuart.

On the part of the Appellant it was argued that by the general rule of equity, a specific devise was exempt from contribution to a general pecuniary legacy, and that it was for the Respondents to shew from the words or provisions of the will, a clear intention on the part of the Testator to charge the land specifically devised, with the payment of the legacy: that if the land was so charged, a fortiori, the specific legacies to the brother and the widow must be equally [101] charged, which seemed inconsistent with the apparent intent of the Testator, particularly as to the widow, whose legacy was given as a substitute for the right of dower: that the judgment below was founded on the propositions that every devise of land was specific, therefore the devise of a residue of real property was specific, and that there was no distinction as to exemption from charge, between a devise of a particular estate and of such residue: which propositions were contrary to law and the authority of decided cases.

For the Respondents, it was put upon the ground of an implied intention to be collected from the will: And that the words of the will charge all the lands without exception, and are not confined to the residue.

[102] Lord Manners: This is an appeal from a decree of the Court of Exchequer in England, on a bill by the Respondents, who are pecuniary legatees of a sum of £4,000 under the will of John Spong, for the payment of this legacy and for the usual accounts. The bill prayed that if the personal estate of the Testator should be insufficient, the deficiency should be raised out of his real estates, and the question between the parties is, whether if the personal estate should be insufficient to satisfy this legacy, the legatees interested in this sum have a right to resort to the property specifically devised and bequeathed to supply the deficiency. The Lord Chief Baron was of opinion, that according to the true construction and effect of the Testator's will the pecuniary legatees had such right, and decreed accordingly. The Appellant Thomas Spong, who is a specific devisee and legatee, and is also residuary devisee and executor, has appealed from that part of the decree.

The Testator by his will, upon which the question arises, gave a legacy of £200 to his wife, and he also gave to her the possession of a dwelling house, in which he resided, so long as she continued his widow, sole and unmarried. He gave to her also all his furniture and wines, and moveables of every description, not consisting of money, or securities for money, in and about his dwelling house, during her natural life, she continuing unmarried; and after her decease, or her marrying again, he gave his dwelling house, cottage, furniture, and wines which should not have been used, together with moveables of every description, and not consisting of money, or securities for money, [103] to the use of his son Thomas Spong. He then gave to his wife an annuity of £100, £300 of it being payable out of the lands given and devised to his son Thomas Spong, and the remaining £100 out of a Mill and premises devised to another son, William Spong. He then directed that the several provisions made by his will should be in lieu of dower; and he released his son John Spong from a bond debt of £1000. He then gave to his executor a sum of £1000, which is the sum now in question, to be invested in his name in government securities, upon trust, to pay the dividends and interest to Letitia Spong, the wife of John Spong, for her separate use during her widowhood, with remainder to her son as provided by the will. He then gave his estates, freehold and leasehold, at Mill Hall and other places in the County of Kent, and also a property in the County of Middlesex, to Thomas Spong the Appellant, his heirs and assigns for ever, subject to the annual payment of £300 to his wife during her life, part of the said yearly sum of £400 by his will given to her; and the annuity or yearly sum of £100 thereafter given in trust for his daughter Rosamond Spong. He then gave to his son Thomas Spong all the farming stock, etc., upon his farm. He then gave certain lands in the parishes of Aylesford and Burham, to his Executor in trust for his son Daniel Spong, for his life, and after his decease to his children. He then gave certain lands, cottages, and appurtenances to his son William Spong, subject to an annuity of £100, the remainder of the sum of £400 given to his widow.

He gave several other pecuniary legacies, and [104] then comes this clause upon which the question arises: "I do hereby expressly charge and make liable my real and personal estate to and with the payment of the aforesaid several legacies." He then gave some direction with respect to his pews in Aylesford Church; and as to all the rest, residue and remainder of his real and personal estate, of what nature or kind soever the said might consist, not theretofore given and bequeathed, he gave and devised it to his son Thomas Spong, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely, and he appointed Thomas Spong his executor.

Upon the hearing of this cause the Lord Chief Baron pronounced a decree to this effect: "That the Will should be established, and the trusts thereof performed and carried into execution;" and it was further ordered and decreed "that it should be referred to the Master to take an account of the respective values of the several real estates of which the said testator was seised at the time of making his will, and the time of his death;" and it was further ordered and decreed "that it should be referred to the Master to take an account of the debts, legacies and funeral and testamentary expenses, and of the personal estate of the testator John Spong, come to the hands of the appellant, his executor, or of any other person or persons by his order or for his use, and how the same and every part thereof had been applied and disposed of: and upon taking such accounts if it should appear that the personal estate of the testator was not sufficient for the payment of the said legacy, then the Court declared that the testator John Spong had by his will charged so [105] much as should remain unsatisfied upon the whole of his real estates, whether specifically devised or otherwise, and also upon his personal estate specifically bequeathed."

It appears that there was some real property of the testator which passed under the residuary devise, and in this case, Thomas Spong the specific devisee under the will has appealed from that part of the decree which makes liable to the satisfaction of the pecuniary legacy the property devised by the will.

Upon the report of the case it seems that the Lord Chief Baron has laid down a proposition which appears to have pervaded the whole of his argument, and to have governed his decision, and which is to this effect, namely, that there is no difference between a specific devise of a particular estate, and a residuary devise of a real estate, and that a general charge of pecuniary legacies upon real estate as it would affect a residuary devise so it would affect a property specifically devised: for as to real estates they are in their nature specific devises, and if a legatee has a right to resort to the one he has equally a right to resort to the other. Upon this proposition the whole case rests. Now, I confess, I cannot concur in this proposition. There is not much authority in the books upon the subject, but, I think there is a marked and obvious distinction between property specifically devised and real estate which passes under a residuary clause.

In the first case a testator by specifically devising or specifically bequeathing any part of his property, intends as between the objects of his bounty to separate that part of his property from the rest, and that it should not be subject to the [106] provisions and operation of his will. Whereas in a residuary devise as in the present case, it is quite the reverse. The devisee must take it subject to all the provisions and incumbrances charged upon the land. In the one case the devisee takes the specific thing devised—in the other case the residuary devisee takes such part of the real property as shall remain after satisfying the charges and incumbrances affecting the real estate. The cases therefore appear to me most materially different. By the general rule a specific devisee or specific legatee shall not contribute to make good a pecuniary legacy, but there can be no such rule applicable to a residue. A residue of a real estate is so far specific that it must be in the possession or in the power of the testator to devise it at the time of making his will, and upon the lapse of any specific devise it will not fall into the residue, but in other respects it is merely residue, and this is its character. Lord Hardwicke in the case of Hamby v. Roberts, which is reported in Ambler, and better reported in the first volume of Dickens's Reports, recognizes that distinction in the marshalling of assets: and it is a distinction, as it appears to me, which is very obvious and very decisive of this case. The Lord Chief Baron has not drawn that distinction, and this appears to me to be the objection to this part of the decree against which the appeal was directed.

Mr. Sugden in his argument contended that if the testator had at the outset of his will charged his debts and legacies upon his real estate, and had then given specific devises, and specific bequests, and also pecuniary legacies, the pecuniary legatees would, in case other funds were deficient, [107] have a right to resort to the property specifically disposed of. I do not concur in that opinion. It certainly was not the opinion of Lord Alvanley, who in three different instances stated his opinion as to the distinction between creditors and legatees under such circumstances. In the first case of Kightley v. Kightley (2 Ves. J. 328) in 1794, Lord Alvanley makes that distinction. Afterwards in the case of Shallcross v. Finden (3 Ves. 739) in 1795, he persists in that distinction, and in the case of Keeble v. Brown (5 Ves. 359), in the year 1800, he continues to distinguish between creditors and legatees in respect of such a charge.

Now this opinion of Lord Alvanley's, though it does not amount to the authority of a decision upon the subject, is by no means without weight. He laid down this rule in the first case I have adverted to, and having afterwards understood that the Lord Chancellor differed from him in opinion, that brought his mind more forcibly to reflect upon it, and he persisted in that opinion, and afterwards proceeded in three different cases to lay down the doctrine accordingly. I think there is much more weight to be given to it than to a mere obiter dictum, for though it does not amount to a decision, it was a deliberate and well considered opinion.

When this case came on for argument, I stated that I would not in the absence of any law Lord take upon myself to reverse the decision of an eminent Judge, whose decisions are entitled to so much respect. I have now an opportunity of expressing my opinion in the presence of my noble and learned Friend on the woolsack; and I have the satisfaction of saying that I have com-[108]-municated that opinion to Lord Eldon, and Lord Redesdale, both of whom concur with me in it.

With respect to the case of Campbell v. Joy, which was supposed to be a decision upon the point; in that case there does not appear to be an express charge so as to amount completely and entirely to an authority upon the point; but I have enquired of Lord Redesdale what we are to understand by his stating in that case "that it would be understood by counsel that it would be contrary to principle to charge a specific part of an estate called Throne, with the payment of legacies." His answer was, that what he meant by its being against principle was, that it was an established rule of the Court that a specific devisee or a specific legatee was not to contribute to make up a pecuniary legacy; and that that was what he meant to lay down in that case.

Now if the testator had intended to prefer the pecuniary legatee to the specific devisee or specific legatee, and had by his will expressed that intention, or if that intention must be necessarily implied from the context of the will, there is no doubt the Court would have given effect to that intention and have decided accordingly. But the rule of construction when this intention is not expressed, is that the pecuniary legatee cannot resort to property that is specifically disposed of. That was the opinion of Lord Eldon in this case, and it was the opinion also of Lord Redesdale, in which I perfectly concur, having had the advantage of hearing all the arguments upon the subject.

There was another observation which was very well made by one of the Counsel at the Bar, that [109] in this case the testator seems to have himself understood the distinction between a specific legatee and a residuary legatee, for he gives to Thomas Spong a specific bequest of land and personal property, and he also makes him residuary devisee, and legatee, and from that it was inferred that he was aware of the difference between a specific and a residuary devise of real estate. That was an observation made by one of the Learned Counsel, and very properly as applying to this case; so far, therefore, from there being any intention in this case on the part of the Testator to prefer the pecuniary legatee, he has himself drawn the distinction, and he has stated nothing that would justify the Court in excepting this case out of the general rule, namely, that a specific legatee or a specific devisee shall not make good a pecuniary legacy. If this distinction of the Lord Chief Baron's were to stand, it would very much disturb and shake that rule, which I think there is no ground for doing.

With respect to the case put by Mr. Sugden, although I may say, that I do not agree with him, and that I think Lord Alvanley was not of that opinion, perhaps the best and most satisfactory answer that I can give to Mr. Sugden is, that the Testator in this case has not so done as he represents. He says, that if in the outset of the will there was a charge of legacies, upon real and personal estate, it would entitle the residuary legatee to go against the property so devised. But in this case the Testator has not so done.

Upon the whole, I submit to your Lordships, that the part of the decree of the Lord Chief Baron, in which he directs that "if it shall ap[110]pear that the personal estate of the Testator was not sufficient for the payment of the said legacy, then the Court declared that the Testator John Spong had by his will charged so much as should remain unsatisfied, upon the whole of his real estates, whether specifically devised or otherwise, and also upon his personal estate specifically."

devised," should be reversed, and that in all other respects the decree should be affirmed.

Die Lunae, 13th of April, 1829.—It is ordered and adjudged, etc. that so much of the decree complained of in the said appeal as declares that "if upon taking the accounts, it should appear that the personal estate of the Testator was not sufficient for the payment of the legacy in the decree mentioned, then that the said Testator J. Spong had by his will charged so much as should remain unsatisfied, upon the whole of his real estates, whether specifically devised or otherwise, and upon his personal estate specifically bequeathed," be and the same is hereby reversed. And it is further ordered and adjudged that the said decree complained of, in all other respects be and the same is hereby affirmed.

In the report of the case of Joy v. Campbell, 1 Scho. and Lefroy, p. 339, is a marginal note or abstract, which is thus expressed:—"A specific legacy cannot in a subsequent part of the will be charged with payment of debts or legacies." The Lord Chief Baron, in his observations (1 Young and Jervis, 314) in giving judgment upon this case of Spong v. Spong, having expressed a doubt of the accuracy of this marginal note, a corrected report of the case of Joy v. Campbell, drawn up by Mr. Beatty, is inserted below. This report contains many essential additions to the statements, some of which are noticed by italics, and others by indexes. A report is also added of the further proceedings in the case before Lord Manners.

[111] William Brown deceased, was in and before the year 1787 a dormant partner in the mercantile house at Belfast called the "Sugar House Company," in which he possessed one half of six shares part of twenty shares of which the capital stock consisted, the other half of which six shares belonged to John Brown his brother; William Brown was also a dormant partner, and had one third of a share of the capital stock in another mercantile establishment called the "Rope Walk Company," in which John and another brother Thomas Brown were concerned in the same manner, and to the same extent, each having one third of a share.

In 1787, John Brown being about to commence business as a banker, assigned his interest in the said two mercantile concerns to his brother William in trust for himself, and William executed a declaration of trust accordingly; and shortly after William intending to enter into another banking house, prevailed on Thomas (who was apprized of the former trust), to become a trustee both for him and for John, for their respective shares in the said houses, the other partners having agreed to accept Thomas as a partner. An assignment was executed to him, for merely nominal consideration, the object being to evade the provision of the bankers' act; and soon after the execution of the assignment, Thomas cancelled the deed by cutting off the name and seal of William, and delivered back the deed so cancelled to William in whose possession it remained till his death. Thomas regularly received the dividends accruing from the said companies, and duly paid over to William his shares during his life, and gave credit to John in his account with him for the amount of his shares. During the period of these transactions Thomas carried on a distinct trade in partnership with John Oakman, under the firm of Brown and Oakman.

William Brown was, previous to the making of his will after mentioned, and at the time of his death seized and possessed of a farm and land called the Throne near Belfast, in the county of Antrim, for the lives of the King and the Dukes of York and Clarence, and from the death of the survivor for the term of forty-one years, to be computed from the 1st November, 1790, and also seized and possessed of other real and personal estates to a very considerable amount, and being thus seized and possessed, he, on the 11th November, 1794, made his will duly executed, by which he bequeathed several pecuniary legacies and an annuity, and devised and bequeathed to his brother Thomas Brown, his dwelling-house in Belfast, held for lives and years, with his household furniture, plate, houses, etc. and [112] after bequeathing several further pecuniary legacies, and among others one thousand pounds to William Brown Joy, the son of his niece Mary Ann Joy, and two thousand pounds to the other issue of said Mary Ann Joy; he left devised and bequeathed his farm and premises at the Throne, in the Barony of Belfast, with his buildings, etc. thereon unto his nephew William Brown, son of his brother Thomas Brown, to hold to him his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, from the time he attained his age of twenty-one years; but in case his said nephew William Brown should die under the age of twenty-one years, he left and devised the said farm and premises to the next eldest son which his said brother Thomas Brown might happen to have, when such next eldest son should attain the age of twenty-one years, and to the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of such next eldest son; and in case no son of his said brother Thomas should attain the age of twenty-one years, then he left and devised the farm at the Throne amongst the daughters of his said brother Thomas (if more than one) share and share alike, with this special limitation however respecting the said devise of the farm at the Throne, to wit that none of the said devisees should or could take effect, until the decease of his said brother Thomas, for it was his will, and he did thereby order and direct, that his brother Thomas Brown should have and enjoy the free use and benefit, profits, and advantages of the said farm, from testator's decease for the term of his natural life without impeachment of waste. The testator then bequeathed three thousand pounds among the children of his said brother Thomas Brown to be paid with interest on their coming of age or sooner at the option of his executors, and subject to the payment of the legacies, annuities, devises and bequests aforesaid, and to his debts and funeral expenses; he devised and bequeathed all the rest residue and remainder of his lands, tenements, freehold estates, effects, money, and securities for money, goods, chattels, and worldly property of every denomination and description whatsoever and wheresoever at the time of his death, unto his said brother Thomas Brown his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and nominated John Campbell, (to whom he gave a legacy of one hundred pounds), James Joy, and his brother Thomas Brown executors and trustees of his will, and the testator thereby ordered and directed that whatever part of the several legacies thereinbefore mentioned should remain unpaid, at the end of twelve months next after his decease, together with the life annuity thereinbefore mentioned, should be then well and sufficiently secured upon his freehold and personal estates and assets, and bear a legal interest from that time until paid and discharged in manner aforesaid. And in case any of the legacies thereinbefore [113] mentioned and bequeathed should lapse, by means of the death or failure of one or more of the legatees aforesaid previous to testator's death, he thereby bequeathed such lapse the legacy or legacies to his said brother Thomas Brown his executors, administrators, or assigns, and upon the death or failure of one or more of the legatees aforesaid or annuitant before mentioned, whose legacies were payable under said will upon contingencies of life, at attaining full age, or being otherwise, circumstantially or eventually, capable of taking or inheriting under the said will, he did thereby order and direct that all such contingent legacies should go and belong to his said brother Thomas Brown his executors, administrators, and assigns.

William Brown the testator died in December, 1795, whereupon all the executors proved his will in the prerogative court of Ireland, and took probate, but as James Joy did not live at Belfast where the property principally lay, it was managed by the others; Thomas Brown continuing until his bankruptcy in October 1798, to receive the dividends of the Sugar House and Rope Walk companies as trustee, collecting debts due to the deceased and paying some of his debts and legacies, and Campbell (who had been the partner of William in the bank) retaining in his hands a sum of five thousand two hundred and eighty-five pounds one shilling and fivepence, belonging to his testator, which was lying in the bank at the time of his death, and paying himself his legacy of one hundred pounds.

With respect to this sum of five thousand two hundred and eighty-five pounds one shilling and fivepence the following transactions took place. Campbell had in the life time of William Brown lent a sum of four thousand two hundred pounds to

Brown and Oakman on the joint note of William and John Brown, and Brown and Oakman for two thousand seven hundred pounds, of this, part was paid in William Brown's life time, and the remainder due at his death the sum of three thousand two hundred and thirty-two pounds, which Campbell received from the bank, and lodged the notes in the bank to the credit of William Brown's account; soon after the bank settled accounts with Thomas Brown as executor of William Brown, on which occasion, after deducting the said sum of three thousand two hundred and thirty-two pounds, and also a sum of one thousand five hundred and forty pounds which had been previously paid to Thomas Brown, a balance of five hundred and thirteen pounds one shilling and fivepence appeared due to the estate of William Brown which was then paid to him, and a receipt for the whole sum of five thousand two hundred and eighty-five pounds one shilling and fivepence was given to the bank by Campbell and Thomas Brown as executors; at [114] the same time, the notes not only of William Brown but of John Brown and of Brown and Oakman were given up to Thomas Brown, and no steps were ever taken to compel payment against either John Brown or Brown and Oakman.

After the bankruptcy of Brown and Oakman, (which did not take place until October 1798) the assignees insisted on their right to have not only Thomas's original share in the Rope Walk company, but also that which he held in trust for William, which trust he had admitted on his examination before the commissioners, and this claim having been disputed by the executors of William, was submitted to arbitrators, who by their award decided in favour of the assignees, in consequence of which, the value of that share was paid over to them by the company.

On the bankruptcy of Thomas Brown, John Graham and John Scott were chosen his assignees, who as such, sold the interest of the bankrupt in the freehold tenement in Waring Street, Belfast, which had been specifically devised by William Brown to him for the sum of one thousand two hundred pounds, and they also sold the life interest of Thomas Brown in the farm at the Throne, which had been specifically devised to him for life.

Thomas Brown died on the 2nd of July, 1801, leaving Sarah, Isabella, William, Frances, Mary, and Campbell Brown, his only children, but before his son William, or any of his children, had attained the age of twenty-one years.

The bill in this cause was filed on the 14th of January, 1803, by the children of Mary Ann Joy against Campbell and Joy, the surviving executors of William Brown, and the assignees and children of Thomas Brown, and against John Brown the eldest brother and heir at law of William Brown the testator, stating the foregoing circumstances, and charging that owing to the misapplication of the assets by Thomas Brown and Campbell, there was not a sufficiency left for payment of the legacies bequeathed to them by the will of William Brown, and praying, "That the said award may be set aside, and that the executors might be decreed to come to a just and fair account with your supplicants for the estate of the said William Brown, and that the said executors might set forth a particular account of the real and personal estate of the testator, specifying the nature, quantities, qualities, and value thereof respectively, and how much thereof they had applied in discharge of the testator's proper debts and legacies and funeral expences, and how much thereof had been applied in discharge of the debts of the said Thomas Brown, and of said Brown and Oakman, and to whom, and for what paid, [115] and what was become thereof particularly; and that the said John Campbell might answer for such parts of testator's estate as he misapplied in payment of said notes, or as through his neglect or wilful default had been wasted and lost, or as by his means or assistance had come to the hands of said Thomas Brown, or that said Thomas Brown might contribute to the payment of said notes: And that the said executors might set forth a particular account of the debts due and owing by the testator at the time of his death, and on what securities, and to whom due, and how contracted, and which of them remained unsatisfied, and which of them had been paid, and by whom; and that the whole real and personal estate whereof the said William Brown died seized or possessed, or such part thereof as to the Court should seem fit, might be decreed to be subject to the said William Brown's debts and legacies; and that the same or a competent part thereof, might be sold for payment of said debts and legacies, or that plaintiffs might be permitted to claim as creditors on the estate of said Thomas Brown for the amount thereof, or for said William Brown's proportion of the purchase money thereof specified in said deed of assignment to said Thomas Brown; and that plaintiffs, or said executors in trust for them, might be permitted to claim as creditors on said bankrupt's estate, for all sums of money received by him before his bankruptcy out of said two companies, on the foot of said William Brown's shares therein; and that the said John Graham and John Scott might be restrained by injunction from making a dividend of said bankrupt's estate, until the hearing of the cause. And that plaintiff's legacies might be raised, and might be placed out at interest on good security for their benefit, until such legacies should respectively be payable; and that in the meantime the interest thereof might be applied towards their maintenance and education, and that all necessary accounts might be taken.

All the defendants answered the bill: and witnesses having been examined, the cause came on for hearing on pleadings and proofs, and was argued on the 1st, 2nd, 4th, 5th, and 12th days of May, 1801, before Lord Redesdale, the then Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

The Attorney-General (O'Grady), now Chief Baron, Mr. Saurin, Mr. Mayne, and Mr. Joy for the plaintiffs: the Solicitor-General (Plunkett), now Chief Justice Common Pleas, Mr. Burston, and Mr. Scriven, for the defendants, John Campbell and William Brown, and the other children (all minors) of Thomas Brown: Mr. Dunt, and Mr. Bushe (now Chief Justice King's Bench), for defendant Joy: and Mr. Ball and Mr. Bell for the assignees of Mr. Brown.

[116] Much of the argument of Counsel was directed, to the consideration of the validity of the award, made regarding the shares held by Thomas Brown in the two companies, in trust for William the testator, and also as to the liability of Campbell to refund to the estate the sum he had received in payment of the notes in which the testator was security to him with Thomas Brown, and Brown and Oakman. It was also argued by the plaintiffs' Counsel, that the assignees of Thomas Brown were bound to bring into Court the proceeds of the sales of the tenement in Waring Street, and the life interest of Thomas in the farm at the Throne, both of which he took under the specific devises of the will. With regard to the farm at the Throne, on the part of the plaintiffs it was contended, that the devise of the Throne to William Brown was a contingent remainder, and that by the death of Thomas Brown before his son William came of age the remainder to William, and the other limitations expectant thereon were defeated, and the same therefore descended to testator's heir at law, or to his residuary legatees, and were in either case subject to the debts and legacies of the testator. However, it was argued that even taking it for granted that the property passed to William the minor under the specific devise in the testator's will, it was equally liable with the other real property to the payment of his debts and legacies.

On the part of the minor, William Brown, it was argued that the devise of the interest of William Brown which was a per auter vie estate, and a term of years in case the lives should fall within a certain period to William Brown the minor at 21, though given by a written clause to Thomas the father for life, could not be considered as a contingent remainder, which must take effect, or not at all, on the death of Thomas, as in the case of a particular estate supporting a remainder of an estate of inheritance for the per auter vie estate remains and continues whilst the life lasts, and if there be no special occupant, it goes to, and vests in the first occupant, and that the devise therefore was no more than an appointment of the person to take a special occupant, and though he may not, and it was admitted, was not entitled to take as such until he was 21, it was contended that his use then would be good, and no rule of law to prevent him, and that the devise was clearly a good existing devise, and that the doctrine of contingent remainders was quite inapplicable. This point being established, it was admitted that the possession or profits of the lands from the death of Thomas Brown to whom it was specifically devised only for life until William Brown should attain the age of twenty one years, passed under the residuary devise to the assignees of Thomas Brown, subject with the rest of testator's property not specifically devised to the payment of his debts and legacies; but that only till William, the specific devisee, should attain his full age, and that after that period they would belong to him, not subject to the charge made by the will for the payment of the debts and legacies, notwithstanding the testator's other properties should be inadequate to pay his debts and legacies, as it was submitted that the said charge did not affect the interest to which William was entitled under the said specific devise.

With respect to this property his Lordship had the question fully discussed at the bar, "whether William Brown, the son of Thomas, took the estate devised to him by way of contingent remainder or of executory devise," but it afterwards appeared unnecessary to decide the question at that stage of the cause.

Lord Redesdale: I shall consider further the point with respect to Campbell and the Throne property, the only other question is with respect to the shares in the partnership concerns.

His Lordship then went into the consideration of the arguments which had been urged on the part of the assignees of Thomas Brown as to the validity of the award made with respect to these shares, and stated the reasons at great length which induced him to come to the conclusion, that "with respect to this property the right was with the creditors and legatees, and that there was no difficulty in saying that this money should be accounted for." His Lordship then went on to say,—

"On the other part of the case,* the funds for paying these demands, are only the property passing under the residuary bequest after the specific bequest to Thomas Brown," (that is, the specific bequest of the tenement in Waring Street, and of a life interest in the Throne.) "It is attempted in the subsequent part of the will to charge this, but that is against principle: it is a legacy as much as any other, and it cannot be considered that the testator meant to give that specifically, and yet to subject it in some manner as if it formed part of the residue; that property therefore, must be taken by the assignees of Brown, not subject to the legacies so far as the other fund shall not be able to discharge them."

The Lord Chancellor was disposed to reserve his judgment as to [118] the liability of John Campbell to refund to the testator's estate the sum he had received from the testator's assets in payment of the notes of the testator and Thomas Brown, and Brown and Oakman; and also the absolute disposition of the fee in the Throne property until the report should come in; but it having been intimated as the wish of the parties to have his Lordship's opinion as to the liability of Campbell delivered in the first instance, the cause was called on again on the 12th of May, 1804, and his Lordship after alluding to the arguments of Counsel on both sides, and referring to several decisions on similar points, declared that Campbell was bound to refund the sum he had so received from the assets of the testator.

Pursuant to that part of the decree by which it was ordered, that the estate and property of William Brown not specifically devised then remaining unsold should be forthwith sold, the testator's interest in several premises were sold by the executors, and amongst the rest, the rents of the farm of the Throne to accrue until a son of Thomas Brown should attain the age of twenty-one years, were sold for the sum of fifty pounds, the Chancellor considering that the intermediate rents between the death of Thomas Brown, and the majority of William Brown, his son, passed under the residuary devise and were subject to the testator's debts and legacies.

John Campbell having died, a bill of revivor was filed against his executors, and the cause was revived.

Graham and Scott, the assignees of Thomas Brown, both died, the former having survived.

William Brown, the eldest son of Thomas Brown, attained his age of twenty-one years on the 30th of April, 1810.

The Master made his report in 1811. On the 22nd February, 1812, the cause was heard on the Master's Report and on the merits.

The Attorney-General for the plaintiffs, after stating the pleadings, decree, and Master's Report, proceeded: "A question arises on the freehold premises called the Throne, belonging to the testator, who after bequeathing several legacies, devised the farm of the Throne to his nephew William Brown, to hold to him, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, from the time he attained the age of twenty-one years; but in case he should die under that age, he devised the farm to the next eldest son which his brother might happen to have, when such next eldest son should attain the age of twenty-one years, and to the heirs, etc. of such next eldest son, and in case of no son attaining twenty-one years, to the daughters. This question is reserved by Lord Redesdale in the decree, and it now becomes necessary to consider who is entitled under the will to this farm. We contend that it is a devise to testator's brother for life, with a contingent remainder to his first son attaining twenty-one, and not an executory devise; that Thomas having died before any son attained twenty-one, the contingent remainder is gone, and the estate descends to the heirs. There was another question, whether this farm was liable to the payment of the pecuniary legacies, but Lord Redesdale decided that those lands being specifically devised to Thomas Brown for life, and to his first son attaining twenty-one, were not liable to the payment of the legacies.

Mr. Dunn for the defendant, William Brown, the devisee.

The object of the testator was to put forward in life the family of his brother Thomas. His brother John was his heir at law, but the testator does not notice him in the will. The testator had fixed his residence at the Throne, and his anxious wish appears to have been to establish Thomas's family there. He intended that Thomas should enjoy the farm during his life, and on his death the devise over to take effect. The intent is clear and manifest, but it is contended that this being a contingent remainder, has been destroyed. We contend that this limitation to William, the son of Thomas, is a vested interest. I argue this as if it were an estate of inheritance, but it is an estate per autre vie, in which there cannot be strictly a legal remainder. The first case where a devise to a person at twenty-one was held to be a vested remainder, was Boraston's case, 3 Rep. 19. Edwards v. Hammond; or Stocker v. Edwards. There was a devise for life, remainder to another when he should attain twenty-one. The tenant for life died and the remainder man was only seventeen, and the question was whether the remainder vested: the Court held it to be a condition subsequent, and that the estate vested immediately, subject to be divested on not attaining twenty-one. See Mansfield v. Dugard, 2 Eq. Ca. 195; Stocker v. Edwards, 2 Shower, 398; 3 Lev. 132.

Lord Manners: If the words in the will were to Thomas for life, remainder to his eldest son on attaining twenty-one, I should go with you; but the devise is to William Brown from the time he should attain twenty-one years.

Mr. Dunn: The word "If" is the strongest that can be used to create a contingency; and yet even that has been overruled. Bromfield v. Crowder, 1 N. R. 313. There the testator devised to A. for life, and after her death to B. for life, and at the decease of A. and B. or the survivor, gave all his real estate to C. if he should attain twenty-one. It was held C. took a vested remainder. In the pre-[120]-sent case the word "from" is used in the first devise; and in the second devise the word "when" is used, which shews the intention. The last limitation is to the daughters. The testator must be presumed to have intended an equal benefit to all the children. Now the devise to the daughters is without any condition, and if their father died without leaving sons, they would take absolutely. This proves the intention of the testator was that all should take alike. In Bromfield v. Crowder, it was contended the remainder was gone, yet the Court was unanimous in the opinion that the estate had vested; and there is no distinction between the present case and that, where the devise was held to be an immediate devise, but to go over in case of death before twenty-one.

Lord Manners: When I find that Sir William Grant, who had so much experience, sent that case to a Court of Law, I ought not to decide the present question, which is purely legal; however, I shall hear the argument.

The Solicitor General on the same side.

We contend that this is an executory devise, although I may argue differently from the course pursued by Mr. Dunn, yet we have the same interest. If the father had no estate for life, it would be clearly an executory devise to the eldest son, and would vest. This estate was intended to vest in possession when any of the nephews attained twenty-one, till then the father of the devisees was to enjoy as a rent charger, then does any inconsistency arise by giving the father an estate for life? It is only a condition subsequent, that if the first nephew should die before twenty-one, his father living, the second nephew should take; but if he died after twenty-one, then the estate would go to his representatives. The attaining twenty-one is the period looked at by the testator, and when one of the nephews should attain it, the estate would then vest. The father was an incumbrancer for the rents and profits. Suppose the testator had devised an annual sum to the father, or that the sons should pay the rents and profits to him, would that make any difference? 2ndly, Here the words of the will are transposed in order to make out a contingent remainder,—it is not the rule of construction thus to defeat the will.

Mr. Plunkett for the legatees.

Lord Redesdale has decided that this is not a vested interest, and then the question is, whether it be a contingent remainder or an executory devise.

Mr. Burston for the legatees.

From the decision of Dou v. Morgan, 3 T. R. 763, it is manifest that this is not an executory devise, it must be either a vested or [121] contingent remainder,—whether the testator intended it should be one or the other, is never attended to. Here is an estate for life to Thomas, remainder to his first son attaining twenty-one, remainder to the daughters. As some of the sons have attained twenty-one, the daughters cannot take: here the condition is, if any of the sons attain twenty-one at the death of the father: a remainder may be limited of an estate per autre vie, and a freehold estate must support it.

The Lord Chancellor: I must direct a case to be made for the opinion of a Court of law on the following question: Whether any of the children of Thomas Brown, in the events which have happened, took any and what interest under the will of William Brown, in the lands called the Throne farm.

On the 21st of May, 1812, the case was argued in the Court of Common Pleas, upon nearly the same grounds which had been urged before the Lord Chancellor: The following certificate was afterwards sent by the Judges to the Lord Chancellor.

"We are of opinion, that in the events which have happened, the defendant William Brown took upon the death of his father, Thomas Brown, the whole interest in the term of lives and years in the lands called the Throne farm, under the will of the said William Brown, subject to be divested, if the said William Brown, the defendant, had died before he attained the age of twenty-one years."

On the 13th of May, 1813, the cause was heard on the Judge's certificate, and also on the question specially reported by the Master, whether the executors of Campbell should be charged with interest on the sum of three thousand two hundred and thirty pounds, part of a sum of five thousand two hundred and eighty-five pounds, applied by Campbell, in paying the debts due to Thomas Brown and John Oakham; when the Lord Chancellor was of opinion that the certificate of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas should be affirmed, and that the executors of Campbell should be charged interest, and the following decree was made.

Court: Decree the defendant, William Brown, entitled to the farm called the Throne in the pleadings mentioned, devised to him by the will of the late William Brown deceased. Decree the defendants, the executors of John Campbell, deceased, chargeable with the several sums of three hundred and eighteen pounds six shillings and twopence, and three thousand seven hundred and twenty pounds fourteen shillings and tenpence, being the interest reported due by [122] them on the sum of three thousand seven hundred and eighty-five pounds one shilling and fivepence, unapplied by Thomas Brown in said report named out of the sum received by him from the discount company in the pleadings mentioned, together with interest on said sum of three thousand seven hundred and eighty-five pounds one shilling and fivepence, from the 20th day of January, 1811, to which day interest was so reported thereon until paid, and let said several sums be forthwith paid by said defendants to the plaintiff, William Brown Joy, as administrator, De bonis non, with the will annexed of said William Brown deceased, and after payment thereof of plaintiff's costs, refer it to the Master to apportion said several sums so to be paid the plaintiff, William Brown Joy, amongst the several legatees of said William Brown according to the sums reported to them, and the sums paid them on foot of their respective legacies, and let the several sums so to be apportioned be paid by the plaintiff, William Brown Joy, to the several persons entitled thereto out of the fund so to be apportioned and paid to him as aforesaid. Refer it to the Master to apportion the stock transferred to the credit of the plaintiffs, Isabella Joy, Robert Joy, and George Joy, minors, pursuant to the said order of the 9th day of May, 1812, together with such interest as hath accrued thereon, to and amongst the said Isabella Joy, Robert Joy, and George Joy, minors, and let the Accountant-General then forthwith draw in favour of and transfer to the said Isabella, Robert, and George Joy, respectively, on their attaining their respective ages of twenty-one years, so much of said stock and the interest thereof as shall be so apportioned to them respectively, either party, plaintiffs or defendants, to be at liberty to proceed on said references. Reserve the question of costs as against the assignees of Thomas Brown, and the creditors of John Campbell.

(GREAT SESSIONS, CHESTER, AND KING'S BENCH) (IN ERROR.)

EDWARD VIGOR FOX, Esq.,—Plaintiff: GEORGE HENRY, Bishop of Chester,—Defendant.

[Mews' Dig. v. 1231 : S.C. 1 Dow and Cl. 116 : 6 Bing. 1 : and in K.B. 2 B. and C. 635 : 4 Dowl. and Ry. 93. The sale of next presentations and agreements to exercise rights of patronage in favour of particular persons are rendered invalid by the Benefices Act 1898 [61 and 62 Vict. c. 48] s. 1 (1) (b) (3) : but (s. 1 (7)) in a family settlement a life interest to the settlor may be reserved. See also Walsh v. Bishop of Lincoln, 1875, L.R. 10 C. P. 518.]

By the stat. 31 Eliz. c. 6, s. 5, it is enacted, that "If any person, etc. shall, for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, directly, or indirectly, or for or by reason of any promise, agreement, grant, bond, or other assurance of, or for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit whatsoever, directly or indirectly, present or collate any person to any benefice with cure of souls, dignity, prebend, or living ecclesiastical, or give or bestow the same for or in respect of any such corrupt cause or consideration, that every such presentation, collation, gift and bestowing, and every admission, institution, investiture, and induction thereupon shall be utterly void, frustrate, and of none effect in law."

In quare impedit it was found, by special verdict that B. the incumbent of a rectory was on a certain day afflicted with a mortal disease of which he died at eleven o'clock at night, and that at three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day T. the patron of the living, and F. both knowing the condition of B. in pursuance of an agreement, executed a deed by which in consideration of £6000 T. granted to F. the advowson for a term of 99 years, if F. should so long live, with a proviso that as soon as F. by vacancy or otherwise should have made presentation to the Rectory, he should re-assign to T. the residue of the term. It was found also by the verdict that this agreement and deed was a device to convey the next presentation: But that the deed was executed without the knowledge or privity of H. (the person afterwards presented by T. and rejected by the Bishop Ordinary), and without any intention to present him.

Upon this finding, judgments having been given for the Defendant in the Courts of Great Sessions, Chester, and the King's [124] Bench, they were reversed in the House of Lords upon writ of Error, the House being of opinion that this sale of the next presentation was not void under the statute.

This was a Writ of Error, brought by the plaintiff below, from a judgment of the Court of King's Bench at Westminster, affirming a judgment of the Court of great Sessions at Chester, on a special verdict in a quare impedit commenced in the latter Court.

In the declaration in the Court below, the first count stated that the advowson of the rectory of the church of Wilmslow was appurtenant to the manor of Bollyn, and set out specially the title of Thomas Joseph Trafford to the manor, with the appurtenances for life; and shewed that J. Bradshaw, the last incumbent, was presented by virtue of a grant of the next avoidance made by Trafford, through whom Thomas Joseph Trafford claimed: and then proceeded: "And the said Thomas Joseph Traf ford being so seised thereof afterwards, to wit, on the 12th day of November 1819, at, etc. (the said church being then and there full of the said J. Bradshaw, the then incumbent thereof,) by a certain indenture then and there made, between Thomas Joseph Trafford of the one part, and plaintiff of the other part, of which profert is made, he the said Thomas Joseph Trafford, for the consideration therein mentioned, did grant, bargain, sell, and demise unto the plaintiff, his executors, etc. All that the said advowson, donation, right of patronage, presentation, and free disposition of, in, and to the said Rectory and Parish Church of Wilmslow in the County [125] Palatine of Chester, with the rights, members, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, habendum to the said plaintiff, his executors, etc. for ninety-nine years, if the said Thomas Joseph Trafford should so long live." By virtue of which said last mentioned indenture, the said plaintiff, then and there became and was possessed of the said advowson, of and in the said Rectory, as in gross by itself for the said term, so to him thereof granted. The declaration then averred that Thomas Joseph Trafford is still living, and that after the making of the indenture, and whilst plaintiff was possessed of the advowson, to wit, on, etc. the said church became vacant by the death of the said J. Bradshaw, the last incumbent thereof, whereby it then belonged and now belongs to the plaintiff to present a fit person to the said church so being vacant; but the said Bishop unjustly hinders him from so doing.

There was a second count, setting out a title to the advowson in gross, and omitting all mention of the manor: in all other respects it was similar to the first.

The defendant craved oyer of the indenture made between the plaintiff and Trafford, whereby it was witnessed, that in consideration of £6000, paid to Trafford by the plaintiff, the former had granted, bargained, sold, and demised, and by the said indenture did grant, etc., all that the advowson, donation, right of patronage, presentation, and free disposition of, in, and to the Rectory and parish Church of Wilmslow, with the rights, members, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, habendum, for ninety-nine years, if Trafford should so long live: With a proviso that when [126] and so soon as he the said Edward Vigor Fox, his executors, etc. should have presented to the said Rectory or Church of Wilmslow, by reason of the same having become vacant or void by the death, resignation, deprivation, eviction, promotion, or succession of J. Bradshaw the incumbent, or otherwise, or through the wilful neglect or default of him the said Edward Vigor Fox, his executors, etc., the said Rectory or Church should have been suffered, as to the presentation or right of presentation thereto to lapse, he the said Edward Vigor Fox, his executors, etc. should and would at any time or times thereafter at the request and proper costs and charges of the said Thomas Joseph Trafford, or such person as he should appoint, re-assign the said advowson to him the said Thomas Joseph Trafford, or such person as aforesaid, for all the residue which should be then unexpired of the said term of ninety-nine years, free from all incumbrances, by the said Edward Vigor Fox, his executors, etc. He then craved oyer of the indenture in the second count mentioned, which was declared to be in the same words as the indenture in the first count, and therefore not set out on the record.

He then pleaded several pleas:

1st. That the said Thomas Joseph Trafford did not grant, bargain, sell, and demise unto the said plaintiff, his executors, etc. the said advowson, etc. in the first count of the declaration mentioned in manner and form, etc.

2d. A similar plea to the second count.

3d. The third plea which was pleaded to both counts, traversed the grant, etc. unto the plaintiff, his executors, etc.

[127] 4th. The fourth plea to both counts averred that the said Church of Wilmslow is within the Diocese of Chester, and a benefice with cure of souls, and that whilst the said Thomas Joseph Trafford was so seised of the said manor and of the said advowson, and before the making of the corrupt, simoniacal and unlawful agreement in this plea aftermentioned, to wit, on the 11th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1819, the said J. Bradshaw then being the incumbent of and filling the said church, was afflicted with a mortal disease, so that he was then in extreme danger of his life, and his life was thereby then despaired of, whereof, as well the said Edward Vigor Fox and Thomas Joseph Trafford as one George Uppley, clerk, in that plea aftermentioned, to wit, on, etc.; and also at the time of making the corrupt, simoniacal, and unlawful agreement in that plea aftermentioned, there had notice: and the said Bishop further says, that whilst the said Thomas Joseph Trafford was so seized of the said manor to which, etc. with the appurtenances, etc. and of the said advowson as aforesaid, and whilst the said J. Bradshaw, so being the incumbent of and filling the said church as aforesaid, was so afflicted, and in such danger, state, and condition as aforesaid, to wit, on, etc. at etc. they the said Thomas Joseph Trafford, Edward Vigor Fox, and George Uppleby, and each of them, then and there, well knowing the premises and believing and expecting that the death of the said J. Bradshaw of the mortal disease aforesaid, was then and there fast approaching, and that, by means of the death of the said J. Bradshaw, the said church would forthwith become vacant, it was in such belief and [128] expectation corruptly, simoniacally, and unlawfully, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, agreed by and between the said Thomas Joseph Trafford and the said Edward Vigor Fox, with the knowledge of the said George Uppleby, that the said Edward Vigor Fox should pay to the said Thomas Joseph Trafford a sum of money, to wit, the sum of £6000, and that the said Thomas Joseph Trafford, in consideration thereof, should grant, bargain, and sell to the said Edward Vigor Fox the next presentation to the said church; and that, in order to make such grant, bargain, and sale, and as a means of making such grant, bargain, and sale to the said Edward Vigor Fox of the next presentation to the said church, and as a shift, contrivance, and device, to evade and elude the making such grant, bargain, and sale, as a mere grant, bargain, and sale to the said Edward Vigor Fox, of the next presentation to the said church in express terms, the said indenture in the said declaration mentioned to have been made between the said Thomas Joseph Trafford and the said Edward Vigor Fox should be made, and that the said Thomas Joseph Trafford should seal, and as his act and deed, deliver the said indenture; and the plea further stated, that afterwards, and whilst the said J. Bradshaw, so being the incumbent of, and filling the said church as aforesaid, was so afflicted and in such danger, state, and condition as aforesaid, to wit, on the 12th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1819, to wit, at, etc. in pursuance, furtherance, and performance of the said corrupt, simoniacal, and unlawful agreement, and in order to make such grant, bargain, and sale of the next presentation to the said church, [129] and as a means of making such grant, bargain, and sale by the said Thomas Joseph Trafford to the said Edward Vigor Fox of the next presentation to the said church, and as a shift, contrivance, and device, to evade and elude the making such grant, bargain, and sale, as a mere grant, bargain, and sale to the said E. V. Fox, of the next presentation to the said church, in express terms, the said indenture in the said declaration mentioned to have been made between the said T. J. Trafford and the said E. V. Fox, was made, and the said T. J. Trafford did then and there seal, and as his act and deed deliver the said indenture. And the plea further stated that the said J. Bradshaw, so being the incumbent of and filling the said church as aforesaid remained and continued so afflicted as aforesaid, and in such danger, state, and condition as aforesaid, from the time in that respect in this plea above-mentioned until the time of his death, and that afterwards to wit, on the 12th day of November 1819, Bradshaw so being the incumbent of and filling the said church as aforesaid, of the disease aforesaid, died, to wit, at, etc. and by means thereof the said church then and there became and was vacant, and the plea concluded by saying that, by reason of the premises and by force of the statute in such case made and provided, the said last mentioned indenture became, and was, and is utterly void, frustrate, and of no effect in law, and wholly inoperative to grant, pass, or convey any estate, right, title, or interest in the said advowson, or any presentation, or any right of presentation to the said church to the said Edward Vigor Fox. The plea then stated that afterwards, to wit, on the 30th day of December, [130] 1819, at, etc. the said Edward Vigor Fox, under colour, and by pretence and means of the said last mentioned indenture so made as aforesaid, in pursuance of the said corrupt, simoniacal, and unlawful agreement, did corruptly simoniacally, and unlawfully, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, present the said George Uppleby, clerk, to the said Bishop, to be admitted, instituted, and inducted into the said Church of Wilmslow, to wit, at, etc. And the plea insists, that by reason of the premises, and by force of the statute in such case made and provided, the said presentation of the said George Uppleby by the said Edward Vigor Fox, so made as aforesaid, became, and was, and is utterly void, frustrate, and of no effect in law.

5th. The fifth plea was like the fourth, omitting the parts in italics.

6th. The sixth plea varied from the fourth only by omitting to state the privity of Uppleby.

7th. The seventh plea varied from the fifth in the same manner.

8th. The eighth plea alleged that the said Church of Wilmslow, is within Defendant's diocese of Chester, and a benefice with cure of souls; and that whilst the said T. J. Trafford was so seised of the said manor and advowson, and before the making of the corrupt, simoniacal, and unlawful agreement in this plea after mentioned, to wit, on the 11th of November, 1819, the said J. Bradshaw, then being the incumbent of, and filling the said Church, was afflicted with a mortal disease, so that he was then in extreme danger of his life, and his life was thereby then despaired of, to wit, at, etc. whereof the said [131] E. V. Fox and T. J. Trafford, to wit, on, etc. and also at the time of making the corrupt, simoniacal, and unlawful agreement in this plea after mentioned, there had notice; and that whilst the said J. Bradshaw, so being the incumbent, and filling the said church as aforesaid, was so afflicted, and in such danger, state and condition as aforesaid, to wit, on, etc. at, etc. they the said T. J. Trafford and E. V. Fox, and each of them, then and there well knowing the premises, and believing and expecting that the death of the said J. Bradshaw, of the mortal disease aforesaid, was then and there fast approaching, and that by means of the death of the said J. Bradshaw, the said church would forthwith become vacant, it was in such belief and expectation corruptly, simoniacally and unlawfully and against the force of the statute in such case made and provided, agreed by and between the said T. J. Trafford and the said E. V. Fox, that in consideration of a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of £6000 to be therefore paid by the said E. V. Fox to the said T. J. Trafford, the said indenture in the said first count of the said declaration mentioned, to have been made between the said T. J. Trafford and the said E. V. Fox, should be made, and that the said T. J. Trafford should seal, and, as his act and deed, deliver the said indenture. And the plea states, that afterwards and whilst the said J. Bradshaw, so being incumbent of, and filling the said Church as aforesaid was so afflicted, and in such danger, state, and condition as aforesaid, to wit, on the 12th day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1819, at, etc. in pursuance, furtherance, and per-[132]-formance of the said corrupt, simoniacal, and unlawful agreement, the said indenture, in the said first count of the said declaration mentioned to have been made between the said T. J. Trafford and the said E. V. Fox was made; and the said T. J. Trafford did seal, and, as his act and deed, deliver the said indenture.

9th. The ninth plea, after stating the illness of the incumbent, and that the Plaintiff and Trafford had notice of it, alleged the corrupt and simoniacal agreement to have been, that Trafford should, "in consideration of money, grant, bargain, and sell to the Plaintiff the next presentation to the said church;" and averred that the indenture in the declaration mentioned, was made in pursuance of that agreement, and concluded as the eighth plea.

10th. The tenth plea, after the same introduction, alleged that Plaintiff and Trafford well knowing the premises, and believing and expecting that the death of the said J. Bradshaw of the mortal disease aforesaid was fast approaching, and that by means of his death, the said church would forthwith become vacant, and the said Plaintiff intending to present the said George Uppleby to be admitted, instituted, and inducted into the said church at Wilmslow, when the same should, by the death of Bradshaw, next become vacant; it was then and there corruptly, etc. agreed between Trafford and the Plaintiff, that the Plaintiff should pay to Trafford £6000, and that he, in consideration thereof, should grant, etc. to the Plaintiff the next presentation to the said church, the said Plaintiff then and there intending to present the said G. Uppleby. The [133] plea then alleged, that in pursuance of that agreement, and in order to make such bargain and sale of the next presentation, the indenture in the declaration mentioned was executed by Trafford, and that the Plaintiff accepted and received it with intent to present Uppleby, and concluded as the former pleas.

11th. The eleventh plea, after the same introductory matter as in the ninth, alleged that it was corruptly, etc. agreed between the Plaintiff and Trafford "that the indenture mentioned in the declaration should be made, and that it was made in pursuance of that agreement."

12th. The twelfth plea varied from the eleventh only, by omitting to allege that the Plaintiff and Trafford knew of the incumbent's dangerous illness.

13th. The thirteenth plea, after the averment of identity, without mentioning Bradshaw, alleged that whilst Trafford was seised of the manor and advowson, it was corruptly, etc. agreed between him and the Plaintiff, that the indenture in the declaration mentioned should be made, and that it was made and executed in pursuance of that agreement.

14th. The fourteenth plea, after the same introduction, stated, that whilst Trafford was seised of the manor and advowson, and before the making of the said simoniacal and corrupt agreement in this plea after-mentioned, to wit, on, etc. and after the death of the said Bradshaw, the said last incumbent of the said church, and after the church became vacant by the death of Bradshaw, and whilst it remained and was vacant, to wit, on, etc. it was corruptly, etc. agreed by and [134] between Trafford and the Plaintiff, that Trafford should, in consideration of £6000 to be paid by the Plaintiff to him, grant, bargain, and sell to the Plaintiff the next presentation to the said church, and that the indenture before mentioned was made and executed in pursuance of that agreement.

15th. The fifteenth plea was similar to the fourteenth, except as to the corrupt agreement, which it alleged to be that the indenture in the declaration mentioned, should be made; and averred that it was made and executed in pursuance of that agreement.

The replication to the third plea took issue on the traverse of a grant. To the fourth, that it was not corruptly, etc. agreed by and between the Plaintiff and Trafford, with the knowledge of Uppleby, as in that plea alleged. A similar replication to the fifth plea; and to each of the other pleas, the replication denied that it was corruptly, etc. agreed as in those pleas alleged.

The jury found a special verdict: first, they found the identity of the several matters alleged in the two counts of the declaration, as averred in the pleas; and then that before and on the 12th day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1819, the said Thomas Joseph Trafford was seised of the manor and advowson within-mentioned, and that before and on the said 12th day of November, in the said year of our Lord 1819, the within-named Joseph Bradshaw was the incumbent of the within-named church, in the pleadings within-mentioned: And that the said church was then full of the said Joseph Bradshaw, to wit, at the parish of Wilmslow within-men [135] tioned, in the county of Chester within-mentioned; and that the said Joseph Bradshaw, so then being such incumbent of, and filling the said church as aforesaid, was, before and upon the said 12th day of November, in the said year of our Lord 1819, afflicted with a mortal disease, so that he was then in extreme danger of his life, and his life was thereby then greatly despaired of; and that he was and continued so afflicted with such mortal disease, and in extreme danger of his life, and his life was and continued to be greatly despaired of until the time of his death; and that the said Joseph Bradshaw so being such incumbent as aforesaid, died of the said mortal disease, on the said 12th day of November, in the said year of our Lord 1819, at half-past eleven o'clock at night of the same 12th day of November to wit, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid: And that on the said 12th day of November, in the said year of our Lord, 1819, at ten minutes before three o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, and whilst the said Joseph Bradshaw was such incumbent as aforesaid, an agreement was made and concluded between the said Thomas Joseph Trafford, so being seised of the said manor and advowson as aforesaid, and the said Edward Vigor Fox for the sale, by the said Thomas Joseph Trafford to the said Edward Vigor Fox, of the next turn or presentation of the said church, for and in consideration of six thousand pounds of lawful money of Great Britain; that on the said 12th day of November, in the said year of our Lord 1819, and immediately after the making of such agreement, they, the said Thomas Joseph Traf-[136] ford and Edward Vigor Fox, in pursuance of such agreement, and in order to carry the same into effect, and as an expedient to convey the next presentation alone, sealed and delivered the within-mentioned indenture, bearing date the 12th day of November, in the said year of our Lord 1819, and of which said indenture the said Bishop hath within had over, and which is within set forth upon such over thereof, to wit, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid: and that the said agreement was made, and the said indenture was sealed and delivered in the life time of the said Joseph Bradshaw: and that the said Joseph Bradshaw at the time of making the said agreement, and also at the time of sealing and delivering the said indenture, was afflicted with the said mortal disease, and in extreme danger of his life, and that his life was thereby then greatly despaired of: And that the said Thomas Joseph Trafford and the said Edward Vigor Fox, at the time of making the said agreement, and also at the time of sealing and delivering the said indenture, well knew and believed that the said Joseph Bradshaw was afflicted with the said mortal disease, and was in extreme danger of his life, and that his life was thereby then greatly despaired of, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid: and that the said agreement was made and concluded, and the said indenture was sealed and delivered without any knowledge or privity whatsoever of the said George Uppleby, and without any intention to present the said George Uppleby to the said church, when it should become vacant, but whether or not, etc.

[137] The argument upon this special verdict, took place on the 14th of June, 1822, when the Court of Great Sessions at Chester were divided in opinion; but in order to carry the cause up to a higher tribunal, the judgment was entered for the defendant by consent.

On a writ of error to the King's Bench, the judgment of the Court below was affirmed in Hilary Term, 1824 (see the Report of the Case in K. B. 2 B. and C. 658); and this writ of error was brought to reverse both judgments.

The case was twice argued, first on the 8th of July, 1828, and afterwards in May 1829.

For the Plaintiff in Error: Mr. Serjeant Cross.

By the law of England, the patronage, or the right of presenting to a benefice, is a property or estate capable of being conveyed in fee, for life, for years, for any number of turns, or for the next turn only, whilst the church is full; when it is empty, it is incapable of being conveyed (Baker v. Rogers, Cro. Eliz. 789. Stevens v. Wall, Dyer, 282. b. 4 And. 15. Brookesley v. Wickham, 1 Leon. 167), because it is like the rent of an estate become in arrear, which is a chose in action, and cannot be assigned, but the church is full as long as the incumbent is alive; and is equally so whilst he is in his last sickness, as in full health.

The patron, therefore, of a living may be changed at any time till the last moment of the existence of an incumbent, and a new patron substituted; and neither the common nor statute law imposes any restrictions in this respect on lay patrons (12 Ann. st. 2, c. 12, applies to clerks only).

It is the exercise only of the right of presenting [138] by the patron for the time being, which is a public trust, and as such controlled by law: which sufficiently guards the interests of the church, by providing that the existing patron shall not nominate from corrupt motives, or by reason or in consequence of a corrupt contract.

This restriction arises from the statute 31 Eliz. chap. 6, and from this statute only: and the question turns entirely upon the construction to be put upon its provisions. It is a penal statute, and it creates forfeitures; and therefore, according to the acknowledged principle of law, must be construed strictly, and not extended by a supposed equity.

This statute avoids the presentation which the patron for the time being makes, for any money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, arising directly or indirectly; or for any promise of such reward, directly or indirectly (see 12 Ann. st. 2, ch. 12; and also the oath in 3 Burn's Eccl. Law, which explains this). It is direct or indirect reward, not direct or indirect presentation, which it prohibits in express terms.

In the present case, Mr. Fox, the plaintiff in error, was the patron at the time of the actual vacancy; and he selected the clerk, without any communication with Mr. Trafford; and his selection was not influenced or produced by money or reward, directly or indirectly. The presentation by the actual patron is not tainted with the least suspicion of simony.

To bring the case within the provisions of the act, it must be contended, as it was in the courts [139] below, that Mr. Trafford was to be considered as the patron presenting the clerk, and receiving the reward for that purpose, and the plaintiff in error as the mere instrument to carry such presentation into effect. But there is nothing in the finding of the jury to warrant such a conclusion.

It is admitted, that the grant of a next presentation during the life of an incumbent may be void, on the ground of simony; but that is where the contract is really simoniacal; a contract for the presentation by the patron of a particular clerk, for money, and the conveyance of the next presentation is a contrivance or instrument to carry it into effect, and is so found by the jury; this will be illustrated by the case of Winchcombe and Puleston (reported Noy, 25, Hobart, 165, 1 Brownlow and Golds, 164), the leading case on the subject; the pleadings are in Winch's Entries, 887, and fully explain the nature of the transaction. The contract was made between the clerk to be presented and the patron, the incumbent being then sick of a grievous disease, and expected every day to die, that in consideration of £90 to be paid by the clerk to the patron, he should procure him to be presented to the church when vacant, and to assure such presentation, he should grant the next avoidance to a person, a familiar friend of the clerk, specially nominated and appointed by him in confidence to make the presentation, with the intent that the clerk should be presented; and it is averred, that in performance of this contract the grant was made, and the contract was so found by the jury. Here was a clear simoniacal contract: [140] and the substituted patron was the mere instrument to carry the contract into effect, and to appoint the particular clerk. The case of Clusse v. Pomroy (Cit. Lane, 73) is nearly to the same effect; and is another instance of a contrivance to carry into effect a simoniacal contract.

If the presentation do not appear upon the face of the pleadings to be clearly simoniacal, that is a presentation by the existing patron of the clerk, for reward, it is a question for the Jury whether each transaction be or be not a shift or contrivance to carry a simoniacal contract into effect; as, under the statutes against usury, if there appear on the face of an instrument a loan, and a reservation of illegal interest, the Court can give judgment against its validity, but if the transaction does not appear on the face of it (Fryman v. Burslow, Lutw. 273. Per Tenterfield, C. B. Calvert v. Kitchen, Lane, 102) necessarily to be usurious, it is a question of fact for the jury, whether it be a shift or contrivance or not. In both the cases, the really simoniacal or usurious contract ought to be shown by a special plea, when a special plea is required; and in all cases found by the jury.

The defendant has not pleaded in this case, and the jury have not found that there was any corrupt or simoniacal contract, that Trafford should present the clerk; and that the grant of the next presentation was a mere contrivance to carry it into effect.

In the absence of such a finding, the Court can [141] not make any presumption against the validity of the grant. Simony as well as fraud is not to be presumed, but found.

If it were competent for the Court to make any presumption, the facts pleaded and found do not warrant any such presumption in this case.

If it had been found that money was to have been given to Trafford, if Uppleby should be presented, or that it was the purpose or even intent of the plaintiff to have presented Uppleby, it might have been argued that the grant was made for that purpose, and if so, the grant might possibly be said to be an instrument to carry into effect the particular appointment; and the clerk might possibly be said to have been presented by the former patron. In such a case the substituted patron has no power of selection, but is a mere instrument, and the appointment made virtually by the old patron, is an appointment made for reward. But if there is no intention or purpose to present any particular clerk, the new patron is a free agent, may select whom he pleases, and if he select any clerk, without reward, he is not within either the letter or spirit of the act. The selection of the clerk, the object aimed at by the statute, is free from all taint. The old patron parts with, and the new patron purchases the right of selection, by means of the grant, and that right is fairly and properly exercised.

The judgment (2 Barn. and Cress, 658) of the Court of King's Bench proceeds in a great degree upon the ground that Courts have a right to consider what is an evasion of a statute, a power which, it is humbly [142] conceived, does not apply at least to the case of a penal statute creating forfeitures, and if allowed to be exercised, would lead to great doubt and uncertainty in the law.

Upon referring to decided cases, there is none in which it has been held that the grant of a next presentation, the incumbent being in extremis, is void, a short note in Winch. 63,* excepted, in which mention is made of its having been so adjudged in Chancery, but under what circumstances does not appear; it may have been so adjudged on the special facts.

On the other hand, there is a solemn decision (Barrett v. Glubb, 2 Black, 1052) of the Court, that by the grant of an advowson, when the incumbent was on his death-bed, and it was uncertain whether he would live over the night, with full knowledge in the contracting parties, the next presentation did pass, and was not avoided by simony, which is a direct authority for the plaintiff in error. If the grant of the next presentation, when united with all other future presentations, was not void: the grant of the next presentation alone could not be so. This decision has never yet been questioned until the present case.

For the Defendant in Error:

The Solicitor General.†—This is a case within [143] the spirit of the statute of

* Sheldon v. Brett. See remark on this case in Barrett v. Glubb, 2 Black, 1052.

† The reasons printed at the end of the case for the defendant in Error, having been reprinted in other reports of this case, it is considered advisable to add them in a note, that they may be compared with the argument of the Solicitor General, as it was delivered in the House of Lords. They are as follows:—

First.—Because Simony was an offence by the common law of the land, antecedently to the statute of 31st Eliz. c. 6.; and the transaction as stated upon the record, was a corrupt and simoniacal contract for the sale of the next turn or presentation under the special circumstances of the case. 1 Institute 17 B. 3 Institute 156. Mackaller v. Todderick, Cro. Car. 361. Winchcomb v. Pullerton, Hob. 167.

Secondly.—Because the presentation in the present case, was substantially a presentation by Mr. Trafford the seller, and was by him a presentation for money. Bartlett v. Vinor, Carth. 252.

Thirdly.—Because the transaction in question, was a shift and contrivance to evade the provisions of the statute of the 31st Eliz. c. 6.

Fourthly.—Because it was a presentation by Mr. Trafford, for money, of such clerk as Mr. Fox might nominate; and because a contract to such effect is simoniacal, though it may have passed without the privity of the clerk, who may afterwards happen to be presented: the privity of a clerk is not a necessary ingredient in a corrupt or simoniacal contract, as has been established by several authorities, and particularly in Doctor Hutchinson's case, 12 Rep. 100; and in the case of Baker v. Rogers, Cro. Eliz. 788. 3d Inst. 154.

Fifthly.—Because, by law, no grant can be made of the next presentation, when the church is empty, of which rule, though it has been some times said that the reason is, that the presentation is then a fruit fallen, or that it is a mere personal privilege, or that is severed from the advowson, and would pass to the executor; the true and substantial reason is public utility, and the better to guard against the mischiefs of simony, as was expressly laid down by Lord Mansfield, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Wilmot, in the Bishop of Lincoln v. Walforstan, 3 Burrough 1504, and because the contract in the present instance was made upon the footing and understanding of the church being full in name and form only, but vacant in substance and reality. Brookesby's Case, Cro. Eliz. 174. s. c. 1 Leonard 167. 3 Leonard 256. Dyer 282.

Sixthly.—Because the law, of which the object and policy is the presenting to benefices, with cure of souls, of men of learning and piety, and the preventing of scandal to religion, and prejudice to the church, by preferments either of improper persons, or from corrupt motives, will not endure the danger which would arise from the sale of the right of presentation, when the incumbent is at the point of death, where the contracting parties know that fact, and where the contract is made with a view to and upon the terms of an immediate presentation.

Seventhly.—Because there is no mischief intended to be guarded against by the rule of law prohibiting the sale of the next presentation, when the church is empty, which might not be equally incurred, if such presentation could be sold when the incumbent is on his death-bed, and known to be so both to the buyer and to the seller.

Eightly.—Because the statute, 31 Eliz. c. 6, ought to receive a liberal construction,

Elizabeth (31 Eliz. c. 6. s. 5). It is found by the special verdict, that the agreement and the indenture were an expedient "to con-[144]vey the next presentation alone." It is found indeed that the clerk had no knowledge of the contrivance; but that is immaterial if the transaction was simoniacal. The indenture purports to be a grant of the whole advowson, yet there is a covenant by the purchaser after a presentation or default for reconveyance. This unusual species of conveyance bears in itself a badge of fraud. No doubt the case of Barrett v. Glubb was under the eyes of the draftsman in framing the conveyance. The transaction amounted to simony by the common law before the passing of the statute. If not within the letter of the statute, it must be construed so as to suppress the mischief.

As a general proposition it may be admitted, that [145] the line of distinction is between vacancy and plenary. But in the Bishop of Lincoln v. Wolverston (5 Burr. 1504), the Judges did not agree that the question rested on the ground, that by vacancy the thing became a chase in action, but rather that public policy forbade the dealing for presentations during a vacancy, for fear of simony. In the stat. 3. Elizabeth there is no definition of simony. It must therefore have been an offence at common law, which inference is borne out by other authorities (Co. Litt. 17. b. 3. Inst. 153). The statute only provides for penalties, and takes away the necessity of proceeding in the spiritual court. The words of the statute are "directly or indirectly," and it prescribes no time, which is another circumstance to be considered. According to the statute, simony may be when the church is full. The receipt of money by Trafford brings the case within the word "indirectly." He received the money to enable another person to present. The transaction according to the understanding of all the parties, was to be effected the very same day. Upon the question of construction the statute of Elizabeth is penal in some respects, but remedial in others, and statutes are to be construed according to the spirit, not the letter (2 Inst. 152. Hardres 207, 208). In the judgment in the Court below, many cases were cited to show that statutes should be construed by equity. As cases upon the statutes of usury, there being no special words in the statute, so cases on fraudulent preference in bankruptcy.

Lord Eldon: Can we apply the cases as to fraudulent preference in bankruptcy to this spe-[146]cial verdict? The doctrine must now be taken to be law. But I remember when it did not prevail. According to the early cases the doctrine as to fraudulent preference was discountenanced by Courts of Equity.

Lord Maclefield in one case * expresses a very strong opinion upon this subject. The first case in the courts of common law, was Alderson v. Temple, 4 Burr. 2235. In that case three of the Judges decided on the ground that the contract was not completed. That case was followed by Harman v. Fisher (Cowper, 117).

The Solicitor General: The construction upon the statutes of simony is the same in equity. In Grey v. Heketh (Ambler, 268), Lord Hardwicke was of opinion that Courts of Equity contemplate the evasion of the statute.

This contract is a clear evasion upon the facts proved by the special verdict: the incumbent was treated as dead by the parties to the contract. If the living becomes void by other modes, as resignation, which may be contrived, will not the statute apply to such cases? So in the case of cession, where the resignation and cession is contrived between the parties (Greenwood v. Bishop of London, 5 Tan. 727). The case in Winch is put in the abridgments of Bacon, Viner, and Comyn, and received the sanction of Chief Justice De Grey in Barrett v. Glubb. In Kitchen v. Culvert, Baron Bromley [147] says, "the intent of the statute is to eradicate all manner of simonies, and therefore, the words are not, 'if any man give money to be presented,' but they are, 'if any present for money,' and the jurors here found £20 given, and in order to reach the evil for the remedy of which it was passed, and because the deed set forth in the record was only a contrivance to pass an immediate presentation for money, in violation of the policy and evasion of the provisions of the statute.

Lastly,-- Because in Sheldon v. Brett, Winch 63, it was expressly decided, that a grant of the next turn for money was simoniacal, when the parson was sick in his bed, and ready to die.

* Cook v. Goodfellow, 10 Mod. 489, in which Lord Maclefield, according to the report, declared that an assignment made on the eve of bankruptcy by a mother to her children, was just and commendable. The case of Oudley, 2 P. Wm. 427.

nothing for what it was given, or to whom it was given; for if money be the meede, a presentation is void, and in our case without notice of the parson, the admission and all which ensued thereupon is void, by reason of the simony in the patron, and is void in the parson also; and if in this case, we are not within the words of the statute, we are within the intent clearly."

It is not the less simony because the presentee is not privy to the contract (Baker v. Rogers, Cro. Eliz.). The case of Barrett v. Glubb is different in many particulars, and it was a fair purchase of the advowson; there was no fraudulent intent to evade the statute. It was a fair and honest contract.

The Lord Chancellor: It appears by the bill and answer that he was in a very dangerous state at the time of the contract—this appears by a letter, dated the 10th of August.

Lord Eldon: The expression of the letter is "that not a moment is to be lost."

The Solicitor-General: In this case the contract began and ended on the same day: in Barrett v. Glubb, it was going on for a month. It was not argued in that case that it was virtually within the statute. Here the finding of the jury is of fraud.

[148] In reply: The case in Winch as digested by Comyn, supposes the bargain to be with the presentee. In Baker v. Rogers, the living was void: the statute relates only to presentation, not to the contract for conveyance.

Lord Eldon: This is a very important case, regard being had to the various decisions upon the subject. As to the case of Barrett v. Glubb, it is certainly a strong decision; there is some difficulty in saying that that was a contract which the judge of a Court of Equity should have directed to be carried into execution. The law of simony was perhaps not so well understood formerly. That case has the authority of Lord Bathurst and of Lord Chief Justice De Grey, who adhered strictly to the rules of law, as contradistinguished from equity. In that case Lord Bathurst was of opinion, that the contract might be enforced in equity, if the law would sanction the means by which it was concocted. The Court of Common Pleas were of opinion that the advowson, including the next presentation, might be sold under the circumstances disclosed by the bill and answer.

The circumstance that the injunction was not continued is of no consequence, because as it was continued until the return of the certificate, the parties would not be at liberty to act without the authority of the Court: that is, therefore, a decision to be reconciled with this. It has been argued that no fact of fraud has been found, but the question is whether it is not a fraud on the law. The question is whether, regard being had to the law of simony, if the doctrines as to fraud [149] on the law are applicable, the case is under the circumstances brought within the rule. As to the modern doctrine upon fraudulent preference in bankruptcy, the case of Hamby v. Fisher, could not then have been supported; but having been long followed in subsequent decisions, it is not now to be disturbed. It is not usual to put to the judges a direct question, but I should propose the same question in substance, indirectly, viz. "Whether on the whole of the matter contained in the special verdict, the right to present on the death of Bradshaw was in E. V. Fox."

The following question was then put to the judges: "Whether upon the whole of the matters stated or referred to in the special verdict, the right to present to the rectory or parish church of Wilmslow, upon the death of the Rev. J. Bradshaw, was by law vested in E. V. Fox, the Plaintiff in error."

Lord Chief Justice Best (3d June): After stating the question put to the Judges, proceeded as follows:—The Judges who heard the argument at your Lordships' bar are unanimously of opinion, that, upon the whole of the matters stated or referred to in the special verdict, the right to present to the rectory or parish church of Wilmslow, upon the death of the Rev. Joseph Bradshaw, was by law vested in Edward Vigor Fox, the plaintiff in error.

The patronage of churches was at first yielded by the Bishops to the lords of manors, who founded or endowed them, and annexed them to [150] the manors in which the churches were situated. By the grant of a manor, the advowson appendant to it passes to the grantee. Many of these advowsons have since been severed from the manors to which they were appendant. But although advowsons, when in gross, as these which are separated from the manors to which they belonged, are called, and are a species of spiritual trusts, yet they have been said by Lord Kenyon and other Judges to be trusts connected with interests; and they certainly do not lose the temporal character which originally belonged to them, but may be sold either in perpetuity, or for the next or any number of avoidances.

If the perpetual advowson be sold when the church is void, the next presentation will not pass; and if the next avoidance only be sold after the death of the incumbent, the sale is altogether void. It may be wise to carry the restraint on the sale of this species of property still further, and to say the next avoidance shall in no case be sold. Undoubtedly, much simony is indirectly committed by the sale of next presentations. If it is proper to prevent the giving of money for a presentation, it seems equally proper to prevent the sale of that which gives the immediate right to present. But the Courts of Law have never thought that they were authorized to go to this length: and even in cases where the purchase of the next presentation seemed to bring a party nearer to simony than any other case, it was found necessary to have the aid of the Legislature to prevent such purchases. A clergyman might buy a next presentation, and present himself, before the passing of the statute of 12 Ann. cap. 12. The preamble [151] to the second section of that statute states, that "some of the clergy have procured preferments for themselves by buying ecclesiastical livings:" and then the section provides, that if any one, who shall either directly or indirectly take or procure the next avoidance, for money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, shall be presented or collated, (which words limit the operation of the act to clergymen,) it shall be deemed simoniacal.

It seems to me, that if the terms of the statute of Elizabeth could be extended by equity, the case of a clergyman buying a presentation with the intention of presenting himself, might have been reached without any other Act of Parliament. If such a case as this was not within the statute of Elizabeth, the case on which your Lordships have desired our opinion cannot be affected by that statute. The church, in the present case, was full: no clergyman was privy to the agreement; and the living was not intended by the plaintiff in error, at the time when he bought the presentation, for the clerk, whom he afterwards presented.

But I would observe, that persons have recovered who appeared to be dying. The special verdict only states that the incumbent, at the time of the sale, was afflicted with a mortal disease, so that he was then in extreme danger of his life, and his life was thereby greatly despaired of, and that he was so afflicted with such mortal disease, and in extreme danger of his life, and his life was and continued to be greatly despaired of until his death, which happened at half-past eleven at night of the day on which the [152] sale was completed. Many who are afflicted with mortal diseases, and are from such diseases thought to be in imminent danger of dying, live for a considerable time; and the effect of the diseases are sometimes so far suspended, that the persons so afflicted become again capable of performing the duties belonging to their stations in life.

If this conveyance was void, it must have been void at the time when it was executed, and would so remain into whatever hands, and under whatever circumstances the right of presentation might have passed. Now, if this incumbent had been restored to apparent health, and the vendor had sold the presentation to another person ignorant of the circumstances under which the first sale was made, it would be most unjust to hold that the second sale was void; and yet this would be the necessary consequence of a decision, that the first sale was simoniacal. While the law permits the next presentations of livings to be sold during the life of the incumbent, as long as the incumbent is alive, the sale is good. Every one who purchases a next presentation, contemplates the death of the incumbent. If this contemplation made the sale void, no sale of a next avoidance could be good. If the death of the incumbent, and the prospect of using the presentations, may be contemplated, the time when the death is to happen cannot be material.

This case has been compared by the counsel for the defendant in error to those of contemplation of bankruptcy; but a party is not permitted to do an act in contemplation of bankruptcy, which is injurious to creditors. A transfer of goods, or payment of money in contemplation of bankruptcy, [153] was before the 6th Geo. 4, void. By that act such a transfer or payment is an act of bankruptcy, because such transactions are direct frauds upon the creditors of the bankrupt. But the death of an incumbent may be contemplated, and the purchasing of the next avoidance, in consequence of such contemplation, is no fraud upon any one. The cases, therefore, have no resemblance to each other. The making the legality of the transaction to depend upon the state of the incumbent's health, would give occasion to much expensive litigation, and, probably, to much false swearing, and would keep churches for a long time void.

The affairs of men are best regulated by broad rules, such as exclude all subtle disputes, all doubtful unsatisfactory enquires. It would be difficult to establish a rule that should settle what degree of probability of the approaching death of an incumbent should prevent the sale of the next avoidance of a benefice, and more difficult to ascertain by evidence, when an incumbent was within that degree. The most convenient rule is that which I conceive the law has already established; namely, that the right to sell the presentation continues as long as the incumbent is in existence.

The judgment of the Court below is, according to the words of the Chief Justice "founded on the language of the 31st Elizabeth, cap. 6, and the well-known principle of law, that the provisions of an Act of Parliament shall not be evaded by shift or contrivance." The words of the fifth section of the act are, "That if any person shall, for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit, directly or indirectly, or for or by reason [154] of any promise, agreement, grant, bond, covenant, or other assurance, of or for any sum of money, reward, gift, profit, or benefit whatever, directly or indirectly present or collate any person to any benefice, or give or bestow the same, for or in respect of any such corrupt cause or consideration, etc." This clause applies only to the person presenting to the living. If he has received no reward, or promise of reward, the presentation is not affected by the terms of the act. The Plaintiff in error, who made the presentation, received no reward, nor had any expectation of reward, for making this presentation. I agree, that if some other person had received a reward for the Plaintiff in error, and was to account to him for it: if the Plaintiff in error was not the real purchaser of the avoidance, but the person presented, or some one in his behalf, these and many other things might be considered as frauds on the act, and have avoided the contract. But such things should have been shewn by the pleadings and found by the jury. All that appears on this record, is, that the Plaintiff in error bought the next avoidance of a living that was full, and that, without any corrupt consideration, he used the right of presentation, which he had purchased: all this he had a right to do. There is no circumstance found that shews this to have been a fraud on the Act; unless it be a fraud on the Act to buy the presentation to a living, which the seller and buyer expect will soon become vacant. Presentations are bought and sold every day, with this expectation.

There is no legal authority to support the judgment of the Court, except a short and loose [155] note in Winch's Reports of Hatton, saying what used to be done in Chancery: on the other hand, the case of Barrett v. Glubb, is directly opposed to the judgment of the Court of King's Bench. It was thought that the case had not the weight of a judicial decision, because it was not acted upon, but it was acted upon—Lord Bathurst decreed the conveyance of the advowson, which included the next presentation, and gave the purchaser and his clerk their costs. The seller must have acquiesced in this decision, or he would have prosecuted his quare impedit, and if the Common Pleas had retained the opinion that they had certified to the Chancellor, he might have carried it by a bill of exceptions to the King's Bench. When the Chancellor decreed a conveyance, without doubt it was such a conveyance as gave the purchaser a legal title from a time before the death of the incumbent, by making the assignment take effect from the date of the contract to assign. There was therefore no occasion for any injunction, as was supposed by the King's Bench; the question by the conveyance decreed was fairly raised for another Court of Law, if the party had not completely acquiesced in the judgment of the Common Pleas, confirmed by that of the Chancellor. There are no other cases in the books, which bear much on the question proposed to us.

For the reasons given in support of the Judge's answer to that question I only am responsible.

The Earl of Eldon: This case involves questions certainly of very considerable importance. A case upon the same subject was decided by the Court of Common Pleas many years ago, [156] and the manner in which that case was decided in the Court of Common Pleas was of very great importance: first, because it was decided by most learned judges, and secondly, because it was a case in which a Court of Equity sent the case for the opinion of that Court of law, in order to enable the Court of Equity to decide what it should do in equity.

The case was thus: There had been a purchase of an advowson, the incumbent being at the time in such a state that he died within two days afterwards. The period was very nearly, if not exactly the same as in the present case. It was one circumstance in that case, that the intended purchaser of the estate stated that there must be no delay, but that the contract should be immediately completed. The Court at that time was filled by Lord Chief Justice De Grey, a very eminent judge, Mr. Justice Blackstone, and by two other judges. The case was sent for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, for the purpose of enabling the Lord Chancellor, Lord Bathurst, to determine whether the contract should be carried into execution by an actual conveyance. That being the nature of the case, and that being a case in equity, makes it a much stronger case than if the Court of Equity had not taken that course; for with respect to many cases of contract, which come before Courts of Equity, the parties resort to a Court of Equity because it is conceived there are grounds upon which a Court of Equity will grant its interposition to carry into effect that contract. In that case the controversy was, whether supposing that contract to be good in [157] law, the party ought not to be left to his remedy at law, instead of coming into Equity for a specific performance of the contract. The Chancellor of that day thought fit to take the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, upon the question whether the advowson being sold at such a period nearly approaching to the death of the clergyman, the presentation as well as the advowson being included in the conveyance, the conveyance carried with it the assignment of the presentation; and the Court of Common Pleas were of opinion that it did, and so they certified to the Court of Chancery.

I observe in the proceedings in this case in the Court below, that the Court seems not to have been fully informed by the counsel at the bar, because two judges of that Court now concur in the opinion that this was a good conveyance, who then thought it was not so. The Court seems to me to have been not specifically informed as to what was the fact. We have heard it stated at the bar, that an injunction had been granted by the Lord Chancellor against the proceedings in the quare impedit, and that after that opinion of the Court of Common Pleas was communicated to his Lordship, he did not continue the injunction. Now that circumstance is really of no weight; it was quite unnecessary to continue the injunction, because the moment it was intimated that in the opinion of the Court of Common Law, and in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, that was a good contract to be carried into execution, it was not necessary to take the trouble of asking for the injunction being continued. For the conveyance [158] was immediately executed which carried the contract into execution, and that conveyance having been executed, it would be a good conveyance of the presentation as well as of the advowson; and the conveyance being a good conveyance of the presentation, being declared by the Court of Chancery to be a good equitable conveyance of the presentation, and the Lord Chancellor proceeding on the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas, there was an end of all question.

Now regarding the effect of this decision on human transactions, seeing that in all probability many transactions have taken place upon the footing of it, it does appear to me, I confess, very undesirable that that decision should be shaken by the Courts of Law. I had much rather an Act of Parliament should be passed on the subject, than see a further extension of that doctrine, of which we have heard much in the argument at the bar. I most fully concur in the opinion which has been expressed by the learned Judges.

The question was then put by the Lord Chancellor.

Judgment reversed.

[161]

IRELAND.

(COMMON PLEAS—EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.)
(IN ERROR.)HENRY HARDING,—Plaintiff; JOHN POLLOCK, and ARTHUR HILL CORN-WALLIS POLLOCK,—Defendants.

[Mews' Dig. viii. 694. S.C. 1 Dow and Cl. 453; 6 Bing. 25. As to appointment of clerks of the peace in Ireland see County Officers and Courts (Ireland) Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. c. 56), ss. 8, 9. As to England, see For v. Harcourt, Shower P.C. 158; Eng. Rep. 1 H.L. 107, and note thereto.]

Upon a special verdict the Jury found that by an act of Parliament in Ireland, of the 3rd and 4th of Philip and Mary, it was enacted that the King and Queen, and her successors, should be entitled to the counties of Leix, Slieve-marge, Erry, Glinaltry, and Offaly, and that for making them shire grounds, a certain portion of the said counties should thenceforth be a shire or county, by the name of the King's county, etc.; and that from the year 1556, (the date of the act) the Kings and Queens of Ireland have nominated and appointed, and been used to nominate and appoint fit persons to fill the office of Clerk of the Peace for the King's county, to the year 1798, in which year it was found that the Defendants in error, were by patent created Clerks of the Peace within every county in the province of Leinster except Kilkenny, to hold for their lives, etc.; and that they under the patent they held, exercised the duties of the office till 1800; and that the King's county is in the province of Leinster. The verdict then found that the Custodes Rotulorum of the county have appointed persons to fill that office in the said county, from the year 1760 to the present time, (1819) who have held and enjoyed the said office accordingly, with the exception of, etc. who were in possession under the Crown; and further set forth letters patent, dated in 1776, appointing the Earl of Drogheda Custos Rotulorum of the King's county during pleasure, and also certain deeds or warrants under seal, whereby the Earl of Drogheda appointed successively two Clerks of the Peace for the King's county, who executed the duties, and received the emoluments of the office without interruption from 1772.

Held reversing the judgment in the Court below, that the Custos Rotulorum, and not the King, has by law, the right to appoint the Clerk of the Peace in the King's county.

[162] This was a writ of error from the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland in this cause. The Plaintiff in error, claimed the office of Clerk of the Peace for the King's County in Ireland, and had been several years in possession of it, under an appointment by the Custos Rotulorum of the county. The Defendants in error, claimed the same office, under letters patent from the Crown. The action was brought for money had and received, to ascertain whether the right to make such appointment for that county was in the Crown or in the Custos Rotulorum.

The Defendant below pleaded two pleas: first, the general issue; and, secondly, the statute of limitations, in both of which issue was joined; but, as the Plaintiffs below sought only to establish their right, no question arose on the second plea, the object of which merely was to cover the profits received more than six years before the commencement of the action.

The case was tried before Lord Norbury, at the sittings after Michaelmas Term, 1819, the venue being laid in the county of the city of Dublin. At that trial, a special verdict was found, stating in substance as follows: "That His late Majesty King George the Third, by letters patent, under the great seal of Ireland, dated the 30th of July, 1798, granted to the said John Pollock and Arthur Hill Cornwallis Pollock (the Defendants in error,) the office of Clerk of the Peace within and throughout the province of Leinster, in Ireland, and within every county thereof, ex-[163]- cept Kilkenny, to hold for their lives, and the life of the survivor of them, which letters patent were duly enrolled in the Rolls Office, on the 4th of August, 1798, and were duly accepted by the said John Pollock and Arthur Hill Cornwallis Pollock, and that they are fit and proper persons to hold the said office; and that by virtue of the said patent, they duly obtained possession of the said office in the King's County, and exercised the duties thereof by them, and their sufficient Deputies, until the year 1800. That the King's County is in the province of Leinster, and is one of the counties thereof; and that by an act of Parliament in Ireland, of the 3rd and 4th of Philip and Mary, and in the year of our Lord, 1556, it was enacted, that the king and queen, and her successors, should be entitled to the counties of Leix, Slieve-marge, Erry, Glinalirry, and Offaly, and that for making them shire grounds a certain portion of the said counties should from thenceforth be a shire or county by the name of the King's County, and that the residue should be a county by the name of the Queen's County. That from the year 1556, (at which time it appears by the act of Parliament that the lands comprised within the King's County were first made a shire by the name of the King's County,) the kings and queens of Ireland have nominated and appointed, and been used and accustomed to nominate and appoint, fit persons to fill the office of Clerk of the Peace for the King's County to the year 1798; and that the Custodes Rotulorum of the county have appointed [164] persons to fill that office in the said county, from the year 1760 to the present time, who have held and enjoyed the said office accordingly, and received the emoluments thereof, with the exception of Hugh and Andrew Carmichael, appointed by the Crown; and of one James Cowly, the deputy of the said John Pollock, who were severally in possession under the Crown." The special verdict then states, "Letters patent of his late Majesty, bearing date October 30th, 1766, and duly enrolled, by which the Earl of Drogheda was appointed Custos Rotulorum of said county during his Majesty's pleasure; and then sets out a writing, under hand and seal, whereby the said Lord Drogheda, in 1772, appointed Edward Moore Dowden Clerk of the Peace and deputy Custos Rotulorum of the said county, during the pleasure of the said Earl: And finds, that the said Dowden took upon himself the execution of the duties of the said office, and executed the duties and received the emoluments thereof, until his death in 1789: And then sets out an appointment of the said Henry Harding, (the Plaintiff in error,) in said year to said office, by said Lord Drogheda, under hand and seal, during good behaviour: And finds, that said Harding was and is a proper person to hold the said office, and did all things necessary to qualify him to hold the said office, and to make him a complete Clerk of the Peace, and was admitted to the said office and took on him the duties thereof, and has continued from thence to the present time to execute the duties and receive the emoluments thereof, without inter [165] ruption by any person, and conducted himself properly therein; and that said Lord Drogheda is still" (at the time of finding said verdict,) "Custos Rotulorum of said county. The special verdict then finds, that within the last six years the Defendant received fees and emoluments of the said office to the amount of one shilling; and with the formal conclusion submits the right to the Court."

On this special verdict the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland, in Trinity Term, 1821, after full argument, gave judgment unanimously in favour of John Pollock and Arthur Hill Cornwallis Pollock, the Plaintiffs in the action.

From this judgment Henry Harding, the Defendant in the action, brought a writ of error returnable into the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, where he assigned the general error only.

The case was again fully argued in that Court, which in June 1823, affirmed the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, two of the Judges dissenting; whereupon the original Defendant brought his writ of error returnable into Parliament, where he again assigned the general error.

The case was argued * before the House of Lords, first in 1827, and afterwards before the Judges in 1828.

* The arguments of counsel are omitted, because the topics of argument and the authorities are all noticed in the opinions delivered by the Judges. For the same cause the reasons printed at the end of the cases for the Plaintiff and Defendant in error are not reprinted.

[166] For the Plaintiff in error: Mr. John Campbell and Mr. [1, see 6 Bing. 28].
For the Defendants in error: The Solicitor General and Mr. Brougham.

In the course of the argument a question arose as to a word occurring in the statute 12 Ric. 2. c. 10, whether it was "clerk or clerks." Upon this question, the Lord Chancellor said, "Mr. Justice Powell interprets it, clerk of the Justices: 'Whenever the Justices take 4s. a day for their time at the said sessions, their clerk is to take 2s.:' 'in four clerks.' It is a clerk of the whole body, both in the French and the English translation. The folio edition of the statutes from which I read, was printed in pursuance of the address of the House of Commons,—to that we must refer. The other printed edition is different, but unless that edition was verified by comparison with the record, the House would consider themselves bound by the edition printed under authority."

Another question arose upon an inconsistency of statement in the special verdict, the allegation in first part being, that "By virtue of a patent (dated the 30th of July, 1798,) John Pollock and Arthur H. C. Pollock obtained possession of the office (of Clerk of the Peace,) in the King's County, and exercised the duties thereof by them and their sufficient deputies until the year 1800." In a subsequent part of the special verdict is set forth an appointment by Lord Drogheda, in 1789, of Henry Harding, as Clerk of the Peace during good behaviour: that he was [167] a proper person to hold the office, and did all things necessary to qualify him to hold the office and to make him a complete Clerk of the Peace, and was admitted to the said office, and took on him the duties thereof, and has continued from thence to the present time, to execute the duties and receive the emoluments thereof, without interruption," etc. Upon this question the following observations were made:

The Lord Chancellor (22d April): It says they were in possession, and exercised the duties, but there is no averment that they received the fees. In the latter part it is averred, "that he received the fees, perquisites, and emoluments thereof, without any interruption:" that is, as to the possession of the fees and emoluments, "with the exception of Hugh and Andrew Carmichael, who were in the possession of the office," saying nothing as to the fees and emoluments. Putting the whole record together, it appears, that the Plaintiff in error, was in possession during the whole of the period: that he received the fees and emoluments without interruption; that the Defendants in error were in possession, or a deputy rather in possession, for the period of two years, and received no fees and emoluments: the words "without interruption," appear to be limited to the words "fees and emoluments."

Mr. Campbell: I say the word interruption applies to all.

The Lord Chancellor: Yes, so it does, if it stood by itself, but in the preceding page it is stated thus: "And the jurors upon their oath, do further say and find, that the persons appointed by the Custos Rotulorum, have held and [168] enjoyed the said office of the Clerk of the Peace, from the year 1760 to the present time, and received the fees and emoluments thereof, with the exception of Hugh and Andrew Carmichael, who had been appointed by the Crown, and James Cowley, who had been appointed by the Plaintiff John as his deputy, in the said office of the Clerk of the Peace of the King's County aforesaid, and who severally were in possession of the said office under the Crown:" and in a previous page it is stated, "that they were in possession of the said office, and exercised the duties thereof by themselves, or their sufficient deputies, under or by virtue of said patent, until the year 1800." The only way, therefore, in which you can reconcile these apparently conflicting averments is, to state, that as to the possession, there was an interruption for two years: but no interruption as to the receipt of the fees and emoluments. You may so reconcile them.

Mr. Campbell: The grant by the Crown is to John Pollock, and Arthur Hill Cornwallis Pollock. John could not appoint under this patent. It must be referred to some antecedent grant to John separately, before the joint grant was made.

The Lord Chancellor: In a previous part, it appears they were in possession from 1798 to 1800. It seems impossible to reconcile the statement, if possession is material, in the different parts of this record. With regard to the possession, it states in one part of the record, that in the year 1798 this appointment took place, and that the party was in possession two years till 1800. In a subsequent part, it states that other parties were in possession from an anterior period, down to the [169] present time, without any interruption whatever. It states first, that the parties who took under the grant of 1798, were in possession, and exercised the duties thereof by themselves, or their sufficient deputies, under or by virtue of the said patent, until the year 1800, a period of about two years. In a subsequent part it states, that the other grantee was in possession, from an anterior period down to the present time, and received the fees and emoluments of the office without any interruption. Those are the findings upon the record, and if they are material, they are directly at variance with each other: how is it possible that this House can deal with it? I said, assuming that it is a material averment on the record, it is inconsistent in itself. It states, without interruption. I point this out for consideration. This cause has been depending ten years, and we should be very sorry to send the record down again.

At the conclusion of the argument the following observations were made:

The Lord Chancellor: It appears that in the year 1556, a statute was passed by the Irish parliament, by which the King's County and the Queen's County were created. The Custos Rotulorum was appointed I believe after that, and it appears according to the special verdict in this case, that for a period of two hundred years, the Crown have uniformly appointed in the King's County to the office of Clerk of the Peace.

This action was tried in the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland; a special verdict was found, and upon that judgment was given for the Plain-[170]-tiff. Upon that judgment, a writ of error was preferred to the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The subject was discussed before ten of the judges: and eight were of opinion to confirm the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas. From that judgment of the Exchequer Chamber of Ireland, the writ of error has been brought to this House.

It was considered during the last session of parliament, when this case came on for consideration before a noble and learned friend of mine, who at that time held the office, which I have now the honor of holding, that the general question was of such importance, that it would be advisable to request the attendance of His Majesty's learned judges, to obtain their opinion upon some of the questions, which might arise out of the discussion of this subject.

The main point for consideration is, as to whether or not the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace for the King's County in Ireland is vested in the Crown, or in the Custos Rotulorum. I have, with the view of obtaining the opinion of the learned judges as to this point, which will be a guide to the determination of your Lordships, framed several questions, which, with your approbation, I shall submit to the consideration of the judges: one arising out of the discussion at your Lordships' bar, to ascertain what opinion the learned judges entertain as to this point: namely, whether previously to the statute of Henry 8th, the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace in the English Counties was vested of common right in the King, or whether it was in the Custos Rotulorum? [171] I have also framed another question, to ascertain the opinion of the learned judges as to what was the law in Ireland up to the year 1800, with respect to the general counties in Ireland? And I have also framed a question more immediately applicable to the present subject, whether, having regard to the statute passed in the year 1556 by the Irish parliament, and having regard to what has taken place under that statute, the learned judges are of opinion that the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace of the King's County in Ireland, belongs of right to the Crown, or whether it belongs to the Custos Rotulorum? Those are the principal points of the case which have been argued at your Lordships' bar.

But other questions have arisen out of the particular form of this Record, and your Lordships will concur with me in lamenting that after this subject, a subject of very great importance, has been now in agitation for a period of ten years, after a judgment pronounced in the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland in the first instance, after an appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber in that country, and after an appeal to this House, any doubt should arise, whether from defects in the Record, the case is in such a shape as to enable your Lordships to decide upon it as it at present lies upon your table. Several questions will arise out of those points which are peculiar to this case, originating in the shape of the Record, and with your Lordships' permission I shall prepare some questions, which I consider material arising out of the Record, and arising out of those particular points to which your attention has been directed, with a view to obtain the opinion of the [172] learned judges on those points which are essential before we come to the consideration of the main question.

On 1828, the following questions were proposed by the Lord Chancellor, and put by the House to the judges for their opinion :

First, whether the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the shires of England did by law, previously to the passing of the Act 37 Hen. 8, c. 1, belong of right to the Crown or to the Custos Rotulorum of the shire, by virtue of his said office, or to any, and to what person or persons ?

Secondly, whether the appointment to the office of the Clerk of the Peace within the shires of Ireland did by law, in and previously to the year 1800, belong of right to the Crown or to the Custos Rotulorum of the said shire, by virtue of his said office, or to any, and to what person or persons ?

Thirdly, whether the right to appoint to the office of the Clerk of the Peace within the King's County in Ireland did by law, in and previous to the year 1800, belong to the Crown or to the Custos Rotulorum of the said shire, by virtue of his said office, or to any, and what other person or persons ?

On the 18th May, 1829, the judges delivered their opinions as follows :

Littledale J. : Upon the first question, I am of opinion that the right to appoint to all offices connected with the administration of justice, is vested in the Crown by the royal prerogative, and if the [173] Crown, by its royal prerogative, constitutes a new Court of Justice, it may appoint the judges of the Court and all the subordinate officers, upon which terms as it shall think proper. So also if the Crown, by virtue of an Act of Parliament, is authorized to constitute a Court, it may appoint the judges of that Court, and also the officers, in such manner as it may deem most expedient to carry into effect the object of the legislature. But if in the constitution of a Court formed under the authority of Parliament, the Crown is to appoint the judges alone, but not the officers of the Court, the act being silent as to the appointment of any officer, then I apprehend, as a matter of law, the power of appointing the officers belongs to the Court itself, or to some member or members of the Court to whom particular duties are assigned, and who in the discharge of these duties must commit the performance of the minor part of those duties to some subordinate officer or clerk : and if the Crown having the right of appointing the officers, has once waived it, and has suffered either the judges of the Court at large, or some particular judge, to whom special powers are confided, to appoint the officers necessary to conduct the subordinate business of the Court, then I apprehend the Crown cannot afterwards interfere and take from the Court or particular members the appointment of the subordinate officers ; for otherwise great confusion would ensue in the administration of such officers, acting under the authority of the Court, but liable to be displaced, and the Crown by allowing the Court to appoint the officers in the first instance has manifested its intention that that should be the course of proceeding in the [174] administration of justice in that Court. If I am right in taking this view of the subject, I think it will follow that the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the shires of England did by law previously to the passing of the Act of 37 Hen. 8th, cap. 1, belong of the right to the Custos Rotulorum of the shire, by virtue of his office.

The office of Custos Rotulorum and that of Clerk of the Peace, are offices created within time of legal memory : no immemorial usage or prescription can therefore be applied to either of them. But, if it be true, that in the cases of courts, or superior offices entrusted with the administration of public justice, the principle be recognized that the members of the court, or some superior officer, have appointed the subordinate officers or clerks to assist in the administration of justice, then I take it on the creation of new courts or superior officers within time of memory : the same principle will apply that the Court or superior officer, as the case may be, have, as incident to the Court or office, a right to appoint the subordinate officers or clerks, saving always the right of the Crown, on the first creation of the Court or superior office, to constitute and regulate it as it thinks proper, both as to the subordinate officers and clerks, and in other respects as the Crown thinks fit.

The oldest authority that recognizes this common law principle is the statute of Westminster, 2nd, 13 Edw. 1. stat. 1. cap. 30, "that all justices of the benches from henceforth shall have in their circuits clerks, to enrol all pleas pleaded before them, like as they have used to have in [175] time passed." And Lord Coke, in commenting upon this statute, in 2nd Institute, 125, says "this power is as antiently they used to have, that is by the common law." And he states the reason why this clause of the Act was passed, that the king had been informed that he might appoint the officers on the circuits, which this writer declares to belong to the justices, and that they enjoyed the same of antient time, that is by the common law; and then he goes on to give the reason of the justices having this power. (At present indeed the senior judge appoints, and has done for a considerable time past; how this has happened I cannot now ascertain, whether the second judge had acquiesced in the senior judge appointing so long that it cannot now be objected to, or whether the practice in modern times may be evidence of a usage before the time of legal memory, so as to found a right, such as the statute referred to an antient usage) "and the reason thereof is twofold: 1st For that the law doth ever appoint those that have the greatest knowledge and skill to perform that which is to be done; 2nd. The officers and clerks are but to enter, enroll or effect that which the justices do adjudge, award, or order, the insufficient doing whereof maketh the proceeding of the justices erroneous, than the which nothing can be more dishonourable and grievous to the justices, and prejudicial to the party, therefore the law, as here it appeareth, did appropriate to the justices the making of their own clerks and officers, and so to proceed judicially by their own instruments, and that this was the common law. The king cannot grant the office of the shire or county clerk " (who is to [176] enter all judgments and proceedings in the County Court) " for that the making of the shire clerk belongeth to the sheriff by the common law, as in Mitton's case it appeareth, "et sic de cæteris." In Mitton's case, 1 Coke 32, the queen Elizabeth had granted the office of county clerk, or shire clerk, to Mitton and others. The queen appointed Hopton to be sheriff of the county, who interrupted Mitton. It was resolved that the County Court, and the entering of all proceedings in it, are incident to the office of sheriffs, and therefore cannot by letters patent be divided from it, and after advert- ing to some other points which had been raised, it goes on to state, as a general answer to all objections, that "great inconvenience would ensue to sheriffs, who are great and ancient officers and ministers of justice, if such grants should be of validity, for by such, as well the entering of all proceedings in the same Court, as the custody of the entries and Rolls thereof, do belong to the office of sheriff." He proceeds afterwards to say "if the Record be embezzled the sheriff shall answer for it, and therefore it would be full of danger and damage to sheriffs if others should be appointed to keep the entries and Rolls of the County Court, and yet the sheriffs should answer for them as immediate officers to the Court, and therefore the sheriff shall appoint clerks under him in his County Court, for whom he shall answer at his peril. The same law of the sheriffs turn, and law and reason require that the sheriff, who is a public officer and minister of justice, and who as an officer of such eminency, confidence, peril, and charge, ought to have all rights appertaining to [175] his office, and ought to be favoured in law before any private person, for his singular benefit and avail." And then it goes on to state, that the sheriffs shall have custody of gaols, and shall put in such keepers, for whom they will answer, and the reason given is, because they shall be answerable for escapes; and it goes on to state, that it would be against all reason that they should be answerable for escapes, and subject to amerciaments, and yet that another should have the keeping and custody of the goal. The Parliamentary declaration in the statute of Westminster, and Lord Coke's Commentary, and also the resolutions in Mitton's case, seem sufficient to show that in antient offices the right of appointment of the subordinate officers and clerks is in the Court or the superior officer, as the case may be; and I apprehend that if a new Court or office be created, the same rules will attach upon them. The reasons for it are precisely the same. The language of Lord Coke in his Institutes, and the language of the Court in Mitton's case, apply in every respect to such officers as the Custos Rotulorum and the Clerk of the Peace, whose case is now under consideration.

With respect to the principle of new offices being to be governed by the rules of the common law, I would refer to the case of Wilkes v. Williams (8 Term Reports, p.

631.) That was an action on promises, and the Defendant pleaded in abatement, that he was a tipstaff of the Court of Chancery, and then he says, that there is an antient custom in the High Court of [176] Chancery, time out of mind, that all the resident officers, clerks and ministers of the same Court of Chancery, shall be freed and quieted, as antiently used to be, according to the liberties and privileges of the Court immemorially used, and ought not to be impleaded elsewhere than before the Chancellor or Keeper of the Great Seal: and on a demurrer to the plea, objections were taken to the plea, and amongst others it was stated to be pleaded, as an exemption to offices created within time of memory, as to which the Court held that such a custom might well extend to new created offices, for where an immemorial privilege is claimed for all the officers of the Court, and some officers are made within the time of legal memory, they must also fall within the privilege. So I say here, that if the common law allows antient Courts and superior officers to appoint their clerks and subordinate officers, the same common law principle applies to new Courts and newly created offices.

The precise origin, either of the Custos Rotulorum or of the Clerk of the Peace, does not appear to be very well known. There were, at the common law, persons who were called Conservators of the Peace: some of these were such by virtue of certain offices which they held, others appear to have been elected: the precise nature and extent of their functions do not appear clearly defined, nor whether they had a clerk to enrol and enter their proceedings, nor how that clerk was appointed. These conservators were discontinued, and the mode in which the constitution of the conservators of the peace was changed, and the present justices of the peace were constituted, [177] will be seen in Lambard's Eirenarcha (Cap. 4, p. 21.) The origin of the justices of the peace, as at present constituted, is to be found in statutes passed in the reign of Edward the 3rd (1st Edw. 3, stat. 2, cap. 16. 4 Edw. 3, cap. 2. 18 Edw. 3, stat. 2, and 34 Edw. 3, cap. 1), and consequently, within time of legal memory. It may be considered that the last of these was more particularly that which decided the character and constitution of the present justices. These justices at large had at first the custody or keeping of the rolls, and even still they have them in point of law, as all writs of certiorari and error are directed to them. No mention is made in any of these acts of Edward 3rd, of any such officer as Custos Rotulorum, (and it is not very clear when he was first constituted), nor of any such office as Clerk of the Peace: but in the 12th Richard 2nd, cap. 10, it is provided that the clerk of the justices shall have 2s. a day for his wages, and the clerk of the justices I take to be the present Clerk of the Peace. In the 11th Henry 7th, cap. 15, the Custos Rotulorum is mentioned as being to have the oversight of the sheriffs in the cases mentioned, and it seems from the reference in Lambard (Eiren. p. 42), that there was such an office as Custos Rotulorum as early as the 14th of Richard 2nd. It does not appear whether, previously to that time, there was any such person as the Custos Rotulorum, and if there was not, the justices would, as incident to their office, have a right to appoint the clerk, according to the rules of the common law.

But as soon as the justices became a distinct [178] Court, it would be inconvenient that the records should be dispersed amongst them promiscuously, and not kept together in one place. Lord Holt, in Harcourt v. For (see 1 Shower 426, 506, 516, and Shower's Parl. Ca. 158, 4 Mod. 167, 12 Mod. 42), says, he looks upon it, it was in the power of the king to appoint some particular person to have the custody and charge of the Records, and that he should be a person responsible to the justices for the safe keeping of them, and he says this was thought convenient, for the words at the end of the commission of the peace are "we appoint you," such a one, "to be Keeper of the Records and Rolls of the County." He goes on to say "this seems to me to be the commencement of the office of Custos Rotulorum, for no one being more in commission than another, it was in the power of the king, by his prerogative, to appoint one to keep the records. But, therefore, it does necessarily follow, that no person whatsoever could be Custos that was not a justice of peace in commission." Then Lord Holt goes on to consider how the Custos came to appoint the Clerk of the Peace, he says "the Custos names him for this reason, because the rolls and records of the sessions being by the Commission put into the custody of the Custos Rotulorum, the clerk being the person that must be trusted with the rolls to make entries upon, to draw judgments, to record pleas, to join issues and enter judgments, then, by common right, and by the common law of the land, it belongs to him that hath the keeping of the records to nominate this clerk, and not to any one else, and it would be the most in-[179]-convenient thing in the world that the Custos Rotulorum being entrusted with the custody of the records, by his commission, any other should be made Clerk of the Peace for the actual possession of these records, than such a one as he should appoint, where upon any loss or miscarriage he is answerable for it himself to the king and the subject."

This reasoning of Lord Holt, as to the propriety of the person who has the records of a Court entrusted to him, appointing a subordinate officer to take care of them, is certainly extra judicial, but it tells in precisely with what is said by Lord Coke in his 2nd Institute, commenting on the statute of Westminster the 2nd, as to clerks of assize, and the language of the Court in Mitton's case.

This conjecture of the origin of the Clerk of the Peace being appointed by the Custos Rotulorum, is called in question, first, because in 12 Richard 2nd (cap. 10) he is called clerk to the justices; secondly, because Lambard (Eirenarcha, p. 394) calls him, in conformity with the statute of Ireland the second, clerk to the justices, and not the clerk of the Custos Rotulorum only; thirdly, because in the Year Books (2nd Hen. 7th fol. 1) he is called the clerk and attorney of the king. In the reign of Richard the 2nd, when he was called clerk of the justices, it does not appear that there was any Custos Rotulorum; but, admitting that there was, and adopting the assertion of Lambard, that at the time when he wrote, the officer was clerk to the justices, it does not follow that he is to be appointed by the justices. The justices form the Court, and therefore he may with [180] propriety be called their clerk, because he is to record their proceedings, and it is his duty to attend the Court.

It is to be observed also, that the legal custody of the rolls and records is in the justices, though the actual custody is in the Custos Rotulorum, who is to produce them at the sessions, and upon other proper occasions, to the justices, and therefore there is no more inconsistency in calling him clerk to the justices when he is appointed by the Custos Rotulorum, than there is in saying that the rolls are in the legal custody of the justices, though the actual custody is in the Custos, by virtue of the King's commission. But if Lambard's authority is to be taken, that at the time when there was a Custos, the Clerk of the Peace was the clerk of the justices, his authority must be taken altogether; and in the next paragraph he says "Howbeit" (as much as to say, notwithstanding he is clerk to the justices) "the nomination and appointment of him hath long time belonged to the Custos Rotulorum. And this office was also for a time given by the king's letters patent for term of life, as that of the Custos Rotulorum was, until the statute of 37 Henry 8, cap. 1, recontinued the antient order of giving it by the Custos Rotulorum only." He therefore considers, that the antient order of giving it was in the Custos.

Then, as to his being called in the year books clerk and attorney of the king, nothing can be inferred against the right of the Custos from that; if he is to enter the proceedings on the rolls and records, he is, as far as that applies to entries in which the king is concerned, the clerk and at [181] torney for the king; but that has nothing to do with the right of appointment. The officer on the circuit who, in common parlance, is called clerk of assize, is really the clerk of the assize and clerk of the Crown, and is so called in his grant of office. The statute of Westminster speaks of the justices within their circuits, appointing their clerks to enrol pleas pleaded before them, in general terms; and when his duties come to be specified, he is called clerk of the assizes and clerk of the Crown; that is, he is the clerk of the assizes as to those things which relate to civil suits, and clerk of the Crown as to those things which relate to the Crown. It is not material to consider in what relation this officer stood to the Custos, whether he is his deputy or his clerk, or the clerk to the body of justices, for whom the Custos keeps the rolls and records; but this question is, in whom is the right of appointment? He cannot be considered as the deputy of the Custos in the legal sense of the word, because a deputy may perform all the duties of the principal, which the Clerk of the Peace cannot.

Besides the case of Harcourt v. Fox, there is the case of Saunders v. Owen (Salk. 167. 5 Mod. 386. 1st Ed. Raym. 158. Carth. 126.) That was an assize of novel disseisin of the office of Clerk of the Peace. The case turned upon the manner of the appointment, because at that time there was no doubt about the right of the Custos.

to appoint. In the report of the case in Salkeld, the Court say that it always belonged to the Custos Rotulorum to nominate the Clerk of the Peace, but the Clerk of the Peace was removable whenever the Custos Rotulorum was removed or changed, and, moreover, was [182] removable at the will of the Custos till the 32nd of Henry 8th, which makes him to continue in quousque the Custos shall continue in. This, therefore, is a declaration of the Court as to the original right of the Custos, and also considers that the effect of the statute of the 37th of Henry 8th, only altered the period of the duration of the office. In Jenkins (Cent. 216. fo. 59) it is stated, that the Custos Rotulorum appoints the Clerk of the Peace.

In the King v. Evans (4 Mod. 31. 1 Show. 282. 12 Mod. 13) the Custos Rotulorum having been displaced, the Clerk of the Peace refused to deliver the rolls to the new Custos; he was indicted and found guilty, and removed from his office and brought a mandamus to be restored. It was said that he was a ministerial officer to the Custos, and ought to deliver the records to him at the end of the session. The Chief Justice says, "The Clerk of the Peace ought to make out all the process which cannot be done without the rolls. When they are completed, he must deliver them to the Custos, but so long as they are in process they are to be with the Clerk of the Peace;" and, therefore, it seemed reasonable that the Defendant should be restored; but three judges were of a contrary opinion. This case does not seem to prove much either way as to the right of appointment, but only as to the conduct of the Clerk of the Peace, and that the Custos might require the rolls to be delivered to himself, if he thought fit, of which there could be no doubt. In the same case, as reported in 12 Modern Reports, Holt says, "the custody of the rolls belongs to the [183] Custos Rotulorum. The Clerk of the Peace is a distinct officer, and not a mere servant." A peremptory mandamus was ordered.

Then it is material to consider, whether the statute of the 37th of Henry 8th, cap. 1, throws any light upon the subject. It begins, "Where, before this time, the Lord Chancellor of England, for the time being, hath, by reason of his office of the Chancellorship, the nomination and appointment of the Custos Rotulorum, and that in like manner all and every person which hath had and enjoyed the said office of the Custos Rotulorum hath had, until now of late, the nomination and appointment of the Clerk of the Peace: And whereas now of late divers and sundry persons, not being learned, nor being able for lack of knowledge, to exercise the offices of Custos Rotulorum and Clerk of the Peace, have of late years, by labour, friendship, and other means, attained and gotten for term of their lives, of the King's Majesty, several grants, by his Highness's Letters patent to them made, of the said Clerkships of the Peace:" and then it goes on to enact how the appointments to these offices shall be made in future, and as to the Clerk of the Peace, that he shall be appointed by the Custos. Further acts of Parliament have since been passed as to these offices, but they are not material to the present enquiry. This recital then appears to contain a direct recognition of the right of the Custos Rotulorum to appoint the Clerk of the Peace. It says, that the Custos hath had, until now of late, the nomination and appointment. That must [184] mean the lawful and rightful nomination and appointment, and then it goes on to give the Custos a distinct power of appointment to the office, to be held as long as he should continue Custos.

It may however be said, that this act cannot be taken to recognize any pre-existing right in the Custos, because it says that the Lord Chancellor had, by virtue of his office, the nomination and appointment of the Custos, and which he had not by law. I admit that he had it not by law. The only way to account for this recital in the act is, that in point of fact, he had exercised the right, and which he probably had done, because he made out the commission; and he might consider that it was proper for him to direct who were to keep the records. But at all events, there is a parliamentary recognition that the Crown had not appointed the Clerk of the Peace, at the first formation of the Court of the Justices, because it says, that the Custos Rotulorum had until now of late appointed the Clerk of the Peace; and that now of late, persons had got grants from the Crown; and of course, it follows, that at the first formation, the Crown had not exercised the right, and that being so, the title of the Crown cannot be supported; and then it becomes a question, whether the nomination be in the Justices at large, or in the Custos Rotulorum.

It may be said there are a great many offices in Courts of Justice, where the power of nomination is not as is contended for by the Plaintiff in error. No doubt many are in the Crown, as to which, I consider that the right of nomination was reserved by the Crown, at the original formation of the Court. In others, it is in the Chief Justice: and [185] as to them, I consider that the right of the Chief Justice is founded in prescription, which has taken it away from the Court at large. There are many which are appointed by the Chief Officer, but these are subordinate officers or clerks, who are appointed by the superior officers.

In Skrogges v. Coleshill (Dyer 175), it appears that the office of Exigenter became vacant in 1558, and afterwards Sir Richard Brooke, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas died, and during the vacancy of both offices Queen Mary granted the office of Exigenter to Coleshill, and afterwards granted the office of Chief Justice to Anthony Brown, who refused to admit Coleshill, and granted the office to Skrogges: and then in 1st and 2d Elizabeth, the right of the parties were discussed, and it was held by the Judges present, viz. the Judges of the King's Bench and the Chief Baron, (the Judges of the Common Pleas being excluded), that the title of Coleshill was null, and that the gift of the office by no means, and at no time, belongs or can belong to the Queen, but is only in the disposal of the Chief Justice for the time being, as an inseparable incident belonging to the person of the Chief Justice, by reason of prescription and usage. At the end of the case, a reference is made to the statute of Westminster, and it then goes on thus: "and so it seems in reason that the Justices were before the clerks, and made clerks at their pleasure." In this case, the title of the Chief Justice stands upon usage and prescription, and very properly so, because by the Common Law, the right to appoint [186] the officers of the Court, was in all the Judges of the Court, and the Chief Justice alone, could only appoint by usage and prescription. But the case is important in this point of view, that it says the gift of the office by no means, and at no time, belongs or can belong to the queen: and the question then I apprehend was between the right of the whole Court and the right of the Chief Justice, which latter could only be founded on prescription.

The next case to that of Skrogges is in Dyer 176 a (Kirkham's Case), by which it appears, that the office of Chirographer, and of Custos Brevium in the Common Pleas, both belong to the king.

The next cases are Duchess of Grafton v. Holt (Skinner 354), and Bridgman v. Holt (Shower's Parliamentary Cases 411). In these cases, the question was between the Crown and the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, as to the right of appointing the chief clerk of the King's Bench. The Chief Justice claimed the right by prescription: and one question was, whether the prescription was interrupted by an act of Parliament of 15th Edward the 3d? But the right of the Chief Justice was put on the point of prescription, and not upon the Common Law right, nor that would have given it to the whole Court.

Another question is, whether this right of nomination is not a matter of fact, to be decided by a Jury, rather than a matter of law? But I think it is a question of mere law, for the reasons I have given. The only thing that could be considered as a matter of fact, to be tried by a [187] Jury, would be, whether the Crown had reserved the right of nominating the Clerk of the Justices, or whatever he may be called, at the time, when the first commission issued for appointing Justices of the Peace? and I think that Courts of Law may take judicial notice that the Crown did not do so, from a total absence of any thing appearing to countenance such a supposition, and from the language of the statute of 37 Henry 8, where such exercise in fact is distinctly negatived, and from the various authorities which I have referred to, as to the office in question, in none of which is it in any way supposed that the Crown did exercise such a right in the first instance. It may be said, that in the Counties Palatine, a different rule prevails: and that in the County Palatine of Lancaster, the Clerk of the Peace is not appointed by the Custos Rotulorum; and that in Durham, the Bishop does not appoint in the character of Custos Rotulorum. Whatever is done in the Counties Palatine, is not necessarily according to the rule of the Common Law. But it depends altogether on the particular constitution of each county, as it was originally formed by act of Parliament, or otherwise; and I do not consider that what has been done in Counties Palatine, can affect the general principles of the Common Law.

I am therefore of opinion upon the first question, that the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace, within the shires of England, did by law, previously to the passing of the act 37 Henry 8, cap. 1, belong of right to the Custos Rotulorum of the shire, by virtue of his said office.

The law of Ireland before the time of Henry the [188] 2nd, was the Brehon Law. King John in the twelfth year of his reign, is said (Co. Lit. 141, de Communi omnium de Hibernia consensu) to have gone into Ireland, and there, by the advice of grave and learned men in the laws, whom he carried with him, by Parliament, to have ordained and established that Ireland should be governed by the laws of England: some of the Irish accepted, but others objected to this. In the parliament at Rithensy (40 Edward 3d), the Brehon Law was abolished. In Poyning's Law (10 Henry 7th), it is provided, that the English statutes before that made in England, shall be in force in Ireland.

Whatever therefore were the rights of the Crown, or other persons in England, at the formation of the Courts of Justices in England, were also the rights of the corresponding persons in Ireland. No act of Parliament in Ireland, before the year 1800, took away the right of the Custos. I am of opinion, therefore, on the second question, that the appointment of the office of Clerk of the Peace within the shires of Ireland, did by law, in and previously to the year 1800, belong of right to the Custos Rotulorum of the shire, by virtue of his said office.

The King's County was created by 3 and 4 Philip and Mary, c. 2, s. 3. A new county with all the officers attached to it, will follow the rule of all other counties: and if the Crown at the time of the original formation of the Court of the Justices in England, did not exercise the right of nomination and appointment of the officers, it could not do so in Ireland, either when the Court of Justices was [189] first formed there, or at the time of the formation of the King's County. The clause of the Act creating the King's County is as follows: "And be it also enacted, by the authorities aforesaid, that the New Fort in Offaly be from henceforth for ever called and named Phillipstown, and that the said countie of Offaly, and such portion of the said Glinmalry as standeth, and is situated of that side of the river of Barrow, whereupon the said Phillipstown standeth and is situated: and all the seigniories, honors, manors, lands, tenements and hereditaments of the same country and portion, and every of them, be from the Feast of St. Michael the Archangel, next coming after the first day of this present Parliament, one shire or countie named, known and called the King's Countie: and shall from the said Feast be taken, reputed and used as a countie or shire to all purposes for ever: and that there shall be appointed, ordayned and made, within the said countie or shire, for the rule thereof and execution of things there, sherife, coroners, escheator, clerke of the market, and other officers and ministers of justice, yearly, as in other the shires or counties of this realm of Ireland be or should be."

I am therefore of opinion as to the third question, that the right to appoint to the office of Clerk of the Peace, within the King's County of Ireland, did by law in, and previously to the year 1800, belong to the Custos Rotulorum of the said shire, by virtue of his said office.

Vaughan, B.: With reference to the last two questions, it is to be considered as admitted that the Crown, if it ever possessed the right of [190] appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the shires to which these questions refer, has never parted with that right, unless it passed to the Custos Rotulorum in each county, merely by virtue and in right of his said office of Custos Rotulorum.

To the first question I answer, that the office of Clerk of the Peace, within the shires of England, did by law, previously to the passing of the act of 37 Hen. 8th, cap. 1, belong of right to the Crown. The king, by prerogative, has the creation of all powers and offices in the state, especially those connected with the administration of justice. Whoever therefore insists on the right to appoint to any such office, must to establish a legitimate claim, derive his title through the Crown. But I apprehend this may be done, first by grant from the Crown: secondly, by prescription, which presupposes such grant: thirdly, by Act of Parliament, to which the King is a consenting party.

It is not argued, nor is there colour for contending, that the office of Clerk of the Peace rests on any act of Parliament, as its foundation prior to the 37 Hen. 8. Nor can the doctrine of prescription, in the legal acceptation of that term, assist the claim, because, neither the office of Custos Rotulorum, nor of Clerk of the Peace, had any existence before the time of legal memory. The case of the Plaintiff in error must depend therefore on the question, whether the right of the Custos to appoint can be derived from any grant mediately or immediately from the Crown; and on this ground I conceive it may be defended. When I use the words mediately or immediately, I would be understood that the right to appoint [191] to the office of Clerk of the Peace may be derived through the Crown by the grant of some other office, to which it may be inseparably incident; and that it did of right belong to the office of Custos Rotulorum to appoint to the office of Clerk of the Peace in England, not by virtue of any express grant from the Crown, but as incidental to the office of Custos Rotulorum, prior to the statute of 37 Hen. 8th, accessorium sequitur principale. It passes as an accessory to its principal.

I think that can be shown by a consideration, first, of the origin and nature of the respective offices of Custos Rotulorum and Clerk of the Peace, and of their relative duties, as arising out of and connected with the Commission of the Peace; secondly, by the strongest legislative declarations and recognitions on the subject; thirdly, by the authority of solemnly adjudged cases, some of which appear to me to be strictly analogous; and by the declarations and opinions of the most eminent judges. And, first, as to the origin (as far as it can be traced) and nature of the respective offices and their duties, as connected with the Commission of the Peace.

It is difficult to fix, with any precision, the period when any of these offices were first created. Their origin is involved in obscurity; and if the attempt to discover it, eluded the researches of the eminent judges, who must have employed many watchful hours in this enquiry, in the reign of William 3rd, (I allude to the case of Harcourt v. Fox) the subsequent lapse of 130 years, has only enveloped the subject in darker mystery. That the office of Custos Rotulorum is not an im-[192]memorial one, must be conceded, because the Commission of the Peace which gave birth to it is within the time of legal memory; but that it is a very ancient office will not be disputed. In what manner the peace was maintained in very ancient times, and before the reign of Edw. 3rd, whether by persons under the name of Conservators; whether some of them, (for example) the king's justices, and inferior judges, and ministers of justice, as sheriffs, constables, tithing men, headboroughs, and the like, were ex officio wardens of the peace; whether others were entitled to hold the same office by tenure or prescription; whether others were elected in full County Court, in pursuance of a writ directed to the sheriff for that purpose; whether others again were occasionally appointed by a committee of the Crown; what was the extent of their authority, and what the precise limits of their jurisdiction, are questions which it might gratify a spirit of antiquarian curiosity to investigate, but from which investigation I conceive no clear light would be reflected to guide us in our present enquiry.

Before the reign of Edward 3rd, it should seem that Commissions of the Peace were not confined within the limits of particular counties, not addressed exclusively to persons resident within them; their authority however, was restrained strictly ad conservandam pacem.

As soon as Edward 3rd, ascended the throne, which became vacant by the imprisonment, deposit, and murder of his father, the stat. of 1 Edw. 3rd, cap. 16, was passed, intituled, "who shall be assigned justices and keepers of the peace;" and containing this simple enactment [193] "Item For the better keeping and maintenance of the peace, the king wills, that in every county good men and lawful, which be no maintainers of evil, nor barrators in the county, shall be assigned to keep the peace." This short and general act gave very limited authority to the persons to be appointed under it, making them nothing more than Conservators of the Peace, nominated by the Crown, in addition to those who were already such by the pre-existing laws and usages of the realm. Within three years afterwards these justices and keepers of the peace were entrusted with somewhat more enlarged powers, being invested with the additional authority to take, but not to try indictments. The statute of Edw. 3rd, cap. 2, after some regulations respecting the appointment of justices of assize and gaol delivery, ordained that there should be assigned good and lawful men in every county to keep the peace; and the justices assigned to deliver the gaols had power given them to deliver the gaols of those that should be indicted before the keepers of the peace; and such keepers were directed for that purpose to send their indictments before those justices. After this statute I find no material alteration in their authority until the eighteenth of the same reign, when they were to be empowered by a commission from the Crown, (if need should be) "to hear and determine felonies and trespasses." 18 Edw. 3rd, cap. 2, title, "justices of the peace shall be appointed, and their authority." "Item.—That two or three of the best of reputation in the counties shall be assigned keepers of the peace by the king's commission: and at what time need shall be. [194] the same with other wise and learned in the land, shall be assigned by the king's commission to hear and determine felonies and trespasses done against the peace in the same county, and to inflict punishment reasonably, according to law and reason, and the manner of the deeds." When, in obedience to this statute, it was prayed by the Commons, in the twentieth year of the same reign, that they might have a power to hear and determine felonies; it was answered that the king would appoint learned persons for that office.

So in the twenty-first year of the same monarch, the Commons being charged to advise the king what was the best way of keeping the peace of the kingdom, they recommended that six persons in every county, of whom two were to be de plus grounds, two knights and two men of the land, and so more or less, as need should require, should have the power and commission out of Chancery to hear and determine the keeping of the peace.

In conformity with these petitions and statutes, and others which may be seen in Cotton's Extracts from records in the Tower, commissions were at various times framed, assigning certain persons to execute the powers which the statutes authorized the king to confer: in which, in addition to the general powers for keeping the peace, a special charge was introduced to enforce the observance also of particular statutes, viz. statutes of Winton, 2 Edw. 3rd, and the statute of Northampton, 20 Edw. 3rd, with some others: but the general standing authority given to the justices to hear and determine felonies and trespasses, thereby constituting them complete judges of a [195] Court of Record, was not conferred upon them until the 34 Edw. 3rd, cap. 1, and I conceive that statute gave occasion to the commencement of the office of Custos Rotulorum, and the necessity of appointing an officer to make and keep the rolls or records of the peace, naturally arising out of the execution of this commission, so much enlarging their jurisdiction and powers. Observe the title and language of the statute 34 Edw. 3, cap. 1: "What sort of persons shall be justices of the peace, and what authority they shall have." The act states, first, "in every county in England shall be assigned for the keeping of the peace, one lord, and with him three or four of the most worthy in the county, with some learned in the land, and they shall have power, etc. And also to hear and determine, at the king's suit, all manner of felonies and trespasses done in the same county, according to the laws and customs aforesaid."

I have endeavoured to trace the rise and progress of the growing authority and jurisdiction of the justices of the peace, with a view to ascertain whether they had power to hear and determine felonies and trespasses, until 34 Edw. 3rd, and consequently, were a Court of Record before that time: because, if I am correct in supposing that they had no such authority, there was no necessity for any such officer as Custos Rotulorum or Clerk of the Peace, nor do I believe either of them to have existed in fact prior to that period. But a Court of Record being then organized, and the justices assembled for the first time under the commission directed by that statute, I apprehend it would of right belong to them, as incident to [196] the administration of justice, having records which must be in their custody, to appoint an officer, by whatever name he might be called: whether Clerk of the Crown, Clerk of the Justices, or Clerk of the Peace, to assist them in drawing their indictments, in arraigning their prisoners, in joining issues for the Crown, in entering their judgments, in awarding their process, and in making up and keeping their records.

The nature of these duties, may sufficiently account for his being sometimes called not only Clerk of the Peace, but also Clerk and Attorney for the Crown (Year Book, 2 Hen. 7, p. 31, pl. 2). Where a question arose, whether all the Justices of the Peace ought to bring their recognizances to that Justice which was Custos Rotulorum! all agreed it was good so to order it, and well done: and the Clerk of the Peace at the Sessions, is there described as Clerk of the Peace, who is Clerk and Attorney for the advantage of the King.

In Harcourt v. Fox, as reported in 1 Mod. 173, and in Holt's Rep. 189, the Court is reported to have affirmed, that the first beginning of a Custos Rotulorum was in the 34th year of the reign of Edw. 3: and that the reason why he was appointed at that time was, because the Justices of the Peace could not then agree among themselves, who should keep the records: and that upon application made to the King concerning the matter, his Majesty (to prevent all disputes) appointed a fit person to keep them, and gave him the custody of the records in every county. But from very careful perusal of what [197] may perhaps be considered as a more full and accurate report of the same case in Shower, where the opinions of the judges are reported seriatim, I do not collect with certainty, that the Custos Rotulorum was nominated by the Crown, so early as in the 34th year of Edward 3. Lord Holt indeed observes, "That that statute gave occasion to the commencement of the office of Custos Rotulorum: for the justices being judges of record, the records of that Court must be in their custody. But as it might be inconvenient that the records should be dispersed amongst them promiscuously, and not kept together in one hand, it was in the power of the Crown, to appoint a particular person to have the custody and charge of them." Such is the language ascribed to Lord Holt by the report in Shower: but at what precise period of time the King first exercised that power, whether on the issuing of the first commission, after the 34 Edw. 3, or in consequence of the supposed disagreement, stated to have arisen amongst the justices themselves, does not distinctly appear in the judgments of any of the judges, and I incline to the opinion that it was not until a later period.

To hazard any conjectures on the subject is, (to adopt the phrase used in the argument of Harcourt v. Fox), ambulare in teuebris: but whatever cloud may obscure this enquiry, my researches have led me to conclude, that in a short succession of years, subsequent to the 34 Edw. 3, the King introduced the clause now found in every commission of the peace, containing a special designation of the Custos Rotulorum by name. [198] This fact is manifested from several passages in Lambard, who in page 10 of his valuable work says, "That the earliest commission extant, expressly appointing by name, the individual to whom the custody of the records of the peace was committed by the Crown, was in the 11th year of the reign of Richard 2d." In mentioning the alterations made in the terms of the commission of the peace, he adds, "And Stephen Bateman was then the first for Kent, to whom the credit of the records of the peace was thereby committed, which officer is now since then called the Custos Rotulorum: all which matters you may find in the records 28th of June, 11 R. 2, part 2, membrana 35."

From whence I infer, that although during the interval between 34 Edw. 3, and the 14 R. 2, comprising a period of about thirty years, the justices had generally the custody of the records, and, as incident to that custody, the appointment of any ministerial officer to assist them in that duty, (by whatever name he might be called), yet when, in progress of time, whether from differences arising between the justices themselves, or from any other cause, the Crown appointed the Custos Rotulorum by name, (a course of proceeding, which according to Lambard, obtained from the 11 Rich. 2), that appointment in any judgment, drew after it as incidental to it, the nomination of Clerk of the Peace, by reason of his possession and custody of the records. It is true, there is no mention of Clerk of the Peace, by that precise name, until some time after the statute, 12 Rich. 2, c. 10, which recognizes an officer as ministerial to the justices in the dis[199]charge of their duties at the sessions, under the denomination of their clerk. The clause to which I refer, is that which directs that every of the said justices shall take for their wages four shillings the day, for the time of their sessions, and then clerk two shillings; but I conceive there is nothing in that statute to negative the presumption, that the officer therein described as Clerk of the Justices of the Peace, or by abbreviating the expression, Clerk of the Peace, the same individual officer performing the same duties, is clearly designated.

Indeed in the 13th year of the reign of Hen. 1, the reign immediately succeeding that of Rich. 2, and within twenty years of the period of time, when the Crown had introduced into the commission of the peace, the name of an individual justice as the keeper of the rolls, I find the Clerk of the Peace described in the year books, 12 H. 1, p. 10, pl. 30, as Clerk of the Sessions of the Peace: for it is there stated, that at a gaol delivery in the castle of Sarum, one of the justices Hawkes, addressing himself to Horn, who was Clerk of the Sessions of the Peace, directed him to take down the name of the prisoner, who was not then indicted, that he might be enquired of at the next sessions of the peace.

I now proceed to the consideration of the question, whether there be not on the rolls of Parliament a direct legislative recognition of the rights of the Custos to appoint the Clerk of the Peace? and beg leave to refer to the statute, 37 H. 8.

In my humble judgment, the language of the statute is plainly declaratory of the right of the [200] Custos by law, to appoint to the office of Clerk of the Peace: nor can I conceive that the law officers of the Crown, whose duty it was to protect the rights and interests of his Majesty, would have permitted such a preamble to have stained the rolls of Parliament, unless they had regarded the recent grants, by his highness's letters patent, of the clerkship of the peace, as an encroachment and usurpation upon the ancient legitimate right of the Custos, to appoint by virtue of his office. The immediate occasion of passing that statute, will appear from the language of the preamble: "Whereas before this time, the Lord Chancellor, by reason of his office, hath had the nomination and appointment of Custos: and that in like manner, (that is, by reason of his office, and incident thereto) all and every person which had and enjoyed the said office of Custos, hath had until now of late, the nomination and appointment of Clerk of the Peace:" then it goes on to recite the mischiefs resulting from the nomination of persons not sufficiently learned to exercise the said offices, by reason whereof, indictments for felony and murder, and other offences and misdemeanors, and the process awarded upon them have not only been frustrate and void, sometimes by negligent engrossing, by the embezzling or rasure of the same indictments, but also sundry bargains and sales have also been void, for lack of sufficient enrolment of the same.

Some of the duties of Custos Rotulorum are here enumerated: viz. the drawing the indictments for felonies and other offences: the keeping of them, and the awarding of process upon the [201] same: and the enrolment of bargains and sales. That these duties extend as well to the proper making, as to the keeping of the records, cannot be disputed: for if the naked custody of them, without regard to their due entry and enrolment, were the only office required from the Custos or his agent, the lack of sufficient knowledge could not have been urged as the mischief which called for a remedy. From this act, therefore, I conceive the inference almost irresistible, that the Clerk of the Peace, had at all times, until recently before the passing of it, been appointed by the keeper of the records. In this opinion I am fortified by great authorities. Lambard, in commenting upon this statute, p. 378, after observing that the nomination and appointment of Clerk of the Peace, had long time belonged to the Custos Rotulorum, adds: "And this office was also for a time, given by the king's letters patent for the term of life, as that of the Custos was, until the second stat. of 37 H. 8. c. 1. recontinued the ancient order of giving it by the Custos Rotulorum only."

Is it possible for language to express, in terms more clear, appropriate, and forcible, the opinion entertained by this author, that this act was declaratory of the legitimate right of the Custos to appoint, and of his sense of the usurpation of the Crown? Eyres J. in the case of Harcourt v. For, as reported in Shower (1 Shower 518), in discussing the several provisions of the statute 37 H. 8. expresses his opinion, that it must be regarded as a declaratory law. He expresses himself in these [202] terms:—"From all which parts of this act so perused, I think it must be obvious to every man's understanding, that this act was but declarative of what the law was before the making of the act:" nor does it appear to me, that the argument of its being a declaratory law is at all weakened, or the right of the Custos to appoint the Clerk of the Peace in any manner impugned, by the fourth or fifth sections of the act: the first of which continued and confirmed all such as (being found when the act passed, in the actual possession of those offices) had derived their titles to them, under any letters patent or commission from the crown: and the last of which, the fifth section reserved to the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Durham, the Bishop of Ely, and every of their successors, the exercise of the same rights which they had been accustomed to enjoy.

The fourth section I think, can be regarded only as the confirmation of a suspicious and doubtful title. For if the king's right to appoint had been clear and unquestionable, where was the necessity of a special enactment to establish it? Nor does the view which I have taken of the character of this monarch, induce me to conclude that he would have condescended to compromise an acknowledged right in the Crown, upon terms of continuing the then present possessors in office for the period of their lives. As to the fifth section, I am not aware that any argument has been founded upon the construction of this clause unfavorable to the right of the Custos. Those jurisdictions are specially excepted from the general provisions of the act. They may, or may not, have originated in similar usurpations: [203] and it may have been thought expedient to confirm the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Durham, and the Bishop of Ely, and their successors, in the exercise of all the liberties and authorities, according as they had enjoyed the same, by the seal of a parliamentary enactment.

I cannot close my observations on this subject, without remarking, that although the reign of Henry 8, has been considered as a very distinguished era in the annals of our judicial history, yet the royal prerogative was then strained, more particularly in his latter years, to a very tyrannical height, and its encroachments sanctioned (to use the language of the elegant commentator on the laws of England) by those pusillanimous Parliaments, one of which, to its eternal disgrace, passed a statute, whereby it was enacted, that the king's proclamations should have the force of law.

I now propose to shew by cases strictly analogous, and by the opinions and judgments of the most eminent lawyers, formed after much consideration, that the appointments of the Clerk of the Peace may properly be regarded by law, as incident to the office of Custos. Mr. Justice Gregory, in Harcourt v. For (1 Shower 523), says, "I do not see but that the Clerk of the Peace, being an officer relating to the execution of the law, his office must be governed by those rules, which govern other offices of the like nature." I would, therefore adopt this mode of illustrating the subject, and refer to the several offices of Clerk of Assize, of the Shire Clerk in the County [204] Court of the Sheriff, of the Exigenter in the Court of Common Pleas, and the Clerk of the Pleas in the Court of King's Bench. I would apply the reasoning by which the right to appoint to those offices was sustained, and the principle to be extracted from them, namely, that law and reason require that the Custos should appoint, to the question I am called to answer.

To take first the office of clerk of assize: it is difficult to conceive two offices bearing a stronger resemblance to each other, than that of Clerk of Assize and Clerk of the Peace. The relation of Clerk of the Peace to the Justices at Sessions, is precisely the relation of Clerk of Assize to the Justices of Assize: they are the very indenture and counterpart, formed upon the same model, created by the same necessity, and discharging the same duties. By whom is the Clerk of Assize appointed? By the Justices of Assize. If it be said that the Justices of Assize derived their right to appoint from the provisions of the statute of Westminster, which transferred it to them from the Crown, I would answer that their right is laid in a deeper foundation, not in the statute, but in the common law. For, according to my Lord Coke, there exists a common law principle, which, without intrrenching upon the prerogative of the Crown, gives to the justices of the court, the right of appointing such officers as are necessary auxiliaries to them in the discharge of their judicial functions, and for whose qualifications and fidelity they are responsible. This principle is directly recognized by Lord Coke, in his commentaries upon the statute of Westminster 2; from which, according to his opinion, the [205] Judges of Assize had exercised the right, long before the existence of that statute. "Habeant de eorum omnes justiciarii de bancis in circuitibus suis clericos notulantes omnia placita eorum eis placitata, sicut antiquitus habere consueverunt (Statute of Westminster 2d, c. 30, 2 Inst. 425). Hereby it appeareth, that the justices of courts (generally) did ever appoint their clerks: as here it is put, for example, that the justices of the benches in their circuits, had clerks that enrolled all pleas pleaded in them, as anciently they used to have, i. e. by common law." In the next passage he reiterates and confirms the same position, that this branch of the statute declareth it to belong to the justices, and that they had enjoyed the same of ancient time, i. e. by common law. Here, then, is a studious disclaimer of the statute of Westminster, as being the origin of the right, and an anxiety manifested to prevent any misconception of his clear opinion, that the appointment did of right belong, and was incident to the common law. His reasons for this opinion appear to me conclusive, and his authorities incontrovertible: "and the reason thereof is twofold: first, the law doth ever appoint those who have the greatest knowledge and skill;" secondly, he says, that the officers and clerks are but to enter, enrol, or effect that which the justices adjudge, award, or order: the insufficient doing whereof, maketh the proceeding erroneous; therefore the law (as it here appeareth) did appropriate to the justices, the making of their own clerks and officers, and so to proceed judicially by their own instruments; and this was the common law.

[206] "The king cannot grant the office of clerk of the shire or county clerk, (who is to enter judgments and proceedings in the county court) for that the making of the shire clerk belongeth to the sheriff of the common law; as in Mitton's case, it appeareth, et sic de ceteris, 4 Rep. 31." It appears that Queen Elizabeth, by patent, granted the office of county clerk to Mitton for life, and afterwards constituted Arthur Hopton, sheriff of Somerset, who interrupted Mitton, claiming the appointment as incident to his office of sheriff, and thereupon appointed a Clerk himself of the County Court. For Mitton, it was argued that the grant was good, because the County Court was the Queen's Court; and that the Queen might, in her own Court, appoint a clerk to enter the judgments and proceedings. Secondly, that A. H. who was made sheriff after the patent, could not avoid it, for the Sheriff held his office only at the will of the Queen, who might determine it at her pleasure, and the Queen had granted it to Mitton for life. Thirdly, precedents were shewn, by which it appeared that such offices had been granted by King Henry 8.

It was resolved by the two Chief Justices and all the Judges, nullo contradicente aut reluctante, that the patent was void in law; that the office of Sheriff was an ancient office, before the Conquest, of great trust and authority; and although the King appointed the Sheriff durante bene placito, yet he could not determine in part, nor abridge him of any thing incident or appurtenant to his office. "Resolved that the County Court, and the entering of all proceedings in it, are incidental to the office of Sheriff, and therefore cannot be [207] divided from it." And Scrogg's case, 2 Eliz. was cited. The Exigenter's case was referred to in Dyer 175, as to the third objection.

But for general answer to all objections, it was observed, that great inconvenience would ensue to sheriffs, who are great and ancient officers and ministers of justice, if such grants are valid. For that as well the entry of all proceedings in the same Court, as the custody of the entries and rolls thereof, do belong to the office of sheriff; and if the record be embezzled, the sheriff shall answer for it; and therefore it would be full of danger and damage to sheriffs, if others should be appointed to keep the entries and rolls of the County Court, and yet the sheriff should answer for them; and therefore the sheriff shall appoint clerks under him in his County Court, for whom he shall answer at his peril. And law and reason require that the sheriff, who is a public officer and minister of justice, and who has an office of such eminence, confidence, peril, and charge, ought to have all right appertaining to his office, and to be favored in law. This is illustrated by the case of gaols: the custody of which of right belongs, and is incident to the office of sheriff, who must answer for excesses.

Mitton's case recognizes, and was decided upon principles directly applicable to the case of the Custos Rotulorum; for it does not appear, either from the argument of counsel, or from the judgment of the Court, that the right of the sheriff, although a very ancient officer, existing before the conquest, was founded on prescription, but on the fact of his being the actual keeper of the rolls and entries of the Court, for which he was re-[208]-sponsible; and when it is remembered that the sheriff exercised a criminal jurisdiction, the sheriff's clerk might with propriety be considered as much the Attorney-General of the King, in joining issues for the Crown, as the Clerk of the Peace.

In addition to those cases of the Clerk of Assize, and the Clerk of the Sheriff's Court, which appear to be strictly analogous, I would mention the Exigenter's case, Scroggs v. Colleshill (Dyer qui supra), for the principle on which it was decided; viz. that the title of Colleshill was null, and that the gift of the office at no time belonged to the Queen, but was at the disposal of the Chief Justice, for the time being.

as an inseparable incident belonging to him, and this by reason of prescription and usage. In 1558, Queen Mary, during the vacancy of the office of Exigenter, and of Chief Justice of the Common Bench, granted the Exigenter's office by patent to Colleshill: she afterwards, by patent of same date, granted the office of Chief Justice to Browne, who refused to admit Colleshill, and appointed Scroggs. Sir Nicholas Bacon was commanded by the Queen, to examine the right and title of Colleshill, and to report. He convened all the Judges of the Queen's Bench: Saunders, Chief Baron and Gerard, Attorney-General, and Caril, Attorney of the Duchy, (all the Judges of the Common Pleas excluded) who took a clear resolution that the title of Colleshill was null, and that the gift of the office at no time belonged to the Queen, but was at the disposal of the Chief Justice, for the time being, as an inseparable incident belonging to the said Chief Justice: and this by reason of prescription and usage. Dyer, [209] after citing the words of the statute of Westminster 2d, Habeant de cetero omnia placita eorum eis, concludes with these words: "And so it seems in reason that the justices were before the clerks, and made clerks at their pleasure."

To this may be added, the case of Bridgman v. Holt (Shower's Parl. Ca. 111), where the question was, whether the office of Clerk of the Pleas in the King's Bench, was grantable by the Crown, or belonged to the Chief Justice, and was granted by him? This officer was to enrol pleas between party and party only, having nothing to do with any pleas of the Crown. All the rolls and records in this office, were in the custody of the Chief Justice. All writs to certify and remove the records, were directed to the Chief Justice. From the nature of the employment, it was insisted, that in truth he was but the Chief Justice's Clerk: and further, it was shewn that for two hundred and thirty-five years, the office when void, had been granted by the Chief Justice, and enjoyed accordingly under such grants: and that in those grants were introduced these words, after the mention of the surrender to the Chief Justice:—"To whom of right it doth belong to grant that office whensoever it shall be void." This declaration by the party claiming to appoint is weak, when compared with the strong legislative recital of the right of the Custos to appoint, in the preamble of the statute of 37 H. 8.

In addition to these authorities, the case of Harcourt v. For, to which I already have had frequent occasion to refer, should never be lost sight of. It is true, the question there to be decided was, whether upon the construction of [210] the several acts of 37 H. 8, and the 1st of William and Mary, the office of Clerk of the Peace, determined by the death or removal of the Custos; or whether being appointed, he did not acquire under the statutes, an interest quandiu se bene gesserit!

In the decision of that question, which arose within five years after the passing of the act, it became an essential part of the enquiry, to ascertain the origin and nature of the respective offices of Custos Rotulorum and Clerk of the Peace. I cannot therefore consider the opinions delivered by Lord Holt, and the other Judges, upon this branch of the subject, as obiter and extra-judicial dicta, but bearing pertinently and directly on the point. And although it was insinuated that Lord Holt's mind had insensibly contracted a bias, from his connection with one of the litigant parties in another cause, unfavorable to the pure administration of justice, yet I am persuaded, that his spotless integrity, and high judicial character with the present age, and with posterity, will afford him an ample shield against so severe and undeserved an imputation.

The case of Saunders v. Owen (Raymond's Rep. and Salkeld qua supra) followed soon afterwards, which establishes the same principles. The Court held that it always belonged to the Custos Rotulorum to nominate the Clerk of the Peace, but that he was removable whenever the Custos was removed or changed: and moreover, that he was removable at the will of the Custos, until 37 Hen. 8, which continued him in office quousque, the Custos continued, so that he de [211] deemed himself in his said office justly and honestly.

The point therefore for decision was, whether the nomination by parol was sufficient, or whether it required an appointment by deed? But I am not aware that there was any dissatisfaction expressed at the decision of Lord Holt, in Harcourt v. For, which was afterwards affirmed in the House of Lords: and under these circumstances, after a careful examination of the origin (as far as I have been able to trace it) of the respective offices of Custos Rotulorum and Clerk of the Peace, and of vicea duties, as arising out of and connected with the commission of the peace; from the legislative declaration, and recognition of the right of the Custos Rotulorum to appoint, which, as it appears to me, is to be found on the rolls of Parliament (statute 37 Hen. 8), and from the accumulated weight and authority of the cases to which I have referred as analogous, and the principles to be extracted from them, my mind (with great deference to the opinion of others, from whom it may be my misfortune to differ) has arrived at the conclusion, that the appointment of the office of Clerk of the Peace within the shires of England, did, by law, previously to the passing of the act of 37 Hen. 8, belong of right to the Custos Rotulorum of the shire, by virtue of his said office.

To the second question, whether the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the shires of Ireland did by law, in and previously to the year 1800, belong of right to the Crown, or to the Custos Rotulorum of the shire, by [212] virtue of his said office, or to any and what other person or persons? I answer that I conceive it to have belonged of right to the Custos Rotulorum of the shire, by virtue of his office.

As early as the reign of King John, a regular code or charter of English laws was granted by that monarch, about the twelfth year of his reign, and deposited in the Exchequer of Dublin, under the king's seal, for the common benefit of the land, (as the public records express it) that is, for the common benefit of all who should acknowledge allegiance to the Crown; and for the regular and effectual execution of those laws, the king's four Courts of judicature were established upon the model of the four superior Courts of England; and a new and more ample division was then made of the king's lands of Ireland into counties, in which sheriffs and other officers were appointed, in accordance with the system of government prevailing in England. If then the office of Clerk of the Peace was incident to the office of Custos Rotulorum in England, it seems to me to follow as a necessary natural consequence, that the same rule must hold in Ireland: the nature of those several offices and the duties required in relation to them being the same in both countries. The various Irish acts of Parliament referred to (13 and 14 G. 3, c. 26; 23 and 24 G. 3, c. 39, 40; 35 G. 3, c. 29; 34 G. 3, c. 25; 40 G. 3, c. 80), directing documents to be deposited by the Clerks of the Peace, among the records of their respective counties, and requiring them to give attested copies, appear to me strong legislative recognitions, that [213] the appointment of the office of Clerk of the Peace in Ireland is incidental to the office of Custos. The act passed so recently as 1 G. 4, c. 27, which gives the Clerk of the Peace right to hold the office quamdiu se bene gesserit, shews that before that time, the appointment of Clerk of the Peace was determined by the death or removal of the Custos who appointed, and therefore furnishes a strong inference that the appointment of Clerk of the Peace in Ireland, was, by law, incident to the office of Custos before the union.

By the cases also that have been decided in Ireland, of the King v. Fergusson, and the King v. Severney and Falkiner (post, p. 216), this seems to have been received, declared, and acted upon, as the law of that country.

To the third question, whether the right to appoint to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the king's county in Ireland, did, by law, in and previously to the year 1800, belong to the Crown, or to the Custos Rotulorum of the said shire, by virtue of his said office, or, etc.? I also answer, that the right to appoint to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the king's county in Ireland, did, by law, in and previously to the year 1800, belong to the Custos Rotulorum of the said shire, by virtue of his said office.

The frame of this question, has not failed to draw my attention to the consideration of any distinction, which the historical fact, that the king's county was not formed into a county until the 3d and 4th year of the reign of Philip and Mary, in the year 1556, might naturally suggest.

I do not, however, apprehend that this circum-[214]-stance can in any manner vary the question, having taken occasion to state in the most distinct and unqualified terms, that neither in England nor in Ireland can the right of the Custos to nominate the Clerk of the Peace be maintained upon the ground of prescription: the office of Custos Rotulorum and of Clerk of the Peace in both countries, and the very county also in Ireland to which this question more directly applies, being each and every of them created and existing only within the time of legal memory.

But the moment in which the king's county became a county, however recent its formation, I conceive that the right to appoint a Clerk of the Peace, upon the principle, and for the reasons I have before stated, as applicable to England, became eo instanti indispensably incident to the office of Custos Rotulorum in Ireland, there being no provision in the statute of Philip and Mary to alter the law in this respect.

Being formed upon the model of other counties, with similar officers, such as Custos Rotulorum, sheriffs, etc., their appointment would be regulated and controlled by the same laws which prevailed in the government of those counties.

When, in the reign of Henry 8, the shire of Monmouth was created by a severance and divisions of the Lordships and marches within the country or dominion of Wales, and by a union and annexation of certain portions of them thenceforth, by legislative enactment, became part and member of the new shire of Monmouth, with a Custos, sheriff, and other officers, I conceive that to the sheriff belonged the right of [215] appointing the shire clerk of the County Court, and to the Custos Rotulorum the right of appointing the Clerk of the Peace, as incident to his office, in the same manner as in the most ancient counties in this realm.

Conceiving therefore the decision of this last question to depend upon the same principles, in the explanation and development of which, I fear that I have drawn but too largely upon your Lordships' patient attention, in my discussion of the merits of the first question, I conclude with expressing my humble opinion, that the right to appoint to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the king's county in Ireland, did, by law, in and previously to the year 1800, belong to the Custos Rotulorum of the said shire, by virtue of his said office.

Gaslee, J.: As I have reason to believe that all my learned brethren who are now present, with the exception of one, will concur in the answer which has been given by my learned brother who has preceded me, to the several questions propounded by your Lordships; and as he has entered so fully and ably into the investigation of the grounds and reasons, on which he has founded those answers; I think it is not only unnecessary, but that it would be an inexcusable waste of your Lordships' time, were I to enter into any lengthened discussion upon the present occasion. I shall, therefore, content myself with saying generally upon the first of the questions, that it appears to me clearly, that the act of Parliament referred to in this case, is a declaratory act; and that upon an attentive consideration of that act, and the several authorities which have [216] been cited and commented upon by my learned brother, I am of opinion, that the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the shires of England, did, by law, previously to the passing of the act of 37 Hen. 8, c. 1, belong of right to the Custos Rotulorum of the shire, by virtue of his said office.

Upon the second question, in the absence of any means of ascertaining precisely the course adopted upon the introduction of the sessions, and of the office of Custos Rotulorum, and Clerk of the Peace into Ireland, the natural presumption is, that it would be that which had been pursued in England. But it does not rest on presumption only. The two cases of the King v. Ferguson, and the King v. the Justices of the Peace, of the county of Tipperary, and Frederick Falkner the Clerk of the Peace in the said county (cited in the appendix to the case of the Plaintiff in error), appear to me to be decisive, and to be in support of the rights of the Custos Rotulorum. It is observable, that the grant under which the Defendant in error claims, which is a grant of the office of Clerk of the Peace of the whole province of Leinster, of which the county of Longford, and also the king's county, are members, (except Kilkenny) is dated the 30th July, 1798, and that seven months after the date of that grant, the right of Ferguson to the office of Clerk of the Peace for the county of Longford was established. I am therefore of opinion, that the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the shires of Ireland, did, by law, in and previously to the year 1800, belong of right to the Custos [217] Rotulorum of the shire, by virtue of his said office.

Upon the third question, I do not see any sufficient ground for making a distinction between the king's county and the other shires of Ireland. The act of Parliament constituting the king's county, does not recite any. The clause is very short; it enacts "That certain portions of land therein described, shall be one shire or county, named, known, and called the king's county, and shall be taken, reputed, and used as a county or shire, to all purposes whatsoever." It goes on to add that "there shall be appointed, ordained, and made within the said county or shire, for the rule thereof and good order of things, three sheriffs, coroner, escheators, clerk of the market, and other officers, and ministers of justice, yearly, as in other the shires or counties of this realm of Ireland be, or should be." It might, perhaps, be sufficient to say, that the Clerk of the Peace is one of the officers and ministers of justice; but in addition to that, I would refer to the case of the county of Monmouth, as strictly analogous to the present. The statute making that an English county, says nothing of a Custos Rotulorum, yet he is appointed, and appoints the Clerk of the Peace, in the same manner as is done in other English counties. It is made an English county by the 27th Hen. 8, c. 26. I do not find that there was any Custos Rotulorum of any of the Welsh counties, until after that period. The 27th Hen. 8, c. 5, authorises the making Justices of the Peace within Chester and Wales. By 34 and 35 Hen. 8, c. 26, intituled an act for certain ordinances in [218] the king's dominion, and principality of Wales, reciting that there were twelve shires in Wales, eight old ones and four new, by 27 Hen. 6, besides Monmouth; it enacts (section 53) "that in each of the twelve shires there shall be Justices of the Peace and Quorum, and also one Custos Rotulorum; that the said Justices of the Peace, Justices of Quorum, and Custos Rotulorum, shall be named and appointed by the Chancellor of England, by commission under the king's great seal of England," taking no notice of the Clerk of the Peace, who, I believe, is constantly appointed by the Custos Rotulorum, as in the English counties.

With respect to any objection which may be made, on account of the length of time, during which, it appears by this case, that the Crown have actually appointed the Clerk of the Peace in the king's county, I would merely observe, that in the case of the King v. Falkener, it appeared that the Crown had appointed the Clerk of the Peace for the county of Tipperary, for a very considerable period after the act of Parliament, which abolished the appointment in the Duke of Ormond, though not so long as the Crown appointed the Clerk of the Peace for this county; but notwithstanding that, the appointment was held to be in the Custos Rotulorum.

On these grounds, I state it to your Lordships, as my humble opinion, that the right to appoint to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the king's county in Ireland, did, by law, in and previously to the year 1800, belong to the Custos Rotulorum of the said shire, by virtue of his said office.

[219] Bayley, J.: I regret extremely, that I cannot bring myself to concur in the opinion, which the other Judges have formed in this case. The first question proposed by your Lordships to our consideration is this: Whether the appointment to the office of Clerk of the Peace within the shires of England, did, by law, previously to the passing of the act of 37 Hen. 8, c. 1, belong of right to the Crown, or to the Custos Rotulorum of the shire, by virtue of his said office, or to any and to what other person or persons? I have the misfortune to think it of right belonged to the Crown, if the Crown reserved it to itself; that it belonged to any other person or persons, (at least if named in the commission of the peace) upon whom the Crown chose to confer it, if the Crown thought fit to give it away; or that if the Crown did not think fit to reserve or confer it, it belonged of right to the Justices at large in Quarter Sessions assembled. Your Lordships' question appears to me, to propose as a mere point of law, to whom by law the right belonged; and my answer is framed upon that view of the question. I do not say, therefore, that the Crown did not in fact confer this right upon the Custos Rotulorum; all I say is, that unless it did so confer it, the Custos has it not.

The Courts of Sessions of the Peace originated, I apprehend, in the reign of Edw. 3, and were founded upon commissions issued in pursuance either of 18 Edw. 3, stat. 2, c. 1, or of 34 Edw. 3, c. 1. The former of those statutes provides, that two or three of the best reputation in the counties, shall be assigned keepers of the peace by the king's commission, and at what time need [220] shall be, the same with other wise and learned in the law, shall be assigned by the king's commission, to hear and determine felonies and trespasses done against the peace in the same counties. The 34 Edw. 3, c. 1, directs that in every county of England shall be assigned for keeping the peace one Lord, (une Seigneur) and with him three or four of the most worthy in the county, with some learned in the law, with power to hear and determine at the king's suit, all manner of trespass done in the same county. Both these statutes are silent as to the officers and the constitution of the Court. Then, as it seems to me, a question of law arises, what could legally be done? and secondly, a question of fact, what was done? Where the Crown erects a Court of Justice of its own authority, it may, I apprehend, fix and nominate what officers it shall have, and how their successors shall be appointed; and I take it, it has the same power, where it creates a Court of Justice under the direction of Parliament; unless there be something in the act of Parliament, from which a contrary intention in the legislature may be collected; the legal presumption appears to me to be, that the legislature will break in as little as possible upon the prerogative of the Crown; and that what it does not by express words, or by necessary implication take away, it leaves in the Crown. Upon the establishment of this Court, therefore, the Crown might if it thought fit, appoint one of the Justices to be Custos Rotulorum, or it might omit it. It might name a Clerk of the Peace, or reserve to itself the future right of nominating the successors; or it might omit to name him, and be silent as to the [221] office; and then the Sessions would have the right, as incident to their being a Court to decide upon having such an officer; and the right to appoint him would either be in the Sessions, if the Crown made no other provision as to the appointment of officers, or in such other person or persons on whom the Crown had conferred the right. And whatever the Crown might do in the first instance, would either be variable upon future occasions or not. In the former case, the Crown might resume to itself the right when it thought fit; in the latter, the nomination and appointment could not have belonged to the Custos Rotulorum, unless he had been appointed ab initio.

Lambard, in his Eirenarcha, intimates, that there was extant in his time, one of the commissions granted in the 35th Edw. 3. and if we could discover the commissions granted at that time, and could be satisfied that the commissions for the different counties were uniform, and all of the same tenor, they might throw great light upon the question, as a question of fact, though they could not be admitted in argument upon the question of law. Suppose those commissions to have been silent as to the Custos, and to have reserved to the Crown the right of appointing a Clerk to the Justices, can there be a doubt but that such right would have been well reserved? Suppose the commissions to have nominated a Custos, and to have given him the power pro hac vice, to nominate the Clerk of the Peace, would not that have been a valid gift, and would it have been valid for more than that turn? Would it not equally have been valid, had the nomination been given to the Jus-[222]tices at large, though it had appointed one in particular to be Custos Rotulorum? Suppose it to have nominated no Custos, and to have been silent as to the Clerk of the Peace, would not the Justices in Sessions, that is the Court, have had the power to nominate such Clerk? Such power according to Rolle (Abridgement, 426, Court F.), is incident to every Court. Suppose the commissions for different counties to have varied, or suppose them to have varied at different times, what would then have been the case? That they did vary as to the county palatine of Lancaster is clear, from the exception in the statute of William and Mary (1 William and Mary, stat. 1, c. 21), and from the modern practice; that they varied as to other places, may be collected from the exception in the statute of Hen. 8 (37 Hen. 8, c. 1, s. 5). In Durham at present, the Bishop is his own Custos. The provisions in the statutes of Hen. 8, and Edw. 6 (37 Hen. 8, c. 3 and 4, and Edw. 6, c. 1, s. 5), shew that he may make another person so; but he appoints the Clerk of the Peace for the county, without noticing his own character as Custos Rotulorum; and his grant of the office is confirmed by the Dean and Chapter of Durham. In Lancashire, Lord Derby is appointed Custos Rotulorum by the king, under the seals of the duchy and county palatine of Lancaster, and Lord Clarendon is appointed Clerk of the Peace, under the same seals; and the instrument so far from containing any expression that he is the deputy to the Custos Rotulorum, distinctly enjoins the Custos Rotulorum to permit him to exercise his office, [223] without impediment, hindrance, molestation, interruption, or denial. Let me press upon your consideration, the argument which arises from the practice in Lancashire, and other privileged places. The statute 34 Edw. 3, applies to every county in England, Lancaster therefore is included; and what is the case in the other counties in England, must be the case there. If the Custos had ex officio as matter of law, the right in every county in England before the 37 Hen. 8, he must have had it there. If the king were precluded from nominating in ordinary counties, he must have been precluded there. If it would have been illegal elsewhere, it would have been equally so there (4 Institute 204). It was not until the 50 Edw. 3, that the county of Lancaster was erected into a county palatine in Parliament. The practice, therefore, even if it be confined to Lancashire alone, seems to establish the point, that this is a question of fact, not matter of law. If the early commissions passed immediately after the 34 Edw. 3, were before your eyes, and you were to find that many of them sanctioned the same practice as has prevailed in Lancashire, would this have no influence upon your judgment? Would it not be the foundation on which you would act?

The argument that we are at liberty to decide as matter of law, upon the right of the Custos Rotulorum to nominate, is founded on the recital in the 37 Hen. 8, cap. 1, on Lord Coke's comment (2 Institute 425) on the statute (13 Edw. 1, st. 1, c. 2) of Westminster 2, and on the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Holt in Harcourt v. For. [224]-court v. For. The recital in 37 Hen. 8, cap. 1, is that "where before this time, the Lord Chancellor hath by reason of his office, the nomination and appointment of the Custos Rotulorum; and in like manner, the Custos Rotulorum hath had until now of late, the nomination and appointment of the Clerk of the Peace, within the shire where he was Custos Rotulorum; and where now of late, sundry persons not learned, nor meet, nor able for lack of knowledge to occupy the said offices of Custos Rotulorum and Clerk of the Peace, have by labour, friendship, and means, gotten grants by the king's letter patents, of the said clerkships of the peace;" and upon this it enacts that every Custos shall nominate the Clerk of the Peace within his shire; and the Custos and Clerk of the Peace shall execute the said offices by themselves or by sufficient and able deputy. This recital that the Custos till of late hath had the nomination, may, as it seems to me, refer to the practice as matter of fact, without referring to the right as matter of law. The recital does not state that of right he hath had, but states the fact only, that he has had; and the statute does not declare and enact, but enacts only; and it does not from beginning to end, insinuate that the patents of the Clerks of the Peace were illegal, or the grants void: on the contrary, it confirms the persons then in office, in their respective offices. If it were referring to the right as matter of law, it would, as it seems to me, go too far, and mistake the right; as the right, unless there were something to shew the contrary, would be in the Sessions, not in the Custos. I admit Lord Holt's opinion in Harcourt v. For. is very strong, that [225] the right of nominating the Clerk of the Peace belongs to the Custos Rotulorum of common right, by the common law of the land; but that was not the point in judgment: it was incidental to the case under consideration. None of the other judges concur with him, and his conclusion is, "So that now having as well as I can, given an account of the nature of the office of Custos, and the reason of his having the nomination of the Clerk of the Peace, I shall now give my particular reasons, upon which I ground my judgment in this case."

I am aware that one of the main foundations for his opinion is, that the Clerk of the Peace must be trusted with the possession of the rolls, to make entries upon, and that the Custos Rotulorum would be answerable to the king and to the subject, in case of their loss; and that it would be the most unreasonable thing in the world, that the Custos Rotulorum should be answerable for such miscarriage, unless he had the appointment. But the answer to that argument is, that if the Clerk of the Peace has the possession of the rolls, not as deputy to the Custos, but as the officer of the Court, the Custos would not be answerable to the king or to the public, in case of their loss or destruction, whilst they remained necessarily in the hands of the Clerk of the Peace; and as to the notion of unreasonableness, that objection has applied at all times, as to the county palatine of Lancaster; and it has applied in every county in England, since the 1st William and Mary, where a new Custos Rotulorum has been appointed in the lifetime of a preceding Clerk of the Peace, and it applied to the very [226] case they were then deciding, for the decision was that the old Clerk of the Peace was entitled to continue, though the Custos who appointed him was removed, and a new Custos appointed.

Another argument he relies upon, is drawn from the practice as to the Clerk of Assize and the County Clerk in Mitton's case, and the reasons given in 2d Institute 425, for that practice: but both those offices are considered in 2d Institute, as having existed before time of legal memory, and the Crown may be excluded by time, from interfering as to ancient offices, though it is not prevented from interfering as to offices created within time of legal memory. It may be observed too, that Lord Holt speaks of the possession of the rolls by the Custos, as possession of them by all the justices (1 Show. Rep. 528), that he speaks of the Custos Rotulorum as the senior of the justices in Court.

It may be of some service, if I shortly notice how this power was treated by the counsel in argument, and by the other judges, and how it was again treated, when another opportunity occurred. Sir T. Powys argued that anciently the Custos was in the nomination of the Lord Keeper, and as anciently, the nomination of the Clerk of the Peace in the Custos, but that the Clerk of the Peace was not the Clerk of the Custos, but of all the justices in general, and properly the Clerk of the Sessions (Id. 429). Mr. Hawler who argued for the Defendant says, that the statute of Edw. 3. makes no mention of such an office, but it was an incident. Justices would not make and draw out their own records, and in all probability, he who [227] is called in the statute of 3 Rich. 2. their clerk, was appointed by the justices, to do that work for them. He supposed that the Clerk of the Peace was at first the keeper of the records, but afterwards he that was most eminent among the justices was appointed Custos, and he appointed the Clerk of the Peace, his deputy or servant (1 Show. P. C. 159). Levinz, who was for the Plaintiff, upon the second argument says, "Should I go about to enquire into the origin of the office of Custos, I should attempt ambulare in tenebris" (1 Show. Rep. 512). As to the office of Clerk of the Peace, he says, "I cannot say how it was before the statute of Hen. 8. etc. Before there were justices, there were conservators, and it is likely they had their clerk to do their business, and keep their records; and it is likely this officer was in imitation of that, but I cannot directly tell how things might be, for this matter is all in nubibus" (Id. 513). Justice Eyre says, "We are I confess much in the dark, as to the beginning of the office of Clerk of the Peace; but the statute of William and Mary (1 W. and M. (s. 1) c. 24) takes him wholly out of the power of the Custos, and subjects him to another jurisdiction, that is to the Sessions of the Peace, to which he is properly an attendant" (Id. 519). Mr. Justice Gregory notices that in 2 Hen. 7. fo. 1 (the Year Book, pl. 2), he is called not only Clerk of the Peace, but attornatus domini regis, and that says he, is a proper name of office for him: for he draws the issues upon traverses, and so acts as attorney in that Court for the king (Id. 523). Mr. Justice Dollen is silent as to these points; [228] and it is by Lord Chief Justice Holt, and by him only, that they are principally discussed.

These opinions were delivered in Trinity Term, 5 William and Mary. None of the other reporters of this case give the detailed account of Lord Holt's argument. One of the reports (1 Modern 172) unites all the arguments of the Court, and puts it thus: "As to the beginning of this office, we are much in the dark, for we can only make probable conjectures about it, and as to his continuance in office, it is not to be collected out of any of the law books before 37 Hen. 8. It is plain it was not an office from time immemorial, because the commission of the peace is not so. Afterwards it became necessary for one to make entries and join issues: the Custos appointed a Clerk for that purpose, who is now called the Clerk of the Peace; and this seems very agreeable to the statute of Westminster, by which it appears, that such officers and clerks who are to enter and enrol the pleas, were always appointed by the judge or chief minister of the Court." Comberbach (Rep. 240) only says the nomination of the Clerk of the Peace belonged to the Custos, as the most proper person.

Within five years, namely in Hilary Term, 8th and 9th William 3. whilst the opinion of Lord Holt must have been within the recollection of every judge in Westminster Hall, a question as to the office of Clerk of the Peace again arose in Owen v. Saunders (1 Lord Raymond 158), and Harcourt v. Ear was expressly referred to. The question was, whether under the statute of 1 William and Mary, a nomination [229] by the Custos Rotulorum to the office of Clerk of the Peace by parol was good? and Mr. Justice Powell, a lawyer of no mean talent and acquirements, said, "It had been objected that this Clerk of the Peace was originally but a deputy to the Custos Rotulorum, and therefore not properly an officer. But he was of opinion that he is, and was originally an officer, and not merely a deputy to the Custos Rotulorum. The statute 12, Rich. 2. cap. 10, appoints him wages, and there he is called Clerk of the Justices of the Peace, and he is in the nature of Attorney General to the king. In 2 Hen. 7, c. 1, he is called the Clerk of the Peace" (L. Raym. 139). Lord Chief Justice Treby said, the origin of this office of Custos Rotulorum is not very clear, but in all probability the trust of the conservation of the rolls was committed to one of the justices, and then he was called Custos Rotulorum, and probably by the consent of his brethren (13 Hen. 4, cap. 10, plac. 33), he nominated the Clerk of the Peace (Id. 163). In 12 Rich. 2, cap. 10, he is called Clerk of the Justices, and wages are appointed. The statute 2, Henry 7, cap. 1, first makes mention of the Custos Rotulorum.

In this case Justice Powell almost goes out of his way, to state that the Clerk of the Peace is not a deputy to the Custos, but an original officer; and Lord Chief Justice Treby, notwithstanding the previous opinion of Lord Holt, intimates that the origin of the Custos Rotulorum was not very clear, and that instead of its belonging to the Custos Rotulorum of common right, and by the common law of the land, to nominate the Clerk of [230] the Peace, he probably nominated him by consent of his brethren. The charge of the Custos Rotulorum in the ordinary commissions of the peace, and the observations as to the duties at the Sessions of the Custos Rotulorum and the Clerk of the Peace, in Lambard's Eirenarchia, deserves attention. The earliest commission I have met with, is at the commencement of Herbert's Justice, in the edition of 1517, and at the conclusion it commands "John Fitzjames that at the days and places aforesaid, he cause to come, writs, precepts, processses, and indictments aforesaid, before himself and his said companions, and inspect and determine the same." In another edition of the same book, printed in 1606, there is a similar clause, except that it seems addressed to all the justices, and not to any one by name; but this may be a mistake in the text, because in the margin it is stated to be "al. Custos Rotulorum," and the same book, in the form of what is called "the new commission," contains this clause, "assignavimus denique te prefatum Edw. II. Militem, (not the person first named in the commission, for the officers of state are first named) Custodem R. pacis nostrae in dicto comitatu nostro, ac propterea tu ad dies et loca predicta breviter precepta, processus et indictamenta predicta coram te et dictis sociis tuis venire facias ut inspiciantur, et debito modo terminentur."

Lambard in his Eirenarchia, speaks of Sessions, and of the officers bound to attend, and among those one is the Custos Rotulorum, who is to attend in respect of his duties, and another for his own duties, separate and distinct from those of the Custos, the Clerk of the Peace. "Two [231] sorts of men there are, that are the ordinary attendants at these Sessions; that is the officers of the Court and the jurors. Among the officers, the Custos Rotulorum hath worthily the first place, both for that, he is always a justice of the quorum in the commission, and among them of the quorum, a man (for the most part) especially picked out for wisdom and credit; and yet in this behalf he beareth the person of an officer, and ought to attend, etc. for the words in the commission be to him now by his proper name: 'Quod ad dies et loca predicta breviter precepta, processus et indictamenta, predicta coram te et dictis sociis tuis venire facias.' Whereas until the 14 Richard the 2d, that charge was general to all justices, and not laid specially upon any one person in the commission, as it doth appear in the Tower by the records, which I have already vouched" (see Lambard 373, etc. printed in 1594).

By the commission in a county, the Custos Rotulorum ought to attend at the Sessions with records, etc. (Com. Dig. Justices of the Peace, D. 4). "The Clerk of the Peace oweth his attendance at the Sessions also, for (omitting certain things specified) he readeth the indictments, and serveth the Court. He enrolleth the acts of the Sessions, and draweth the process, etc. (He also must deliver letters to all such as be acquitted of felony, etc. :) all which things he cannot do if he be not present; so that he is an officer to this Court, and Clerk of the Justices, as the 12th of Richard the 2d, c. 10, nameth him, and not as Mr. Marrow thought the Clerk of the Custos Rotulorum only" (Id. 406, 7). And [232] this as it seems to me, is the true state of the case. The Custos Rotulorum, though one of the justices, is in respect of his custody of the rolls, to attend with the rolls in the Court; and the Clerk of the Peace, as a distinct officer of the Court, is to record upon such rolls, such acts of Court as are to be recorded; and when he has recorded them, it is his duty to hand them over to the Custos Rotulorum, that he may keep them in safe custody, though the Clerk is entitled to have them whilst in process. In Rex v. Evans (4 Mod. 31), the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Holt approaches this point, where he says the Clerk of the Peace is bound to deliver the rolls to the Custos when completed, though he is entitled to have them whilst in process. If there ever was a time when the rolls were in the custody of the justices at large, without any Custos Rotulorum, this would be the case; and I see no reason why it should not continue to be the case, where one justice in particular was selected to be Custos Rotulorum.

My opinion, therefore, is not negatively that the right of appointing is not with the Custos Rotulorum, not that the right is affirmatively either with the king or with the Quarter Sessions; but that the question with which of them it is, is matter of fact for the consideration of a jury; not matter of law for the decision of a Court: and with this view, the case of Bridgman v. Holt (Show, Parl. Ca. 115), and the state of the officers in the superior Courts exactly accord. In Bridgman v. Holt, the question was, whether the office of Clerk of the Pleas for enrolling pleas in the King's Bench, [233] was in the king or in the chief justice? The Defendant who claimed under the Chief Justice, proved a series of grants for a period of two hundred and thirty-five years, whenever the office became void. It was treated therefore as a question of fact, not as a question of law. And what is the state of the other officers of the superior Courts, and upon what principle is it to be explained? Why does the Chief Justice of the King's Bench appoint the Custos Brevium in the King's Bench, whilst the gift of the same office in the Common Pleas is not in the Chief Justice there, but in the king or his grantee? Why are the first and third prothonotaries in the Common Pleas in the gift of the Chief Justice, and the second in the Custos Brevium? Why does the king appoint the master of the Crown office in the King's Bench, and the chirographer in the Common Pleas? Why is the office of Exigenter in the Common Pleas an inseparable incident to the person of the Chief Justice, so that a grant thereof by the king, whilst the office of Chief Justice is vacant, is null and void? Why do the three puisne Judges of the King's Bench appoint the Signer of the Bills of Middlesex? All is referable to what is mentioned as the ground of the opinion in Scruggs v. Coleshill (Dyer 175), viz. prescription and usage; and what is the foundation of prescription and usage but a lost grant?

Upon the whole, therefore, I submit that the question in whom the right of appointing was in England before the 37 Henry 8, is matter of fact, [234] depending upon the commissions issued in the different counties in England, and the usages thereon; and that until such matter of fact is duly enquired into and ascertained, it cannot be answered as a question of law.

To the second question, as every observation I have made upon the first question, applies with equal force to the second, I humbly submit that it is also a question of fact, not a question of law, in whom the right in Ireland was.

The third question appears to me, to depend upon the point already noticed, viz. the right of the Crown in the commissions it first granted under the statute of Edw. 3, to reserve to itself the right of nominating to the office of Clerk of the Peace; for if the right existed when those commissions were granted, it seems to me to have existed as to this county, when a commission for this county was first granted. If the Crown had originally a right as to each county, to mould the machinery as it pleased, and to reserve to itself such nominations as it thought it behoved the public weal it should reserve, it must have had the same right as to this county, when first it became an object of consideration, as it had in every other. I am therefore of opinion upon the last question proposed by your Lordships, that the right of appointing the Clerk of the Peace in the king's county in Ireland, when the district that county comprises was first made a county, was in the Crown.

The other judges who were present concurred in the opinions delivered by Little Dale, J. Vaughan, B. and Gaschee, J.

[235] The Lord Chancellor: This is a writ of error from the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland. The question relates to the appointment of the Clerk of the Peace in the king's county in Ireland. It was contended on the one side, that the appointment of Clerk of the Peace of the king's county in Ireland was in the Crown; on the other hand it was contended, that it belonged to the Custos Rotulorum of the county. The Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland, was of opinion that the appointment belonged to the Crown.

A writ of error was brought, and it was argued in this House during the last Session of Parliament. It was a case of great importance, and all the judges were assembled for the purpose of hearing the arguments, in order that your Lordships might have the benefit of their advice and assistance with respect to the subject.

The learned judges differed in opinion, and they postponed, therefore, delivering their judgments till the present Session. That difference still continued; a great majority of the judges, however, were of opinion, that the right to that appointment was in the Custos Rotulorum of the king's county, one judge only dissenting. The opinions of the learned judges were delivered at great length in this House. I had an opportunity of attending to their reasonings at the time. I have since been favored with copies of their judgments, and have had an opportunity of again considering them; and without troubling you by going over the same arguments which have been already advanced upon the subject in great detail, it may be sufficient for me to state, that I am [236] satisfied that the decision of the Court below was erroneous, and that the appointment of this office is not in the Crown, but in the Custos Rotulorum. I am of that opinion upon the authorities that were cited by the learned judges, by which they fortified their opinions, and by the reasonings which they employed in support of their opinions. I therefore propose that the judgment of the Court below be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

ROBERT BLAKENEY and CATHERINE ANN BLAKENEY otherwise OWENS his Wife.—Appellants; THOMAS NEVILLE BAGOTT,—Respondent.

[Mews' Dig. vii. 241: viii. 774, 827: xiv. 1773, S. C. 1 Dow and Cl. 405.

See Butler v. Miller 1867, I. R. 1 Eq. 195.]

AN agreement for a Reversionary Lease having been obtained by an attorney from the son of his employer, who was remainder man in a settlement under which his father who had granted the existing Lease was tenant for life—On a bill for specific performance, the Court refused under the circumstances to enforce the agreement.

F. C. under a settlement executed in 1716 was tenant for life of certain lands, with a power to lease for any term not exceeding thirty-one years, remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male. In 1745 F. C. granted to S. O. who was then acting as his attorney, a lease of lands, comprising two hundred acres of good land, Irish plantation measure, for three lives or thirty-one years, whichever should last the longest. M. C. was the only son of F. C. In 1749 M. C. by a writing indorsed upon that part of the lease of 1745, which was in the possession of S. O. in consideration of £20, agreed to ratify that lease, and on the expiration of the term, to grant a renewal for a further term of lives, a blank being left in the agreement as to the number of lives. The agreement was not indorsed on the counterpart of the lease in the possession of F. C. and was not registered till June 1760. In May 1760 F. C. died, leaving M. C. surviving, who by deed in 1760, settled the lands in trust for himself for life; remainder to his two daughters as tenants in common. The Respondent became entitled to one moiety of the lands, as the only son of one of the daughters; and at a sale under a decree in Chancery in 1814, purchased the other moiety. At the time of the sale, it was mentioned that the lands were sold subject to the lease of 1745. S. O. died in 1780, leaving [238] S. L. O. who was the last surviving life in the lease of 1745, and held the lands under the lease till his death, which took place in 1817. The Appellants claimed as devisees of S. L. O. In 1820 the Appellants filed a bill in Chancery, stating the facts above mentioned, and praying a specific performance of the agreement to grant a renewal of the lease.

Held that under the circumstances, the Appellants were not entitled to such relief.

The facts of this case as stated upon the bill and answer, and appearing by proofs in the cause, are as follows:

By indenture of marriage settlement, bearing date the 19th of July, 1716, and made between Francis Cuff, of the first part; Henry Richardson, of the second part; John Maxwell, and Robert Maxwell, of the third part; Gerald Cuff, and Edward Lucas, of the fourth part; and Michael Cuff, and Samuel Warring, of the fifth part: reciting that a marriage was then intended to be had, between the said Francis Cuff and Catherine Richardson, one of the daughters of the said Henry Richardson, Francis Cuff for the considerations therein mentioned, granted to Michael Cuff and Samuel Warring, amongst other, the lands and premises of Ballaghinurry, Shanbellymore, and Gortneafaly, to hold to Michael Cuff and Samuel Warring, their heirs and assigns, to the use of Francis Cuff for life; remainder to the first and every other son of Francis Cuff on the body of Catherine Richardson, lawfully to be begotten: in tail male.

By this deed it was provided, that Francis Cuff should have full power to make leases of the [239] lands, or any part thereof, for any term not exceeding thirty-one years in possession and not in reversion, without any fine, and at the best improved rent.

Francis Cuff, by indenture of lease, bearing date the 15th of October, 1745, demised the lands comprising two hundred acres of good land, Irish plantation measure, to Samuel Owens, for three lives, or thirty-one years, which ever should last the longest, at a rent of £40 sterling yearly.

Samuel Owens at the time of obtaining the lease, resided upon the estate, and was at the time of the execution of the lease, the law agent and attorney of Francis Cuff.

By an indenture dated the 1st of February, 1749, and made between Francis Cuff and Michael Cuff, the only son and heir apparent of Francis, of the one part; and James Cuff of the other part: reciting the deed of the 19th of July, 1716, and particularly setting forth the leasing power reserved to Francis, under that deed, and that Francis Cuff was tenant for life. Francis and Michael, for the considerations therein mentioned, granted to James Cuff, his heirs and assigns, the several lands before mentioned, to hold upon the trusts therein mentioned, and among others to the use of Francis Cuff for life, with a power to charge £600 for younger children.

This deed was registered in May, 1750.

By article of agreement, dated the 11th of December, 1749, written on the back of the lease of the 15th of October, 1715, Michael Cuff, in consideration of £20 * paid to him by Samuel Owens, [240] covenanted to ratify the existing lease, and also to grant renewals to Samuel Owens, at the determination of the existing lease, for a further term of lives, a blank being left in the agreement as to the number of lives.

At the date of the execution of this agreement Samuel Owens continued to be the law agent of Francis, the father of Michael Cuff.

This agreement was registered on the 17th of June, 1760.

Francis Cuff remained in possession of the lands until the time of his death, in May 1760, when Michael Cuff, his son and heir at law, became entitled to the possession as a remainder man under the settlement.

Michael Cuff, by deed bearing date the 21st of July, 1760, after the birth of his only children, Catherine Ann, and Wilhelmina Cuff, conveyed the lands to Saint George Caulfield and James Cuff, Esq. in trust to the use of himself for life; remainder to his two daughters; to each, one undivided moiety as tenant in common, and thereby reserved to himself, and to every person to whom any estate of freehold was thereby limited, when in possession, and not in reversion, power to make leases not exceeding twenty-one years, at the best improved rent, without any fine. There was a saving in this deed, for all the leases and incumbrances then in being, and lawfully and justly made by Francis Cuff, and such as he had a good and lawful right to execute; but no mention was made of the lease of 1745, nor of the article endorsed thereon.

[241] This settlement was registered on the 23d July, 1760

* Of the sum paid there was no legal evidence; but it was assumed in the argument in the Court below, and stated in one of the reasons of the Appellant's printed case.

Michael Cuff died in the year 1763, leaving issue Catherine Ann, and Wilhelmina Cuff, who thereupon entered into, and became possessed of the lands.

By deed of settlement, bearing date the 13th of October, 1775, and made between Catherine Ann Cuff of the first part; Henry Upton, and Jane Ord, guardians of the said Catherine Ann, and Charles Walker of the second part; John Bagott of the third part; and Christopher Clarges and William Green of the fourth part; Catherine Ann Cuff, for the consideration therein mentioned, released to Christopher Clarges and William Green, her undivided moiety of the lands, upon the trusts therein expressed.

This deed was registered in the year 1775.

Upon the death of John Bagott and Catherine his wife, the father and mother of the Respondent he came into possession of their moiety of the lands, and the undivided moiety of the lands which belonged to Wilhelmina Cuff, were purchased by the Respondent at a sale in 1814, under a decree of the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

While the lands were held by Samuel Owens, under the lease of 1745, he also possessed himself of certain bogs and turbaries, the property of the Respondent, adjoining the lands.

Samuel Owens died in 1780, leaving Samuel Lea Owens, his nephew, who held the lands under the lease until his death, which happened in the year 1817.

Samuel Lea Owens was the surviving life in the lease of 1745, and upon his death, the Respondent [242] demanded possession of the lands from the occupying tenants, which they refused to give, alleging that they withheld such possession, by direction of the daughter of Samuel Lea Owens, who had intermarried with the Appellant, Robert Blakeney, and claimed as devisee of Samuel Lea Owens, to be entitled to a renewal thereof for lives, under the article indorsed on the lease of 1745.

On the Respondent's counterpart of the lease of 1745, there was no agreement or article indorsed.

At the sale before the Master, the lease of 1745, and the claim upon the article were stated, and Wilhelmina Cuff's moiety of the lands was sold subject to the lease, but no mention was made of the article in the abstract of the title; and there was no mention of the article in the master's notes, made at the time of the sale, nor in the deed which conveyed the moiety to the Respondent.

The greater part of the estate, of which the lands in question were part, were subject to a rent charge for ever of £40 per annum; and the part sold was subject to the moiety thereof.

On the 15th of December, 1820, the Appellants filed their bill in the Court of Chancery in Ireland, and thereby, amongst other things, stated the original lease, and the agreement for the renewal thereof for lives, and that they were entitled to the benefit of such renewal; and prayed that the agreement for renewal might be carried into specific execution, and that the Respondent might be compelled to execute to them, such draft of renewal, as might be approved of by one of the masters of the Court.

[243] The Respondent put in his answer to this bill, insisting on the several facts before stated, in bar of the relief sought by the bill. Issue having been joined in the cause, it was agreed that each party should be at liberty to read and give in evidence on the hearing of the cause, the matters in the consent mentioned, and witnesses having been examined on both sides, the cause was heard; and a decree pronounced on the 22d of June, 1825, whereby it was ordered and decreed that the Appellant's bill should be dismissed.

On the 9th of July, 1825, the Appellants preferred a petition to the Court, complaining that they were aggrieved by the decree, and praying that the cause might be reheard.

On this petition, an order was made that the cause should be reheard on the first rehearing day of the then next term; and the cause having been accordingly reheard on the 8th of December, 1825, and further reheard on the 26th of January, 1826, the Court on the 17th of February, 1826, pronounced judgment thereon, and ordered that the decree should be affirmed.

The appeal was presented against this decree and the order on rehearing.

For the Appellants, (the Plaintiffs in the suit), on the original hearing were read, by consent, copies of the memorials of the deed of 1745, and the agreement of 1749; and also depositions of a witness, who swore that the moiety of the lands subject to the lease, were sold subject to the lease and the agreement to renew, and a passage [244] from the further answer of the Defendant to the same effect.

For the Respondent, the Defendant in the suit, were read the settlement of 1716: Memorials of two deeds, one of settlement, to which Francis Cuff and Michael Cuff were parties, the other of mortgage, both dated in 1749, with indorsements shewing that Samuel Owens was the attorney of Francis Cuff: A patent for holding fairs and markets in Ballymore, with an indorsement in the hand writing of Samuel Owens,—“Owens, agent:” An account for news and advertisements, 1743-6, made out to Samuel Owens, and indorsed thus:—“Mr. Cuff paid me for news and advertisements:” A memorial of the settlement of 1760: Deposition and survey, proving that the lands in lease measured two hundred acres, arable and pasture, and thirty acres of bog: That arable and pasture were at the time of the survey, worth on an average twenty-five shillings an acre, and the bog half a crown an acre: Depositions proving the handwriting of Samuel Owens on the patent, and the account before mentioned, and that he was a practising attorney.

For the Appellants: Mr. Sugden and Mr. Pepys.

The question is, whether the whole is one instrument, and one equitable demise?

It appears by the settlement of 1716, that the lands were settled upon Francis Cuff for life, he having a power to lease for thirty-one years, with remainder to his issue male, which remainder vested in Michael Cuff.

[245] There is no proof that Owens was the law agent of Francis Cuff: and if it were proved, it would be immaterial, as Francis Cuff lived until May 1760, and never complained. But the question depends upon the agreement by Michael Cuff the son. There is no proof that Samuel Owens was the attorney of the son. The lease having exceeded the power, could not bind the son, except in so far as he confirmed it.

The father and son were dealing with the estate, and the son was induced to grant an extension of the lease, which was invalid.

The original lease with the indorsement was lost. It was in the possession of Kelly, a friend of the Respondent, who could not be forced to produce it. The expression in the memorial, “for the consideration therein mentioned,” after such length of time is no evidence. This is not the case of an heir expectant. It is incumbent on those who impeach the lease, to shew the want of consideration. The answer states a belief that £20 was the consideration. If this is the case of an heir expectant, he is dealing with his father. The rule of equity has never been applied to such a case. Goulard v. De Faria (17 Ves. 20; see Whalley v. Whalley, 3 Bligh's Rep. 1), is shaken as an authority on the doctrine of dealings with heirs expectant. The Courts now will not set aside a fair contract. It has been held that where the sale is by auction, the rule does not apply: so where the tenant for life and the remainder man join, the grant is not of a reversionary lease by an expectant heir. Here as it was preceded by the lease of 1715, and followed by the [246] deed of 1749, and the agreement of 1749, it must be considered as part of a family arrangement. Francis Cuff acquiesced till his death in 1760. Michael Cuff also acquiesced till 1760. Then a new right sprung up: a right to hold free from all incumbrances. All the parties acquiesced during their respective interests. The agreement is entire, and cannot be separated. It is a rule of equity, that that which is agreed to be done, shall be considered as done. The agreement therefore is a lease. It would be a fraud, if the Respondent were permitted now to refuse to execute a lease. The consideration goes to the whole agreement. If it is binding as to the lease of 1715, it must be equally so as to the agreement of 1749. Upon the purchase in 1811, there was direct notice of the agreement given to the purchaser.

The Respondent by his original answer, denies that he had notice of the agreement. By his farther answer, after exceptions allowed, he admits that the agreement by way of indorsement upon the lease was publicly stated.

The Lord Chancellor: And he goes on to say, that it was further stated that the agreement was fraudulently obtained.

Lord Manners: It was relied upon in the Court below, that if the Appellant was not entitled to the lease, at least, he was entitled to the £20 with interest.

For the Appellant: There is no evidence whatever that the consideration was £20 or any other sum. The agreement was entire, both parts standing on covenant equally.

On the death of Francis in 1760, the lessee held under the agreement of 1749, and not by [247] the lease of 1745, because it was void on the face of it. Since the death of Francis, the estate has belonged to Michael alone, and there has been acquiescence ever since.

The Lord Chancellor: If there is nothing appearing on the memorial, it may be that there were two distinct considerations, one for the confirmation of the lease, the other for the agreement to renew.

For the Appellant: That is not possible. The estate was held from 1760 to 1817, under acquiescence. Suppose the three lives had dropped early, and three new lives had been called for; it is probable that all the lives would have run out. If parties have a right to set aside an agreement, but acquiesce, a Court of equity will not relieve.

The settlement of 1760, and the exception of the leases, cannot affect the Appellants. They have nothing to do with that settlement, and it was voluntary.

No question was raised in the Court below on the point of uncertainty.

The question as to the £20 is put in issue by the answer; but there is no evidence to support the allegation. It is admitted by the answer, that there was possession, and payment of rent, under the lease.

As to the purchase in 1814, possession is in equity evidence of the interest of a party. Daniels v. Davison (16 Ves. 249). This rule applies in the case of collateral, a fortiori in case of direct notice. A purchaser buying property, takes it [248] subject to the engagements of the seller. The purchaser is bound to perform the covenants, and indemnify the seller.

Lord Manners: The question here is, whether the vendor is bound.

For the Appellant: The party bought subject to the lease and agreement to renew. For there was due notice of the incumbrance. Suppose Michael Cuff had been living, and sold subject to the lease of 1749: if the bill had been dismissed, the vendee might have brought an action. All the parties according to their successive interests, acquiesced in this, which is an entire agreement. The seller has concluded the purchaser, Walton v. Com. Stamford (2 Vern. 279). In McGuire v. Armstrong (2 Bull v. Beatty, 538), the purchaser was held a trustee for the seller: that is directly applicable to this case.

Lord Manners: I did not consider the case inconsistent: it is an equity between the seller and the purchaser, not giving a right to other parties.

For the Appellant: It turns him into a trustee for the seller. The Respondent comes here claiming the benefit he contracted, not to insist upon. He is to become a trustee for the seller, upon the consideration of having bought at an under-value. Suppose I buy an estate subject to bad leases, I know that they are impeachable by the party who sold. A party who buys an estate subject to an incumbrance, is bound to the full extent. The purchaser here bought subject to an agreement, Taylor v. Stibbert (2 Ves. J. 437), and Crofton v. Ormsby (2 S. and L. 604). If the purchaser were not bound, the original equity would revive against the seller.

[249] The Lord Chancellor: This part of the argument only goes to half.

For the Appellant: It goes to the whole: the claim is under a voluntary settlement as to one moiety, and for consideration as to the other. In the latter case there is notice: in the other they are bound without notice.

For the Respondent: Mr. Horne and Mr. Bligh.

The elaborate argument for the Appellants, proceeds upon an ingenious assumption of facts without proof, and bold inferences of law without authority. It is supposed for instance, that the instrument of contract is an actual demise, which is answered first by reference to the words of the instrument, and secondly by the proceeding of the Respondent. If the indorsement operates as a lease, his bill for the specific performance of a contract already performed according to the supposition is unnecessary. The argument then supposes that it is an equitable demise. How that differs from an unperformed contract is not suggested. Having assumed the fact that this is a lease, it is properly argued as a legal consequence, that it is for those who impeach it, to shew the want of consideration. This consequence is displaced, by shewing that the fact from which it is drawn, namely, that the instrument operates as a lease, is invented, and the premises being unfounded, the inference fails.

It is then assumed that this was a family arrangement, in which the father stipulated with the son, for a confirmation of the original lease, and the extension of it by the indorsed agreement; and upon this assumption, it is argued that in such a [250] case, where father and son being respectively tenant for life and remainder man in fee, join in a lease, it is not a dealing with an heir expectant for a reversionary lease. To this we answer, that the foundation of the argument is assumed. There is no proof of any family arrangement, of any dealing upon the subject, or that the father was even cognizant of the agreement. Such facts cannot be presumed; and the facts in proof lead to a contrary hypothesis; for the counterpart of the lease in the possession of the father, had no indorsement of the agreement, and the part which had the indorsement, was kept by Samuel Owens unregistered, until after the death of the father in 1760. The next hypothesis assumes, that the father acquiesced till his death, and the son till 1760. But in what did they acquiesce? not in the indorsed agreement. The father knew nothing of it, and the son could not remove Samuel Owens from the possession, while the original lease was subsisting, which, as the Appellants, and we admit, he confirmed by the indorsed agreement. The argument is inconsistent. If he confirmed the lease, how could he dispute the possession before the expiration of the lease? The acquiescence, if such it may be termed, was in the legal right of the lessee.

The son might indeed, before he signed the indorsement, have disputed the legality of the lease under the power, or he might have proceeded to set aside the agreement, on the ground of improvidence and inadequacy of consideration; and not having done so in due time, relief might have been refused after long delay, as to the original lease, in a suit where he was Plaintiff. But the agree-[251]ment to grant a new lease was distinct from the agreement to confirm the old one; and the right to a renewal did not arise until the falling of the last life in the lease. It was then time enough to dispute that part of the agreement. It is said that on the death of the father, as he had exceeded his power in granting the lease, a new right sprung up in the son, to hold free from all incumbrances; but this is inconsistent with the assertion as to family arrangement, and the confirmation of the lease by the son. Sometimes it is supposed in the argument, that there is no proof of any consideration; if so, the case of the Plaintiff must fail: for he comes to a Court of Equity to enforce an agreement without consideration. But then it is argued, that the consideration being indivisible, the agreement is entire, and incapable of being severed; and that on the death of the father, the lease being void, the lessee held under the agreement or demise, as it is called. But if the son had proceeded by ejectment on the father's death, might not the lessee, supposing his conduct fair, have had relief in equity on that part of the agreement, which operated as a confirmation of the lease, postponing or waiving the other part of the agreement?

As to the argument derived from the notice given of the agreement at the auction, that moiety of the estate was put up to sale by an incumbrancer; but in any case, that notice could only operate to relieve the vendor from any subsequent question or caveat, as to an agreement, which in the same notice was stated to be invalid. Could such a notice have the effect to set up an agreement unfairly obtained, and unavailable in [252] equity? If notice of a disputed claim turns, as it has been argued, the purchaser into a trustee for the claimant, then no estate with a limited title, can safely be brought to market. If the estate is sold absolutely subject to a lease or incumbrance, the purchaser is bound; so if the disputed claim turns out to be a fair one. That was the case in Taylor v. Stibbert. The fallacy of the argument lies in treating that as absolute, which is only a conditional engagement, not to insist on warranty. It is said that if the purchaser were not bound, the original equity would revive against the vendor. That original equity is now in question before the House on this appeal.

This is said not to be the case of an expectant heir bargaining for his reversion. It is, however, the case of a young man not in possession, but while he acquires the vesting of a remainder, granting a lease in reversion, for a mere nominal consideration, to the attorney of his father. Such being the respective characters of the parties to the contract, it was the peculiar duty of the attorney to preserve evidence. But over existed, of the fairness of the transaction. It is clear that Michael Cuff was in some way overreached or deceived. In the lease and the memorial, he is described as son and heir of the father, and the reversion is reserved to the father, his heirs and assigns. One of the lives named in the lease was that of Michael, so that as heir of his father, he could not by possibility have any benefit from the reversion. If, as from these facts it might be inferred, he was persuaded by the attorney that his father had absolute power over the property, the [253] consideration must have appeared ample under such persuasion.

The following authorities were cited, besides those stated in the argument:

Upon lapse of time—Bonny v. Ridgard, 1 Cox, 149; Moth v. Attwood, 5 Ves. 845; Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. 355; Lord Kensington v. Philipps, D. P. MSS. and 5 Dow. p. . . .; Scott v. Dunbar.*

[254] In the course of the argument, the following observations were made:

The Lord Chancellor: What acquiescence is there under the second part of the agreement! The agreement appears on the memorial to be severed into two parts. The consideration might be reasonable, so far as the confirmation of the lease goes, but bad as to the agreement for renewal.

Lord Eldon: It appears that the Appellant states in his case, that Francis Cuff was seized in fee: if that is not correct, it appears that then Francis Cuff was tenant for life: and that Michael gave the confirmation, and agreed for the new lease while his father was living.

What is the evidence that the agreement was in consideration of a sum of money, as it is stated in the case! Taking the copy to be true, there is no statement in the memorial that the agreement was in consideration of a sum of money. How does it happen that it is differently stated in the case! Can it be for any purpose but to deceive! These Irish cases are so stated, that we never know the facts.

The Lord Chancellor: It was assumed and argued below, that £20 was the consideration. If [255] the agreement had been registered before 1760, the father might have detected the fraud.

* D. P. 1826, MSS. The bill was by the assignee of an equity of redemption, against the mortgagee, etc. praying redemption, etc. The defence was that the conveyance was obtained by a steward from his employer at an inadequate price, and while he was in a state of distress, and pecuniary embarrassment. In the Court below, the bill as to redemption was dismissed with costs: but this decree was reversed on appeal to the House of Lords, principally on the ground that the transaction was not questioned, until after the lapse of thirty-eight years. Lord Eldon: It appears that the property was set up to auction, (not where) but it was then stated that the property was subject to a lease, and covenant in the lease for renewal.

Lord Manners: It is fair to the Appellants to state, that my judgment was founded on the admission, that the consideration of the agreement was £20.

Lord Eldon: The lease takes no notice of any power. It is for life of Michael Cuff, etc. Owens covenants to pay £40 to Francis Cuff, his heirs and assigns, and then Francis Cuff covenants for his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, for quiet enjoyment.

Lord Manners: Upon the hearing in the Court below, I was of opinion, that this was not a case in which the Court ought to interfere to enforce a specific performance, and dismissed the bill on the grounds which I will state.* The consideration for the renewal is not stated in the memorial, but it was admitted at the bar, that £20 was the consideration for the agreement to renew the lease. It was argued by the counsel for the Appellant, that the omission to register, or the delay in registering the agreement, was immaterial; and at this distance of time, it may not be a circumstance to be much relied upon, although it is matter of suspicion. It is, however, material in this respect, that in Ireland it depends upon the registry, whether a deed, whether legal [256] or equitable, is to have priority; and one would have imagined, that in such a transaction between an attorney and an improvident young man, the attorney would have been anxious to get his document of title registered: to him it must have been a matter of importance.

The settlement of 1760, was executed for a valuable consideration. Under that deed the Respondent derives title to one moiety of the lands in question. The bill for the specific performance was filed in 1821. The Court thought that the Plaintiff had not made out a sufficient title, and dismissed the bill. If the case had been brought before the Court recently after the transaction, depending upon such a title, it would have been impossible, consistently with the rules of equity, to have granted relief. That a young man, an expectant heir, should be induced by his father's attorney, for a consideration of £20 to ratify a lease which was void as against him, and also for the same consideration, to grant in reversion another lease for lives undefined, imports in itself, a transaction so grossly fraudulent, that no court of equity could give its assistance to effectuate such an agreement.

Then arises the question, whether from length of time and possession, there has been an acquiescence which deprives the Respondent of his ground of defence? As to possession, it is clear that it must be referred to the lease of 1745. Samuel Owens was in possession under that lease. The last renewed lease according to the agreement, was not to commence until the expiration of the former lease. But then it is argued here at the bar, that the agreement is one [257] and entire; that it must be good or bad for the whole. That was not so considered, or argued, upon the hearing in Ireland. It appeared, and was there assumed, that the agreement related to distinct matters, and had operation accordingly: one part to confirm the act of the father, the other to grant a renewal of the lease. The Court considered one part of the agreement fair and sustainable, the other invalid: that the consideration of the £20 was the only circumstance connecting the two parts of the agreement. If that were the only question, and it turned upon adequacy or inadequacy of price, I might agree with the counsel for the Appellant, that the agreement must be considered as entire. But looking at the whole question, it could not be so treated; for the consideration itself was evidence of the unfairness of the transaction—a mere bribe—a gross imposition: the consideration could prove nothing but fraud. On this ground the Court proceeded as to one moiety. The same reasoning applies to the other moiety purchased in 1814. It appears that moiety was sold subject to the lease of 1745, and purchased with notice; which is supposed to have the effect of compelling the purchaser to perform the agreement. It is clear that the person who sold meant to exonerate himself, and that the party who bought had the benefit in a lower price. That may create an equity between the vendor and the purchaser, but the lessee has nothing to do with it. Upon this ground I formed my opinion, in M'Cur

* His Lordship here stated the facts of the case as set forth in the text, and then proceeded as above.

v. Armstrong (2 Ba. and Be. 538). The case from Vernon (Walton v. Com. Stamford, 2 Vern.) is a loose [258] note, but shews that the vendor meant to release the subject. In the case of Earl Brooke v. Bulkeley (2 Ves. 498), the bill was filed by a vendor against a purchaser, and person claiming the benefit of a lease; calling on the purchaser to execute the lease. Lord Hardwick says, "The first question will depend on the obligation the Plaintiff was under to renew at the time of the agreement for the purchase; and next, on the notice of that obligation: for if the Plaintiff was under an obligation, either in law or equity, to renew, and the purchaser or his agent at the time of the purchase had notice of such obligation, the estate must be taken subject thereto." If the vendor is bound, so is the purchaser, and vice versa. The reasoning, therefore, as to the moiety purchased, applies equally as to the other. The question in the case in Vesey, was between the vendor and purchaser, who was entitled to the benefit? There is no material distinction.

If evidence was necessary, it ought to have been treasured up by Samuel Owens. The possession is accounted for, by reference to the lease of 1715. There is nothing to connect the two parts of the agreement but the single consideration of £20. This is not a case for the extraordinary interference of a Court of equity. No evidence was required on the part of the Respondent, because he relied upon the unfairness of the transaction, apparent on the face of it. In the Court below, it was insisted that the £20 with interest, should be repaid. Upon this question the Appellants were left to their remedy at law. The Appel-[259]lants, or those under whom they claim, might have filed a bill to perpetuate testimony; and in such a case, it was highly necessary to do away all imputation which might attach upon such an agreement: this they have failed to do.

The Lord Chancellor then put the question, and the judgment was affirmed. Judgment affirmed by order, 10th June.

[261] A testator by his will, devised to trustees and their heirs, all his freehold and copyhold land at S. and also his freehold land at H. in case there should be but one son of his daughter A. who should attain the age of twenty-one years, upon trust for such son and his heirs; and in case there should be two or more sons of A. who should attain the age of twenty-one years, then in trust for the second of such sons and his heirs; and in case there should be no son of A. upon trust for such of the daughters of A. (if any) as should first attain the age of twenty-one years, etc.; and then after certain bequests of stock in trust, to pay the dividends by way of life annuities, the testator devised and bequeathed all the residue of his property, whether freehold, copyhold, or for years, money in the funds, upon mortgage or otherwise, upon security or at interest, debts of whatever other nature or kind, to the same trustees, their heirs, executors, and administrators, upon trust, to sell, get in, etc. and to apply the proceeds in payment of debts and legacies, etc.; and as to the residue of the monies to arise by such sales, to invest the same in the public funds or real securities; and if there should be only one child of A. upon trust, to transfer or assure the funds, and the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, to such only child, at or on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, etc.; and if there should be two or three children of A. in trust, for such two or three children, equally to be divided between them, the shares of sons to be transferred on their attaining the age of twenty-one years, etc.

The testator afterwards made a codicil to his will in these words, to the effect following:—"Having some short time back drawn my pen through the first fifteen lines of the sixth sheet of my will, and being apprehensive that such rasure not being witnessed, might lead to litigation, I declare that the sole intention of such rasure is, to revoke that part only of the will, whereby I direct the sale of my freehold property; and I hereby direct and appoint, that the son of my daughter A. who shall first attain the age of twenty-one years, shall on attaining that age change his name to Elwes; and I give and devise to the said son of A. on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, and changing his name to Elwes, all my freehold property, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, to hold to my said grandson, his heirs, and assigns, etc.; and I do hereby [262] ratify and confirm the said will, except as before is excepted."

Held that the will was revoked by the codicil, expressly as to the power of sale; and as to the corpus of the lands at S. and H. by the effect of inconsistency of devise, but that the will was unrevoked and operative in all other respects; and that under the devise by the effect of the will and codicil, no estate in the lands at S. and H. and the other freehold estates, was vested, but remained contingent upon the event of sons or daughters of the testator's daughter, according to the limitations of the will, living to attain the age of twenty-one, etc.; and that until such vesting upon such event, (or until such event should become impossible) the estate in the lands vested in the trustees, and the rents and profits were applicable according to the trusts of the will.

George Elwes being at the time of making his will, and until his death, seised of or well entitled to an estate of inheritance in fee simple, of and in divers freehold manors, messuages, lands, and hereditaments, situate in the counties of Berks, Surrey, Middlesex, and Suffolk, and elsewhere, and also to an estate of inheritance in fee of, and in divers copyhold and customary hereditaments, situate in the counties of Berks, Essex, and Suffolk, and elsewhere; and also possessed of and well entitled to a very considerable personal estate and effects, consisting of valuable leasehold messuages and hereditaments, monies in the funds, and various other particulars; when he was of sound and disposing mind, memory, and understanding, duly made and published his last will and testament in writing, bearing date the 1st day of March, 1811, and duly executed by him, and attested as by law required, to pass [263] freehold estates by devise; and he thereby among other things, devised and bequeathed as follows: "I give and bequeath unto my brother John Elwes, and Abraham Henry Chambers, (the Respondent) and their heirs, all that my freehold and copyhold farm and estate, situate, lying, and being in Southwood Park, in the county of Suffolk, which I lately purchased from John Pytches, Esquire, (and the copyhold part, whereof I have already surrendered to the uses of my will;) and also all that my freehold farm and estate at Haverhill, in the county of Essex, to, for, and upon such trusts as are in and by this my will expressed and declared thereof; (that is to say) in case there shall be but one son of my daughter Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by her present husband, the said Thomas Duffield, who shall attain the age of twenty-one years, upon trust for such son, his heirs and assigns, for ever; and in case there shall be two or more sons of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, who shall attain the age of twenty-one years, then in trust for the second of such sons, his heirs and assigns for ever; and in case there shall be no son of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas Duffield, who shall attain the age of twenty-one years, then upon trust for such of the daughters (if any) of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas Duffield, as shall first attain the age of twenty-one years, or be married under that age, with the consent of the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will, and the heirs and assigns of such daughter for ever; but if [264] there shall not be any son of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas Duffield, who shall attain the age of twenty-one years, nor any daughter who shall attain that age or be married, and the said Thomas Duffield shall depart this life leaving the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield him surviving, then upon such and the same trusts for the benefit of the children, as well sons as daughters, of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield by any second husband with whom she may happen to intermarry, as are hereinbefore expressed and declared of and concerning the said freehold and copyhold farms and estates, for the benefit of the children of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield by the said Thomas Duffield; but if there shall not be any son of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by such after taken husband, who shall attain the age of twenty-one years, nor a daughter who shall attain that age, or be married with such consent as aforesaid, then upon trust for my brother John Elwes, his heirs and assigns for ever." And then after bequeathing certain legacies, the testator devised and bequeathed as follows: "And as to for and concerning all the rest, residue and remainder of the property of which I shall be possessed, or to which I shall be entitled at the time of my decease, or over which I have a disposing power, whether the same consist wholly or in part of estates, of freehold, copyhold, or for years, money in the funds, upon mortgage, or otherwise out upon security or at interest, debts, or of whatever other nature or kind the same or any part [265] thereof may be, I give, devise, and bequeath the same and every part thereof, unto the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust, that they the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, or the survivor of them, or the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of such survivor, do and shall with all convenient speed after my decease, sell, dispose of, and convey all and singular my freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates, with the appurtenances, etc.; and also do, and shall make sale of and convert into money, all such part and parts thereof, as shall consist of money out upon mortgage or other security at interest or otherwise, and also get in all debts which shall be due and owing to me at the time of my decease, in such manner as they shall think expedient, etc. And I do hereby declare and direct, that the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall stand and be possessed of and interested in the monies to arise or be gotten in by the means aforesaid or otherwise, under and by virtue of this my will, in trust, in the first place, from and immediately after my decease, to satisfy and discharge all such debts, as shall be due and owing by me to any person or persons whomsoever at the time of my decease, or which shall afterwards accrue due; and in the next place, to pay, satisfy, and discharge my funeral expences, and the expences of proving this my will; and then to pay and discharge the several legacies and bequests which I have [266] given or bequeathed, or shall give or bequeath by this my will, or by any codicil or codicils thereto; and after full payment and satisfaction thereof, in trust, forthwith to lay out and invest such a portion of the residue of the monies to arise and be produced by the means aforesaid, in the purchase of so much and such sum of 3 per cent. consolidated bank annuities, in the names of them the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, or of the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, or assigns, as the yearly dividends thereof will amount to the sum of £1000 of lawful money current in England; and upon trust, that they

the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, and assigns, do and shall from time to time, during the natural life of my said daughter Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, pay, or cause to be paid, all the dividends of the said 3 per cent. consolidated bank annuities so to be purchased, as the same shall accrue and be received, into the proper hands of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, etc. And I do hereby declare and direct, that the said 3 per cent. consolidated bank annuities so to be purchased as last aforesaid, shall from and after the decease of my said daughter Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, fall into and be taken as part of my said personal estate, and be disposed in manner hereinafter declared thereof: And as to for and concerning the then residue of the monies to arise and be produced by the sales hereinafore directed to be made of my said real and personal estate, upon trust, to lay out [267] and invest the same in the purchase of parliamentary stocks or funds of Great Britain, or upon real securities at interest, in the names of them the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, or of the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, or assigns, upon the trusts, and for the intents and purposes, and with under and subject to the several powers, provisoes, and declarations, hereinafter expressed: (that is to say) in case there shall be only one child of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas Duffield, in trust, that they the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, or assigns, do and shall pay, assign, transfer, or assure the said stocks, funds, and securities, and the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, unto such one or only child, at or on his attaining the age of twenty-one years if a son, or at or on her attaining that age, or being married with the consent in writing of the trustees, for the time being of this my will if a daughter: and in case there shall be two or three children of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas Duffield, then that they the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, or the survivor of them, shall and do stand possessed of the said stocks, funds, and securities, and the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, upon trust, for such two or three children, equally to be divided between them share and share alike, the share or shares of such of them as shall be a son or sons, to be paid, assigned, transferred, or assured to him or [268] them, on his or their attaining the age of twenty-one years: and the share or shares of such of them as shall be a daughter or daughters, to be paid, assigned, transferred, or assured to her or them, on her or their attaining the age of twenty-one years, or being married with such consent as aforesaid: And my will is, that in case any one or more of such children, being a son or sons, shall depart this life under the age of twenty-one years, or being a daughter or daughters shall depart this life under that age, and without being married with such consent as aforesaid, then the shares of him, her, or them so dying, shall accrue and go to the survivors and survivor of such children in equal shares and proportions if more than one: and if but one, then the whole to such one, and be paid, assigned, transferred, or assured to him, her, or them, together, with, and at the same time, as his, her, or their original share or shares are and is by this my will directed to be paid, assigned, transferred, or assured: provided always, that if any or either of such children, being a son or sons, shall happen to depart this life under the age of twenty-one years, having lawful issue of his or their bodies living at the time of his or their decease or deceases, or born within due time thereafter, then the share or shares of him, her, or them so dying and having issue, shall go and belong to his or their child or children, and shall not survive to or amongst the others or other of such two or three children: And my will is, that in case there shall be four or more children of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas [269] Duffield, that the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall stand and be possessed of the said stocks, funds, and securities, and the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, upon trust, in the first place to purchase with a competent part thereof, or otherwise to set apart thereout, the sum of £50,000 3 per cent. consolidated bank annuities, and to stand possessed thereof, and of the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, in trust, for such son of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas Duffield, who under the trusts of a settlement now intended to be forthwith made, shall become possessed of an estate tail in the said manor of Marcham, and the messuages, farms, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which shall be comprised in the same settlement; and subject to the payment or setting apart of the said sum of £50,000 3 per cent. consolidated bank annuities, my will is, that the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall stand and be possessed of the then residue of the said stocks, funds, and securities, and the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, upon trust, for such four or more children (exclusive of such son as last aforesaid) of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike, and to be paid, assigned, transferred, or assured to them respectively, at the same time or times, and with such benefit of survivorship [270] amongst them, and in such manner in all respects as hereinbefore directed and declared of and concerning the said stocks, funds and securities, and the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, in the event of there being only two or three children of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas Duffield. And in case the said Thomas Duffield shall happen to depart this life, leaving the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield him surviving, and without leaving any issue by her, or if he shall leave issue by her, and all such issue, being sons, shall depart this life under the age of twenty-one years, and without lawful issue, and being daughters, shall depart this life under that age, without having been married with such consent as aforesaid, then my will is, and I do hereby declare and direct, that the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall from and after such the decease of the said Thomas Duffield, and failure of issue as aforesaid, stand and be possessed of and interested in the stocks, funds, and securities, in or on which the monies to arise and be produced from the residue of my real and personal estate hereinbefore devised under the trusts hereinbefore declared thereof, shall be laid out or invested, upon trust, to pay the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof, from time to time, during the natural life of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, to such person or persons, as she by any note in writing signed with her own hand, shall, whether covert or sole, and notwithstanding [271]-ing her coverture, (but so as the same be not by way of anticipation) appoint to receive the same; and in default of such appointment, then upon trust, to pay the said interest, dividends, and annual proceeds, into the proper hands of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, for her separate and peculiar use and benefit, not subject or liable to the debts, control, dispositions, or engagements of any husband with whom she may hereafter happen to intermarry, and for which her receipts alone shall be good and sufficient discharges: And in case the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield shall happen to marry a second husband, and there shall be any issue of her body by such second husband, then my will is, and I do direct, that the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall, from and after her decease, stand possessed of the said stocks, funds, and securities, and the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof, upon such and the same trusts, for the benefit of the children of such second marriage, as are by this my will, declared of and concerning the said stocks, funds, securities, interest, dividends, and annual proceeds, for the benefit of the children of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas Duffield. And in case of the decease of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, without leaving any issue of her body, who by virtue of the trusts of this my will, shall become entitled to the said stocks, funds, and securities, and the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, then [272] I give, bequeath, and dispose of the same stocks, funds, and securities, and the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, in manner following, (that is to say) I give the sum of £1000 etc. And as to, for, and concerning all the then residue of the said stocks, funds, and securities, and the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof, I give and bequeath the same and every part thereof, unto the said John Elwes, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to and for his and their own use and benefit, and to be paid, assigned, transferred and assured to him and them accordingly. And my will further is, and I do hereby declare and direct, that the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and other the trustee and trustees, for the time being of this my will, shall by and out of the rents, issues, and profits of the said freehold and copyhold estates, by this my will first devised, and by and out of the part or share of and in the said stocks, funds, and securities, and the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds thereof, to which any child or children of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield, by the said Thomas Duffield, or by my after taken husband, shall be presumptively entitled, pay and apply for the maintenance and education of any such child or children, in the mean time, and until his, her, or their share or portion, shares or portions, shall become payable, such yearly sum and sums of money, as to them the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, or the survivor of them, his executors or [273] administrators, or other the trustees or trustee, for the time being of this my will, shall seem meet, etc." And the testator nominated and appointed John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, joint executors of that his will, etc.

Some time after the date and execution of the will, the testator drew two cross lines with his pen over a part of his will, which contained the trust or direction for the sale of his residuary freehold, leasehold, and copyhold estates. The testator after the date and execution of his will, and before the date and execution of the codicil after stated, purchased certain other freehold and copyhold messuages, lands, and hereditaments in fee, and was seised thereof at the respective times of making his codicil, and of his death; and he afterwards, when of sound and disposing mind, memory, and understanding, duly made and published a codicil, bearing date the 3d day of March, 1821, which was executed by him, and attested, so as to pass freehold estates by devise; and to the purport and effect following: "Having some short time back drawn my pen through the first fifteen lines of the sixth sheet of my last will and testament, dated on or about the 1st day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eleven, and being apprehensive that such rasure not being witnessed might lead to litigation, I, George Elwes, do hereby declare by this my codicil to the said will, that the sole intention of such rasure was, and is to revoke that part only of the aforesaid will, whereby I direct the sale of my freehold property, which sale I accordingly do hereby revoke; and I do hereby direct and [274] appoint, that the son lawfully begotten of my daughter Emily Frances Duffield, who shall first attain the age of twenty-one years, shall on attaining that age change his name for that of Elwes: And I give and devise to the said son of my daughter aforesaid, on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, and changing his name to Elwes, all my freehold property, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, to have and to hold to him my said grandson, his heirs, and assigns, for ever: Also I give and bequeath to my wife Amelia Maria Elwes, for and during the term of her natural life, my dwelling house, situate and being on the Terrace in High Street, in the parish of Mary-le-bone; and I also give unto my said wife, the contents of the said house: And I do hereby nominate and appoint the Reverend William Hicks, of Whittington Rectory, in the county of Gloucestershire, to be my executor, in the room of my late brother John Elwes, Esquire, deceased; and I do hereby ratify and confirm the aforementioned will and testament, dated as aforesaid, except as is before excepted."

On the 2d day of September, 1821, George Elwes died, without having revoked or altered his will, save as the same was altered by the codicil, and without having altered or revoked his said codicil.

George Elwes on his death, left the Respondent Amelia Maria Elwes his widow, and the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield his daughter, and only child and heir at law, and heir according to the custom of the manors, whereof his copyhold estates were holden, and also his sole next of kin.

[275] The Appellants had then five children; namely the Respondent George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield, their then only son, an infant then of the age of nine years and upwards, and four infant daughters, namely, the Respondents Caroline Duffield, Maria Duffield, Anna Duffield, and Susan Eliza Duffield, younger than their said brother.

After the death of George Elwes, the Respondent Abraham Henry Chambers, the executor named and appointed by his said will, and the Respondent William Hicks, appointed executor by the said codicil, duly proved his said will and codicil in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and received and got in some parts of his personal estate, and of the profits and produce thereof, and had thereout paid his funeral expenses, and all or most of his debts, the whole amount whereof was inconsiderable.

In 1821 a bill was filed, and afterwards amended, stating among others, the facts herein before set forth, and contending among other points, that the devises of the lands at S. and H. and the residuary freehold lands, were not vested under the will and codicil, but future and executory, and that until the events happened on which the vesting should take place, the Appellant E. F. Duffield, as heir at law, and customary heir, was entitled to the rents and profits of the lands, subject to application of such part as might be necessary for the maintenance of the presumptive devisee under the will. The bill among other things, prayed a declaration in this respect accordingly.

The several Defendants to the original and amended bill having appeared, and put in their answers, and the cause being at issue, witnesses [276] were examined, and certain documentary evidence was adduced on the part of the Appellants: among other documents, the will and codicil of the testator George Elwes, were proved by the attesting witnesses.

The cause came on, and was heard before the Vice Chancellor, on the 22d, 24th, and 28th days of February, the 1st day of March, and the 9th day of April, 1823; and on the 17th day of April, 1823, the Court by decree of that date, (among other things) declared that the will of the testator George Elwes, bearing date the 1st day of March, 1811, and the codicil thereto, bearing date the 3d day of March, 1821, were well proved, and that the same ought to be established, and the trusts thereof performed and carried into execution; and the same was ordered accordingly; and to take an account of the personal estate, etc. And it was ordered that the said master should inquire and state to the Court, what freehold and copyhold estates of inheritance the said testator was seised of at the times respectively of making his will, of making his codicil thereto, and of his death: And it was ordered, that the said master should take an account of the rents and profits of the said testator's freehold and copyhold estates, accrued since his death, and received by the Respondents Abraham Henry Chambers and William Hicks, or either of them, or by any other persons, by their or either of their order, or for their or either of their use. And it was declared, that the appointment made by the said codicil of the Respondent William Hicks to be an executor, in the room of the testator's deceased brother John Elwes, does not operate as an appointment of the [277] said William Hicks to be a trustee as well as executor. And it was ordered, that it should be referred to the said master, to inquire and state to the Court, what children of the marriage between the Appellants were living at the time of the death of the said testator, and whether any, and what children had been since born, and what were their respective ages. And it was ordered, that a case should be made for the opinion of the judges of the Court of King's Bench; and that the questions in such case should be, first, whether the devise of the freehold part of the estate at Southwood Park, and of the freehold farm and estate at Haverhill, contained in the will, is revoked by the codicil? Second, did the manor of Marcham pass under the residuary devise contained in the testator's will; and if it did, was such devise revoked by the codicil? Third, did the manor of Marcham pass under the codicil to the first son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield, who shall attain twenty-one years and change his name to Elwes, or to whom does the same belong? Fourth, does the estate at Withersfield and Haverhill, purchased after the testator made his will, pass under the devise in the codicil to the first son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield, who shall attain the age of twenty-one years and change his name to Elwes, or does it go to the residuary devisee, under the joint operation of the will and codicil, or does it descend to the testator's heir at law? Fifth, to whom belong the surplus rents and profits of the said copyhold estate at Southwood Park, and of the said freehold estate at the same place, and of the said freehold farm and estate at Haverhill, (if [278] the devise of such estates contained in the will was not revoked by the codicil) after providing for the maintenance of the devisee thereof, until a first son of the said Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield shall attain twenty-one years; or in failure of such son, till a daughter shall attain that age, or be married with consent according to the will? Sixth, to whom do the intermediate rents and profits of such of the testator's freehold estates as are effectually devised by his codicil, to the son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield, who shall first attain twenty-one years and change his name to Elwes, until such events take place, belong? And it was ordered, that all proper facts necessary to bring such matters in question, should be stated in the said case: And it was ordered, that it should be referred to the said master to settle the said case, if the parties differed about the same. And, etc. (declaration as to donatio mortis causa). And it was ordered, that the copyhold estates of the said testator, (other than his copyhold estate at Southwood Park) and the leasehold estates of the said testator, should be sold, with the approbation of the said master, to the best purchaser or purchasers that could be got for the same, to be allowed of by the said master: And it was ordered, that the money to arise by the said sale should be paid into the bank, with the privity of the said Accountant-General, to be there placed to the credit of this cause, as follows: viz. such part thereof as should arise by sale of the testator's said copyhold estates, to the account of monies arising by sale of the said testator's said copyhold estates, and such parts thereof as should arise by sale of the said testator's [279] leasehold estates, to the said account, "the testator's personal estate," subject to the further order of the Court: And, etc. (receiver:) And, etc. (reference as to maintenance of infants, etc.) And the Court reserved the consideration of the question relating to the sum of £50,000 three per cent. consolidated bank annuities, and of the several questions thereinbefore directed to be sent for the opinion of the judges of His Majesty's Court of King's Bench, until the judges of the said Court should have returned their certificate; and also reserved the consideration of all other further directions, and of the subsequent costs of this suit, until after the master should have made his general report; and any of the parties were to be at liberty to apply to the said Court, as there should be occasion.

The Respondent Amelia Maria, the widow of George Elwes, on the 3d day of July, 1824, intermarried with the Respondent William Hicks. Previous to that marriage, an indenture of settlement, dated the 3d day of July, 1821, was executed, whereby all the annuities, and other property which the Respondent Amelia Maria Hicks was possessed of or entitled to, as a provision made for her by her late husband George Elwes, were assigned to the Respondents Robert Greenhill Russell, and George Spencer Smith, upon the trusts therein mentioned, for the benefit of the Respondents Amelia Maria Hicks and William Hicks. In consequence of this arrangement, the Appellants on the 2d day of August, 1824, exhibited their supplemental bill in the Court of Chancery against the Respondents Robert Greenhill Russell, George Spencer Smith, [280] the Reverend William Hicks and Amelia Maria his wife, as Defendants, stating the original suit and decree, and proceedings, and the marriage of the Respondents William Hicks and Amelia Maria his wife, and the indenture of settlement made upon their marriage; and praying, that the Appellants might have the benefit of the original suit and proceedings, and that the decree and proceedings, whether by way of appeal or otherwise, might be carried on and prosecuted as well against Robert Greenhill Russell, and George Spencer Smith, as against the Respondents William Hicks and Amelia Maria his wife, in respect of their new interests in the matters in question in the suit, and for general relief.

To this supplemental bill, the Defendants Robert Greenhill Russell, George Spencer Smith, William Hicks and Amelia Maria his wife, appeared, and put in their answers, admitting the material facts stated in the supplemental bill. The Plaintiffs entered into evidence to prove the marriage of the Defendants William Hicks and Amelia Maria his wife, and the said indenture of settlement made on that occasion. The supplemental suit came on to be heard by consent, before the Right Honourable the Master of the Rolls, on the 13th day of August, 1824, when his Lordship was pleased to order and decree, that the former decree, bearing date the 17th day of April, 1823, and the several proceedings should be carried on and prosecuted, and the accounts and inquiries thereby directed, taken and made between the said parties to the said supplemental suit, in like manner as thereby directed as to the [281] parties to the former suit, with directions as to costs and taking accounts, etc.

The master made a separate report of the testator's debts and legacies, dated the 2d day of December, 1824, which was confirmed by order, dated 9th December 1824.

On the 16th December, 1824, he made his separate report respecting the maintenance to be allowed for the infant Respondents.

By an order of the Master of the Rolls, bearing date the 18th day of December, 1824, the master's report of the 16th of the same month was confirmed; and it was ordered that the sum of £2000 a year, etc.

The payments for the maintenance of the five infant Respondents were made agreeable to the last mentioned orders.

On the 14th day of July, 1825, the Respondent Henry Duffield, another son of the Appellants, was born, who being the second living son of the Appellants, was the presumptive devisee of the Southwood Park and Haverhill estates, devised by the testator's will, and also, as a child of the Appellants, entitled to a share of the testator's residuary personal estate, and to have maintenance allowed him out of his expectant property.

The Appellants on the 9th day of December, 1825, filed a supplemental bill in the Court of Chancery against the Respondent Henry Duffield as a Defendant, stating the original and former supplemental suits, and the decrees and proceedings had therein, etc. and the birth of the Respondent, and his claim on the matters in question; and praying that the Appellants might have the benefit of the original and former sup-[282]-plemental suits and proceedings; and that the decree and proceedings, whether by way of appeal or otherwise, might be carried on and prosecuted against the Respondent Henry Duffield.

To this supplemental bill, the Respondent Henry Duffield appeared, and put in his answer by his guardian, thereby claiming all such rights and interests in the testator George Elwes's real and personal estate as he was entitled to, and submitting the same to the protection of the Court. This supplemental cause came on to be heard upon bill and answer, before the Master of the Rolls, on the 17th day of December, 1825, when it was ordered and decreed, that the former decrees, bearing date the 17th April, 1823, and the 13th August, 1824, and the several proceedings, should be carried on and prosecuted, and the accounts and inquiries thereby directed, be taken and made between the parties to that supplemental suit, in like manner as thereby directed as to the parties to the former suit; and after directing the taxation and payment of the costs of that supplemental suit to that time, the consideration of all further directions, and of the subsequent costs of that suit, were reserved in like manner as the same were reserved by the former decrees; and any of the parties were to be at liberty to apply to the Court as there should be occasion.

In pursuance of the Vice-Chancellor's decree of the 17th April, 1823, a case was prepared for the opinion of the judges of the Court of King's Bench; that case contained a statement of the facts, except that, to avoid the impropriety of [283] proposing to a Court of common law, a question concerning the devise of a mere trust estate, the ultimate limitation of the manor of Marcham, and the freehold hereditaments comprised in the indenture of settlement, of 7th October, 1802, made to George Elwes in fee, in the event of the Appellant Emily Frances Duffield marrying without his consent in writing, was described in the case to be a use capable of being executed in possession by the statute, and not a mere trust estate as the settlement makes it. The questions in the case were those directed by the Vice Chancellor's decree, as before stated.

In the sittings after Easter Term 1824, the case was argued before three of the judges of the Court of King's Bench, (in the absence of the Lord Chief Justice) who certified their opinion thereon to the Court of Chancery, as follows:

"This case has been argued before us by counsel. We have considered it, and are of opinion,

"1st. That the devise of the freehold part of the estate at Southwood Park, and of the freehold farm and estate at Haverhill, contained in the will, is not revoked by the codicil.

"2d. That the manor of Marcham did pass under the residuary devise contained in the testator's will, and that such devise was revoked by the codicil.

"3d. That the manor of Marcham did pass under the codicil to the first son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield, who shall attain twenty-one years and change his name to Elwes.

[284] "4th. That the estate at Withersfield and Haverhill, purchased after the testator made his will, passed under the devise in the codicil to the first son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield, who shall attain twenty-one years and change his name to Elwes.

"5th. That the surplus rents and profits of the said copyhold estate at Southwood Park, and of the said freehold estate at the same place, and of the said freehold farm and estate at Haverhill, after providing for the maintenance of the devisee thereof, belong to Abraham Henry Chambers, the surviving trustee under the will of the said testator, until a first son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield shall attain twenty-one years, or in failure of such son, till a daughter shall attain that age, or be married with consent according to the will.

" 6th. That the intermediate rents and profits of such of the testator's freehold estates, as are effectually devised by his codicil to the son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield, who shall first attain twenty-one years and change his name to Elwes, until such events take place, belong to Abraham Henry Chambers, the surviving trustee under the will of the testator.

" J. Bayley. G. S. Holroyd. J. Littledale."

Upon the return of this certificate, the causes came on to be heard on the 26th day of April, 1826, before the Vice Chancellor, upon further directions: and on the 29th day of April, 1826, [285] a decretal order was pronounced, whereof the declaration and mandatory part is as follows:—

This Court doth declare, that the said certificate of the judges of the Court of King's Bench is hereby confirmed, as to their answers to the first and second questions proposed in the said case: And as to the matter of the third, fourth, fifth and sixth questions, this Court doth declare, that the equitable estate and interest of which the said testator George Elwes died seised or entitled to in the manor of Marcham, and the other freehold hereditaments comprised in the said settlements of the 7th day of October, 1802, and the 15th day of October, 1807, passed by the general devise in the said codicil of all the testator's freehold property, lands, tenements, and hereditaments.

" And this Court doth declare, that under and by virtue of the said will of the testator George Elwes, the Defendant George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield, as the only son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield, by her husband the Plaintiff Thomas Duffield, living at the testator's death, took upon the testator's death, a presently vested equitable estate in fee, in the testator's freehold and copyhold farm and estate in Southwood Park, and freehold farm and estate at Haverhill, specifically devised by his will, subject to be divested by the death of the said George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield under the age of twenty-one years, or by the birth of a second son of the Plaintiffs: And this Court doth declare, that upon the birth of the Defendant Henry Duffield, the second son of the Plaintiffs, the said equitable estate of the [286] said George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield was divested, and the said Henry Duffield took a vested equitable estate in fee, in the said Southwood Park and Haverhill estates, subject to be divested, in the event of the said Henry Duffield dying, or becoming neither the second nor only son of the Plaintiffs, before he attains the age of twenty-one years." And in taking the account directed by the decree, of the rents and profits of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates accruing since his death, this Court doth order, that the master do distinguish which of such rents and profits arose from the testator's freehold and copyhold farm and estate in Southwood Park, and his freehold farm and estate at Haverhill, specifically devised by his said will: And it is ordered, that the master do also distinguish what part of the rents and profits of the said specifically devised estates, accrued previous to the birth of the Defendant Henry Duffield, and what part thereof has accrued since that time. " And this Court doth declare, that such of the said rents and profits as accrued before the birth of the said Henry Duffield, belong to the said George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield, subject only to the allowance for his maintenance directed by the said will, and that such of the said rents as accrued since the birth of the said Henry Duffield, belong to the said Henry Duffield, subject only to the allowance for his maintenance directed by the said will." And this Court doth declare that the devise of the said testator's residuary freehold estates to trustees, made by his will, is wholly revoked by the said codicil. " And this Court [287] doth declare, that under and by virtue of the said codicil, the Defendant George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield, the eldest son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield, upon the testator's death took a presently vested legal estate in fee, in all the testator's freehold property, lands, tenements, and hereditaments (except only the said Southwood Park and Haverhill estates, specifically devised by his said will) subject to be divested in case of the death of the said George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield under the age of twenty-one years, but without prejudice to the question, how far such estate may be affected in case the said Defendant George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield should not, on attaining his age of twenty-one years, change his name for that of Elwes: And this Court doth declare, that the rents and profits of the said freehold property devised by the said codicil, accrued since the said testator's death, belong to the said George Thomas Warren Hastings Duffield." And in taking the said account directed by the decree, of the rents and profits of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates accrued since his death, it is ordered, that the master do distinguish which of such rents and profits arose from his said freehold property devised by his said codicil. And this Court doth declare, that the direction in the said will, that the trustees thereof should out of the produce of the testator's residuary real and personal estates, purchase or set apart the sum of £50,000 3 per cent. consolidated bank annuities, is to be considered only as a charge on the said residuary fund; and that the said testator [288] not having, after the execution of his will, made any settlement whatever of the manor of Marcham, the said charge or sum of £50,000 bank annuities, is not to be raised, but sinks into the said residuary fund, for the benefit of the persons entitled to such fund. And, etc. (costs and reservation of further directions.)

This decretal order was signed by the Lord Chancellor and enrolled.

The appeal was directed against so much of this decretal order as is printed between inverted commas.

For the Appellants: Mr. Sugden and Mr. Longley.

Mr. Sugden: The testator clearly did not intend the Marcham estate to pass under the residuary clause of the will. It thereby appeared that he intended to dispose of it otherwise. For there is a provision in case there should be four children, to raise £50,000 for the person who would be entitled to the Marcham estate, under a settlement then intended to be made. The obliteration of the will applied only to the direction to sell; not to the trusts as to the purchase money. It is found as to the Marcham and Withersfield estates, that the surplus rents passed under the residuary clause in the will: that is the nicest point that ever was decided. The Court held, that although the estates purchased after the will, could not pass by it; yet as the codicil republished the will, the residuary clause in the will passed what was not disposed of by the codicil. No case is to be found in support of the [289] doctrine, that a codicil containing a devise of after purchased lands shall republish a will, so as to pass by the will an interest which is not disposed of by the codicil. As to the Southwood and Haverhill estates, the devise is to trustees, in case there should be only one son who attains twenty-one; if two, then to the second of such sons; if no sons, then to daughters who should attain twenty-one or marry.

The declaration is, that the eldest son on the testator's death, took a vested estate, liable to be divested; and that on the birth of the second son, that son took a vested estate.

There might be a limitation constructed with great care, by which, what the Vice Chancellor says has been done, might be done. There might be a devise in tail, with a proviso to shift the uses from time to time, till the estate was barred. It might have been done by executory devise, though with great difficulty: thus ——— to the eldest son in fee, and if he should have a brother born in his life time, then to the second son. But it would be necessary to make a great many provisions with respect to the failure of issue. How is the second son here to take? not by description; for he does not answer the description till twenty-one. When can it be said that the description is answered? Supposing there were no son, what is to be done? What daughter is to take? Supposing the eldest daughter died under twenty-one, or that a younger daughter marries before the eldest attains the age of twenty-one? Whenever the estate is divested, you are, according to this declaration, to give it to a person who does not answer the description. Who can say [290] that the second son is more entitled than the eldest? for the eldest after all may be the only son when he attains twenty-one.

You are therefore taking it away from one who may be entitled, in favour of one who may never be entitled.

The eldest son's estate can never be divested, if it be vested till a second, or some other son attains twenty-one.

But it is to be divested in the event of his becoming neither the second nor the only son.

Then is an eldest daughter to take a vested interest?

There are cases, undoubtedly, in which what has seemed to be contingent, has been held to be vested: those cases, however, have no application here. So much for the estates given by the will: now for the codicil.

Here the devise is to the first son who shall attain twenty-one, and shall change his name to Elwes. Who is here intended to take? The testator did not like the name of Duffield, and chose that his own name should go with the estate. The first son might not attain twenty-one, or he might not choose to change his name: any other son might first take the name. The reservation of the question, as to the necessity of taking the name, is avoiding the difficulty: not deciding it. Is not taking the name as much part of the description as attaining twenty-one? One is as much a branch of the description as the other. Supposing Mr. Duffield was to take the name of Elwes, and have a son born afterwards; would that son take upon his birth? It must be now decided what is the effect of that provision, [291] of which the Vice Chancellor has reserved the consideration?

The decisions on which this decree was founded, are not applicable (Bromfield v. Crowder, etc.): where there is a devise to A. if he attains twenty-one, and if not over; it has been held that the devise is immediate. The only question is, whether the condition is precedent or subsequent? The object in those cases is certain: but here it is to one of a class. You can never tell who is to answer the description. Those cases all turn upon the devise over. The other class of cases is, where the devise is to A. until B. attains twenty-one, and then to B. Those cases are cases of exception out of the gift and turn upon the adverbs of time, "when, until," etc. Suppose I devise to my first daughter who shall marry! no unmarried daughter could take.

The decision in Grant's case (10 Rep. 50), was represented to have been a decision that the estate was vested: but that was not so. The reason why the estate was held to be barred was, that the statute of fines enables the party to bar a possibility. There the person was in esse. He was ascertained and described in the will.

In the habendum the words when he shall attain twenty-five were omitted: yet there being no devise over, it was held that he took only a possibility. It is an express decision that upon a devise to A. when he answers a particular description, he can take nothing in the mean time. The Vice Chancellor relied on Spring and Caesar (1 Roll. Abr. 415). He said it shewed that the event being collateral, did not prevent the estate from vesting: that case [292] really has no application to this. The decision proceeds upon the subsequent words, showing the intent against the first words. Why do you in this case give it to the first son? he does not answer the description: but he may answer the description, and therefore you give it to him. But when a second son is born you take it away: why? because he may answer the description, not because he does answer it. But he may not answer the description, and the first son may. That is the person to whom you first give it, and afterwards take it away. You give it him because he may answer the description; and he may still answer the description when you take it away. (Dever v. Frank, 3 M. and S. 25-6 Pri. 46, 8 Tau. 571.)

The King's Bench has held that the will was republished by the codicil, and passed all the interest undisposed of expressly by the codicil; but the trusts upon which the property was devised to the trustees were revoked, and the will contained an express devise of all the estates to other purposes. How then can it operate as a republication for this purpose? But it is not material to argue this question, for the King's Bench has only decided what is the legal devise, leaving the beneficial interest undisposed of. Now the trusts being revoked by the codicil, the rents remain undisposed of.

With respect to the declaration of right by the Vice Chancellor, he has reserved one of the principal questions, which ought to have influenced his decision. He has reserved the question as to the effect of the devise not taking the name of Elwes: so that he is to take the estate, leaving [293] it in doubt whether he will ever answer the description.

With respect to the Southwood and Haverhill lands, the estate is given to the eldest son: why? because he answered the description? no, he did not answer it, but he might answer it. Then the estate is taken from the first son, to give it to the second: why? because he answered the description? no, because he may. Then suppose the second son dies, is the first son to take the estate again?

Lord Eldon: The maintenance is out of the estate, to which the son is presumptively entitled, not to which he is entitled. I take it a person is said to be presumptively entitled to that to which he is not actually entitled, but may become entitled.

For the Appellants: The question which is reserved, is a part of the description. What is the construction of the will, if the estate is to go to daughters? Is a daughter to take whether she marries or not, or marries with or without consent? so that this construction totally defeats the intention: and it is equally against the rules of law and the decisions. Grant's case cited in Lampet's case (10 Rep. 51). It was said that the decision in Grant's case, proceeded upon the ground that the estate was vested; had it been vested, there would have been no question. There is a case, in which it has been held, that a devise to A. at twenty-one without more is not executed. All the cases are where there is either an intermediate estate or a devise over. Boraston's case is of the first class. It was held that the word "when," had merely [294] relation to the preceding estate. They are mere adverbs of time, and not of contingency. Nobody can contend that the son of an eldest son dying under twenty-one would take in this case.

There is another class of cases, Bromfield v. Crowder (1 N. R. 313); the doctrine of shifting estates was there very much discussed. Doe v. Moore, and many other cases. In all those cases there was a devise over. It is there held that it is a condition subsequent. They all depend upon the devise over. There is neither decision nor declaration that a devise to A. at twenty-one is not contingent. He does not answer the description before that age. Then it is impossible to say which child will be entitled till one has attained twenty-one. It is impossible to produce a case, in which the estates have been permitted to shift, in the way in which they have been made to shift here. In order to make estates shift, very nice provisions are necessary, Driver v. Frank (3 Maule and Sel. 25).

Upon this point I have the opinion of the King's Bench with me. The Vice Chancellor has declared an opinion decidedly the contrary. Stevens v. Stevens (Forr. Rep. 228), shews that where there is an executory devise, the intermediate rents go to the heir at law. In Bullock v. Stones (2 Ves. Senr. 521), it was held that a devise to A. when he should attain twenty-one was contingent; but that as A. was to be maintained out of the rents, the estate was to be held vested in the heir.

In the argument below, the two classes of cases depending upon adverbs of time and devise [295] over were cited. Spring v. Caesar was relied on below, to shew that it would make no difference upon the circumstance of contingency, whether it was the party attaining twenty-one, or any other event.

Lord Eldon: In that case it seems to have been held it was a present estate in fee, to be melted down to an estate for life, if A. did not pay 10s. on a given day.

For the Appellants: The clause providing for maintenance is a strong corroboration of our argument, speaking of the shares as presumptive shares (Fearn's Exec. Dev. 547).

Mr. Longley: The surplus rents of the Southwood Park estate result to the heir at law. They do not go to the presumptive devisee, because the devise is executory; and such devisee's interest in the intermediate rents is limited to maintenance merely.

Maintenance given out of interest does not vest a personal legacy. Pulsford v. Hunter (3 Bro. C. C. 417), a fortiori maintenance out of rents shall not vest a real estate devised before the time appointed, or deprive the heir of his rights.

The surplus rents do not go to the eldest son under the devise in the codicil. The claim has never been made by the eldest son; and the answers of the judges to the first and fifth questions, decide it against him.

They do not pass under the residuary clause in the will. General words are not always of universal operation. Strong v. Teate (2 Burr. 912); Roe d. Helling v. Yeud (2 New Rep. 214); Roe d. James v. Avis (4 T. R. 605); Goodtitle v. Miles (6 East, 494): [296] this is confirmed by the answer of the King's Bench to the first question.

Now all that is given by the will to the trustees under the residuary clause, is given in trust to sell. The testator has directed the application of part of the rents in question, in maintenance of the presumptive devisee. The surplus rents are of uncertain duration, and of variable amount, according to events which might happen; therefore no purchaser could be found for the surplus rents, and the testator could never intend they should be sold; consequently these surplus rents do not pass by the residuary clause in the will; and being undisposed of by the will or codicil, these surplus rents fall by way of resulting trust, to the testator's heir at law. This conclusion is consistent with the answer of the judges to the fifth question; who only find that the surplus rents belong to A. H. Chambers, the surviving trustee under the will; but do not declare the trusts, which it would have exceeded their province to notice.

As to the intermediate rents of the Marcham freeholds, of which the testator was seized at the date of his will, the effect of the clause of revocation in the codicil, taken singly, is expressly to revoke the direction to trustees to sell, contained in the will; and impliedly to revoke the devise itself to the trustees. This follows from the principle that trustees under a will, shall take no larger estate than is necessary, for the purposes of their trust (Doe d. White v. Simpson, 5 East, 162; Glover v. Monkton, 3 Bing. 13. See also Morant v. Gough, 7 Bar. and Cress. 206). That this is also the opinion of the judges [297] appears from the comparison of their answers to the second and sixth questions. This being so under this clause alone, no estate whatever in the Marcham freeholds remains in the trustees; and the clause of disposition contained in the codicil, gives only a future and executory interest to an uncertain devisee. This is executory, both as to the devise in the codicil, and the devise of the Southwood Park estate, contained in the will, according to all the authorities. Fearn's definition of an executory devise (Exec. Dev. 100); Ch. J. Bridgman's definition (Sir T. Raymond's Reports 83); Grant's case cited in Hunt v. King (Cro. Eliz. 610); Stevens v. Stevens (Ch. T. Talb. (Forr. Rep.) 228); a case where the devise closely resembled the devise in Mr. Elwes's codicil; Fearn's opinion in his Posthumous Works (p. 191). These authorities shew that both the devise of the Southwood Park estate in the will, and the general devise in the codicil, are executory.

The cases cited against us, do not disprove this position. Spring v. Caesar (1 Roll's Abr. 415) was much relied on by the Vice Chancellor in his judgment. That case is thus reported: "*Si A. Tenant pour vie et R. en reversion en fee covenant a lever un fine, et que ceo serra al use A. et son heirs, si R. ne paie 10s. al A. 10 Septemberis apres, et sil eeo pay, donque al use A. par vie, et apres al use R. en fee, en cest case cest paroll, (si, etc.) est un condition subsequent en new precedent, issint que A. ad un estate en fee tanque R. paie 10s.; et les subsequents parolls ceplaine l'intent ditte subsequent condition, scilicet, et sil eeo pay donque serra al A. par vie et [298] puis al use R. en fee, que montee l'intent detre que A. aura un estate en fee tanque les 10s. pay." Here the words "si, ne," if not, are equivalent to "nisi," or unless. So the limitation will stand—To the use of A. and his heirs, unless R. shall on the 10th September next pay 10s.; but if R. shall then pay 10s. then "donque," i.e. from that time, the fine is to enure to the use of A. for life, with remainder to R. in fee. So the condition was plainly subsequent, and the estate first limited intended to vest immediately. It is to be observed, that as far as regards the fee first limited to A. the condition was subsequent; but with respect to the estate for life of A. and the remainder to R. in fee, the condition was precedent: and in order to make this case an authority to justify the decision in Duffield v. Elwes, it should have been shewn, that the estate for life to A. and the remainder to R. vested immediately, before the 10th of September, and before any payment of the money. In effect, the words "si R. ne paie 10s. al A. 10 Septemberis apres," which come between the limitation to A. and his heirs, and the operative words of condition, viz. "et sil eeo pay donque, etc." merely have a prospect towards the condition subsequent which follows; as if the limitation had been to the use of A. and his heirs, subject to the condition of defeasance hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, provided that if R. shall pay to A. 10s. on 10th September next, then the estate shall be to A. for life, remainder to R. in fee.*

The case of Edwards v. Hammond (2 Show. 398, and 1 New Rep. 324, in Notes) admits of a similar explanation; there is a clear present firm [299] tation, with a notice of a clause of defeasance to follow.

The class of cases in which there was either a devise over in case of the death of the first taker under twenty-one, or a present disposition of the rents and profits until he attained twenty-one, are distinguishable from the present. Thus in Boraston's case (3 Co. 19), there was a devise of a chattel interest in the rents and profits, until Hugh Boraston should attain twenty-one; and Hugh Boraston was mentioned by name, and described as the heir in remainder. In Doe v. Moore (11 East, 601), the devise was to John Moore when he attains twenty-one; but in case he should die before twenty-one, then over to James Moore his brother. So there the devisee was named, and there was a gift over, in case of his death under twenty-one. In Bromfield v. Crowder (1 N. R. 313), the estate given to John D. Bromfield on attaining twenty-one, was, in case of his death under twenty-one, given over to C. Bromfield; and Ch. J. Mansfield thought the intention was to give a vested estate to the first taker immediately. Doe v. Nowell (1 Maule and Sel. 327), was a devise in remainder to all the children of J. Roake equally at twenty-one; but if only one child attains twenty-one, then to such child at twenty-one; and in case J. Roake shall die without issue, or such issue shall die before twenty-one, then over. So there was a gift over upon death under twenty-one. The same rule of construction applies to the cases of Goodtitle v. Whitby (1 Burr. 228); Mansfield v. Dagard (1 Eq. Abr. 195); Doe v. Lea (3 T. R. 41); and Warter v. Hutchinson (1 Barn. and Cr. 721).

[300] It has been much insisted on by the counsel for the eldest son of Mrs. Duffield, that "an event may be more or less probable, but cannot be more or less contingent;" this we admit; but the law itself in determining what shall constitute a legal contingency, does estimate the different degrees of moral probability. There are known and distinguished in law, a potentia propinqua, a near or common possibility; a potentia remota, a remote possibility; and a potentia remotissima, a very remote or most improbable possibility. The first of these degrees may make a legal contingency; the two latter cannot. All that we contend in the present case is, that the uncertainty of the person to take under the description assigned, is fully sufficient to create a legal contingency; and yet the events are not too remote in time or possibility, to form the basis of an executory devise.

The authorities clearly shew that the devise of the Southwood Park and Haverhill estates in the will, and the devise of the testator's general freeholds in the codicil, are both of them contingent and executory.

Supposing that the clause which revokes the direction to sell, leaves the estate in the trustees yet revoking the trust for sale, it revokes all the trusts declared upon the sale and sale monies; for it is only through the medium of a sale, that the freehold property is by the will, made applicable to the purposes of the residuary fund; and the maxim that "qui destruit medium destruit finem" (Lampet's case, 10 Rep. 51), must prevail; consequently the bare [301] legal estate remains in the trustees, without any trust declared; and the trust results to the heir at law, until the vesting of the executory devise shall divest both trustees and heir of any interest in the property.

The younger children of the Plaintiffs who are Appellants in the second appeal, concur with us in contending that these devises are executory; but they argue further, and the judges of the King's Bench, as far as we can conjecture from their answers, seem also to hold the opinion, that the codicil in some way or other, effected such a republication of the will, as to give the intermediate interest in the freeholds undisposed of by the codicil, to the trustees named in the will; we insist that this notion is erroneous, and that there is not in the present case any such republication as can by law have the effect ascribed to it.

Republications are of two kinds, expressed and implied. We admit the doctrine to be settled by a series of authorities, that the mere execution of a codicil in the requisite form for a devise of freehold estate, will, without more, effect an implied republication of a will. But we insist that such implied republication can never be set up against the words of a codicil expressly preventing or limiting that effect, upon the maxim that "Omne expressum facit cessare tacitum." A testator may limit the republication effected by his codicil to the estates already devised by his will, Bowes v. Strathmore (7 T. R. 482; 2 Bos. and Pull. 500), a codicil expressly confirming a will by date, will not set up the whole will against an intermediate codicil re-[302]-voking a part of that will, Crosbie v. Macdonall (1 Ves. 610). And a confirming clause in the conclusion of a codicil, cannot set up a trust in a will, revoked by the earlier part of the codicil, Holder v. Howell (8 Ves. 97).

To apply these principles to the present case—The testator George Elwes in the outset of his codicil, refers to his will by date, and revokes the direction therein contained to sell his freehold property: he then disposes of all his freehold property, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, by way of executory devise, bequeaths a leasehold house to his widow, adds a new executor, and concludes his codicil by saying, that he does thereby “ratify and confirm the aforementioned will and testament dated as aforesaid, except as is before excepted.” Therefore we have here an express clause of confirmation, or republication of the will, limited by an express exception. Every thing which by the earlier part of the codicil is excepted or taken out of the operation of the will, remains excepted at the conclusion and consummation of the codicil. No implication can be admitted to contradict this plain expression. Now by the operation of the clause of revocation contained in the earlier part of the codicil, there was excepted out of the will, the devise of the Marcham freeholds, or at any rate the direction to sell, and its dependent trusts; therefore by the just legal construction and effect of the codicil, the same exception continues in force: hence it follows, that the heir takes the intermediate estate, or a resulting trust of the [303] intermediate rents and profits of the Marcham freeholds.

As to Withersfield, being an after purchased estate, the will alone could have no operation on it; therefore the clause of revocation in the codicil could not affect it. The only clause affecting it, is the disposition in the codicil. This, however, is an executory devise, and partial disposition; therefore the part of the fee undisposed of descends to the heir, until the period when the executory devise shall become vested.

If it be said, that the confirming clause in the codicil republicates the will, and so makes the will affect the Withersfield estate, still the confirming clause confirms with the exception, and not only republicates the devise to trustees, but confirms the clause of revocation also; in which case the intermediate rents of the Withersfield estate, would fall precisely under the same line of argument as those of the Marcham freeholds, and belong like them to the heir at law.*

For the Respondent, the eldest son: Mr. Horne and Mr. Pemberton.

The argument on the other side is, that a party cannot take any interest, till he fully answers the description: our proposition is, that he can when the devise is to an individual when he attains twenty-one, or to a class who shall attain that age, whether the devise is immediate or in remainder: the parties in esse for the time being, who, if they attain twenty-one, would answer the description to take a present vested interest.

[304] As to the Southwood and Haverhill estates, there is by the will, a devise to trustees of the whole legal fee, then a devise to the eldest son, if only one, on attaining twenty-one; if two sons to the second; then there is a provision for maintenance out of the rents: it is said, indeed, that this is out of the property to which the devisee is presumptively entitled, but that is not so: presumptively applies only to the shares of personality. The effect then of this devise is to trustees, till a son shall attain twenty-one; then to the son, with a provision for maintenance in the mean time. Now this is the identical case of Bullock v. Stours (2 Ves. 521), which is supposed to be against us. There the rents were held to be given to the devisee, as soon as he came into esse: here the devisee was actually in esse.

But then it is said the estate cannot shift in the manner stated in the decree, and that it would require intricate limitations to effect this purpose, and Devere v. Frank is cited; but the only question is, whether the intention is apparent: if apparent, in the case of a will, it must take effect whether expressed in six lines, or six sheets of parchment: that was not disputed in Devere v. Frank. But the majority of the judges thought the intention not apparent, and the case was decided against the opinion of great judges.

It is then said, what would be the case if there were no sons, and the estate were to go to daughters, would they take vested interests? The answer is, that question does not occur. The conditions are perfectly different. In this latter case, there is no time fixed, which makes the distinction.

[305] Then as to the codicil. The devise is to the first son, on his attaining

* Mr. Rose and Mr. West appeared for the younger children, on whose behalf a distinct appeal was presented.

twenty-one and changing his name to Elwes. How would it be if the condition as to changing the name were omitted, would that circumstance make any difference? A devise to A. on attaining twenty-one, cannot be more contingent than a devise to him if he attains twenty-one, or when he attains twenty-one: but it is said according to the authorities this is executory. Now for this proposition not one decision is cited. Grant's (cited in Lampet's Case, 10 Rep. 50) case is the only one referred to. But that, though not an authority for the Respondent, is no authority against him. There the conveyance was to the use of A. when he attained twenty-five: before he attained twenty-five, he levied a fine to B., then he attained twenty-five and claimed the estate, and he was held to be barred. It is clear the decision must have been the same, whether he had an interest, or no interest. It seems from the citation in Coke, to have been assumed, that he had not an estate, but only a possibility, which was barred by the fine: it is stated, however, that no judgment was entered. But all that could be decided was, that he was barred, even if at the time of the fine levied he had no estate.

At the date of that case, the rule of construction now firmly established, had not been introduced. Snow v. Tucker, does not come within the principle for which we contend; but that was no decision upon the point: it was merely a decision, that a devise to a woman when she shall marry, is a good contingent devise, with a [306] declaration that the estate shall go to the heir in the mean time, which nobody disputes. There is no time limited, which makes all the difference.

These are all the authorities which have been cited against the Respondents. The others are cases in his favor, which the Appellants' counsel have attempted to distinguish; but unsuccessfully. If the rule be, as they lay it down, is it possible that it can be so destitute of authority?

On the other side: From Boraston's case downwards, there is one uniform current of decisions. It is said, indeed, that Boraston's case and the others of that class, depend upon the adverbs of time, and an intermediate estate: if that were so, it would apply to this case; there being a devise to the trustees till the devisee attains twenty-one. But this distinction has been exploded, as will appear by subsequent authorities. There are others which are not open to this supposed objection, as Edwards v. Hammond (1 N. R. 324, in not. 3 Lev. 432): where a surrender was made to the use of the surrenderee for life, then to A. at the age of eighteen; if he die under eighteen, then to remain to the use of the surrenderor. It was held that A. at fifteen had a vested interest. Was it not as impossible then to say, that A. under eighteen answered the description of the devisee, as to say, that here the Respondent under twenty-one answers the description? There was no intermediate estate; no devise over. The estate was to remain to the surrenderor and his heirs: which is just the same, as if there had been no limitation to him. This was a case of a specific [307] devisee named: but all the cases hold, that where there is a child born who answers the description, such a devise applies to him, as if he were specifically named.

In Bromfield v. Crowder (1 N. R. 313), the devise was to two for life, at the death of the survivor to A. if he should live to attain twenty-one, but in case he should die under twenty-one, to B. at twenty-one, if B. should die under twenty-one, to C. This is in truth the same case with the last; except that there is a devise over, which is said to make so much difference: yet that circumstance is not relied on: in fact, what difference can it make, unless the devise is to the heir, how can it afford any inference of intention? This again is a case of specific devisees.

Doe v. Moore (14 East 601), is the same in substance, but Lord Ellenborough's judgment is very important. The pressure of this case has been so strongly felt, that one of the Appellant's counsel has denied it to be law. But it has never been overruled nor questioned. It is said not to be supported by the authorities on which it rests; but that is a mistake. It is followed by the important case of Doe v. Nowell (1 M. and S. 327). That is the case of a devise to a class, and furnishes an answer to all the arguments on the other side. It was a devise to the children of A. when and as they attain twenty-one. There is not an argument against this decision, which would not apply to that. It was a devise to persons who should answer a particular description. How could any take who did not answer it? Was the estate to open and [308] shift from time to time, to vest and divest as children were born and died? These are the objections to this decision. They all applied to that case, yet the judgment was against them; and that case was confirmed in the House of Lords (Randall v. Doe, 5 Dow).

It is true in that case there was a devise over; but that circumstance is no where the foundation of any decision. Fearn's opinion has been cited against us; but it is manifest that Fearn would have been of opinion against the decision in Bromfield v. Crowder. But it is remarkable that this distinction of a devise over, never occurred to him as of any weight, though he adverts to the distinction of an intermediate estate, which is now exploded.

Thus then stands the case as to the will, and as to the codicil also, unless it can be distinguished on the ground of taking the name.

With respect to the codicil, it is said, there is another and distinct condition, that the devisee is to take the name: they say that it is an uncertain act in itself, and that the thing being uncertain, the estate is contingent. For this they cite two cases: Snowy v. Tucker (1 Sid. 153), that a devise to a woman when she shall marry, is good as an executory devise. Atkins v. Hiccocks (1 Atk. 500), was the case of a bequest to a daughter when she shall marry with consent: the last case is one of personality, as to which the question is different from realty. Both these cases turn upon the circumstance that there is no time fixed. Dies incertus conditionem facit. When a time is limited at which the act is to be [309] done, it is the same thing as if the event must happen, as the legatee attaining twenty-one. This distinction runs through all the cases. In Spring v. Casar (1 Roll. Ab.), the reason given is, that a day is fixed for the payment: a condition that A. shall do, and for the doing B. shall pay, is a condition precedent; but a time fixed for payment will vary the construction (1 Salk. 171). Though in grants estates shall not be till the condition precedent is performed, yet it is otherwise in a will; for the will shall be expounded by the intent of the party, Jennings v. Gower (Cro. Eliz. 249). A condition to take a name, is clearly a condition subsequent: upon a devise to the second son of A. taking my name, and in default of such issue, to the daughter, it was held that a son who died at eighteen without taking the name, was entitled to the rents which accrued during his minority, Trafford v. Ashton (2 Vern. 661). Suppose the son had attained twenty-one, but died before he had assumed the name, leaving children? Suppose there had been no son born at the death of the testator, would the devise have been void as too remote, inasmuch as the attaining twenty-one must precede the taking the name? After all it is a mere question of intention; if the rule compels us to say he meant the sons to take before twenty-one, can it be said still he meant him first to change his name?

If the intermediate rents are not given to the devisee, they are given to the trustees upon the trusts declared. As to the Southwood and Ha-[310] verhall estates, the devise is to the trustees, of all the property, and the trusts are declared of all. As to the bulk of the estate for the son at twenty-one, as to the rest subject to maintenance upon the trusts of the residue, there is nothing afterwards to affect this disposition. As to the estates purchased before the date of the will, every thing is given to the trustees; the devise is revoked only as far as the codicil revokes it. There is no revocation of the devise by the erasure, but only of the trust to sell. The codicil explains how far that devise is revoked, only to the extent in which an interest is taken out of that devise for an eldest son. What is not taken from the trustees remains in them, except as far as this alteration extends, the codicil confirms the will. The residuary clause will pass any interest which the testator had at the time, whether he contemplated it or not. It is for those who would restrict the words, to shew a manifest intention to the contrary. The codicil makes the will speak from the date. Then how does the residuary clause stand? It is a general devise of all his property, not specifically disposed of by the will and codicil. Goodtitle v. Meredith (2 M. and S. 5); Hulm v. Heygate (1 Mer. 285). The trust to sell forms no part of the residuary clause so altered; if so, what becomes of the argument of intention arising from that circumstance? The same principle necessarily carries the after purchased estates. It is for those who would restrict the generality of the expression, to shew a clear intention to contradict it. That the testator expresses certain specific purposes for [311] which he makes his codicil is not sufficient to prove that he has not intentions more extensive.

Lord Eldon (29th June, 1827): The judges of the King's Bench appear in this case to have been of opinion, that no son of the testator's daughter was entitled to the estate devised, until he should attain the age of twenty-one, and that in the mean time, the rents and profits belonged to the person having the legal estate, giving no opinion as to the question of trust, which was not within their jurisdiction. The Vice Chancellor differed in opinion from the judges of the King's Bench; and it is certain that the judge in equity may decide against the opinion of the Court to which he sends for information. Lord Thurlow on one occasion, not being satisfied, sent back a case to the King's Bench for a better opinion: the proceeding was unusual, and Lord Kenyon was angry; but the judges of the King's Bench unanimously gave a different opinion. I followed this precedent myself, in a case (Wykham v. Wykham, 18 Ves. 395) relating to the estates of Miss Wykham in Oxfordshire. Having sent to the Court of King's Bench to ask what estate was created by the words of an instrument, the judges certified that it was an estate tail. I then sent the case to the Court of Common Pleas; they certified that there was no estate at all. I was not satisfied with these opinions, and decided differently from both. In Boraston's case, it appears from the margin of the report, that there were then one hundred and seventy authorities upon the same subject: yet the circumstances of this case are not precisely similar to those of any preceding case. Here [312] the lands are given when the devisee attains the age of twenty-one, and not with a gift over, if he dies under that age; which latter form of limitation does not prevent the vesting of the subject devised. As the judgment stands, the eldest, though he should not attain the age of twenty-one, is held entitled to the rents and profits. Upon the birth of a second son, he, according to the judgment, becomes entitled, divesting the right of the first son. If the second son should die under the age of twenty-one, the right to the rents and profits shifts back again to the first son; and there may be ten sons in existence in the twenty-one years, who may each have some enjoyment; so under this process of shifting the right, daughters might take before the events prescribed by the will: the age of twenty-one, or marriage with consent; and according to the same doctrine, the remainder man might take the estate every other year.

Such being the case, I have conversed with other noble Lords on the subject; and this appears to me to be a question, which the House would not be justified in deciding, without calling on the judges for their opinions. It would have been a great satisfaction if I could have looked in this case only to the interest of the parties, but considering how few of these cases upon questions of vested or contingent interests have come before this House, and that it is the duty of judges to decide questions with a view to all other persons having similar interests, and affected by the same circumstances, and saying no more, than that I have great difficulty in acceding to the doctrines of the judgment in the [313] Court below, I cannot advise the House to proceed to judgment in this case, without having the opinion of the twelve judges, on the matters of law comprised in it. I therefore move, that the judges be summoned to attend, and that the case should be argued before them in the next Session of Parliament.

The Lord Chancellor agreeing in this opinion, an order was made accordingly; and the case was afterwards, in April 1828, argued before the judges; at the conclusion of which argument, Lord Eldon delivered the following opinion:

Lord Eldon (after stating the case sent by the Vice Chancellor to the Court of King's Bench): When this case was made for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, it seems to have been assumed for the occasion, that the devisees in the will, which I shall have occasion to point out, were devisees of the legal estate. I take it to be perfectly certain, that the Court of Equity must itself decide upon the effect of trust devisees, and cannot call in the assistance of the learned judges of any of the Courts of Westminster Hall, by so stating the expressions of the will, as to propose to them the consideration of a testamentary instrument which shall amount to a devise of equitable estates. I take it to be extremely clear according to all the rules of practice, that the Courts of Common Law cannot decide questions as to estates upon trust; and when we look to the nature of those questions, perhaps it may be in some degree as well, that they do not. It is quite clear that a Court of Equity can decide a legal question, because the authority of a Court of Equity, its judicial authority, enables it not [314] only to decide questions of fact, not only to decide matters of evidence, but it has a right of itself, also to decide matters of law : there are many cases, in which, having by the interposition of a jury ascertained the fact, it has proceeded to decide upon it. That a Court of Equity frequently calls for the assistance of the judges of the Common Law Courts, with respect to matters of law, is undoubtedly true ; but it may, if it thinks proper, assume the jurisdiction of deciding on matters of law, as well as matters of equity : and of course the judges of a Court of Equity, ought to know what is law, in order to make the application. I mention this circumstance, because we have heard of its being said, that such men as Lord Hardwicke and Lord Thurlow knew nothing about law : and some of the judges of later time, have thought they did sufficient to get rid of a decision in the Court of Chancery, by saying, that is nothing but Chancery practice.

These questions having been by the Vice Chancellor, referred to the Court of King's Bench, it is to be lamented, that the course of proceeding is such, when a case is sent from the Chancery Court to a Court of Common Law, that having to return again to the Court of Chancery, the Lord Chancellor, or the other judges sitting in that Court, has not the benefit of knowing on what grounds it is, that the judges have decided the question. Whether that can be altered or not I do not know : I think it is extremely desirable it should be. But we cannot expect the Common Law judges will be very hasty in consenting to alter the practice, unless we, sitting in Courts of Equity, will alter our practice, when they are [315] called upon to alter theirs. There is nothing so mischievous as sitting in an Equity Court, to find out that you have asked the Common Law Court a question, or have sent an issue to a jury, without first of all seeing that you have so far explained the object of the question, that the answer to it will enable you to decide the law and the fact. It does not appear to me, that a Common Law Court should be burthened with our equity cases, unless in questions where it is expedient and necessary that their assistance should be called for. It is the more important for other reasons that the judge in equity should look at the sort of cases which he sends to a Common Law Court, in order to assist his judgment, as to what is law in a certain case ; because if he does not do so, or if he does not, when it becomes a case for a jury, express the grounds of his own difficulties, and state with what view the case is sent to the Common Law Courts, it is impossible that the Common Law judges should afford him effectual assistance ; and if they do not, permit me to say that is his own fault in many cases.

Having had the misfortune of being in the Court of Chancery about four and forty years, I can speak from my own experience, from the time of Lord Bathurst, that we have had cases brought back from the Common Law Courts, where it was no fault of the Common Law Courts ; but where they certified their opinion on the precise question referred to them, without its being mentioned to those Courts, or their being able from the case sent to them, to discover what were the difficulties that the judge in the Court of Equity had, at the time when he sent the case for their opinion. I [316] could refer to several cases, in which the Courts of Common Law have determined, and rightly determined on that which was stated to them, but where they have determined the points submitted to their judgment, without the counsel who argued the case, ever themselves knowing what were the points on which the Lord Chancellor, or the Master of the Rolls, or the Vice Chancellor desired assistance, without their knowing what was the difficulty of the learned judge in Equity. I say, therefore, that where a Court of Equity in special cases, calls for the benefit of a trial by jury, with respect to a fact, or for the benefit of the opinion of the Common Law judges in matters of law, it is time and expence thrown away, unless the matter is put into such a shape, that it may be perfectly understood, what it is that the Court of Equity wishes to have decided. I cannot find from any report of this case, what led to the statement of those questions for a Court of Common Law. The case was heard in the Vice Chancellor's Court, and these questions were framed for the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, but before this House we have none of the detail (here the answers of the judges were stated).

The answer to the question, (relating to the devise to the trustees) is the only answer which it was competent for a Court of Common Law to give, namely, that the devise of the legal estate being in trustees, the trustees were to have the rents and profits. What equitable dispositions were made of those rents and profits, it was not for a Court of Common Law to consider or to de[317]termine. They state that the rents and profits belonged to the trustees, until the first son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield should attain twenty one years, or in failure of such son, or his attaining that age, till a daughter should attain that age, or be married with consent, according to the will; that is, they being the legal holders, would according to the effect of this as being a legal devise, take the rents and profits; and that is the only answer which they could give to a question so framed.

With respect then to the intermediate legal rents and profits, it only states, they are effectually devised by his codicil, until the son of the Plaintiff Emily Frances Duffield shall attain twenty-one years and change his name to Elwes, or until the events which are referred to take place; and that they belong to Abraham Henry Chambers the surviving trustee, under the will of the testator.

This information having been conveyed from the Court of King's Bench to the Court of Chancery, that Court (here the declarations of the decree were stated) made a declaration, the result of which is, that the eldest son took a vested estate, subject to be divested by his death under twenty-one, or by the birth of a second son; and that the second son took a vested equitable estate in fee on his birth, but that that estate was subject to be divested in case of the second son dying, or becoming neither the second or only son. The declaration does not go on to state, that if it should come to pass that the second son died, leaving an eldest son the only [318] son, the estate must go back again; and if a third son was afterwards born, the estate would be again divested, and go to the third son; and so the estate would be changed for twenty-one years as often as events of such a nature could happen.

Taking it to be real property and legal estate, if on the opinion of the Court of Common Law being expressed, the conscience of the judge in the Court of Equity is not satisfied, it is his duty judicially to differ from them, and to declare that difference. My memory calls back instances, in which the case has been sent a second time for the opinion of a Court of Common Law. According to the practice of this House, you cannot put to the judges any question directly upon the point before the House; that is, you cannot ask them such a question, as whether the opinion of the judge in the Court below, is right or wrong; nor can you point to them the question which the learned judge put to himself, when he decided the cause. Whether this is a wise mode or not, the practice of this House is, so to frame the state of facts, and so to raise the question upon that state of facts, as to enable you to find doctrine out of the answer applicable to the case before you. It is established also, as the practice of this House, that you cannot ask the judges any question, with respect to equitable estates. It becomes therefore necessary, in order to bring us to the point, that a statement should be made and delivered to the judges, before you can reasonably ask their opinion upon the effect of this will; that statement I will cause to be drawn out, with a review of the case, which questions may be delivered to the judges, in order that [319] they may have, upon the case so stated, an opportunity of considering the questions which it presents for the decision of this House.

With respect to the devise of the Southwood Park estate, it will be in substance, leaving out the names of the trustees, "I give and bequeath all that my freehold and copyhold farm," etc. (here the devise of the Southwood estate was stated). He says nothing about third sons, except by implication, providing for the third, fourth and fifth sons. So likewise with respect to daughters, all he says is, "in case there shall be no son," etc. "then to such of the daughters," etc. By altering the frame of the devise, with respect to the Southwood Park farm and estate, so as to make it a devise without the intervention of trustees, the case for the opinion of the judges, may present it as the devise of a legal estate throughout.

With respect to the part of the will, which adverts to the maintenance of the children, and the fund still existing under this will, except so far as the object of it may have been effected, the fund for children, and the maintenance of children, that clause applies to the rents and profits of Southwood and Haverhill, with reference to the maintenance of such child or children, as might be entitled to that property. It is necessary that, on this part of the case, it should be stated to be a power unconnected with a trust; a power given to A. and B. to apply the fund to be raised (here the power was stated). The observation that arises upon this provision, I shall state to you presently. The question being considered as arising on the legal estates, I [320] propose to address some question, if it becomes necessary, to the judges, with respect to the point what is to be considered either as to the substance of the devise, or as to the undisposed rents and profits, if there are undisposed rents and profits, under the residuary clause in this will.

I have before stated, that the effect of the declaration in the Court of Chancery is, that the first son of Mrs. Duffield is to take, as I understand it, a vested interest in the property, subject to be divested in case of the birth of a second son; that the effect of the destination in the will is, that if the second son dies, and a third son is born, the existence of the third son divests the property out of the first son again, unless you should be of opinion, that the third son is not at all provided for. It appears to me, I confess, that by implication the third son is provided for, but the effect will not be this, if the first son takes immediately upon the interest of the second being divested. If that second son should die before the third son is born, the estate must go back; and then if a third son comes into existence, the estate having so gone back to the first son, would be divested out of him again, and go to the third son; the change of interest taking place according to those events which may occur.

There is one leading question, therefore, to be put upon this part of the case: whether according to law, (for the equity must be left out,) it is the true construction of this will, that the first son took a vested interest in the estate before he attained twenty-one? If you are furnished with the opinions of the judges on that point, you will be able by your own reasoning, to apply the [321] principle of that decision, to all the subsequent parts of this clause—Whether a second son being born divested the estate, and a third son coming into being after the second son died, again divested it out of the first son? and so on, going backwards and forwards. If in the case of the first son that might take place: if it be true, that the first son takes the estate on his birth till it be divested on the birth of the second son, the consequence must be the same, as it appears to me, with respect to all of them.

On this part of the case, I will take the liberty of stating, and calling your Lordships' attention particularly to the clause in the will. It has been argued on a former occasion in this House, that the words imported that there was a vested interest on the birth of a son. I confess that after all I have learned in the course of a long professional life, I should have argued it just the other way: that the words presumptively do not mean now, but at a future time. At the same time, these words may be qualified by other words, that may be found in the will. There is one question which it may be desirable to ask the judges, with reference to this matter, because the maintenance of a third son being to be provided for out of the trust devise, that maintenance is devised out of the rents and profits of the estate, which is either vested or not vested, at the birth of that son. The maintenance undoubtedly, may very well come out of the rents and profits of an estate, when the estate itself is not vested in the son; but you will have to consider this. What says the will, with reference to the application of maintenance, in case a second son should be born? If that second son [322] should be born, there would be a son entitled. Then how are you to find the maintenance of a son presumptively entitled? and how is a maintenance to be given to the eldest son, who is no longer entitled? Then again, supposing the second son to die, the eldest son will again be presumptively entitled; and then, though during the existence of a second son, you could not take a maintenance for the eldest son, the eldest son, who would be unprovided with a maintenance during the life of the second son, would become entitled to a maintenance out of the rents and profits of those estates, on the decease of the second son. Then you have a third son comes into existence, and that third son coming into existence, he is one of the objects of the devise, he would become the person presumptively entitled; the consequence of that would be, that there would be a provision for his maintenance; but if the eldest son was under the age of twenty-one, there would be no provision for his maintenance. It must be considered, and that may furnish an answer to some arguments which might be raised, that the fund is not constituted of the rents and profits only of this estate, but a fund constituted by the use of other property, which is comprised in the disposition, with reference to which, this provision for maintenance is made. If then, we look at this other property, perhaps we may be allowed to look at it in reference to the maintenance of the eldest son, if he should lose his maintenance by the birth of a second son. A question, therefore, should be put to the judges, with respect to that point also, in order that we may be furnished with their opinion, and one general question, taking [323] this as a devise of legal estates, as I should by the alteration of the will state it, in order that the judges may understand the statement and the questions together.

Another question will be, to whom do the rents and profits ultra the maintenance (to whatever son the maintenance is to be paid) belong, until the first son and second son, and so on, attain the age of twenty-one years? If you should be advised that the decree is wrong, in stating that the estate vested on the birth of a first son, the answers to two or three questions of that sort will assist you in respect to the Southwood estate. If the rents and profits do not go with the body of the estate, they must be regulated by some principle according to the will, or they must be embodied in the devise of the estate: some way or other they must be disposed of.

Then with respect to the other property as to the devise in the codicil, one question will be, what is the effect of the codicil on the dispositions in the will? Another question will be, as to its revoking or not revoking? Another question will be, stating this also as a matter of legal enquiry, whether the codicil destroys the effect of the will, with respect to the freehold property, taking it out of the trustees or not? If it leaves the land itself as belonging to the trustees, then under the codicil, it would be an equitable estate: if on the other hand, it destroys both the power of sale, and the estate which was given to the trustees, then it would be a legal estate under the effect of the codicil: and that question might arise, because although by the codicil he affects the property in the way supposed, yet he does not utter [324] the words, I devise this property immediately, so and so, but he says, my meaning is only to revoke that part of the will, whereby I direct the sale of my freehold property, not in express terms revoking the devise to trustees. When he comes to make the devise, he does not devise the property immediately to them, but gives it to a son or daughter on their attaining the age of twenty-one years, and taking his name of Elwes. There will be questions, whether the estate is given to the trustees for twenty-one years, or whether the estate is given to the first son presently, as the decree understands it to be divested in case he does not attain the age of twenty-one, and does not change his name to Elwes: or whether until he has attained the age of twenty-one and changed his name to Elwes, he has an interest in the property connected with the beneficial interest in the property undisposed of during infancy? and there being property undisposed of, according to the will and codicil, to whom does the property in the mesne rents and profits, between his birth and his attaining twenty-one years, go? but before that question can be asked, it will be necessary to have the opinion of the judges, whether the declaration in this decree, that he takes an immediate interest on his birth, to be divested on his attaining twenty-one, can or cannot be supported, if this is to be taken as a legal devise?

Another question will be, putting it in another way indeed, whether he has any interest on attaining twenty-one, between the period of his attaining twenty-one, and taking the name of Elwes?

[325] These are all the questions arising on this will, which I propose should be put to the judges, so corrected, as to point out the questions which may arise, as to the equitable interests.

The questions for the opinions of the judges having been drawn up by Lord Eldon, and proposed by order of the House to the judges for their opinion, on the 2d of March, 1829, Best, C. J. delivered the unanimous opinion of the judges, stating the questions with their answers, as follows:

First question: According to the true construction of the testator's will and codicil, as above stated, would any son of the testator's daughter by her said husband, during his infancy, be entitled to the rents and profits of the testator's estate called Southwood Park or the farm at Haverhill: or any daughter of his said daughter by her said husband, being unmarried, and under the age of twenty-one, be so entitled during her infancy or before she married?

We think that no son of the testator's daughter by her present husband, during the infancy of such son, nor any daughter of the testator's daughter by her said husband, being unmarried, and under the age of twenty-one, would be entitled to the rents and profits of the estate called Southwood Park, or of the farm at Haverhill.

Second question: If the younger of the said infant sons should die in infancy, would the elder of such two sons, during his infancy, be entitled to such rents and profits? if he would be so entitled, and a third [326] son should be born of the testator's daughter by her said husband, would such elder son continue entitled during his infancy, or would such third son becoming a second son, be so entitled?

We think that if the younger of the two sons should die in infancy, the elder of such two sons would not be entitled to such rents and profits during his infancy; and that a third son becoming a second son, would not be entitled to such rents and profits during his infancy.

Third question: If no son of the testator's daughter by her said husband, would be entitled to such rents and profits during his infancy, and no daughter of the testator's daughter by her said husband, would, during her infancy, and before marriage, be so entitled, to whom would the rents and profits of the said premises belong, during the infancy of such sons and daughters of the testator's daughter?

We think that the rents and profits of the said premises, would belong, during the infancy of such sons, and during the infancy, and before the marriage of any daughter to the testator's heir at law.

Fourth question: The testator having given such power to Elwes and Chambers as aforesaid, and to the survivor of them, out of the rents and profits of the said premises, (by his will first devised) to which any child of his daughter should be presumptively entitled, to provide maintenance for such child: and there being two sons of his daughter, infants, at the time of his death, can Elwes and Chambers execute such power, by applying part of the [327] rents and profits of the said premises, for the maintenance of the second of such sons in his infancy; and in case he (such second son) should die in his infancy, the elder of such sons being at the time of such death also an infant and an only son, can Elwes and Chambers in that case apply part of the said rents and profits for the maintenance of such only son during his infancy? and in case after the death of such second son in his infancy, the testator's daughter should have a third son born during the infancy of the testator's daughter's first son, could the said Elwes and Chambers in execution of the said power, apply part of the rents and profits for the maintenance of such third son having become a second son, and would they cease to have a power of applying any part thereof to the maintenance of an only son; or supposing there was an only son, and a daughter of the testator's daughter unmarried, and an infant, would Elwes and Chambers have the power of applying part of the rents and profits for the maintenance of such daughter during her minority?

We think, that there being two sons of the testator's daughter, infants, at the time of his death, Elwes and Chambers should execute the power, by applying part of the rents and profits of the premises first devised for the maintenance of the second of such sons, during his infancy; and in case such second son should die an infant, the elder son being an infant and only son, Elwes and Chambers might apply part of the said rents and profits for such only son's maintenance during his infancy, and whilst he continued an only son; and that in case after the death of such second son in [328] his infancy, the testator's daughter should have a third son born during the infancy of the first, the power of Elwes and Chambers to allow any part of the said rents and profits to the maintenance of the first son would cease, and they should apply part of the rents and profits for the maintenance of such third son; and that supposing there was an only son, and a daughter of the testator's daughter unmarried, and an infant, Elwes and Chambers would not have the power of applying any part of the rents and profits for the maintenance of such daughter during her minority.

Fifth question: According to the true intent of the testator, is any son of the testator's daughter entitled to the rents and profits of the freehold estates mentioned in the testator's codicil, (assuming that the legal estate in such freehold estates is thereby devised) until and before he attains the age of twenty-one years, and also assumes the name of Elwes, and if not, to whom do the rents and profits of such freehold estates (assuming as aforesaid) belong, under the true effect of the will and codicil, until a son attains that age and assumes that name?

The judges are of opinion, that no son of the testator's daughter is entitled to the freehold estates mentioned in the testator's codicil, until he attains the age of twenty-one years and assumes the name of Elwes; and that until a son attains that age and assumes that name, the rents and profits of such estates belong to the testator's heir at law.

All the judges who were present at the argument of this case, concur in the answers which I have [329] given to the questions proposed to us by your Lordships; but for the reasons which I shall proceed to give, I only am responsible.

These questions refer to a codicil; your Lordships will observe that only the will of the testator has been sent to us: we have therefore considered, that the codicil referred to by your Lordships' question, is that which appears in the printed case.

As the case sent to us states a (see Percival v. Percival, 1870, L. R. 9 Eq. 393) residuary clause, we have not felt ourselves at liberty to consider the effect of the residuary clause, which appears in the printed case, but have formed our opinions upon that which is stated to us by your Lordships: and it not appearing on that statement, that the residue of the testator's property is devised to any particular person, we have said that during the contingencies, the estates would descend to the heir at law; and do not, as in the case of Stephens v. Stephens, (Cases Temp. Talbot 228) where the residue was expressly devised to Sir Thomas Stevens, pass under the residuary devise in the will.

The estates in the Southwood park and Haverhill farm given to the second son, and if there be only one son, to the eldest, and if there be no son, to a daughter, do not vest until a second or only son attains twenty-one; or in case of the failure of male issue, until a daughter attains twenty-one, or marries with the consent of the trustees appointed by the will.

The testator's other freehold estates do not vest until some son of the testator's daughter shall attain the age of twenty-one years and take the name of Elwes.

[330] Until these estates become vested, the estates, and the rents and profits derived from them, pass to the heir at law of the testator, as estates not disposed of by the will.

Whilst estates remain contingent, those in whom they are at a future time to be vested, have no interest in the estates, or the rents and profits of such estates.

Such estates must descend to the heir, if they are not given to any person to hold until the events happen, on which they are to become vested. This point is too clear to require any observation: indeed, it was not disputed at the bar. Testators who create contingent estates, often forget to make any provision for the preservation of their estates, and for the disposition of the rents and profits in the intermediate period, between their deaths and the vesting of their estates. In such cases, the estates descend to the heirs, who, knowing that they are to enjoy them only for a short period, and that they have obtained the possession of them from the inattention of, and not from the bounty of the testator, or from the mistake of the professional man who drew the will, will make the most that they can of them during the time that they remain theirs, regardless of any injury that the estates may suffer from their conduct. The rights of the different members of families not being ascertained whilst estates remain contingent, such families continue in an unsettled state, which is often productive of inconvenience, and sometimes of injury to them. If the parents attaining a certain age, be a condition precedent to the vesting estates by the death of their parents, before they [331] are of that age, children lose estates which were intended for them, and which their relation to the testators may give them the strongest claim to.

In consideration of these circumstances, the judges from the earliest times were always inclined to decide, that estates devised were vested; and it has long been an established rule for the guidance of the Courts of Westminster in construing devises, that all estates are to be holden to be vested, except estates, in the devise of which a condition precedent to the vesting is so clearly expressed, that the Courts cannot treat them as vested, without deciding in direct opposition to the terms of the will. If there be the least doubt, advantage is to be taken of the circumstance occasioning that doubt; and what seems to make a condition, is holden to have only the effect of postponing the right of possession. To accomplish this purpose, a distinction has been made between the adverbs if and when, to which the learned in our language, not of the profession of the law, would perhaps not agree: upon this distinction, however, many equitable arrangements of property have been made; upon this distinction the titles of many estates depend, and it will therefore be the duty of the judges to observe it. The condition precedent to the vesting of these estates is so apparent—it is declared in such express terms by the will, that no ingenuity can explain it away; no refinement can get rid of it; and by holding that these estates are vested, we must overthrow the case of Stephens v. Stephens, which is directly in point to the questions submitted to us, and the authority [332] of which was never questioned. The state of the affairs of this family will not be sooner settled by the artificial contrivance of vesting and divesting the estates, than by keeping them contingent, until a final vesting of them can take place, agreeable to the disposition made by the testator. How can it be said, that the affairs of a family are settled, by vesting an estate in an eldest son, and divesting when a second is born; then vesting it in the second, and divesting on the birth of a third son, and death of the eldest; and by again vesting it in a daughter when there are no sons, and divesting it again on the birth of a son. The only effect of vesting these estates would be, to preserve them for the children of sons that die before they attain the ages at which the estates would vest.

But is it wise to encourage the marriage of infants, by making a provision for the children, however imprudently, and however much in opposition to the wishes of their guardians, such marriages may be contracted. The uncertainty of a provision for a family may occasion a pause, before the most important step in life be taken, which cannot be attended with lasting inconvenience, and may prevent lasting misery. Children will seldom suffer from estates remaining contingent, until their parents attain the age of twenty-one; as few, to whom such estates are given, will have legitimate children before they are of age. This objection, if of any weight, will only partially apply to this case, for provision is made for daughters, who may marry with the consent of their guardians, and die before they are of age leaving issue. As the testator has not made [333] the same provision in favour of the children of those sons, who are to succeed to his estates, as he has made for the children of his daughters, and the younger sons, who are to divide with his daughters the residue of his property, it is to be supposed, that he did not intend that the families of the first or second sons should inherit, if their parents did not live until their estates became vested. Knowing how difficult it is to get at the intent of parties, when all possible care is taken to express their intent with the greatest precision in the instruments made by them, and what different interpretations from the different constitutions of men's minds, and from their different habits and educations, are put on the same words, I do not much rely on the intent of the testator. I take for my guide, what I think is a sounder principle of decision in a case, where a testator has expressly secured what he has given to some of his grandchildren, to their issue, and has not expressly secured the freehold estates to the families of those children, to whom he has devised them, namely, whatever his intention may be, that intention is not sufficiently expressed for any Court to act upon it, when by so doing, we must get rid of a condition clearly expressed in the other parts of the will.

It is impossible to say that the words of this will do not import conditions precedent to the vesting these estates.

The estates are not given to any particular children by name, but to such children as shall attain the age of twenty-one years. Until they have attained that age, no one completely answers the description which the testator has given of those [334] who are to be devisees under his will, and therefore there is no person in whom the estates can vest. It is an established principle of law recognized by all the cases that are in the books, and founded on the nature of things, that estates must remain contingent until there be a person having all the qualifications that the testator requires, and completely answering the description given of the object of his bounty in his will.—In Frank v. Frank, 8 Taunton 115, it is said "to make an estate contingent we must have such words as these, I give the estate to such persons who shall at the death of B. E. be the second, third or fourth sons." The present will has the substance of these words, for the devisees are to such only son as shall first attain the age of twenty-one; in case there shall be two or more sons who shall attain the age of twenty-one, then in trust for the second of such sons, (then in trust for such daughters as shall first attain the age of twenty-one years.) The codicil gives the estates to that son who shall first attain the age of twenty-one, and change his name to Elwes. In Frank v. Frank, (Gibbs, C. J.) says, "there was a son in case who answered the description in the will." "A contingent remainder devised to a first, second or other son would vest absolutely as soon as such son should come into being, unless there was a clear intent expressed or implied that it should remain contingent until some later specified time." In the case submitted to us by your Lordships, there is a clear intent expressed that these estates shall remain contingent until it be seen whether one or more sons would attain the age of twenty-one years, and if there be no sons whether any [335] daughter would live to that age, or be married with the consent of the trustees.

The testator has given us an explanation of the terms of the devises of his real estates. In the clause of maintenance he directs his trustees to provide maintenance for the children of his daughter out of the estates or property to which any child shall be presumptively entitled.

A presumptive title is only a possibility, a presumptive heir is one who will be the heir if no one having a preferable claim be in existence at the time of the death of the person to whom the presumptive heir stands in that relation.

When the testator speaks of his grandchildren as presumptively entitled, he must be understood to say that they have no absolute or vested interest.

In the case of Stephens v. Stephens (Ca. Temp. Talb., Forr. Rep., 228), the testator after giving estates to his grandson William and Thomas devised the same property to such other son of the body of his daughter Mary Stephens as should happen to attain the age of twenty-one years. There is scarcely any difference in the terms of the devise in that case and in those in the devises under consideration. The meaning of each is precisely the same. In the case referred to, the judges of the King's Bench (Lord Hardwicke being then at the head of that Court) certified that the vesting of the estate was suspended until a son unborn should attain the age of twenty-one years. Lord Chancellor Talbot made a decree according to this certificate and said that it agreed with his own sentiments and he hoped it would be for the [336] future a leading case in the determination of questions of this kind—I believe that his Lordship's hopes were realized—it has been considered as a leading case—and the impugning its authority would shake a principle of law on which the titles of many estates depend.

It only remains for me to take notice of that part of the will to which your Lordship's fourth question relates, that is the clause which gives to the trustees the power to provide a maintenance for the testator's grandchildren. The words of this clause are as follow :

"And my will further is and I do hereby declare and direct that the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers and the survivor of them, his executors, administrators and assigns, shall by and out of the rents, issues and profits of the said freehold and copyhold estates by this my will first devised, and by and out of the part or share of and in the said stocks, funds and securities, and the dividends, interest and annual proceeds thereof, to which any child or children of the said Amelia Maria Frances Duffield by the said Thomas Duffield or by any aftertaken husband shall be presumptively entitled, pay and apply for the maintenance of any such child or children in the mean time and until his, her or their share or portion, shares or portions, shall become payable, such yearly sum or sums of money as to them the said John Elwes and Abraham Henry Chambers, or the survivor of them, his executors, administrators or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of this my will shall seem meet."

[337] The trustees are directed to execute this power by providing a fund for the maintenance of each child out of the property to which such child is in the language of the will presumptively entitled: an only son would under the will be presumptively entitled to Southwood Park and Haverhill Estates. The testator says nothing about providing maintenance out of the estate left by the codicil to the eldest son—because these he then intended should be sold. As being presumptively entitled to these estates, the only son would be entitled to a maintenance out of the rents and profits of them: when his presumptive title ceased by the birth of a second son, the right to maintenance of the first would be determined. On the birth of a second son, that second son would become presumptively entitled to the Southwood Park and Haverhill Estates, and it would become the duty of the trustees to provide for his maintenance and education out of the rents of those estates. Upon the death of an elder son and the birth of a third, the second would become an elder son and he would cease to be presumptively entitled to the Southwood Park and Haverhill Estates. A presumptive title to which estates would commence in the third son. From this period the son which was born second must be maintained out of the estates destined for the first: and the son born third out of these given to the second: this change in the mode of executing the power must take place whenever a second son becomes an elder, and any son becomes a second. No daughter can ever be entitled to a maintenance out of the estates whilst there is a son in existence, for no daughter will be [338] presumptively entitled until there is a failure of male issue. It may perhaps occur to your Lordships that these changes in the execution of the power of maintenance may render the accounts unnecessarily complicated. Courts of justice are not to consider the inconveniences that may follow from the execution of powers according to the terms by which they are created.

We can find nothing in the will that would authorize any Court to dispense with an exact compliance with the terms of this power, and we therefore think that it should be complied with to the letter.

Lord Eldon: This was an appeal from a decision made by the present Master of the Rolls, which came before this House in consequence of the Lord Chancellor of that day having signed an appeal, with a view to the case finding its way to this House, without its being immediately decided by the Lord Chancellor himself, and I confess it is matter of great satisfaction to me that the case has taken that course. From the first moment I read this will, I entertained considerable doubt whether, notwithstanding all the attention which had been paid to it in the Court below by a most able Judge, the decree which he had delivered was correct. When the matter was argued at the Bar of this House it occurred to me, notwithstanding what Lord Hardwicke had said in the case of Stephens v. Stephens, and what Lord Talbot had said in consequence of that determination, that the decision which had been made, with the subsequent decisions formed upon it, left the matter in such a state that it was of great importance to [339] have the question settled in the most solemn manner; and looking to those decisions which had taken place between the decision in the case of Stephens v. Stephens and the present, I found it one of the most difficult tasks that I ever have had to execute, to draw out the proper questions for the opinions of the learned judges; I think they will do me the justice to say that I exhausted the merits of the case by the questions which I addressed to them, and I should not satisfy myself if I did not say that the learned judges have given a most attentive consideration to this case, and have most plainly stated by the Lord Chief Justice their reasons for the opinion they have given. That opinion must necessarily lead to the reversal of the decree pronounced by the Master of the Rolls, and I conclude the little with which I have to trouble your Lordships, by stating, that having in view all the doctrines which have been stated in the answers to the questions addressed to the learned judges, I do hope that this at least will be a leading case, not affecting so much the distinctions in the earlier case as those which appear to me to exist in the cases between the decision of Stephens v. Stephens and this case.

The answers of the learned judges will necessarily lead to a reversal of this decree. The reversal of the decree will create the necessity of great care in forming the decree now to be made arising out of a will and codicil so singularly expressed as this is. I feel it my duty to return my humble thanks to the learned judges for having pointed out so distinctly what belongs to the case. With respect to the maintenance, I am happy that I have succeeded in drawing the [340] consideration of the learned judges to the point which was material; and I feel obliged to them for the rule which they have given in their answer in reference to that point, which will enable the House to do justice more fully than it could otherwise have done.

It is impossible, without taking these papers and going through them with great attention, to draw that which must be the judgment of the House. That may be done in one or other of two courses: the one is to state the law as it has been delivered by the judges, and to remit the case to the Court of Chancery to apply that law; the other is, instead of following that course ourselves, to pronounce a decree, and having had the assistance of the learned judges, I think it my duty to propose a decree in the very form in which it ought to be sent to the Court of Chancery by this House: thus, endeavouring to save that Court the trouble which must belong to the drawing out of a decree in a case so difficult as this is. I think that is the more wholesome way of proceeding, and I conceive my time will be thought by your Lordships not ill bestowed, if I can accomplish the purpose of drawing out such a decree as I think ought to be made, and ought to regulate subsequent cases, carrying with it the authority which belongs to a decree pronounced in the terms in which this decree should be.

In May 1829, further questions were put to the judges as follows :

1. Upon its being presumed that the decree, or decretal order, ought to be reversed, so far as the same declares that any son of the daughter of the [341] testator would have a present vested interest in, or be entitled to the estates at Southwood and Haverhill, in the will mentioned, or the rents and profits thereof, before he attains the age of twenty-one years, or have a present vested interest in or be entitled to the freehold estates devised by the codicil, or the rents and profits thereof, until he attains the age of twenty-one years, and takes upon himself the name of Elwes according to the testator's direction, and assuming that some son of the testator's daughter will hereafter acquire a vested interest therein, to whom do the rents and profits of the freehold and copyhold estates of the testator at Southwood and Haverhill in the will mentioned, and the rents and profits of the freehold estate in the codicil mentioned, go and belong respectively, until some son of the testator's daughter shall acquire a vested interest therein respectively, having regard to the whole words, contents and effect of the testator's will and codicil?

2. And assuming that the testator purchased copyhold estates after the date of the will, are such copyhold estates having such regard as aforesaid, to be considered as devised by the testator?

On the 23d of June, 1829, Alexander, C. B. after stating the provisions of the will and codicil on which the questions arose, delivered the unanimous opinion of the judges as follows :

The first question respects the rents and profits of the freehold and copyhold estates at Southwood and Haverhill. We are to assume that the specific devise of these estates is not immediate [342] and vested, but future and contingent; that it does not draw along with it the rents and profits intermediate between the death of the testator and the happening of the contingency, and we are desired to testify our opinion to whom, upon the whole frame of these testamentary dispositions, these intermediate profits go and belong.

We are of opinion that they go and belong to the surviving trustee of the testator's will, by force of the residuary clause in the will. This clause is as comprehensive as can be imagined. It extends in express words to "the residue of all the property to which he should be entitled at his decease, or over which he had a disposing power, to the residue of his estate of freehold, copyhold, or for years;" and then after some further enumeration, and lest something should escape, he adds "of whatever other nature or kind the same or any part thereof may be."

There can be no doubt that these would pass the intermediate rents not specifically disposed of. It is not essential to the effect of a residuary clause, that the testator should have had in his immediate contemplation, the property to which his expression applies. Its very nature and object is to envelope every thing, whether present at the moment to the mind of the testator or not. In Stephens v. Stephens (Ca. Temp. Talb. (Forr. Rep.) p. 228), a leading case on the subject of executory devises, of the same description with this, a residuary clause was held by the Court of King's Bench, with Lord Hardwicke at its head, to pass the intermediate rents and profits. Many other cases, if necessary, might be cited to [343] the same effect. It would not have been safe to have come to the conclusion I have intimated, without examining whether here is any other provision in the will, to narrow and limit the residuary clause, so as to exclude these intermediate rents. One only passage has been mentioned, the direction for sale. It is said, the testator could not mean an interest such as this to be sold: that it would be a strange direction to be applied to property of this description, and therefore that he could not intend to include it in his residuary bequest. Observations of this sort, oppose but a feeble obstacle to the necessary effect of clear words. They merit attention when the words are equivocal and ambiguous, and where, from the indistinctness of the language used, you must, to give it any meaning, from necessity, resort to probability and conjecture: but here the language is plain and explicit: and if upon any such reasoning, this interest were withdrawn from the residuary clause, the testator's language would not be construed but contradicted.

I feel that these observations may be deemed unnecessary, because in truth, the fact in which this doubt originates, fails almost entirely. The will, though it did originally, does not now direct any part of the freehold to be sold. The codicil re-vokes the power of sale, as to the freehold, and confirms the will: the will, therefore, must be read, as if there was no such direction to sell: and, therefore, that circumstance at this day, interposes no obstacle to the true construction of the words used in the residuary clause.

[344] We are of opinion, that by force of the residuary clause, the legal interest in the intermediate rents and profits of the Southwood and Haverhill estates, belongs to the surviving trustee of the testator's residuary estate.

The second question respects the intermediate rents of the freehold estates, devised by the codicil to the son of Mrs. Duffield, who shall first attain twenty-one, on his attaining that age.

The judges are also of opinion, that these rents and profits belong to the surviving trustee, by force of the same residuary clause, bound, as the former was, by the trusts declared in the will.

It is without question, that the legal fee simple of the estate, out of which these rents and profits are to arise, was devised, by the residuary clause in the will, to the trustees.

That devise must remain at this day in full force, except in so far as it is altered by the codicil. We must look, therefore, at the codicil, in order to ascertain how far it has altered the devise of these freehold estates, and to what extent it leaves them vested in the original devisees undisturbed. There are only two provisions in the codicil, which touch the freehold in question. The first is the revocation of the direction to sell this estate: the second is the contingent and executory devise to the first son of Mrs. Duffield attaining twenty-one, when that event shall happen.

How far do either of these curtail or limit the absolute gift in fee simple of the estate itself, contained in the previous will, to the trustee, upon the general trust reposed in him by the testator?

[345] It is obvious, that the revocation of the direction to sell, has no effect whatever of this nature. It left the legal estate in fee, as well as the beneficial trusts, absolutely untouched, and amounts only to an arrangement respecting the mode in which the trusts are to be executed.

The contingent and executory devise in the codicil, is a revocation pro tanto of the devise in the will of the same estates: it is an indirect revocation. The last revokes the first because they are inconsistent, and for that reason only. It revokes therefore to the extent in which they are inconsistent, and no further. Now how far are they inconsistent?

The gift is "of his freehold estates to the son of his daughter, who shall first attain twenty-one." We are to assume that this devise is contingent and executory: that nothing vests till the event happens; that no estate or interest, either legal or equitable, passes, until a son attains twenty-one. What becomes of it in the meantime? The prior devise found in the will, remains unrevoked. The estate or interest continues where the will had placed it, that is, in the trustees.

We are of opinion, therefore, that until the contingency shall happen, which is to vest the freehold estate in a devisee by force of the codicil, the rents and profits of that estate go and belong to the surviving devisee in trust of the residue named in the will.

As to the last question put by your Lordships, we are of opinion, that any copyhold purchased by the testator mesne between the will and the codicil passes by the will.

[346] The will has the effect upon this subject, which it would have had, if it had been made at the date of the codicil: for many years this has been the rule. The cases are too numerous to require that any of them should be mentioned. A codicil confirming a will, brings the will down to the date of the codicil. As the codicil bears date on the 3d of March, 1821, so in effect does the will. Then as the residuary clause devises all his copyhold estates, the estates supposed in the question, being at that time his copyhold estates, must pass by it. There have been some cases in which the republication of a will by a codicil, has not had this effect. The case of Strathmore v. Bowes (7 Term Reports, p. 182), is one. In these cases, it was manifest from the language of the codicil, that the testator did not intend to pass his lands purchased after the will.

Nothing of that kind is to be found in this codicil: it must therefore have the usual effect, and the will must pass these copyholds.

Lord Eldon: The judges having given their opinions, in answer to the questions put to them, on this and the former occasion, it is sufficient for me to say, that I concur in all those opinions.

[347] In the appeal on behalf of the children, the following order was made: (23d June, 1829). It is ordered and adjudged, that so much of the said decretal order as declares, that under and by virtue of the said will of the testator George Elwes, the said Defendant G. T. W. H. Duffield, as only son of the Plaintiff E. F. Duffield, by her husband the Plaintiff Thomas Duffield, living at the testator's death, took upon the testator's death, a presently vested equitable estate in fee, in the testator's freehold and copyhold farm and estate in Southwood Park, and freehold farm and estate at Haverhill, specifically devised by his will: subject to be divested by the death of the said G. T. W. H. Duffield under the age of twenty-one years, or by the birth of a second son of the Plaintiffs: and so much of the said decretal order as declares, that upon the birth of the Defendant Henry Duffield, the second son of the Plaintiffs, the said equitable estate of the said G. T. W. H. Duffield was divested, and that the said Henry Duffield took a vested equitable estate in fee, in the said Southwood Park and Haverhill estates, subject to be divested in the event of the said Henry Duffield dying, or becoming neither the second nor only son of the Plaintiffs, before he attains the age of twenty-one years be reversed: and it is declared, that no estate, according to the true construction of the will, would vest in any son, prior to his attaining the age of twenty-one years: and it is further ordered and adjudged, that so much of the said decretal order as declares, that such of the rents and profits of the said estates at Southwood Park and Haverhill, as [348] accrued before the birth of the said Henry Duffield, belong to the said G. T. W. H. Duffield, subject only to the allowance for his maintenance directed by the said will: and that such of the said rents as accrued since the birth of the said Henry Duffield, belong to the said H. Duffield, subject only to the allowance for his maintenance directed by the said will, be also reversed: but without prejudice to any question, with respect to the application of the rents and profits, or any part thereof, for the purpose of maintenance: and it is also declared, that the devise of the said testator's residuary freehold estates to trustees made by his will, is revoked by the codicil, subject to what is hereinafter stated, respecting the intermediate rents, issues, and profits thereof: and it is further ordered and adjudged, that so much of the said decretal order as declares, that under and by virtue of the said codicil, the Defendant G. T. W. H. Duffield, the eldest son of the Plaintiff E. F. Duffield, upon the testator's death, took a presently vested legal estate in fee, in all the testator's freehold property, lands, tenements and hereditaments, (except only the said Southwood and Haverhill estates specifically devised by his said will,) subject to be divested in case of the death of the said G. T. W. H. Duffield, under the age of twenty-one years: but without prejudice to the question, how far such estate may be affected, in case of the said Defendant G. T. W. H. Duffield should not, on his attaining his age of twenty-one years, change his name for that of Elwes, be also reversed: and it is further ordered and adjudged, that so much of the said decretal order as declares, that the rents and profits of [349] the said freehold property devised by the said codicil, accrued since the said testator's death, belong to the said G. T. W. H. Duffield, be also reversed: and it is further declared, that no son of the testator's daughter, under the effect of the codicil, took a presently vested estate in the testator's said freehold estates, but that the same will belong to the son of the testator's daughter, who shall first attain the age of twenty-one years: and according to the testator's direction, change his name for that of Elwes: and it is further declared, that the copyhold estates of the testator, purchased after the execution of his will, and before the execution of his codicil, if such be, had passed by the effect of the will to the person or persons, trustee or trustees, to whom copyhold estates are devised by the will, upon the trusts in the will mentioned: and it is also further declared, without prejudice to any question respecting maintenance, that the intermediate rents, issues, and profits of the testator's freehold and copyhold estates at Southwood Park and Haverhill, and his other freehold estates devised by the codicil, during the suspense and until the vesting of the executory devises thereof respectively, are to be considered, according to the effect of the will and codicil, as belonging and devised to the person or persons, the trustee or trustees, of the testator's residuary estates in his will mentioned, upon the trusts by the said will declared thereof: and it is further ordered, that with the reversals and declarations aforesaid, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Chancery, to do therein what is just, and in all respects consistent with this judgment.

[350] In the appeal on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. Duffield, in the right of Mrs. Duffield as heir at law, an order was made, containing the same declarations as in the order upon the appeal of the infants, and concluding thus:

It is ordered and adjudged, that the appeal so far as it seeks a declaration that the intermediate rents, issues, and profits of the estates at Southwood Park and Haverhill, and the freehold estate devised by the codicil, belong to the Appellants, in right of the Appellant E. F. Duffield, be dismissed, etc.

APPENDIX.

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

GORDON OF CLUNY,—Appellant; JOHN ANDERSON,—Respondent.

ET E CONTRA.

[S. C. 5 Scots R. R. 1, 3 Wils. and Sh. 1. See Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, i. pp. 115 et seq.]

A. being a tenant in possession of a farm, which he held after the expiration of a lease, made a proposal by missive, to take a new lease, upon the conditions of an offer made by W. for another farm belonging to the same estate. W. had engaged to enter into a lease, which was to contain "all the regulations to be laid down for the estate." G. the owner of the estate, by letter, accepted the proposal of A. on the footing of the offer of W. and "the general conditions laid down by him for the whole estate;" and this letter of acceptance provided, that a lease should be executed as soon as the other leases of the estate could be got ready. Three years after this proposal and acceptance, a document entitled articles and conditions, was signed by G. and various other proposed tenants of the estate, but not by W. or A. By one of these conditions it was provided, that "all the fodder should be used upon the farm, and none sold or carried away at any time." This document concluded by providing that the leases on the estate were to be granted upon, and to refer to the conditions therein contained. A few days after the signature of this document, a draft tack with various blanks, but containing a reference to the articles and conditions, and an obligation to [352] perform them, and a consent to the registration of them, was signed by the tenants, including W. but not A. He did however, two years afterwards, sign this draft tack which was never extended, or otherwise executed.

Held, that the draft tack as signed by A. was a probative document, and not a new contract between the parties, but referable to the preceding agreement and conditions; and that the condition prohibiting the sale or removal of straw, etc. applied to the last year of the term, and the way-going crop.

The draft tack not having been produced on the first hearing of the cause, held that the Appellant was liable for all the costs consequent upon the non production.

The Appellant was the proprietor of a large estate called Slains, consisting of a number of farms, subject to leases, which expired in 1801.

The Respondent being in possession, after the expiration of one of these leases, of a farm belonging to the Appellant, made proposals for a new lease, in a missive dated on the 28th of May, 1801, containing nine articles or conditions. By the last of which, he proposed to be bound to the conditions of an offer made by Mr. Wilkins for another farm belonging to the Appellant.

The offer of Mr. Wilkins had been made on the 23d of May, 1801, in a note or missive, containing various conditions, of which the last was in these terms:—"I engage to enter into a lease on the foregoing terms; the lease to contain all the regulations to be laid down for the estate, if by that * time digested and ready."

[353] By a letter addressed to the Respondent on the 2d of June, 1801, the Appellant prefixing a copy of the offer, added:—"I accept thereof, on the footing of Mr. Wilkins's offer, and the general conditions laid down by me for the whole estate;" and then after stating other stipulations, the letter concludes thus:—"A lease to be prepared and executed, as soon as the other leases of the estate can be got ready."

On the 5th of May, 1804, a document was drawn up, entitled "articles and conditions laid down by Mr. Gordon, for letting the estate of Slains." It consisted of twenty-one articles. The sixteenth article was in the following terms: "The whole fodder to be used upon the ground, and none sold or carried away at any time, hay only excepted, and all the dung to be laid upon the farm the last year of the lease." At the end of the articles these words were added:—"These are the articles and conditions referred to in the several offers made by us respectively, for different farms on the estate of Slains, of the dates hereto annexed to our respective subscriptions." The tenants to the number of twenty-one, subscribed the articles; but they were not subscribed either by Anderson or by George Wilkins. Then the articles proceeded in these terms:—"The above are the general articles and conditions, on which the leases on the estate of Slains are to be granted by me, and to be referred to therein."

The document at the conclusion had the signature of the Appellant and witnesses.

On the 12th of May, 1804, a draft tack between the Appellant and the tenants, was prepared in [354] the following terms:—"It is contracted, agreed, and enacted, between Charles Gordon of Chuny, Esq. heritable proprietor of the estate of Slains, of which the lands and others after mentioned are a part, of the one part, and of the other part, in manner and to the effect following, that is to say, the said Charles Gordon in consideration of the yearly tack duty of money and victual underwritten, and of the other prestations, conditions, stipulations, and reservations, specified and contained in a separate paper of general articles, subscribed by him, as relative to his leases of said estate, and to be held as part of these presents, hath set, and in tack and lease let, as he hereby sets, and in tack and asseda-tion lets to the said and his heirs, secluding assignees or sub-tenants, legal or voluntary, without the express consent of the proprietor, all and whole lying in the parish of Slains, and county of Aberdeen, as the same have been marched and bounded according to a new arrangement and plan of said estate, made by Thomas Johnston, land surveyor, subscribed by the said Charles Gordon, and already subscribed, or to be subscribed by the said with which contents and boundaries he holds himself satisfied, and that for the space of twenty-one years, and crops from and after the terms of Whitsunday 1801, which is hereby declared to have been the commencement of this tack, and the term of the said

, his entry; which tack, with and under the several prestations, conditions, stipulations, and reservations, before and after [355] specified, and in the articles referred to, the said Charles Gordon binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors, to warrant at all points: For the which causes on the other part, the said binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors, not only to adhere to, obey, and perform the whole articles, conditions, stipulations, and others contained in the general articles regarding said estate hereinbefore referred to, and held as part of these presents, but also to pay, etc." And then, after various provisions made respecting rent, etc. the draft concluded in the following terms:—"And both parties oblige themselves and their foresaids, to implement and perform their respective parts of the premises, and of the said separate articles to each other, under the penalty of £100 etc., and consent to the registration hereof, and of the said separate articles, as part, in the books of counsel and session, Sheriff Court books of Aberdeen, or others competent, etc." This document was signed by twenty-one tenants, including Wilkins, but not Anderson: he however, signed it two years afterwards.

* No other time is stated in the conditions, but that which appears in the paragraph in the text, viz. that of making the lease.

The Appellant became entitled to the estate some time before the expiration of the tack, and having reason to suppose that the Respondent intended to carry off the straw of the way-going crop upon his removal, he obtained from the sheriff of Aberdeenshire an interim interdict, to prevent the Respondent's purpose: but the interdict was afterwards recalled. The Appellant thereupon advocated: and the Lord Ordinary in respect of the decision of the House of Lords, in [356] the case of the Duke of Roxburgh v. Robertson (2 Bligh's Reports, 156), ordered informations to the Court, adding in a note, "that in a case where the practice which has so long subsisted in Scotland, is said to be totally subverted by a judgment of the Court of Review, it is necessary that both landlords and tenants should be speedily acquainted with the construction to be put upon such clauses, etc."

At this time the Appellant had not produced in evidence, the subscription of the Respondent to the draft tack: and on this ground the cause was remitted simpliciter. This evidence was afterwards supplied by leave of the Court, on payment of costs: but the Court in May 1825, found "that the sixteenth article of the general articles of lease, could not be held as applying to the crop of the last year of the lease: and that the rights of the parties respecting the same, must be regulated by the common law and usage of the county, etc."

Against this decision there was an appeal and cross appeal.

For the Respondent in the original, and Appellant in the cross appeal, the question upon the construction of clause was given up: but it was argued that the draft tack was not a probative document: that the provision not to remove straw the last year of the term, operated as a new and distinct contract, and could not be considered as a condition, even if there were a sufficient reference to the conditions in the documents signed by the Respondents.

[357] For the Appellant: Mr. Wilson and Mr. Wright.

For the Respondent: Mr. Keay and Mr. Miller.

The Lord Chancellor: The argument upon the construction of the clause has been properly given up: but it is contended that it was not binding on the tenant Mr. Anderson: that he had not subscribed it, and that he had never seen it when the lease was granted, and when he had taken possession of the farm. But in his letter, he refers distinctly to the proposal made by Mr. Wilkins, which had been accepted by Mr. Gordon, and which was to include the general conditions laid down for the whole estate. The Court below did not originally think it necessary, to decide the general question upon the construction of the clause, whether it applied to the last year of the lease, because they were of opinion, that there was not sufficient evidence that those regulations had been adopted by the tenant Mr. Anderson. He did not subscribe the paper of articles and conditions, and there was then no evidence that he had seen it. Afterwards the draft tack being produced, Mr. Gordon was permitted, on payment of costs, to make a new case. It then became, and is now the question, whether there was evidence to shew that the articles had been adopted? On the production of the draft tack, the Court below were of opinion, that the articles had been adopted by Anderson: the House will probably be of the same opinion.

It has been argued that this is a new contract, and if so, not having been entered into according [358] to the forms and ceremonies required by the law of Scotland it could not be binding upon the parties. It was said, that Mr. Anderson was in possession of the property as tenant, under the original agreement, and that if this were an entire new contract, not being executed in the manner required by the law of Scotland, it could not have varied the original terms. But this is not to be considered a new contract. It is nothing more than a completion of the first contract. There were certain terms and stipulations, by which one of the farms was to be held by Mr. Wilkins: these terms and stipulations were also to be binding on Mr. Anderson. There was a reference by one contract to the other. If those are not the terms and stipulations, there are no terms and stipulations existing with respect to the farm; but Mr. Anderson having subscribed this paper, although not until four years after he entered on the farm, has identified it as containing the regulations by which he was to be bound. It is to be viewed as nothing but a recognition by Mr. Anderson, that those are the regulations referred to in this contract. In this respect, the judgment should be affirmed. Upon the construction of the clause, it must be reversed. The costs consequent upon the non-production of this instrument in the first instance, were properly thrown upon Mr. Gordon. That part of the judgment should also be affirmed.

SCOTLAND.

(ADMIRALTY AND COURT OF SESSION.)

STRACHAN and GAVIN.—Appellants; PATON and others.—Respondents.[Mews' Dig. xiii. 16, 5 Scots R.R. 13. See Orington v. M'Vicar, 2 Macph. 1069.]

The owners of a ship applied by letter to S. and G. shipwrights, to lengthen and repair the ship, requesting them "to furnish an estimate of the probable cost, and also to note the prices of timber, and the rate of wages." The letter contained this passage: "The timber must be all English oak, and if you have a sufficient quantity on hand for the repair of the ship, besides her lengthening." S. and G. by letter, in answer, say, the expence of lengthening, on a rough calculation, will be £900; and as the vessel would require other repairs, it would be the best for both parties, to do the whole by day work. The letter then contains this passage: "The captain will have it in his power to keep an exact account of the articles expended, and to turn off any workmen that does not please him. We have on hand an excellent assortment of English oak timber of a suitable size for the vessel." A note of prices was added, "wages per day, 3s. 1d.; common English oak timber per foot, 5s." In a subsequent letter from the owners, announcing the dispatch of the ship, this postscript is added: "As it is understood that nothing is to be put into the ship but English oak timber and Dantzic oak plank, to which you must bind yourselves by letter, etc." To this, S. and G. answer thus: "With respect to the materials, we have a good stock of English timber and Dantzic plank, and little or no Hamburgh; so that Captain Young will have it in his power to take what he likes best." In a subsequent letter, the agent of the owners says: "I hope you will put on her the best of materials, and also the best of workmanship."

[360] The repairs were superintended by the captain, the carpenter, the master, and a part owner of the ship, and were completed in 1807. While the repairs were going on, the wages of carpenters were increased, by order of justices, to 6d. a day.

Immediately after the completion of the repairs, the ship sprang a leak of an alarming description on her return to port, when she was repaired by the owners, upon a notice given to the builders, who sent their foreman to inspect. After these repairs, the vessel was proceeding on a voyage to Davis Straits, but was obliged to put back on account of her leaky condition, and was detained twenty-two days on repairs, when the season being too late for the fishery in Davis Straits, she sailed on a fishing voyage to Greenland, and brought home a short cargo. These transactions took place in 1806 and 1807. In 1813, after various legal proceedings, upon inspection of the ship, it appeared that American oak had been used in the repairs of the ship: that two of the bolts had been driven and clenched imperfectly; that there was one hole without a tree-nail; and that the vessel after the lengthening and repair, had increased in the midships five feet in width.

Held, under these pleadings and proofs, that the shipwrights had no right to charge in their account, the additional 6d. per day for wages, nor for the price of superior oak timber; that they were answerable in damages, for having used American instead of English oak, for the repairs done by the Respondents, and for the supposed loss in the fishing voyage, consequent upon the detention for repairs.

Held also, that the costs were properly given against the Appellants, although they had a judgment for a balance after allowance of all the deductions for damages.

The Appellants were shipwrights at Leith. The Respondents were partners in a whale fishing company at Montrose.

In 1806, the agent of the Respondents applied by letter to the Appellants, requesting them to furnish an estimate of the probable cost of lengthening and repairing a whaler, called the Eliza Swan. The letter contained the following passage: "I am required also to request you to note the prices of timber, planks, etc. and the rate of wages, together with your dock dues: the timber must be all English oak: and if you have a sufficient quantity on hand for the repair of the ship, besides her lengthening, etc." The Appellants, by a letter, in answer to this application, say, that the expence of lengthening cannot be estimated correctly, without further information, but upon a rough calculation, it would be about £900; and as the vessel would require other repairs, it would be the best for both parties, to do the whole by day work. The letter then contains this passage: "The captain will have it in his power to keep an exact account of the articles expended, and to turn off any workmen that does not please him. We have on hand an excellent assortment of English oak timber, of a suitable size for the vessel." A note of prices was added: and among others, "wages per day, 3s. 4d., common English oak timber per foot, 5s." After some further correspondence, the agent of the Respondents informed the Appellants, that the ship would be with them in a few days, and adds this postscript: "As it is understood, that nothing is to be put into the ship but English oak timber and Dantzic oak plank, to which you must bind yourselves by letter, as you did not mention in your letter of the 11th current, the plank to be Dantzic." To this the Appellants answered: "The Eliza Swan is not yet arrived; we are all clear for her, and expect [362] her up every tide. With respect to the materials, we have a good stock of English timber and Dantzic plank, and little or no Hamburgh; so that Captain Young will have it in his power to take what he likes best: and we hope to be able to execute the work to the satisfaction of every one concerned." After the receipt of this letter, the Respondents' agent wrote thus to the Appellants: "I had a letter from Captain Young on the arrival of the Eliza Swan, and that she goes into dock on the 15th current: and hope you will put on her the best of materials, and likewise the best of workmanship on her, and return her as soon as possible."

After this correspondence the ship was docked, the repairs were completed in January, 1807; having been personally superintended by the captain, the master, the carpenter, and a part owner of the ship. The charge for the repairs amounted to £2685 3s. 8d., of which £1350 were paid on account. During the repairs, the wages of carpenters were increased 6d. a day, by order of justices. The Respondents having refused to pay the remainder of the demand, alleging that the repairs had been inefficiently done, and not according to contract, an action was raised against them in the Court of Admiralty, concluding for payment of the balance of their bill with interest.

To this action, the Appellants put in defences, in which they objected to a charge in the account of 6d. a day additional for wages, and 6s. per foot for oak. They also raised a counter-action, and afterwards a supplemental counter-action, concluding that the Appellants should remove the foreign timber, which had been used in the [363] repairs, or that the Respondents might substitute British oak, at the cost of the Appellants, and that the Appellants might pay damages for the loss, which had been consequent upon the default in the repair of the ship, which consisted chiefly in repairs done by the Respondents in 1807, 1811, and 1814, and the deficiency of the cargo on the voyage to Greenland.

It appeared in evidence, that immediately after the completion of the repairs, on the voyage from Leith to Montrose, the vessel became so leaky, that she was in danger of being water-logged. At Montrose she was repaired by the Respondents, notice having been given to the Appellants, who sent their foreman to inspect the state of the vessel. After this repair, the vessel was proceeding on her fishing voyage to Davis Straits, but was obliged to put back on account of her leaky condition. She was at that time judiciously inspected at Montrose; several deficiencies were discovered in the outward planking, both as to the planks and the caulking, and plugging of the seams and holes: no other defect is mentioned, as the result of this examination. The vessel was detained for these repairs twenty-two days, and was then employed in the Greenland Fishery, the season being too late for the fishery in Davis Straits, and she brought home a short cargo. There was proof that American oak had been used in the repairs, but that it had been selected by the Respondents. There was also proof that one of the tree-nail holes and some of the nail-holes were empty: that two of the bolts were short, not going through the knees so as to clench, and pieces of bolts were driven from the inside, to [364] give the appearance of being properly clenched; that the caulking was found to be slack after the ship had left the repairing docks; and that she had become five feet wider in the midships, but from what precise cause was not ascertained, otherwise than by the opinion of Mr. Stone, in his report as stated below.

The inspection of the vessel, from which principally the evidence in the cause was furnished, took place in the year 1814. The actions being conjoined, the Judge-Admiral pronounced a judgment, by which he found that the Appellants were not intitled to charge for work or timber, any higher rates than were specified in the letter of the 14th of July: that they were bound to furnish the sorts of timber agreed to, but were intitled nevertheless to charge for the American oak used in the repairs. He farther found that the Respondents were intitled in the counter action, to the expense of the repairs at Montrose, the wages of the captain and crew during the repairs, and the expense of the repairs done after the Greenland voyage. But he repelled the claim for damages, for the loss alleged to have been sustained by the unsuccessful fishing in the Greenland voyage, and the claim for repairs with English instead of American oak. This judgment was afterwards brought before the Court of Session, where the Lord Ordinary having advocated the cause, and having in part reversed the judgment of the Judge-Admiral, the Respondents reclaimed to the Inner House, who remitted the case to Mr. Stone, the master builder, at the dock yard at Deptford, to consider the same, with the proof particularly as regards the manner in which the bolts were [365] driven and clenched, and the length and sufficiency of the beams.

Mr. Stone made a report, stating his opinion, collected from the proofs in the cause; which opinion as to the bolts, was to the effect before set forth in the statement of the evidence: and as to the length and sufficiency of the beams, he says: "I am at a loss to account for any motive (on the part of the Appellants,) in allowing such a thing; but I admit the probability, that the beam said to be five inches short, might have been so much short, or nearly so when put in." He then gave an opinion in form hypothetical, but appearing to be founded upon evidence in the cause, "that the increase of width in the midships, was not the effect of working, but for want of a proper security to connect the beam to the side, or shortness of the beam when put into the ship, want of judgment in proportioning the quantum of fastening, or negligence in the execution of the work." As to the use of American oak, he said, "that experience had since proved, that in a very short time, oak of American growth becomes very defective, and is very subject to fungi."

Upon advising the cause with this report, in 1824, the Court approved the report: altered the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, as to the additional charge for wages and the price of timber, and as to the counter-claim of the Respondents, for repairs done by them in 1811 and 1814, the short fishing in 1807, and the use of American instead of English oak by the Appellants in the original repairs, and found accordingly, directing a condescendence as to particulars and amount.

[366] After this interlocutor, the parties agreed, (without prejudice to the question on appeal,) that £100 should be taken as the damages for the short fishing, and the use of American oak.

The Court thereupon decerned accordingly.

The appeal was against this decision.

For the Appellants: The Solicitor General (Tindal) and Mr. J. Campbell.

For the Respondents: Dr. Lushington and Mr. Keay.

The Lord Chancellor, after stating some of the facts of the case, proceeded thus:

The first question that will arise will be, whether or not the shipwrights at Leith, having instituted the suit against the ship owners for the recovery of the sum due for the repairs, amounting to £1700, any reduction should be made in consequence of the insufficiency of the repairs? According to the law of this part of the island, much that is insisted on the part of the Defendants, would have been the subject of a cross action: but no such question arises according to the state of the pleadings in this case (see p. 62).

The expences incurred after the return of the vessel to Montrose, ought to fall upon the Appellants. The work became necessary, in consequence of their default. They sent their foreman, upon a notice, to view the state of the vessel: and no witnesses having been examined to rebut the evidence of the Respondents on this point. The same argument applies to the repairs done [367] after the return of the vessel from the first Greenland voyage. Upon taking off the doubling, she was found to be in an imperfect condition. What was then done was absolutely necessary, and resulted from the omission of the Appellants.

In the year 1814, which is several years afterwards, the vessel was inspected, and it was then those defects were discovered. The vessel was examined by persons every way competent to form a judgment. It is sworn, that at that period some of the beams that were put in were too short, some of the bolts, (one of them, if not more,) were too short, and bolts were driven in on the other side, to give them the appearance of having passed through. The whole of that evidence was submitted by the Court below to Mr. Stone the master shipwright, at Deptford dock-yard, and he has made a report. I do not at all concur in the observations made at the bar upon that report, for I find no fault with regard to the general scope and tenor of it: he is of opinion, that those defects discovered in 1814, were the effects of the imperfect manner in which the work had been done by the shipwrights at Leith. I am ready to make every allowance for the interval of time that has elapsed from 1806 to 1814, and particularly with respect to a vessel engaged in the Greenland fisheries: but still, looking at this evidence—paying attention to it, and making every fair and just allowance—the impression upon my mind is, that it is satisfactorily made out, that those defects which were discovered in the year 1814, and which were then repaired, are properly referable to the original omission of the shipwrights: and if so, I think they are bound [368] to make compensation. The Court below were of that opinion. I concur in that opinion, and submit to your Lordships that it would be proper in that respect, to confirm the opinion of the judges in Scotland.

Your Lordships will not think it necessary for me to read the evidence to you. It is very voluminous, and in detail. I state fairly, that, after much attention, that is the result of the impression it has made upon my mind. I think the evidence is all one way. There is much reasoning, and very good reasoning, on the other side; but almost all the evidence is in favour of the present Respondent.

Another question that arose, which, though not a question very material in point of amount, is not immaterial in principle, was this: The vessel was detained upon the first repair twenty-two days at Montrose. She afterwards sailed upon her fishing voyage, and came back with an imperfect cargo. The owners of the vessel claim compensation upon this account. The answer that is given, or at least one of the answers, is this, if the vessel had sailed upon the original destination, you are not sure, upon so precarious an adventure, that she would have come back with a larger cargo. But if a vessel is detained for twenty-two days, at a time when she ought to have been on her voyage, (and she was detained these twenty-two days in consequence of the deficiency of the repairs of the shipwrights,) and the parties have been deprived of the fair chance of gaining the advantage resulting from the use of their vessel during that time, I apprehend they are entitled to compensation in the shape of [369] damages. I am quite satisfied, upon an action so framed in this part of the island, that damages would be recovered, for the parties had lost for twenty-two days the use of their vessel.

I do not mean, nor do the parties who are concerned in this appeal mean, to impute moral blame to the shipwrights, for using American oak instead of English oak, because at that period, according to the evidence, it was supposed that American oak was as good as English oak: and the evidence states that the price was about the same: but it has turned out in the result—the evidence establishes the fact—that American oak decays much more rapidly than English oak, and in the present instance, the orders were "English oak." These orders were accepted by the shipwrights, and by the acceptance of those orders it was incumbent upon them to see that nothing but English oak should be used: if they took upon themselves to use any other, they have been guilty of an infringement of the contract; and if they have been guilty of an infringement of the contract, they are liable to an action, and liable to make compensation in damages, for the consequences that have resulted from the breach of that contract. The only ground upon which it is resisted is, that Captain Young was present at the time. But I do not find that Captain Young was vested with any authority, to dispense with the terms of this written contract, with regard to the particulars I have before alluded to; and if the parties take upon themselves to use American instead of English oak, contrary to the terms of their contract, supposing it to be as good,—if it has turned out that their judgment is erroneous, [370] they are bound to make compensation to the ship owners.

There are two other points remaining for consideration. Before the vessel was sent to Leith, the company took the precaution to direct their agent to write a letter, to ascertain the probable expence of lengthening the vessel, and to ascertain the rate of charge, with respect to the wages and materials. For a part of the time those wages were charged at 3s. 4d. and for a part of the time an increased rate of 6d. was charged: and the ground upon which this increased charge was made was, that in fact, while this work was going on, there was a general increase of wages at the rate of 6d. a day: but looking at the distinct and precise terms of this contract, if any loss arises from that increase of wages, it ought to fall, not upon the ship owners, but the shipwrights. The parties sent to know the rate of wages. "What do you mean to charge?" "3s. 4d. a day." It does not appear that 3s. 4d. a day is the price that is paid to the men: 3s. 4d. is the price that the shipwrights are to charge the ship owner. There is no evidence to shew the actual price paid to the labourers by the shipwrights. I consider that they contract, "While this work is going on, we will charge at the rate of 3s. 4d. No matter what contract we have made with our men. We may agree with them by the day, by the week, or by the year. We may employ our apprentices, who are perhaps not paid at all, or at a very low rate. We shall charge you 3s. 4d." If an increase has taken place before this work was completed, the loss, I think, ought in justice to fall upon the shipwrights.

[371] The other point is as to the common English oak. That is charged in the note at 5s. and part of the timber has been charged at the rate of 6s.; and the ground upon which that charge is made is, that it was oak of a superior quality, and ought to be charged at the rate of 6s. They were not justified in making that charge. When they say that common oak is to be charged at such a rate, the party is deluded, unless that is meant to apply to the general run of oak timber throughout the vessel. It was incumbent upon them to have stated, that the common oak timber was to be charged so much, but that it was necessary for certain purposes to use superior oak, to be charged at an increased rate. The Appellants saying the price was 5s. without making any distinction as to the use of any superior oak timber, must be considered bound by it. But the case does not rest here: they say for the beams, and the keel, and the keelson, and for the knees, superior oak timber is requisite: but upon the evidence it turns out, that in the keel and keelson, or in a great part of what they did, they did not use superior oak timber, which means superior English oak timber, but they used American oak: and it appeared also, as to some of the knees, that they were American oak. Therefore, I think upon the fact, that they are not entitled to have this charge sustained.

There is one remaining point, which relates to the expenses. The expenses of the proceedings have been, by the Court below, thrown upon the shipwrights. Now it is said at the bar, (and upon the part of the Appellants the case was argued [372] by English counsel,) that that is not just and does not correspond with our practice in this part of the island, because the shipwrights have recovered a considerable part of their demand: they have recovered to the extent of £600, and having recovered to that extent, it is very hard and unjust that they should have to pay all the expenses. But I think, in the first place, that the rules with respect to costs in this part of the island, are rules of practice: rules of law established with regard to our proceedings. We cannot well reason, from our practice, as to such questions in Courts in any other jurisdiction. But if we come to sift the question, I do not think the argument applies in the manner in which it is pressed. If this inquiry had taken place in England, there must have been two actions. The shipwrights must have proceeded in their action to recover their demand, and the ship owners must have brought a cross action for the damage they had sustained, by the imperfect manner in which the contract was executed; and these two actions must have gone to their termination as two separate actions. Upon the action for damages brought by the ship owners, if they recovered, they would have recovered the entire costs. Now when we advert to these proceedings, almost all the expenses result out of that part of the investigation. Therefore, applying the principle that prevails in this country, and the practice in this country, to the proceedings in this instance, it appears to me, that the result would be nearly the same. And with respect to the action brought by the shipwrights, the ship owner would have had an easy mode of obviating [373] the necessity of paying costs in that action. He would have said, "I claim to deduct two items; that part of your charge for superior oak, and that part of your charge for wages." He might have paid into Court the difference; and if the party had gone on to try the merits of the case, as far as it relates to these points, and he had failed, the costs of the action would have been thrown upon the shipwrights; and therefore, as, when we apply the principle that prevails here to this particular case, there would not be much diversity in the result, I propose that that part also of the decision should be affirmed.

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

POOR ISOBEL M'DIARMID with her Husband. Appellants; JOHN and JAMES M'DIARMID, Respondents.

[S. C. in Court of Session, 3 Wils. and Sh. 37: 1 Shaw 583. See note to Ball v. Mannin, 1829, 3 Bli. N. S. 1.]

J. M., a man eighty-three years old, being entitled under the provisions of a trust disposition and settlement, to the annual produce of a fund, during his life, estimated at the value of £6000, but subject to reduction, in the proportion of one-third, upon the event of a suit, executed a deed, by which he renounced all his interest in the fund, and assigned it to his daughter and her husband, to whom the reversion belonged, in consideration of an annuity of £10 a year, to be paid to him for life out of the fund, and his funeral expenses. In a suit instituted to reduce this deed, it was admitted that he was weak and infirm, and addicted to intoxication; and it appeared that the deed was drawn up by the agents of the daughter and her husband, and that no agent or other person was employed on the part of the father. Under these circumstances, the deed was held void and reduced, and the judgment affirmed on appeal.

By a trust-disposition and settlement executed in 1813, by Angus M'Diarmid and his wife, making a provision for her, by way of annuity, in bar of her legal rights, their heritable and moveable estate, in case Angus M'Diarmid should [375] leave no issue of his body at his death, or their afterwards failing, was limited to John and Catherine M'Diarmid, his father and mother, and the survivor, whom failing, to Hugh M'Diarmid, Christian M'Diarmid, and the Appellant Isobel, his brother and sisters, equally among them, their respective heirs, executors, or assignees. There was also a provision, that in case his mother should die, and his father marry again, his right should determine, and the estate devolve to his brother and sisters; in which case the father was to have right to the occupation of a house, and the trustees to pay him an annuity of £10 during life.

In February 1823, Angus died, leaving his widow, his father, and the Appellant Isobel surviving. His mother, and Hugh and Christian M'Diarmid, his brother and sister, were dead.

The property left was estimated at £6000. The widow thinking her provision inadequate, instituted a suit to reduce the deed, and re-establish her legal provision.

In March 1823, a deed was drawn up by the agent of the Appellants, and by their direction, in which John M'Diarmid and the Appellants were made parties. It recited the trust-disposition and settlement, and an agreement, whereupon it provided, that in consideration of an annuity of £40 a year, to be paid to John M'Diarmid out of the trust funds, he renounced all his right and interest in the trust property, except, etc. the annuity, and thereby agreed and declared, and bound and obliged himself, etc. "that his right to the heritable and moveable estate, except, etc. (as to the annuity) should thenceforth cease and determine, and that the same should [376] devolve and belong, and he thereby gave, granted, assigned, and disposed the same from him, etc. to the person or persons having right after him to the said heritable and moveable property by the deed of settlement." There was a farther obligation on his part, to execute deeds in legal form to effectuate the agreement; and the Appellants on their part, bound themselves to pay to John M'Diarmid £40 a year out of the trust-funds; and both parties thereby authorized the trustees to pay the annuity, and to give effect to all the provisions of the deed.

The draft of this deed was sent to the Appellants by their agent, with an intimation that it would be proper that some man of business should revise it on the part of John M'Diarmid, or that it should be read over and explained to him by some intelligent person, not interested in the matter.

The deed was executed on the 1st of April, no agent having been employed on the part of the father.

On the 7th of May following, he executed a deed in favor of the Respondent James M'Diarmid, with a power to set aside the former deed.

An action of reduction was thereupon brought by the Respondents against the Appellants, charging fraud on the part of the Appellants, in obtaining the agreement, and facility on the part of the Respondent John M'Diarmid in granting it; charging also want of consideration, enormous lesion, and that the deed was intrinsically irrational. The Appellants in their defence, admitted the age and infirmity of the Respondent John M'Diarmid, and that he was liable to get [377] intoxicated, that no agent was employed on his part, and that the amount of the trust-funds, deducting the widow's claim, would be about £4000. The Court finally sustained the reasons of reduction, and adjudged accordingly. The appeal to the House of Lords was from this judgment.

For the Appellants: Mr. Fullerton and Mr. Wilson.

For the Respondents: Mr. Keay and Mr. Miller (the counsel for the Respondents were not heard).

The Lord Chancellor, after stating the facts of the case, proceeded as follows:

It does not appear that any legal adviser whatever, was called in on the part of the Respondent, previously to the execution of this deed, although it was suggested by the solicitors on the part of the Appellants, that that was the course which ought to be taken. It does not ap-[378]-pear that any one of the trustees of this property was informed of the existence of the deed, although the solicitors for the Appellants, suggested that that was the proper course. Under these circumstances, the deed which was thus executed is the subject of a very strong suspicion; but that suspicion is very much strengthened, when we come to look at the deed itself.

In the situation in which John M'Diarmid stood, he was entitled to an income arising out of the property, to the extent of upwards of £200 a year. In another view of the case, he was entitled to the whole property and the disposition of it (during life.) The property amounted, as far as he was interested in it, to £3000 or £4000. The whole of this property was conveyed away by this deed, with the reservation of £40 a year to John M'Diarmid for his life, without any equivalent whatever. Considering the manner in which the deed was obtained, the situation of the party executing the deed, and the dispositions of the deed itself, you will view the transaction with very great suspicion.

But it is material to consider the frame of the deed itself, according to the substance of the deed. It was nothing more than a renunciation of property to which this old man was entitled. He gives up the whole of the property, reserving to himself £40 a year during his life. It is nothing more than a relinquishment of property, and it ought to have appeared obviously on the face of the deed. But when you look at the deed itself, it purports to be an obligation or agreement between the parties; and the deed professes to give something as an equivalent for that renunciation [379] of property, being entitled an obligation and agreement on the back of the deed itself. The consideration is stated to be the grant of this annuity. There was no annuity granted; it was nothing more than a retention on the part of this individual of property to which he was entitled. There was, in point of fact, no consideration whatever; and yet on the face of the deed, it purports to be for the consideration of this annuity, which the parties do not bind themselves to pay, but which is to be paid out of the trust-funds.

Considering the situation of the individual himself, who executed the deed,—his character,—his age,—his infirmity,—his liability to be operated upon by the suggestions of those who were about him; considering the manner in which that deed was obtained, no person having been called in to advise upon it; and considering that the suggestions which were made by the solicitors for the Appellants themselves, as to the course which ought to be pursued, were disregarded; considering also the frame of the deed, it appears to me, that there was abundantly sufficient to justify the decision of the Court below, who considered this transaction as an imposition and fraud on this old man.

One of the grounds stated by the Appellants for the purpose of justifying this transaction is this, that a provision was made for the widow of Angus by the original deed; that she was dissatisfied with that provision, and that she had instituted proceedings for the purpose of reducing the original deed; and it is supposed that the old man was apprehensive that if the original deed [380] was set aside in this action by the widow, he would be deprived of all means of subsistence, and therefore that he was willing to make this species of compromise. But that was a gross delusion. If the widow had a right to set aside the deed, she had a right to set it aside only to the extent to which she was herself interested, and the rest of the deed must remain; and, as one of the learned judges stated in the Court below, that forms an additional reason for vacating this transaction, as having been founded in delusion on the part of this old man. The Court below were fully justified in the opinion they formed of this transaction. There is sufficient in the case, as it now appears, to justify the Court in setting aside this deed, under the circumstances under which it was obtained.

It may be satisfactory to your Lordships to know, that when this case was opened by the Appellants' counsel, a noble and learned Lord (Lord Eldon), who held the office to which I have the honour to succeed, was present, and paid great attention to every part of it. I have had some conversation with him upon the subject, and he has authorized me to state, that he perfectly concurs in the view I have stated to your Lordships.

Judgment affirmed.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

GRAHAM and another, Appellants; TEMPLER and others, Respondents

[Mews' Dig. xiv. 360; S. C. 3 Wils. and Shaw 47.]

G. by trust deed, disposed lands at his death to trustees, to convey to his first and other sons in succession, and the heirs male of their bodies respectively, and in default of such issue, to the first son of either of his daughters who should first attain the age of twenty-one years and his heirs; but in case his daughters should both die, and have no such son of either of them, to convey to G. and R. his nephews. The residue of his real estate he gave to the same trustees to sell, for the use of his daughters; and he assigned and disposed to the same trustees, for the use of his heirs and substitutes, etc. in the order in the deed mentioned, the charters, etc. and rents, "for now, and in all time coming."

Held, that the rents accruing between the death of the disposer, and the event on which the lands were to vest in a son of the daughter, belonged not to the daughters as heirs portioners, nor as disposed to them under the residuary clause of the deed, but were to be held in trust for the parties who should become entitled under the dispositions of the deed.

By a trust-deed executed in 1808, Thomas Graham granted, disposed, and assigned to, and in favour of himself during his life; and at his death, to, and in favour of his wife and other trustees, all his estates real and personal, according to their respective qualities, upon trust, for the pay-[382]-ment of an annuity to his wife, and a sum of £5000 to his daughter; and subject to those burdens, the trustees were to convey the estates to the first and other sons of the disposer in succession, and the heirs male of their bodies respectively; and in default of such issue, to the first son of either of his daughters, who should first attain the age of twenty-one years and his heirs; but in case his daughters should both die, and have no such son of either of them, to convey certain lands to George Graham and his heirs; and other lands, or an estate called Burleigh, to his nephew Robert Graham; and then upon further trust, to sell the residue of his real estate, and assign the produce of the sale, together with the residue of his personal estate, equally, "share and share alike as tenants in common, between his wife and his two daughters, for their separate use." The Disposer then by the deed, assigned and disposed to himself and the trustees, for the use of his heirs and substitutes, and in the order there-inbefore mentioned, all his charters, etc.; and also the whole rents, feu duties, maills, profits, and casualties thereto belonging, and tacks, if any be subsisting at the time, "for now, and in all time coming."

This deed was drawn up by an English conveyancer, and executed in England by the disposer, upon the eve of his departure for India. He afterwards resided partly, and died in England in 1819, leaving a widow and two daughters. The widow died in 1820. The suit in the Court below was commenced by the two daughters, who by an action raised against the trustees, claimed the by-gone and future rents of the lands of Bur-[383]-leigh and Kinross, from the death of their father, until an heir should appear, entitled to take up the succession to those lands. These rents were so claimed, either as not disposed of by the deed, or as passing to them under the residuary clause.

The trustees in their defences contended that the rents passed together with the lands as accessories, and belonged to the heirs named in the deed.

The Lord Ordinary held that the direction (in the deed) was such, as necessarily to imply, that the conveyance of the land should not be made until after an event should have happened, and that there was no provision that the daughter's son should have the intermediate rents, or that in the intermediate time, it should be managed for his profit, and decreed in terms of the conclusions of the libel.

The trustees having reclaimed against this judgment, the Court altered the interlocutor and assolized the defenders.

The appeal was against this decision.

For the Appellants were cited as authorities.—Hyslop, Fac. Coll. Jan. 18, 1811; Arkwright, J. D. Dec. 3, 1819; Niven, March 6, 1823; 2 Shaw and Dunlop, 250; Souther, Jan. 22, 1801, (No. 2, Imp. Will.); Earl of Stair, in D. P. May 24, 1826, June 19, 1827, MSS.

The counsel for the Respondents were not heard in argument, the Lord Chancellor having intimated an opinion that the clause assigning the rents was conclusive, and upon his motion and opinion the judgment was affirmed. (See the English Case of Duffield v. Duffield, ante p. 342.)

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

The INCORPORATION of FLESHERS of GLASGOW, —Appellants; CHRISTIAN (NELSON) SCOTLAND, —Respondent.

A trading corporation having by its bye-laws fixed a rate of allowance to be made to the widows of deceased members, subject only to variation upon a defect of funds, cannot exercise a discretionary power as to the rate of allowance, but may be compelled by process in the ordinary Courts of Justice, (no defect of funds being alleged) to make the allowance fixed in a bye-law in favour of the widow of a freeman, who had entered after the date of the bye-law in question, and paid upon his entry a sum of money to the funds of the corporation, and made a small annual payment to the time of his death.

The costs incurred by an investigation of a disputed fact not allowed to a party who had the judgment upon the general question of right, the fact being found against that party.

In 1807, the Incorporation of Fleshers in Glasgow recorded in their books, a resolution proposed by the deacon and masters, and adopted by the whole body of the ordinary members, "that the annual allowances to reduced members and widows, should in future, be to men bers who have carried on the Flesher trade for five years, £12 sterling; to members who have not carried [385] on the trade five years, £6 3s.; to pendicles, (members not carrying on the trade) £3; to widows of the first class, £8; of the second class, £5; of the third class, £3; but with power to the master-court to increase their allowances as circumstances shall require, or diminish the same, if the funds of the trade are to be encroached on, or will not afford these allowances."

In 1809, James Scotland, who had married the Respondent, entered as a member of the Incorporation, and paid upon his entry, £1 8s. 10½d. to the funds, and afterwards, until his death in 1819, paid annually a contribution of one shilling.

Upon the death of her husband, the Respondent raised an action before the magistrates of Glasgow against the Corporation, setting forth in her summons the facts before stated, except the resolution recorded in the books, to which she alleged that access had been refused by the Corporation. The summons concluded for payment of the yearly sum of £8 sterling, or such other sum as should be found upon inspection of the regulations, to be the amount to which she was entitled.

The Corporation in their defences, contended, 1st. That the allowance was in their discretion, as a matter of charity, which could not be controlled by a Court of Justice. 2d. That the Respondent's husband had not carried on the trade for five years before his death, and therefore, conceding the first point, that she was not entitled to a larger allowance than an annuity of £5.

Upon advising proofs, the magistrates citing [386] Finlay v. Newbiggin (15th Jan. 1793), found that Corporations of tradesmen in royal burghs, were subject to the control of competent Courts, with regard to the application of their funds, to the legitimate purposes to which these funds were destined; and afterwards they found, that from the minutes of the Corporation, and other evidence, the Respondent's claim to aliment appeared to rest on the contract of the parties, express or implied, and not to fall under the rule recognized in the case of Paterson v. the Corporation of the Skinners of Edinburgh (10th Feb. 1803), in which it does not appear that the deceased husband of the claimant had made any payment at the date of his entry, or any subsequent payments, on the condition, express or implied, of his widow receiving a corresponding aliment. Afterwards on advising additional proof, they found the pursuer entitled to an annuity of £8 and decreed accordingly.

Upon advocacy to the Lord Ordinary, he reversed this judgment, on the authority of the case of Paterson. But the Respondent having reclaimed to the Court of Session, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary was varied: the Court decreeing for the payment of the annual allowance of £5 sterling, and allowed only the costs incurred in the discussion of the question of right.

Against this decision there was an appeal and cross appeal.

For the Appellants: The Solicitor General and Mr. Fullerton.

[387] For the Respondents: Mr. Keay and Mr. Miller.

The Lord Chancellor: Upon the agitation of this question, two points have been submitted to the consideration of the various tribunals, before whom this question has been considered. One point, and a material point for consideration, is, as to whether or not this right can be enforced in a Court of Justice? Another question, and that is a question of fact, is, as to whether the Respondent is entitled to the £5 annuity, or to the annuity of £8 a year? With respect to the first and material point for consideration, it is to be recollected, that this was an agreement entered into between the members of this society; that after that agreement had been entered into, Mr. Scotland became a member of the society; made his payments as a member of the society; continued a member of the society till the time of his death; and became therefore a party to the agreement, and entitled to all the benefits of the agreement for himself, and for his widow in the event of her surviving.

There has been no dispute in the progress of this cause, as to the poverty of the claimant, as to her being in indigent circumstances, so as to entitle her to the benefit of this regulation. There has been no impeachment whatever of her moral conduct. It is admitted that she comes fairly within the rule; and the question is, whether, coming fairly within the rule, there being no exception on the ground of her not being indigent, there being no exception whatever to her on account of any impropriety of conduct, this so-[388]-ciety have a right arbitrarily to withhold this payment; because they can arbitrarily withhold this payment, unless there is a means of enforcing the payment through the medium of a Court of Justice? I apprehend this is to be considered as an agreement and an arrangement, between this society and every individual member of the society, and, so long as this arrangement continues in force, every member has a right to the benefit of it; and if that benefit is attempted to be withheld from him, he is entitled to come to a Court of Justice for the purpose of claiming redress.

This was the view of the case taken by the Court of Session, and accordingly they pronounced the interlocutor, against which this appeal has been preferred.

This judgment ought to be affirmed. The only argument that was pressed against it, in point of authority, arose out of the case of Paterson against the Corporation of Skinners of Edinburgh; but that case has no reference whatever to that before your Lordships. It is true, that was a case of aliment; but in the case of Paterson against the Corporation of Skinners, it appears, according to the facts of that case, that in the regulations which existed for the original constitution of that corporation, each individual case was considered by itself; that the claimant preferred her claim to the corporation—they considered the nature of her claim, and made her such allowance as they thought proper; and it appeared that they were in the habit, from time to time, of withdrawing those allowances, according to their own discretion, and their sense of the propriety [389] of the act. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that that case has no resemblance to a case like the present, where an arrangement was entered into with respect to a fixed amount, appropriated according to a certain course of payment, to which all the members of the corporation were parties.

With respect to the question of fact, as to whether the woman is entitled to the five or the eight pounds, I will not go through the detail of the evidence. I will only state generally, that after having looked with as much attention as I can into the subject, it is not made out in a manner satisfactory to my mind; at least it is not made out and established in evidence, that her husband carried on the business of a flesher for a period of five years and upwards; and that not being made out satisfactorily in point of evidence, the consequence is, that she cannot be entitled to claim more than the sum of £5 a year.

With respect to the costs, the manner in which the costs have been arranged, appears to me also to be fair and equitable; that part of the costs which arose out of the discussion of the question of right, has been allowed to the widow, but she has not been considered by the Court below, as entitled to those costs resulting out of the investigation of the question of fact, the decision as to the fact having been against her: and they ought to be disallowed, provided you are of opinion, that the judgment of the Court on the other points ought to be affirmed. I should submit to your Lordships, therefore, upon the whole case, that the final judgment of the Court of Session [390] should be affirmed, and both appeals dismissed. There is an original appeal by the corporation, and there is a cross appeal by the widow: the decision, therefore, I should recommend is, to dismiss both appeals, and I think upon the whole, it will be better that there should be costs on neither side.

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

MANNERS, MILLER, and others.—Appellants: Sir D. HUNTER BLAIR, and others.—Respondents.

AND

BUCHAN and others.—Appellants: The OFFICERS of STATE, and Sir D. H. BLAIR and others.—Respondents.

[See Donaldson v. Beckett, 1774, 2 Bro. P. C. 129; Grierson v. Jackson, 1791, Ridg. Ir. T. R. 304; Universities of Oxford and Cambridge v. Richardson, 1802, 6 Ves. 689; Copinger on Copyright 3rd Ed. p. 310; Shortt on Copyright, 2nd Ed. 48.]

The King by letters patent, granted to B. and B. their heirs and assigns, to be his only printers in Scotland for forty-one years, to use and enjoy with all its profits and privileges, so far as the same were consistent with the articles of the Union, and especially the sole privilege of printing in Scotland, Bibles, (Biblia Sacra) Testaments, the Psalms, the Book of Common Prayer, Confessions of Faith, the greater and lesser Catechisms in the English tongue. The letters prohibited all other persons, subjects and foreigners, to print in or import into Scotland from any parts beyond the seas, any of the said books, without the licence or authority of B. and B. their heirs, assigns, and substitutes, under pain of confiscation.

Held, that the patentees had under this patent, the exclusive right of printing in Scotland, all the books enumerated in the patent, and that the received English translation of the Bible was within the terms of the patent, and could not be sold in Scotland without the authority of the patentees, although the prohibition in terms extended only to importation from parts beyond seas.

In the year 1785, the office of Printer to his Majesty for Scotland, was granted in reversion to the late Sir James Hunter Blair, Baronet, and [392] the Respondents Mr. Bruce. Sir James Hunter Blair was succeeded in his right as joint patentee by the other Respondent, Sir David Hunter Blair.

By the patent of appointment to this office, which bears date on the 2d November, 1785, the commencement of the right is declared to be from the expiry of the then existing patent to Alexander Kincaid, which event took place in the year 1798, and from thence to endure for forty-one years.

By this writ, which is in the form of a commission or letters patent under the Union Seal, his Majesty nominates, constitutes, and appoints, Memoratis Jacobum Hunter Blair, et Joannem Bruce, conjunctim, heredes eorum, substitutes, seu assignatos, solos et unicos nostros architypographos, in illa parte regni nostri Magna Britannia Scotia vocata; idque pro spatio quadraginta unius annorum, computanda ab et post expirationem diplomatis, pro present. et sensus, prefato Alexandro Kincaid, pro simili spatio quadraginta unius annorum concessisse, cum plena potestate ipsis Jacobo Hunter Blair, et Joanni Bruce, conjunctim, eorumque heredibus, assignatis, seu substitutes, antedictis, prefato munere et officio, durante spatio antedicto, utendi, exercendi, et gaudendi, cum omnibus proficiis, emolumentis, immunitatibus, exemptionibus, et privilegiis, quibuscunque eidem spectantibus, in quantum cum articulis Unionis, legibus que Magnæ Britannie nunc existentibus, congruant: Et speciatim, solum et unicum privilegium imprimendi, in Scotia, Biblia Sacra, Novi Testamenti, Psalmorum libros, libros Precum Communiū, Confes-[393]-siones Fidei, majores et minores Catechismos in lingua Anglicana;—necnon solam potestatem imprimendi et reimprimendi acta Parlamenti, edicta, proclamationes, omnesque alias chartas in usum nostrorum publicorum in Scotia officiorum imprimendas: Et generaliter omne quod ibidem publicandum erit, auctoritate regali, imprimendi et reimprimendi: Prohiben, per presentes, omnes alias personas quascunque, tam natos quam extraneos, imprimere vel reimprimere, seu imprimi seu reimprimi in Scotia causare, vel importare seu importari facere in Scotiam, a quibuscunque locis transmarinis, ullos dict. librorum, et chartarum publicarum supra mentionat. absque licentia vel auctoritate a dict. Jacobo Hunter Blair et Joanne Bruce, heredibus eorum, assignatis, vel substitutis, sub pena confiscationis omnium talium librorum, chartarumque publicarum, ita impress. seu importat. in Scotia; unius eorund. dimidii ad nos, alteriusque in usum dict. Jacobi Hunter Blair, et Joannis Bruce, eorumque antedict."

Under these letters patent, the Appellants in the first appeal, had obtained an interdict against the Respondents, restraining them from importing or selling, or exposing to sale, any of the books enumerated in the letters patent. Against this decision, Miller and Manners appealed to the House of Lords, and upon the hearing in 1825, after observing that the only question substantially discussed in the argument of counsel, had turned principally on the language of the patent, which, although it conferred the sole right of printing in Scotland, yet the prohibition was only of printing in Scotland, or importing from places [394] beyond the seas, Lord Gifford proceeded as follows:

In considering this case, since it was argued, it appears to me, that a very important question has not been fully discussed. I apprehend, that the prerogative in this country, to grant the right of printing Bibles, New Testaments, etc. belongs to the King as supreme head of the church, and he only has a right to authorise the publication of the Book of Common Prayer, and the liturgy of the church.

Now this interdict applies not only to Bibles, New Testaments, Psalm Books, and Books of Common Prayer, which I apprehend mean books of English communion, but Confessions of Faith, (whether the Scotch Confession of Faith or the thirty-nine Articles does not appear), or larger or smaller Catechism, (what Catechisms they are does not appear). With respect to some of those works, it may be, that the prerogative of the Crown of Scotland may be larger than the prerogative of the Crown of England. But upon looking into the statute of 1690, by which the church government in Scotland was settled, there is this remarkable passage with respect to the Bible:

Section 8. "The Old Testament in Hebrew, (which was the native language of the people of God of old), and the New Testament in Greek, (which, at the time of the writing of it, was most generally known to the nation), being immediately inspired by God, and by his singular care and providence kept pure in all ages, and therefore authentical, so as in all controversies of religion, the church [395] is finally to appeal unto them: But because these original tongues are not known to all the people of God, who have right unto and interest in the Scriptures, and are commanded in the fear of God to read and search them, therefore they are to be translated into the vulgar language of every nation unto which they come, that the word of God dwelling plentifully in all, they may worship him in an acceptable manner, and through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, may have hope."

Now I cannot find, that by any Act of the Crown of Scotland, or the Government of Scotland, there has been any authorized translation of the Bible for the use of the people of Scotland. I have been unable to find such, if any there is. I believe there is none. Then comes the question, Whether, supposing the privilege of the Crown in Scotland was the same as in England, to authorize a translation of the Bible, yet, not having done so, is it competent for the Crown of Scotland to say, you shall not import into Scotland a translation of the Bible authorized by the law of England? With respect to the Book of Common Prayer, if it alludes to the Book of Common Prayer of England, that is no part of the church establishment of Scotland; and has the Crown of Scotland the privilege to say, that that which is the form of the liturgy of the church of England, with which they have nothing to do, shall not be sold in Scotland, unless printed by the king's printer in Scotland! With respect to the Confessions of Faith, there was a Confession of Faith published in 1690, (which is the Con-[396]fession of Faith adopted in Scotland, and authorized by the Crown), and the Crown has, as it was contended, and not denied, the same sort of privilege in Scotland as to the printing Acts of State, and those particular works which are peculiar to the church of Scotland, if there be any such: but has it the privilege of prohibiting the printing or selling in Scotland, the form of prayer of the church of England, with which form of prayer they themselves say, they have nothing to do in Scotland! So, as to the Psalms, there may be Psalm Books in Scotland, which are peculiarly used by the church of Scotland. Whether they have the power of preventing surreptitious copies of them, I know not. Then, as to the larger or smaller Catechism, it is possible they may have such works. These questions appear to me important, and perhaps I ought to take blame to myself, for not, at the time of the argument, having suggested these difficulties: but they did not then occur to me, for my attention was turned to the prohibitory clause. A good deal of the argument turned upon the case cited at the bar, which was said by the Appellants, to be the converse of this. In that case (Univ. of Orford and Cambridge v. Richardson, 6 Ves. 689) it was decided, that the king's printer in England, had a right to prohibit Bibles printed in Scotland, from being circulated in England, because it would be an infringement of the prerogative, which conferred the right upon a particular individual; and passages were cited from the judgment pronounced by the Lord Chancellor. He was of opinion that the power [397] was reciprocal. He seemed to admit, that the Scotch printer could prevent the English printer from selling the English Bibles, or Book of Common Prayer, in Scotland: but the attention of the Lord Chancellor, and the noble Lord who assisted, was not drawn to the rights of the church of Scotland: nor do I see any thing in the judgment, that warranted the conclusion that he had formed a decisive opinion upon that point, but there are passages that are thought to bear that way.

It seems to me, with a view to save expense to the parties, and the delay that would take place, that it would be better for me to ask your Lordships to adjourn the case till the next session of Parliament, and have a farther argument upon this question, which affects the privilege of the Crown of Scotland, exercised in Scotland over works of this nature. Your Lordships have had an argument directed to the various species of works interdicted by this interdictor, some of which may, for ought I know, come within the prerogative of the Crown of Scotland, conferring a monopoly upon the printer: but I do not profess to have formed any opinion upon the subject. It is of great importance to consider, whether the prerogative of Scotland can extend to a translation of the Bible, which the Crown of Scotland has never authorized itself. If it has, we shall be informed of it. Is it the translation printed in England? or what translation of the Bible is it, which the king's printer in Scotland has the sole privilege of printing? Is it every Bible, or the English translation? I apprehend the [398] principal question in this case, will turn mainly upon the printing of the Bible and the New Testament.

I therefore propose to your Lordships to adjourn this case till the next session.

The case was accordingly adjourned (29th June, 1825).

In the mean time, the question came under discussion in a similar suspension and interdict presented to the Court of Session by the King's Printers against Buchan and others, members of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Bible Societies. The Lord Ordinary in that case, "in respect of the charges (Buchan and others) having failed to point out any distinction between the matters at issue in the present process of suspension, and those determined after the fullest discussion and consideration by the first division of the Court in the case of the King's Printers v. Mannings and Miller, and other booksellers in Edinburgh, and that no documents which appear to the Lord Ordinary materially to affect the grounds of that judgment, are now founded on, which were not before the Court as aforesaid, or that any allegations in point of fact, are made by the chargers, different from those which were made in the said case before the Court," suspended the letters supplicatory, continued the interdict and decreed. The Court, on the case being brought under their review, in consideration of the doubt as to the royal prerogative in Scotland, expressed in the House of Lords, appointed intimation to be made of the Officers of State, and allowed them to appear for his Majesty's interest; and thereafter (12th May, 1826) adhered, except as to [399] the Book of Common Prayer, as to which they altered the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and removed the interdict in hoc statu (4 Shaw and Dunlop, No. 365).

Buchan and others appealed, and the King's Printers presented a cross appeal, in regard to the Book of Common Prayer.

[400] The Lord Chancellor: The principal Respondents in this case are the King's printers in Scotland. They hold that office under a patent from the Crown. The Appellants are members of certain Bible Societies in Scotland, and have been in the habit of importing Bibles from England; and the material question to be decided in this case, is whether or not the King's printers in Scotland have, by virtue of their office and their patent, a right to exclude persons from importing Bibles, and the other works which are contained in the patent, from England?

Two important questions were raised in this case. One, which was raised, and which was argued at great length in the Court below, and argued very ably at your Lordships' bar, was as to the right of the Crown to grant a patent, the effect of which shall be, to prevent persons in Scotland from importing Bibles, and other works of the description mentioned in the patent, certain religious works, from England; and the second question turned upon the particular construction of the terms of this patent.

With respect to the first question, it arose out of the case of Manners and Miller v. Blair, which was before your Lordships' House two or three sessions ago. When that case came on for argument, and was argued at your Lordships' bar, it occurred to the learned Lord who then presided here (Lord Gifford), that there was a doubt as to the validity of the patent, and as to the power of the King to grant a patent of that description. I do not mean to suggest that the [401] noble and learned Lord expressed any opinion upon that subject, but that he was desirous, before he decided that question, that that point should be argued at your Lordships' bar; but which was in fact, never argued in the particular case, because the case in which I am about to propose that your Lordships should give judgment, was before the Courts below; and being before the Courts below, the point was raised before the judges of the Court in Scotland, which had not in fact been raised in the case of Manners and Miller v. Blair; and that case having come before your Lordships upon appeal, it was considered more convenient and proper, that the argument, with respect to the validity of the patent, and with respect to the prerogative of the Crown, should be on that particular case, than on the case of Manners and Miller; but your Lordships' decision in the one case, will be of course governed by the decision in the other.

In conducting the argument, with respect to the prerogative of the Crown, reference was made, and very properly made, to the cases of prerogative in England. For two hundred years and more, the kings have, in England, granted patents to their printers here, as extensive as the patent we are now considering, and perhaps more extensive, but extensive enough to raise the question we are now considering. In England, the power of the king to grant patents of this description, or to appoint to such an office, has never been seriously questioned. Those patents have from time to time come under the review of our Courts, and the judges have been called upon [402] to decide upon them. One case occurred before Sir Joseph Jekyll, so far back as the year 1720, and others at different periods, both in the Courts of Equity, and also before this House during the last century; and I would state it as a point not admitting now of doubt or controversy, that as far as relates to the office of King's printer in England, the Crown has the prerogative to grant a patent as extensive as that we are now considering,—assuming, for the purpose of argument, that the patent is as extensive as it is contended on the part of the Respondents to be.*

But although the power of the King and his prerogative in England has never been questioned, it has been rested by judges on different principles. Some judges have been of opinion, that it is to be founded on the circumstance of the translation of the Bible, having been actually paid for by King James, and its having become the property of the Crown, and therefore it has been referred to a species of copyright. Other judges have referred it to the circumstance of the King of England being the supreme head of the church of England, and that he is vested with the prerogative with reference to that character. Other judges have been of opinion, and I confess, for my own part, I am disposed to accede to that opinion, that it is to be referred to another consideration, namely, to the character of the duty imposed upon the chief executive officer of the Government, to superintend the publication, of [403] the Acts of the Legislature, and Acts of State of that description, and also of those works, upon which the established doctrines of our religion are founded, that it is a duty imposed upon the first executive magistrate, carrying with it a corresponding prerogative. That was the opinion of Lord Camden, as expressed in the case of Donaldson v. Becket (4 Burr. 2408), in most direct and eloquent terms in this House: that was the opinion also expressed by Chief Baron Skinner, in the case of Eyre and Strahan v. Curran (Court of Excheq. 1781); and I think that may be collected or inferred to be the opinion of a learned and noble Earl, now a member of your Lordships' House, from what fell from that noble and learned Lord, in the case of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge v. Richardson (6 Ves. 701, 5).

If that be so, if that is the true principle upon which this prerogative is to be rested, it appears to me that all difficulty ceases with respect to the prerogative in Scotland. In Scotland, as well as England, patents of this description have been granted without dispute or contest, for more than two hundred years. These patents have at different periods been made the subject of suits in the Courts of Scotland, and particularly in the case of Watson v. Baskett, in the year 1716, or the year 1717, which cases came afterwards by appeal to the House of Lords. In another case, that of the King's Printers v. Bell and Bradgate, this patent came under the consideration of the Courts of Justice in Scotland; and many other cases may be referred to, for the purpose of establishing the same fact, so that we have in Scotland, as [404] well as England, patents granted successively for a period of more than two hundred years. These patents have been the subjects of suits. These cases have come to your Lordships' House; and I do not think, that until the doubt was thrown out by the noble and learned Lord to whom I have referred, the late Lord Gifford, the prerogative of the Crown of Scotland was ever called in question. Certainly it never did occur to the very able counsel who argued the case of Manners and Miller v. Blair in the Court below, seriously to consider or to contest that point.

In the course of this argument it was assumed, as the basis of a part of an argument, that the prerogative in England depended upon the King's character as supreme head of the church; and it was argued, that that principle did not apply to Scotland, for that although the King was the supreme head of the church in England, he was not the supreme head of the church in Scotland; and therefore the prerogative might well exist in this part of the island, and yet not exist in Scotland. But, I have already stated, that I do not refer the prerogative to the circumstance of the King being, in a spiritual or ecclesiastical sense, the supreme head of the church in England, but to the kingly character—to his being at the head of the church and state, and it being his duty to act as guardian and protector of both—a character which he has equally in Scotland and England. It is perfectly clear, that it is the duty of the King to act thus part, as the guardian of the church in Scotland. That is a principle laid down by the authorities in Scotland as much as in England. By the authority of the statute [405] by which the Reformation was established in Scotland, it is declared to be the duty of the magistrates, and the King as supreme magistrate, to be the protector of the church; and in the Act of 1690, by which the Presbyterian church was established, when the Episcopalian church authority was finally put an end to in Scotland, the same principle is laid down and acknowledged. I think, therefore, that this right and prerogative depends upon the King's character as guardian of the church and guardian of the state, to take care that works of this description are published in a correct and authentic form; and that those arguments upon which the authority rests in this country apply also in Scotland.

* Baskett v. Parsons. At the Rolls 1718. In D. P. 1719. Cited in Univ. of Oxf. and Cam. v. Richardson, 6 Ves. 699.

But it was said at the bar, that in England, as far as relates to the translation of the Holy Bible, we have the translation recognized by public authority, introduced into the service of the church by public authority; and that the prerogative in England will properly apply to this translation, but that the same principle does not apply in Scotland.

With respect to the Bible which was translated in the reign of James the First, and which indisputably was translated under his sanction, and by virtue of his authority, it does not appear that he contributed any thing towards the expense. It does not appear that that translation of the Bible was introduced into the church by the authority of any Act of Parliament, by the authority of any Act of Convention, or by proclamation; but undoubtedly it was introduced under the sanction and authority of the head of the church, under the sanction of the King of that [406] period,—in what precise way does not appear by evidence. It is probable, that after it was completed, and the heads of the church were satisfied with it, it was by the authority of the bishops, in their respective dioceses, introduced into general use throughout the kingdom, possibly without any further act for that purpose. But is there any essential difference between the situation of England and Scotland in this respect? I apprehend clearly none; because the same translation has, if not by the actual authority, at least by the sanction of the General Assembly of Scotland, been introduced into their church, and used there for a period I believe of one hundred and fifty years; and I understand that use of it in Scotland is as general, and indeed as exclusive and universal as in England. This translation, therefore, has been sanctioned in the country by the church of that country, and by the proper ecclesiastical authorities; and I apprehend that it stands in the same situation, and is guarded by the same privileges, and is in point of law, unless the General Assembly should order otherwise, as compellable to be used in the churches of Scotland as it is in the churches of England. I do not apprehend, therefore, that there is any difficulty in this respect, or that any argument whatever, can be founded on the idea, that by some authority in this country that particular translation has been introduced into universal use in our church, and that no corresponding authority exists in Scotland. I have no doubt there is some authority, at least some implied authority, for the introduction of it in England; and I apprehend there is [407] the same implied authority, the same sanction for it by ecclesiastical authorities in Scotland.

It was in consequence of this circumstance, and some doubts arising out of this particular view of the case, that the noble and learned Lord to whom I have referred, was desirous that in this particular view, it should be considered again.

It appears to me, that as far as relates to the translation of the Holy Scriptures, the case with respect to Scotland is precisely the same as it is with respect to England. But in this patent there are other works noticed. There is the Confession of Faith. I find that the Confession of Faith was ratified by the General Assembly, in the year 1649; it is therefore a book adopted by the proper ecclesiastical authority in the country. The larger and the shorter Catechisms were also ratified by the General Assembly about that same period; and with respect to the metrical version of the Psalms, which is also contained in that patent, that was, as I am informed, prepared by the authority of the General Assembly, and it is used in the churches by authority of that General Assembly. It appears to me, therefore, that these works come within the same principle as the Holy Scriptures, and within the same principle as the Book of Common Prayer in this country.

A question has been raised with respect to the Book of Common Prayer, which is also contained in this patent; and it is said, that at all events, the King could not in Scotland, confer the exclusive right of printing this work on his printer in Scotland. The Court below entertained some [408] doubt upon this point, and in this particular stage of the cause, they have excepted the Common Prayer from the operation of their interdict, without, however, pronouncing any decision upon it. At one period episcopacy existed in Scotland. During that time, there is no doubt the King's authority applied to the Book of Common Prayer, as well as to the other works to which I have referred. It is true that by the Act of Parliament passed in the year 1690, an alteration was made in this respect. By the effect of that Act of Parliament in 1690, the presbyterian form of worship became the established form in Scotland, and the church of that persuasion became the established church of Scotland: but, those persons who were members of the church of England, who were in her communion, were still entitled to the protection of the Crown: there was nothing in that Act of Parliament to deprive them of that protection: and if the King possessed the prerogative previous to the passing of the Act in 1690, by which he had the exclusive right, by himself or his officers, in Scotland, to publish the Book of Common Prayer, there is nothing in the Act of 1690, to deprive him of that prerogative, which he had previously enjoyed.

It does not appear to me, therefore, in this view of the case, that there is any essential difference between that part of the patent which relates to the Book of Common Prayer, and that which relates to the other works. I think, therefore, that with respect to this question, which was not originally mooted in the Court below, [409] namely, the general question of the validity of the patent, which was only afterwards argued in the second case, in consequence of the wish intimated by the noble and learned Lord to whom I have adverted, that your Lordships will have no difficulty in coming to the opinion, that in Scotland, as in England, the King possesses this prerogative, and that he has a right to confer it upon his printer.

If that be so, the only remaining question to which I propose to call your attention is, the construction of the patent.

I confess I had considerable doubts at first, in determining what was the proper construction of this patent: but in looking very attentively at the patent, considering the whole bearing of it, and all the facts of the case, those doubts and difficulties have ceased. The patent is in substance this, that those particular individuals are declared to have the sole and exclusive right of printing in Scotland the particular works which are mentioned in it. They are to have the office, and discharge the duties, with all its perquisites, all its emoluments, and all its privileges, as far as it is consistent with the articles of Union. That is the granting part of the patent, to which I shall at present confine my observations.

The expression, "as far as it is consistent with the articles of Union," requires some explanation. A short time before the patent was granted to Baskett in the year 1716, which was in the same terms as this, a patent had been granted to a person of the name of Frechairn, in the year 1711. That patent was, in the granting part of it, as general as this which I have stated; but [410] it contained a prohibition against all persons importing, either from England, or any parts beyond the seas, any of the particular works enumerated in the patent. Some doubts were created in the minds of some persons, with respect to the validity of that patent: it was submitted for the consideration of the Lord Advocate of Scotland, Sir James Stewart; and Sir James Stewart was of opinion, that it was contrary to the fourth article of the Union between England and Scotland, to prohibit the importation of those works from England. The patent was also referred to the consideration and opinion of Mr. Kennedy, who held at that time, the office of Solicitor General at Scotland: he gave an opinion upon this point, directly the reverse of that expressed by the Lord Advocate; and it turns out in the result, as appears by the decision in the case of Richardson v. the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, that the opinion which the Solicitor General gave was the correct opinion, and that the patent was not contrary to the terms of the article of Union. If that be so, then we may read this patent precisely as if those words were not contained in the patent: and then it is a question, as to the exclusive right of printing these particular works, granted with the office of King's printer, with all the privileges, and with all the emoluments incident to that office. With reference to the previous part of it, the exclusive right of printing works of this description, must carry with it the right of excluding all other persons from the participation, from the right of printing them or circulating them. The one is a consequence of the other. The Crown, [111] by its prerogative, has a right of printing by its officer, it has by its prerogative, the right to exclude all others from the enjoyment of the right, by importation or otherwise.

Therefore, when the King grants the right of printing, he grants the other part, namely, the authority he possesses, or rather, as Lord Eldon has said, the duty consequent upon that authority, the duty of excluding others: and it appears to me, therefore, on looking at the subject in this view, with reference to the granting part of the patent, the patentees have clearly a right to exclude.

But there is a prohibition which follows the granting part of the patent, and it is said, the prohibition extends only to parts beyond the seas; and there is a penalty annexed to the prohibition,—all persons are prohibited from importing the specified works from parts beyond the seas, under the penalty of losing those works. But it is no objection to a patent, which conveys a particular power and a particular authority, that there is a prohibition accompanied with a penalty, and that that prohibition accompanied with a penalty is not co-extensive with what is supposed to be the grant. An argument may arise out of the prohibition, for the purpose of construing the grant, and for the purpose of ascertaining what the intention of the granter was; but if the intention of the granter be clear, it does not follow that the grant is at all limited, from the circumstance of there being a prohibition, accompanied with a penalty, which is not co-extensive with the grant.

But in this case no question can arise upon the limitation of the prohibition, because we can un-[412]-derstand at once, what was the reason of the limited nature of the prohibition. That prohibition arose out of the doubt expressed in the opinion of the Lord Advocate of Scotland. In the granting part of the patent, reference was made to the articles of Union. We grant you all the powers which have been enjoyed by any of your predecessors in this office, as far as they are consistent with the articles of the Union, but no further. It was supposed that the prohibition of importation from England, was contrary to the fourth article of the Union: and therefore, when the party drawing that patent came to the prohibition to be followed by a penalty, he did not choose to carry that prohibition beyond the point, to which it could be with safety and certainty extended. When we find that it has been decided, that the articles of the Union do not bear upon this case, we have at once an interpretation of the whole patent, and see the reason for the limited prohibition, and that these words were not intended to have any effect in limiting the patent, unless the articles of the Union required it should be limited. My opinion is, that it is a grant of the authority of the Crown: that the Crown intended to convey all the authority it possessed, and, as Lord Eldon very properly says, there is a duty incident to the authority. The Crown intended to convey its authority, and the Crown intended to convey that authority with a corresponding duty. I therefore cannot bring myself to entertain any serious doubt with respect to the construction of the patent.

On these grounds, I should recommend to the House, both with respect to the former objection, [413]—as to the prerogative of the Crown, and also with respect to the construction of the patent,—to confirm the opinion expressed after very elaborate argument, and expressed in great detail, and with great ability, by the judges below. I should propose, that in the case of Buchan v. Blair, the interlocutors complained of by the original appeal should be affirmed, and those complained of by the cross appeal reversed: and as incident to that decision, I should propose that the judgment in the case of Manners and Miller v. Blair, should also be affirmed.

The only difference to which it is material to call your attention, is that in the case of Manners and Miller v. Blair, the interlocutor includes the Book of Common Prayer: but in consequence of some doubts entertained by the learned judges, having been expressed in the interlocutor in this particular case of Buchan v. Blair, that is made the subject of exception: I should recommend to your Lordships, that these interlocutors be affirmed on all other points: and as to this exception, that the interlocutor be reversed.

The effect of the judgment will be, that the King's printer in Scotland will stand on the same footing as the King's printer in England. It has been decided, that the King's printer in England has a right to prevent the importation of all books which come from Scotland. I did not mention that as the foundation of the judgment,—that was not a ground on which to proceed to such an adjudication: but, at the same time, your Lordships will not regret that the judgment to be pronounced is followed with consequences so just and equitable.

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

Sir NEIL MENZIES, Bart.—Appellant: The EARL OF BREADALBANE and another.—Respondents.

[Mews' Dig. xiv, 1982, 5 Scots R. R. 119. Adopted in A. G. v. Lonsdale (Earl of) 1868, L. R. 7, Eq. 387; Veidl v. L. and N.W. Ry. Co. 1871; L. R. 10 Ex. 7; and Orr-Ewing v. Colquhoun, 1877, 2 A. C. 857. And see Whalley v. Lancashire etc. Ry. Co., 1884, 13, Q.B.D. 136.]

A proprietor of land on the bank of a river, having commenced the building of a mound, which according to the opinion and report of an engineer, would, if completed, in times of ordinary flood, throw the waters of the river on the grounds of a proprietor on the opposite bank, so as to overflow and injure them, was restrained by perpetual interdict, from the farther erection of any bulwark, or other work, which might have the effect of diverting the stream of the river in time of flood from its accustomed course, and throwing the same upon the lands of the Appellant.

In 1798, the predecessor of the Appellant, by bill of suspension and interdict, complained against the proprietor of the lands held by the Respondent, that he had begun to erect upon the upper end of a piece of land, along the bank of the river Tay, at the distance of four or five yards from the ordinary channel, a bulwark, which, if finished, would have the effect of turning the water upon the complainant's property, and overflowing his lands.

An interdict was granted upon this bill, and a remit was made to an engineer to inspect the channels of the river, and report on the probable effect of the erection of the bulwark.

[415] No further proceedings were taken until 1821, when the Respondent having purchased the property called Bolfrax, on which the bulwark was erected, awakened and transferred the action against the Appellant, who was the representative of the original complainer; whereupon the matter was referred to an engineer, upon the terms of the original remit.

The engineer by his report, gave a description of the lands in question; of the channels, and the effect of floods in the river; and of the ordinary modes and effect, and the proper site and construction of embankments; and concluded by reporting, that the embankment on the upper end of Bolfrax-haugh was too near the margin of the ordinary channel of the river.

Upon the report, the Lord Ordinary declared the interdict perpetual.

On the 11th July, 1826, the interdict was recalled by the Court.

The appeal was against this decision.

[416] The Lord Chancellor: This is a question arising out of an embankment on the river Tay. The river Tay, on the north side, at the spot in question, is bounded by a considerable extent of flat land, belonging to Sir Neil Menzies; on the southern side it is chiefly bounded by high land, but this high land terminates at a point called Bolfrax-haugh, which land belongs to Lord Breadalbane. Bolfrax-haugh continues for the space of about twenty-seven acres. Then there is another piece of land, Farleyer Island, part of which belongs to Lord Breadalbane, and between those two lands there is a portion of the old channel, as if the water had formerly ran in that direction. There are some facts not at all in dispute in this case. Every person knows the character of the river Tay; and that in times of flood, that is, in autumn, winter, and in the spring, the flood stream takes its course with very considerable violence along this piece of land, to which I have referred. It is therefore obvious, that an embankment running parallel to the stream, commencing at the first point of Bolfrax-haugh, and carried up to Farleyer Island, would have the effect of stopping up the old course of the flood stream, and throwing it entirely on the opposite piece of land belonging to Sir Neil Menzies, and the question in this case is, whether the proprietor of this land, Bolfrax-haugh, has a right so to do?

The land which now belongs to Lord Breadalbane, was formerly the property of Mr. Alexander Menzies, and in the year 1778 he commenced these works, when he either formed or repaired a jetty in the alveus of the stream, and he connected [417] with that jetty the embankment in question, which embankment is one or two yards distant from the course of the stream, about three feet in height, sufficiently high to turn the flood water of the river. Those works were carried on, I think, to the extent of about two hundred yards. In consequence, Sir John Menzies then the proprietor, filed a bill of suspension and interdict: an interim interdict was obtained, and further proceedings were carried on; but these further proceedings were all at once suspended, until the year 1821.

In the mean time Lord Breadalbane purchased the property of Mr. Menzies; and having purchased the property, he revived those proceedings. When the case came before the Lord Ordinary, as far as related to the jetty, and any other works in the alveus of the stream, he was of opinion that the interdict should be continued; but he referred the question, as to the embankment upon the side of the river, on the property of Lord Breadalbane, for further debate and consideration. It ultimately came before the First Division of the Court of Session, and the interdict, as far as related to the embankment, was dissolved.

While this affair was going on before the Lord Ordinary, an engineer of considerable eminence, Mr. Jardine, was, according to the course of proceedings in the Court of Session, directed, as the servant and officer of the Court, and standing between the parties, to view the place, and report his opinion. Without going into the minute particulars of that report, I may state, that it is clear that if this embankment should be continued, as it is projected, along the banks of the river, it [418] will have the effect of throwing the ordinary flood streams of the river off the lands of Lord Breadalbane, and on the lands of Sir Neil Menzies. Many circumstances were referred to at the bar, with respect to the law of England upon this subject. It is quite unnecessary to trouble your Lordships with any observation on the law of England, and particularly on the law of England with reference to particular places, because it is clear, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that by the law of England, such an operation could not be carried on. The old course of the flood stream being along certain lands, it is not competent for the proprietors of those lands to obstruct that old course, by a sort of new water-way, to the prejudice of the proprietor on the other side; and I am the less disposed to trouble you with reference to the law of England, for that can be referred to only by way of illustration. This case must be decided by the law of Scotland.

Now, with reference to the law of Scotland, this is perfectly clear, that a superior heritor cannot divert any part of a stream to the prejudice of an inferior heritor. It is also clear, that an inferior heritor cannot do that which shall cause the water to stagnate, to the prejudice of the superior; that is acknowledged to be clear law. But it is said, that applies only to the alveus of the course. But it does not appear to me, that there is any solid ground for the distinction. The ordinary course of the river, is that which it takes at ordinary times; there is also a flood channel: I am not talking of that which it takes in extraordinary or accidental floods, but the ordinary course of the river in the different seasons of the [419] year, must, I apprehend, be subject to the same principle.

But let us see what is said on this subject by the institutional writers on the law of Scotland. Erskine, in his Institutes, is distinct, as it appears to me, and precise upon the subject. He says: "When a river threatens an alteration of the present channel, by which damage may arise to the proprietor of the adjacent or opposite ground, it is lawful for him to build a bulwark ripæ muniendæ causa, to prevent the loss of ground that is threatened by that encroachment;" so that the proprietor whose lands are threatened to be washed away, may, for the purpose of protecting his own property in a case of that description, raise a bank for his own security; but this bulwark must be so executed, as to prejudice neither the navigation, nor the grounds on the opposite side of the river: and as a guard against these consequences, the builder, before he began his work, was obliged by the Roman law to give security. Nothing, therefore, can be more distinct and precise, than the language of Erskine in his Institutes, with respect to this particular case. He says: "You may protect your own property from destruction:" so you may by the law of England: but he says in distinct terms, "Though the river threatens to change its channel, and to encroach upon your land, you cannot protect yourself to the prejudice of the opposite proprietor." Lord Stair in his Institutes, though not so clear and precise, yet in general terms confirms that which is laid down by Erskine in his Institutes.

[420] The language of the Roman law, according to the passage cited in the case, confirms the same doctrine. It is there said, (39 Dig. t. 3, l. 1,) "Opus quod quis fecit ut aquam excluderet, quæ exundante palude in agrum ejus refluere solet, si ea palus aqua pluvia ampliatur, eaque aqua repulsa eo opere agrus vicini noceat, aquæ plurius actione cogitur tollere?" and, according to a passage quoted in the printed papers, Voet repeats the same doctrine. In the Digest you will find another passage to the same effect, under the title "De Aqua," (lib. 39, tit. iii.) "Hæc autem actio locum habet in damno nondum facto, opere tamen jam facto; hoc est de eo opere, et quo damnum timetur, totiensque locum habet, quotiens manufacto opere agro aqua nocitura est; id est cum quis manu fecerit quo oliter fluere, quam natura soleret; si forte immitendo eam aut majorem fecerit aut citatorem aut vehementiorem; aut si comprimendo redundare effecerit: quod si natura aqua noceret, ea actione non continentur." It appears to me, that that passage (and there are others to the same effect in the Digest) confirms the opinion laid down by Erskine in his Institutes, with respect to the law of Scotland, in confirmation of which, he refers to the Roman law. It is true that passages may be found in the Digest, appearing to have a contrary tendency, but I think they may be all reconciled: or, consider the subject in this light, that these passages to which I am now alluding, have reference to accidental and extraordinary casualties, from the flood suddenly bursting forth, and they go to this, that, in such a case, the parties may, even to the prejudice of their neighbours, [421] for the sake of self-preservation, guard themselves against the consequence:—perhaps in this way, the different passages in the Digest may be reconciled.

The principal authority, as it was conceived in the Court below, and as it was at your Lordships' bar, was a case decided in the year 1741,—the case of Farquharson v. Farquharson (the papers were reprinted, and laid before the House). It was considered that that was a case directly in point: and if that had been a decision directly in point, I confess I should have had very great hesitation in declaring the opinion I am now doing. But I have read through that case, and attended to the different reports of it with the greatest attention, and I think that it is distinguishable in almost every particular, from the case now before your Lordships. That was the case of the land of two proprietors on the river Cluny, on opposite banks of the river, which runs northward, and falls into the river Dee. Auchindyne grounds were on the left bank; Invercauld's grounds on the right. Invercauld on his grounds had erected a mound, and the question was as between him and Auchindyne, whether he was entitled to erect that mound; and it was decided that he was. But the circumstances were of this description: "The river had been continually going to the eastward. It had in one instance, actually departed from its original course, and taken a new direction, placing a part of Invercauld grounds on Auchindyne side, and was obviously repeating, or attempting to repeat, the same operation, by a new encroachment on [422] Auchindyne grounds. The mound erected, therefore, was not to have the effect of altering the old course of the river, but it was to have the effect of preventing the old course of the river from being altered; and that, I apprehend, is a most material distinction in cases of this kind. But, independently of this, there was evidence to show, that at least a considerable part of the bank was built on old foundations. There was further evidence of this description, which, with respect to cases like the present, is of the most important character, that, according to the custom of that part of the country, proprietors on the opposite sides of the rivers had embanked against each other; and in this particular case it was proved, that Auchindyne had himself embanked on his side of the river, for the purpose of preventing the overflow of the water on his side, so as to throw it on Invercauld: it was proved also, as the last circumstance, that the destruction of the grounds of Invercauld would have followed, if these works had not been allowed, and that the most trifling damage in point of amount, was occasioned to the proprietor on the other side.

It was under these circumstances, with all these facts appearing, that the Court gave their opinion in favor of Invercauld. That case is distinguishable in all its particulars from the present. That was a dam erected to prevent a change in the course of the water, and it was sanctioned also by the custom in that part of the country, and sanctioned also by the practice which had prevailed as between those different and opposite proprietors.

[423] Under the circumstances of this case, Lord Breadalbane ought not to be allowed to carry on this work to the prejudice of Sir Neil Menzies, and the judgment of the Court below cannot be sustained. The interdict is in terms too extensive, because it prevents new opus manufactum on the banks of the river without qualification. It will be necessary in the form of judgment, that that should be in some way qualified. I shall, therefore, prepare a judgment, and submit it to your Lordships' consideration.

It is ordered and adjudged, "that the Respondent ought to be prohibited and interdicted from the further erection of any bulwark, or any other opus manufactum, upon the banks of the river Tay, which may have the effect of diverting the stream of the river in times of flood, from its accustomed course, and throwing the same upon the lands of the Appellant; and that with this declaration, the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session, to vary the interlocutors complained of, in such manner as may be consistent with the above declaration, and to do further in the cause as may be just, and in conformity therewith."

SCOTLAND.

(COURT OF SESSION.)

JOHN CRICHTON.—Appellant; ELIZABETH GRIERSON and others.—Respondents.

[S. C. 5 Scots, R. R. 164, 3 Wils. and Sh. 329. See Dundee (Magistrates of) v. Morris, 1858, 3 Macq. 154.]

J. C. by a deed of trust and settlement, gave all his lands, etc. to trustees, among whom was his brother, who accepted the trust, for the payment of debts, legacies, and other purposes, among which were donations to certain specified charities. The deed then contained this passage, "And in regard, I have not yet determined in what way and manner the further distribution of my means and estate shall take place. I hereby reserve to myself power and liberty to make such distribution at any time preceding my death, either in holograph instructions to my said trustees, to be executed informally, or by a formal deed, etc." In a codicil to this testamentary instrument, he made this declaration: "In the event of my failing to make a distribution of my means and estate, which shall remain after fulfilling the purposes before specified, either by holograph instructions, though not formally executed, or by a formal deed of instructions, which I reserve to myself full power to do, then it is my wish, that such remaining means and estate, shall be applied in such charitable purposes, and in bequests to such of my friends and relations as may be pointed out by my said dearly beloved wife, with the approbation of a majority of my said trustees: and in the event of her decease, or entering into a second marriage, before such application shall have been pointed out and approved of as aforesaid, then I hereby empower the majority of the said remaining trustees, to make the application in the way and manner they would conceive to be most agreeable to my wishes if in life."

In a question between the brother claiming as next of kin, and the trustees—Held,

1. That the acceptance of the trust was not such an homologation of the deed, as to bar his title to sue. 2. That the testamentary instruments contained a valid disposition of the residue.

[425] James Crichton, who had acquired a fortune in India, and returned to Scotland in 1806, made in 1821, a disposition and settlement in favor of his wife, so long as she should remain a widow, and of four other trustees, (among whom was the Appellant his brother,) or a majority of them who should accept, or act, etc. in trust, for the uses, ends, and purposes, thereafter specified, and contained in any instructions expressive of his will, to be executed by him as aftermentioned: By this disposition he gave all and sundry lands, etc. and appointed the trustees who should act, sole executors, and universal legatees, and intromitters, in trust, with his whole personal estate. Various trusts were then declared by the deed, for payment of debts, legacies, etc. He also directed his trustees to make payment of £200 sterling, to each of three charities, viz. the Infirmarys of Dumfries and Edinburgh, and the Lunatic Asylum of Edinburgh. The deed then proceeded in these terms: "And in regard I have not yet determined in what way and manner the farther distribution of my means and estate shall take place, I hereby reserve to myself power and liberty, to make such distribution at any time preceding my death, either in holograph instructions to my said trustees, to be executed informally without the usual solemnities, or by a formal deed of instructions relative hereto."

On the 20th of November, 1821, he executed a codicil in these terms: "I hereby declare, that in the event of my failing to make a distribution of my means and estate which shall remain, after fulfilling the purposes before spe[426]-cified, either by holograph instructions, though not formally executed, or by a formal deed of instructions which I reserve to myself full power to do, then it is my wish that such remaining means and estate shall be applied to such charitable purposes, and in bequests to such of my friends and relations, as may be pointed out by my said dearly beloved wife, with the approbation of a majority of my said trustees; and in the event of her decease, or entering into a second marriage, before such application shall have been pointed out and approved of as aforesaid, then I hereby empower the majority of my said remaining trustees, to make the application in the way and manner they would conceive to be most agreeable to my wishes if in life."

James Crichton died in 1823, without having executed any instrument of instructions, or made any other disposition of the residue of his personal estate. The Appellant with the other trustees, accepted the trust by a minute in writing, and undertook to execute the trusts. But afterwards he raised an action of declarator in the Court of Session, insisting that James Crichton had not disposed of the residue of his estate, after answering the special purposes expressed in the deed of trust; that the codicils did not contain any such certain and definite appointment as to be legally effectual, for the disposal of the residue; and that therefore, the residue belonged to him and his sister as next of kin of James Crichton, concluding accordingly for a declaration to that effect: and that the trustees should be [427] ordained to reckon with him, and pay the share of the residue.

The trustees by their answer, contended, 1. That the Appellant had homologated the deed, by acting under it as trustee, and claiming under it. 2. That the expressions of the codicil amounted to a definite exposition of the legal will of the deceased.

On the 12th of May, 1826, the Court sustained the defences, having before repelled the objection to the title of the Appellant to sue.

For the Appellant: Mr. Sugden * and Sir J. Moncrieff.

For the Respondents: Mr. Brougham and Mr. Fullerton.

* Mr. Sugden opened the case; but Sir James Moncrieff as Dean of Faculty, protested as having a right to precedence over King's counsel. This claim of right was resisted by Mr. Sugden; and the Lord Chancellor said, the course now followed, would not be considered as a precedent, as the counsel had preserved their rights by protest.

The Lord Chancellor, after having stated the material parts of the will, and observing that the question turned entirely on the construction and validity of the clause in the codicil, providing for the event of failure to make a distribution of the residue, as before set forth, proceeded thus:

The first point to which I call your attention is, the last part of the clause, for the purpose of getting rid of the argument that was urged at the bar. It was contended, that whatever the construction might be of the former part of the [429] clause, the latter gave an absolute power and control to the trustees, to dispose of the property, without regard to any limitation or condition whatever, except that they were to do it generally in the manner they might conceive most agreeable to the disponent's wishes, if in life; but I apprehend, when the clause comes to be attentively considered, it does not bear that construction. He gives a power to the wife, with the approbation of a majority of the trustees, to dispose of the residue for particular purposes and particular objects; and the word made use of in that part of the clause is, that it shall be applied for particular objects and particular purposes, as pointed out in that clause. The disponent then goes on to say, that in the event of his wife dying, or of her marrying again, (by which she was to be deprived of the power of acting under this clause) those trustees, or the majority of those trustees, were to make the application in the manner they should conceive most agreeable to the wishes of the disponent, if in life. I apprehend, that, in point of construction, this refers to the former clause; and when he talks of the application, it means that the trustees are to make such application, with regard to the objects before pointed out, in the manner the trustees should conceive to be most agreeable to the wishes of the disponent, if he had been then in life. I am quite satisfied that that is the true construction of the clause, from reference to the point to which I have adverted.

I mention that, for the purpose of getting rid of that part of the argument, and of coming to that which is the whole question between the parties; namely, whether it is competent, [430]—for that is the question,—whether it is competent for the disponent, by a deed of this description, to point out particular classes of persons and objects which are intended to be the object of his favor, and then to leave it to an individual, or a body of individuals, after his death, to select out of those classes the particular individuals or the particular objects, to whom the bounty of the testator shall be applied. It is contended, that to give effect to the decision of the Court below, will be, to allow a person to delegate to another the power of making a will for him, which is said to be directly contrary to the civil law, and directly contrary to the law of Scotland, which, it is said, is founded on the civil law. But I apprehend, that that is not the right way of considering the question. I cautiously abstain from expressing any opinion upon that point, which was adverted to in the course of the argument, and is much dwelt upon in the papers, because I think the question does not at all turn upon that position : that it narrows itself to this,—whether a party may, in the disposition of his property, select particular classes of individuals and objects, and then give to some particular individual a power, after his death, of appropriating the property, or applying any part of his property, to any particular individuals among that class, whom that person may select and describe in his will.

The first case to which I shall refer, (because it is the earliest in point of date,) is the case of Murray against Fleming, which was decided, I think, so far back as the year 1729. It is in these terms: "A husband disposed his land estate to [431] his wife in life rent, and to any of his blood relations she should think most fit, to be nominated by a writ under her hand, in fee." The Court of Session decided, "that this disposition granted by the husband to his wife did sufficiently enable her to nominate persons to succeed to the subjects disposed; and that she having accordingly exercised that power, the persons named by her have right to succeed." That, certainly, upon the first impression, is a strong case for the purpose of establishing the position to which I am adverting; but much ingenuity and much talent was exercised at the bar, as was done throughout every part of the case, by the learned counsel who appeared on the part of the Appellant, and, with reference to the particular authority to which I have referred, great pains were taken, by looking into the original papers and proceedings in the cause, and adverting to the arguments of counsel as detailed in those papers, to shew that the judgment of the Court was founded upon the consideration, that the wife had a constructive fee. Now, I do not mean to say that it is impossible, or even improbable, that that should have been the foundation upon which the Court proceeded; but still I find that Lord Bankton (who is a very competent authority,) in a passage in his work, to which reference has been made in the course of the argument adverting to this case, and adopting its authority, does not put it upon that ground, or consider that the Court decided it upon that ground, but he represents it as decided simply on the ground of authority for the object in question being granted to the wife; and my Lord Kames, following Lord Bankton, in his valuable [432] work on the "Principles of Equity," considers the case as having proceeded upon the same ground.

But the point of law does not rest upon the authority of this case alone. The next case in point of time was the case of Brown against his relations (Diet. 2318). The disposition was in these terms: "And the remainder of the proceeds of my said means and estate, after payment of the several legacies already bequeathed, or to be bequeathed by me at any time of my life in manner aforesaid, and of the payment of the expenses of executing this trust, to be divided amongst my poorest friends and relations whom I may have forgot herein, or in any other deed to be made by me in relation hereto, at any time during my life." So that it was to be divided among his poorest friends and relations whom he had forgotten in that deed, or whom he might forget in any one of a similar description he might afterwards make. Now, the judgment of the Court was in these terms: "The Lords find, that by the trust disposition executed by the deceased John Brown, his trustees are vested with a discretionary power to divide amongst the poorest friends and relations of the said John Brown, the remainder of his estate, after payment of his debts and legacies, and the expenses of executing the trust, and that without distinction, whether the said relations are connected by the father's or by the mother's side, and also without distinction of degree;" so that in that case it was considered, that a discretionary power was, according to the terms of the disposition, vested in the trustees, to divide that portion [433] of the property among the relations of the disposer, both on the father's and the mother's side.

A third case, to which I may also refer, for the purpose of establishing the same principle, is that of Snodgrass against Buchanan (ante p. 1281). The case was of this description, the dispositive clause was in these terms: "Therefore, for love and other causes, I do hereby assign, dispose, and make over from me, to and in favour of the said Captain Alexander Buchanan, and the heirs of his body, or his assigns; whom failing, to such of my mother's relations as my kind and respected friend, Mrs. Margaret Buchanan, widow of Dugald Buchanan, Esq. of Craibevain, shall appoint by a writing under her hand; which failing, etc." I consider that as another authority tending to establish the same position. The argument that was urged at the bar was, that in that case the question was not raised; but I consider that a strong circumstance tending to establish the position, for the cases to which I have referred had previously occurred. One was decided so far back as the year 1729, the other was decided at a subsequent period, both of them long anterior to the case to which I have referred; and when I advert a little to the manner in which the case to which I am now drawing your attention was contested by the activity and talent of counsel, the circumstance of the point not having been raised in that case, can be explained only from a thorough conviction of all professional gentlemen at the time practising in Scotland, that the point was too clear for argument; therefore, I consider that, though the question was not raised in that case, the circumstances connected [434] with the case, tend strongly to confirm the position to which I have already called your attention.

Another case was that of a disposition made by a person of the name of Alexander Horn. The facts of the case I find stated in the speech on giving judgment delivered by the late Lord Gifford, in a case to which I shall presently direct your Lordships' attention. Alexander Horn disposed of his property, or a part of his property, to the Lord Provost and Magistrates of the city of Edinburgh, to be applied, according to their discretion, among the poor labourers of that city. That case was quoted for the purpose of establishing the position advanced by the late noble Lord to whom I have referred, in the case of Hill against Burns (14th April, 1826); and this case is another authority tending to the same point, because that property was disposed of in favour of a particular class of persons, out of whom a selection was to be made after the death of the disponent, by the particular individuals to whom that property was conveyed.

The case to which I have referred, in which the case of Alexander Horn was cited, was a case of Hill against Hood's Trustees; that was a case in the first instance decided by the First Division of the Court of Session, and afterwards came before this House (14th April, 1826); and the material part, the disposition of the party, was in these terms: She appointed the residue of her estate to be applied by her trustees and their foresaids, in aid of the institutions for charitable and benevolent purposes established, or to be established, in the city of Glasgow and its neighbourhood; and that in such way and manner, and in such proportions to the principal, the capital, or the interest or annual [435] proceeds of the sums so to be appropriated, as to the trustees shall seem proper: declaring, as she thereby expressed, provided and declared, that they should be the sole judges of the appropriation of the residue for the purposes aforesaid. That case rested on the same principle, and was opposed on the grounds applied to the case now before you. Your Lordships were of opinion, upon the consideration of that case, that the decision of the judges in the Court below was correct and proper, and their judgment was affirmed. I refer to that judgment, of which I have a report now lying before me of the speech delivered by the late Lord Gifford; and it is important in point of authority, for it is a case not standing by itself; for when that case had been argued at the bar, and judgment was given, the noble and learned Lord took a review of the cases to which I have called your Lordships' attention; and the principle he extracted from those cases was the foundation of the judgment which he delivered. We are to consider, therefore, that those principles do not rest solely on the Courts in Scotland, but that they have passed under the review of this House, and have been approved and sanctioned by the House. Your Lordships extracted from them the principle on which the case of Hill v. Hood's Trustees was decided; and I advert to the case of Hill v. Hood's Trustees more particularly, because it was a material part of the foundation of the decision by the Court below in the case now before your Lordships. It was said at the bar, that the case of Hill v. Hood's Trustees did not apply to the present. To be sure the facts of that case are different from those of the present case, but the [436] principle of the case was the same; and when that case was cited by the learned judges in the Court below, and referred to as an authority, they did not refer to the facts of the case merely as governing the present case, but to the judgment of this House, to the principle upon which that was founded, and to the adoption of those authorities by the House, which had never before passed in review before your Lordships; the principle extracted from those authorities they considered as the foundation of the judgment of this House, and they applied that principle to the case now before you.

Before, however, I state the conclusion which I draw from these cases, it is necessary for me to advert to one case which was cited on the other side. I think only one case was relied on in argument, opposing the current of authorities to which I have called your Lordships' attention, and that was the case of Dick v. Fergusson. It is unnecessary for me to enter into the detail of that case of Dick v. Fergusson, because it was commented on in the judgment to which I have referred (Hill v. Burns): and after the facts of that case were commented upon before that noble and learned Lord, he was of opinion, and your Lordships adopted that opinion, that the decision in that case did not run counter to the authorities in the cases to which I have adverted. Thus much, however, I will say respecting that case. In that case the trustees refused to accept the trust, or to act upon it; and in a note by Lord Kames respecting that judgment, he puts the decision upon this ground: He says it was competent to the trustees in that case to have disposed of the [437] property in favour of the heir-at-law. The effect of their not acting under the trust was to give the property to the heir at law,—they have, therefore, by so doing declared their intention that the heir at law should take it: and, considered in that view, it does not at all contravene the current of authorities to which I have called your attention. I am justified, therefore, in saying that the authorities are uniform upon this subject, and I am of opinion that they establish the position, that the trustees may dispose of this property among certain classes of persons, or among particular objects, subject to the intention expressed by the donor, the creator of the trust.

That being the general principle, another objection was made in this case as to the generality of the disposition. It was said, the property is to be given to such relations as the wife shall point out, with the approbation of the Trustees. It was then said at the bar, What is the meaning of the term relations? it is indefinite; and they even went so far as to say, in a certain sense, every man is the relation of every other man: but at all events the classes of the relations in the ascending and descending line are numerous and indefinite. The answer I make is this, that in the cases to which I have alluded that very point occurred; for instance, in that of Murray v. Fleming, the disposition was in favour of any of his blood relations she should think most fit to be nominated. Blood relations, therefore, would embrace all persons who were connected in blood with the disponent,—a body of persons as extensive as it was possible to conceive, and yet in that case the Court were of opinion that the disposition was [438] good. In the next case to which I adverted, that of Brown and his relations, the disposition was to poor friends and relations, which the Court considered to embrace relatives both on the father's and on the mother's side:—the objection, therefore, was as open in that case as in the present, and yet the Court decided it in the manner I have mentioned. Again, in the case of Saundgrass v. Buchanan, the disposition was to the disponent's mother's relations, being again as extensive as it was possible for a disposition to be. The objects were relations. In none of these cases did the objection prevail; and it did not prevail because a particular individual was pointed out as the person who was to select among the class, and to point out those among the relations who were to take.

The same objection in point of principle will apply to those dispositions which were made in favour of charitable institutions, and in respect of those the same answer has been given. It is remarkable that, in the second case to which I have referred, the disposition was to the poorest friends and relations of the disponent, and that was considered a valid disposition: and in respect to charitable purposes, according to the law of England,* which, as to bequests of this kind, is more strict than the law of Scotland, that would be a valid disposition.

For these reasons, after carefully attending to this case,—after considering the most elaborate [439] argument at the bar, from a gentleman who never omits, in the course of his address, any arguments which can be useful to his case,—I mean the Dean of Faculty,—looking to those authorities, and to what your Lordships did in the case of Hill v. Hood's Trustees, I must suggest to your Lordships the propriety of affirming the decision of the Court below in this case.

Upon the trial of an issue directed to try whether for forty-six years prior to 1822, there existed a public foot road from G. to C., it was proved that from the year 1755 to 1789, the road was used by the public without interruption; and that stiles had in 1789 been placed in the fences by the owners of the land, over which the road passed. From the year 1797 there were frequent interruptions down to the date of the trial. The judge at the trial directed the jury that the interruptions proved, were not sufficient to defeat the right in the public to the footway in question; which right must in the evidence be presumed to have been established, by having been used for forty years and upwards, from the date of the interruption, as stated in the issue. Upon a bill of exceptions to this direction, held, that on proof of thirty-four years uninterrupted exercise of the right, it was competent for the jury to presume, and that they ought in point of law, to be directed to presume, an enjoyment corresponding with the manner in which the road had been enjoyed during the thirty-four years, establishing according to the law of Scotland, a prescriptive right of way.

This question arose upon a bill of exceptions. The facts and proceedings were fully stated by the Lord Chancellor in moving the judgment.

The Lord Chancellor: This was a case as to a public right of way on the north bank of the Clyde, from the city of Glasgow to a village of the name of Carmyle. In the course of the proceedings it was directed, that an issue should be prepared for the Jury Court. An issue was accordingly prepared in these terms: "Whether for forty years and upwards, prior to the months of March, April, or May 1822, there existed a public foot path or foot-road along the right bank of the river Clyde, from the city of Glasgow, from the place called the Green, to the [442] village called Carmyle, situated on the said bank of the said river?"

The issue came on for trial, under the direction of the Lord Commissioner of the Jury Court, and a verdict was found for the pursuers, establishing the right of way. An application was made for a new trial, on the ground of a misdirection in point of law. The argument for a new trial was carried on at considerable length, and the Court were finally of opinion, that there was no ground for a new trial. Afterwards a bill of exceptions, regularly signed, was tendered by the defender; and the question in point of law, with respect to the direction of the learned judge, came before the Court of Session, who, after hearing arguments, were of opinion, that the direction given by the Lord Commissioner at the trial was perfectly correct. It is from this judgment that the appeal has now been brought for your Lordships' decision. The whole case, therefore, arises upon the bill of exceptions; and I shall state very shortly, the effect of the evidence on the bill of exceptions, so far as it is necessary to point your attention to it, with reference to the direction of the learned judge who presided at the trial.

It appeared by the evidence of living witnesses who attended at the trial, that so far back as seventy years previously to the time of the trial, (I think as far back as the year 1755,) this way was used without interruption. There was no evidence whatever of any interruption of the right occurring until the year 1789, thirty-four years subsequent to the beginning of the period to which the evidence related. Not only was there [443] no evidence during that thirty-four years of any interruption of the right, but there was a distinct and positive evidence to the contrary. The exercise of the right of way had never, during that period, been at all interrupted; and there were various circumstances which were referred to in evidence, for the purpose of confirming that statement, and, among others, that in the fences there were regular stiles placed, in order to facilitate the passage of persons using the way. In the year 1789, for the first time, according to the evidence, this right was attempted to be interrupted. Even with regard to this interruption, there was contradictory evidence. It appeared however, by very clear and distinct evidence, that in the year 1797, an attempt had been made to interrupt the exercise of this right; and from the year 1797 down to the period of the trial, at successive periods, the occupiers of the property, over which the right of way extended, had at different times interrupted the exercise of it; but in no instance whatever, had these interruptions been finally successful. They had been always resisted; the fences which had been from time to time erected, had been pulled down; and the public had enjoyed the right of way, subject to these occasional interruptions, from the year 1755 down to the period of the trial. It appeared, therefore, that, except the interruption in the year 1789, even supposing that interruption to have been satisfactorily established, (with reference to which there was contradictory evidence,) there was no interruption existing at a period so far back as forty years previous to the time of the trial.

[444] Now these are all the facts, or rather the result of the facts, stated upon the bill of exceptions, necessary for the purpose of explaining the direction of the Lord Commissioner. His Lordship's direction was in these terms: "If the jury believed the witnesses on the part of the pursuers, the public appeared to have been in the possession of, and in the habit of using such foot-path for a long period of time,—more than forty years, (that there is no doubt of;) and that there was on the part of the defender, no evidence to establish an interruption till within the forty years, (with respect to that fact also there was no doubt;) that in that case, and upon the whole evidence, the truth of which the jury was to weigh and consider, the question was, Whether the interruption, as to which evidence on the part of the defender had been adduced, was sufficient to defeat the right, as to which the evidence had been given on the part of the pursuers? And the Lord Chief Commissioner did then and there give as his direction to the jury in point of law, that the interruptions proved, were not sufficient to defeat a right in the public to the foot-way in question."

Now pausing here, the direction of the Lord Chief Commissioner appears to be perfectly correct, that is, assuming the right of foot-way to have been satisfactorily established by evidence. The interruptions which were proved, were not sufficient to defeat such right. They were occasional interruptions, exercised during a period of about thirty-four or thirty-five years, but always resisted, and effectually resisted. Supposing, therefore, the right of way to have been established, [445] an attempt on the part of the occupiers of the land over which the way ran, from time to time to interrupt that right, but not effectually succeeding in interrupting that right, never can be considered as sufficient to get rid of a right of way once established. So far, therefore, there can be no doubt of the propriety of the direction of the Lord Commissioner. He then went on thus: "Which right must, on the evidence for the pursuers, if believed by the jury, be presumed to have been established by having been used for forty years and upwards from the date of the interruption, as stated in the issue."

Now with respect to that passage some doubt was entertained, and the principal part of the argument bore upon that part of the direction of the learned judge; but when it is considered with reference to the evidence, it appears to me to be perfectly distinct and intelligible. He tells the jury, that the right must, on the evidence for the pursuer, if that evidence be believed by the jury, be presumed to have been established by having been used for forty years and upwards from the date of the interruption, that is, previous to the date of the interruption in the manner stated in the issue; for in the issue, the attention of the jury is directed to the period of forty years' enjoyment, as being a period which is sufficient, if uninterrupted, to establish the right of way.

Now what is the evidence with respect to that part of the case? I shall assume, for the purpose of argument, that the interruption in 1789, was established to be an interruption without any contradictory evidence. I do not mean interruption that was finally successful, for the interruption [446] was resisted; but for thirty-four years previous to that time, this way had been used without any interruption at all, by the acquiescence of the proprietors of the land, over which the way ran. That carries back the evidence as far as seventy years,—as far back as the memory of any witness could extend, who was examined upon the trial,—as far as it is probable the recollection of any witness could apply to a case of this description; and if thirty-four years of uninterrupted exercise of the right of way were established, it was then competent for the jury to presume, and they ought in point of law to be directed by the learned judge to presume, from thirty-four years' exercise of a right of way uninterrupted, a previous enjoyment corresponding with the manner in which it had been enjoyed during the thirty-four years. They therefore, were entitled from the evidence to presume, that for forty years previous to the year 1789, the date of the first interruption, this right of way had been exercised without any interruption; more particularly from those circumstances stated in the evidence, that there were actually openings made by the proprietors of the land, for the purpose of allowing the free use and enjoyment of that right of way. The case then stood thus: The learned judge in substance told the jury, there is evidence, from which you may assume that for a particular period, namely for forty years, this way had been exercised without interruption. If you are of that opinion, then that is, according to the law of Scotland, sufficient to establish a prescriptive right of way; and if that right of way be once established in the manner I have stated, then I tell you in point [447] of law, that subsequent interruptions not acquiesced in, cannot defeat the right so acquired. It was contended, and contended strenuously, in argument by counsel at the bar, that, according to the law of Scotland, it was necessary to prove forty years' uninterrupted enjoyment down to the period of the trial. But it is quite impossible to maintain a position of that kind, for it would lead to this consequence, that if you were to establish an uninterrupted enjoyment, even for the period of sixty or seventy years, an occupier could at any time defeat that right so enjoyed, by successive obstructions, although those obstructions might be resisted by persons exercising the right of way, unless they thought proper to go into a Court of Justice. I apprehend that that cannot be the case. It cannot be the case certainly by the law of England. If the right be once established by clear and distinct evidence of enjoyment, it can be defeated only by distinct evidence of interruptions acquiesced in. There was no interruption here acquiesced in; and therefore the judgment given by the Court below, confirming the judgment of the Jury Court, sustaining the direction of the Lord Chief Commissioner upon the trial, ought to be affirmed.

In this case, as it appears to me that the direction of the judge to the jury was correct; and as there was an application made, in the first instance, for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection in point of law; and as that motion for a new trial was overruled; as the case was afterwards brought in upon a bill of exceptions, for the purpose of raising the same question; as the [448] Court of Session was of opinion, that there was no ground for the bill of exceptions, and confirmed the direction of the learned judge; under such circumstances, this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Judgment affirmed.
